The Scriptural institutions of Christianity are the commemorations of the facts which prove the truth of its doctrines. They are few, but important. The observance of the first day in the week is in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ, and a declaration of the truth of our own. In baptism, we commemorate the descent of the Spirit, and assert the necessity of a divine influence, to recover man from the fall. In the other sacrament, of the Lord's Supper, we commemorate the crucifixion, and profess our belief in the atonement.

The scriptural means by which the knowledge of the Christian religion is to be preserved in the world are the perpetual observance of the institutions, and the right interpretation of the completed Scriptures. To secure these great objects, the Divine Founder of Christianity appointed twelve teachers, and after them he appeared from the invisible state to appoint another, who should establish societies from among the mass of mankind, and set apart teachers to instruct the people, interpret the Scriptures, and maintain the institutions of the new religion. The apostles were equal among themselves. They governed the whole visible Church, or general body of Christians, when they were assembled together; and each was the spiritual ruler of the Church or Society which himself had founded.* The same mode of preserving Christianity has been continued from the earliest age to the present time.

Such was the Christianity which was established over the world at the period when the Canon of Scripture was finally closed. The design of its Great Author would have been fully accomplished, if the two great sources of error had not perverted the simplicity of truth. Vice and false philosophy are the only causes of heresy and error. The former endeavours to reconcile the purity and truth of Christianity with the conduct it has forbidden, whether it be ambition, pride, or folly, through all their differences and gradations—the latter refines, alters, objects to, or speculates upon, the doctrines of revelation, till it has established some new theory, or removed some primitive truth.

This view of Christianity enables us to form some criterion of truth, in the midst of all the discordant opinions of modern systems. Whatever doctrine has been invented by later writers, whether it be gradually established, as many of the corruptions of the Romanists have been, or proposed as a more correct interpretation of Scripture, as many of the Unitarian and German speculators have suggested their various novelties, is probably false, as it is certainly suspicious. If it was not once received by all Christians, in the primitive ages, in all their Churches, it is probably heretical. If it is not supported by some of the facts of Scripture it is suspicious. It is not generally remembered that the peculiar doctrines which characterize Christianity are all identified with facts. The facts are the foundation of the doctrine, and moral inferences are deducible from the doctrine which is thus sanctioned and established. The first creeds were very scanty, because controversies were few, and were decided by highly venerated teachers. They were enlarged, as the decisions of the Catholic Church, represented by its general councils, concluded the controversies which were commenced by the philosophy which wrongly explained, or wilfully rejected, the faith which was generally received. The general reception of an opinion among all Churches was esteemed a proof that it had been originally taught by the apostles and their successors.

Such was the new faith, which, at the closing of the Canon of Scripture, had begun to leaven the whole mass of the subjects of the imperial dominion. Even where it was not fully embraced, it elevated the mind, and restrained the conduct of many who would not openly profess it. The very philosophy which opposed or corrupted it inculcated in various instances the necessity of purity, the belief in one God, and the certainty of a future state.

Churches had been founded in Rome, Corinth, Crete, the cities of Asia Minor, in Britain, Spain, Italy, Antioch, and many others. The nations of the world had been brought under the Roman yoke, that a free communication might be maintained between all parts of the civilized world.

The usurpations of the Papacy had not begun, neither had the people proceeded to the opposite extreme of rejecting all government, as an infringement of their liberty. Every separate Church was a society complete in itself, governed through all its gradations of laity, and through the minor offices of the priesthood, the deacons, and the presbyters, by one episcopal head, who was liable to be deposed by the sentence of his own order, if he violated the faith of Christ. Every ruler was controlled by the rest of his brethren, while every independent hierarchy preserved its freedom under the empire of known law. The world has not since beheld more union in the belief, or more perfection in the conduct of Christians. This was the plan which preserved the purity of the Christian creed against the first impugnors of the Majesty of the Son of God. This was the polity which stamped the reprobation of the general body of Christians, at Nice, upon the Arians, who denied the Godhead of Christ—at Constantinople, against the Apollinarian heresy which denied his humanity. It was this which condemned, at Ephesus, Nestorius, who asserted that Christ was two persons; and condemned, at Chalcedon, the error of Eutyches, who confounded his twofold nature. At that time the ghost of imperial Rome was not seated upon the seven hills to terrify the nations with the spiritual thunders of the Vatican, neither was every absurdity of doctrine, and every irregularity in discipline, defended as a proof of liberty and freedom from prejudice.

* [This opinion of Mr. Townsend is asserted in Note 2, and in Note 19, Part IV. but from which the Editor must express a respectful but decided dissent. The model of ecclesiastical legislation in Acts (chap. xv.) inclines him fully to the belief, that the government and discipline of the Church should be conducted, not by bishops alone, or by two separate bodies, of bishops, and of clergy and laity, as in the Protestant Episcopal Church; but by all of them, united in one body. If inspired apostles associated with themselves "elders and brethren," in their first synodical act, it ill becomes their uninspired successors to exalt themselves into an independent and irresponsible council.—EDITOR.]

The Churches of God in these early ages were opposed by every weapon which the devices of an evil spirit, or the corruptions of the human heart, could suggest: and their conquests were made over its most inveterate foes. The civil and military powers of the idolatrous governments opposed them by ten sanguinary persecutions: and though the most eminent historian of the last century, in imitation of a learned critic (Dodwell Dissert. Cyprian), has endeavoured to diminish the number of the sufferers, the undeniable evidence which still remains abundantly demonstrates the prejudice, hatred, and cruelty of the persecutors, and the singular union of holiness and zeal, of fortitude and patience, among the blameless sufferers in the cause of Christianity. We must pass over the cruel persecutions of Nero and Domitian, in which the chief of the remaining apostles, with Timothy, Onesimus, Dionysius the Areopagite, and other illustrious names, were put to death. Neither were the more flagitious and abandoned of the Roman emperors the sole imperial adversaries of the rising Churches. A religion which demands the homage of the heart, and permits no divided dominion, even with the least known evil, is no less detested by the mild and gentle liberality which pleads for the indulgence of the more general vices, than it is hated by the openly corrupt. The third persecution of the Christians under Trajan and Adrian, and the fourth by the Antonines and Marcus Aurelius, were even more extensive in their effects, and equally violent in their fury. The fierce hatred of Severus, which called forth the eloquent apology of Tertullian, and the indignant remonstrances of Clemens Alexandrinus, and Minucius Felix—the selfish hostility of Maximin—the unsparing severity of Decius, who threatened death to the mitigators of the sufferings of Christians—the hypocritical opposition of Valerian, the murderer of Cyprian, who soothed before he slaughtered his victims—the unrelenting efforts of Diocletian to extirpate the very name, and race, and Scriptures of the followers of the crucified Jesus—all these were borne by the despised and hated Christians: who conquered by patient endurance, and triumphed by unresisting submission. The heathen raged, and the people imagined a vain thing: and if the Christians had appealed to the sword, as from their numbers they might have done, their Master had been dishonored by their service, and the world had lost the honorable and perfect witness they bore by their sufferings, to their conviction of the truth of the Gospel.

It was not only the menace and the torture, the rack and the scourge, the stake and the sword, which raised themselves against the members of the Churches of God. The ridicule of the satirist—the world's dread laugh—the scorn of the philosophical leaders of the public opinion—the reasoning of the learned—contempt, and wonder, and pity—all that could move the affections or break the resolution—the fear of infamy, which shrinks from slander—the love of approbation, which excites to virtuous and useful actions, and leads men to honorable eminence—all of these, and more than these powerful motives of action, appealed in vain to the hearts of the primitive Christians. The more their spiritual enemies within, and the turbulent heathen without, oppressed the Churches of Christ, the more "they multiplied and grew," till the majority of the empire professed the faith of the Gospel, and the emperor of Rome became the convert and protector of the faith of Christ.

II. From the Death of Constantine to the Rise of the Papal Power by the grant of Phocas.

Though the philosophy of the Gnostics, the Docetæ, the Marcionites, and others, had corrupted in many instances the purity of Christianity, the two principal heresies which still divide the Universal Church commenced at this period. One contaminated the doctrine, the other destroyed the government of the independent episcopal Churches. The error of Arius and the usurpations of the Church at Rome were the two principal sources of all the corruptions which have degraded Christians. Ecclesiastical history ought only to have related the progress of mankind in knowledge, virtue, and happiness: it tells the same sad and melancholy tale of human infirmity, and crime and folly, which profane history has given to the world.

The common opinion of any age may be known by the opposition which it has made to those who offer their own conclusions to general acceptance. The primitive ages were careful to preserve the scriptural doctrine of the twofold nature of Christ, and to assert his Humanity while they defended his Divinity. The various errors which the spurious philosophy of the first three centuries submitted to the approbation of the Churches, were generally founded on the attempt to exalt the divinity at the expense of the humanity of Christ. The Gnostics invented their notion of the Eons—the Docetæ, their opinion that the form of Christ was not real, but a phantom only: and that the sufferings of Christ in his own person was an impossibility. The error of Arius was founded on the opposite extreme. This heresiarch endeavoured to introduce an opinion, which the Universal Church believed to be derogatory to the Divinity of its Founder, that our Lord was only the first, and greatest, and highest of all created beings. This opinion appeared to him to be more consistent with human reason: and it became, therefore, a part of his philosophy: and he rejected the plainer declaration of Scripture, and the evidence of antiquity both of the Jews and Gentiles. The Jews believed their Logos to be a Divine Being—the Christians received Christ as that Logos, because his own assertions and actions, as well as the testimony of St. John, demonstrated its truth. The sources of heresy with Arius were the same as those which influence so many at present. His private speculations were preferred to that interpretation of Scripture which had been uniformly adopted by the Universal Church. He did not, or would not, remember, that Scripture is superior to reason: and that the prostration of our intellect, which man cannot demand of man, is an act of worthy and reasonable homage to God.

The vehement disputes which convulsed the whole Church through these three centuries, and which respectively occasioned the calling of the first general councils, may be said to have originated in the innovations of Arius. The Councils of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, have confirmed the general opinions of the primitive Churches, and that also of the far greater portion of Christians at present, on the subject of the person of Christ, of the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Atonement. Our most eminent historian has expressed himself with the sarcastic bitterness, so usual with him when Christianity is mentioned, respecting these councils. The faults of Churches and of Christians have always been the triumph of infidelity. Now, as well as formerly, the crimes and follies of David make the enemies of God to blaspheme. He has omitted, however, to relate the influence of these dissensions among Christians upon the people of the East. The usual consequences of controversy, religious indifference, unscriptural error, contempt of the zealous maintainers of truth, and general carelessness of life, prepared the way for any bold teacher, who could triumph over the increasing ignorance, unite the broken fragments of truth and falsehood into one system, and arouse the dormant superstition of the age. There is a fulness of time for error as well as for truth. As the progressive improvement of the human race, by knowledge and literature and science among the heathens, by revelation among the Jews, and by universal peace among all nations, rendered the time of our Lord's incarnation the very fittest period for establishing a religion, founded on evidence which entreated the careful and deliberate investigation of all mankind, that they might be satisfied of its truth, and embrace it upon conviction: so did the progressive deterioration of the age, by the extinction of learning among the heathen, in consequence of the political convulsions of the Roman empire, and the savage inroads of the barbarians, by the puerile attention to trifles among the Jews, by the general contempt in which they were held, and the almost universal mental debasement, render this the fittest period for the general establishment of the two great corruptions of Christianity—the apostacies of Rome, and of Mahomet, the predicted rival enemies of pure religion in the west and east.

It would lead me too far from my object to relate at greater length the causes of the origin, progress, and depression, of the empire of Mahomet: its subsequent temporary revival, the entire loss of its political power as the dangerous rival of its neighbours, and its present increasing weakness by the gradual separation and independence of its fairest provinces. Our writers on prophecy have shown the great probability, that as these two masses of error arose together, their power will be also destroyed at the same time, when the prophetic period of 1260 years, which commenced in the year 600, shall have elapsed. I am not willing, however, to rest any argument upon these interpretations. Time and history are the only certain interpreters of prophecy: and though the declining power of the Mahometan apostacy may appear to sanction this hypothesis, the reviving influence of the unscriptural errors and political power of Romanism excites at once our sorrow and surprise, and compels us to withhold our assent to the desired interpretation, till the veil is yet more withdrawn from the future. Our attention will be more usefully directed to the causes and growth of the western apostacy of the Church of Rome.

The early Churches were united into one society by the observance of one common law—submission to episcopal government. A member of the episcopal Church of one country was considered a member of the Catholic Church of Christ, in every country where he might happen to travel. When Christianity began to be more extensively dispersed, the Church at Rome was distinguished above all others by the number and wealth of its converts. The bishop of Rome was soon enabled, by the munificent donations which were made to the Church, to assume greater pomp, and exercise more extensive power than other bishops. Many circumstances occurred to increase and establish his influence. The provinces had been accustomed to bring their civil appeals to Rome; this became the precedent for the members of the provincial Churches to appeal from their own bishops to the bishop of Rome. A general deference was paid among the western Churches in the first centuries to the see of Rome, though its more open usurpations were repelled with contempt. When Victor, who was bishop of Rome in the year 195, excommunicated the Churches of Asia, who refused to observe Easter in the manner which he judged to be right, Irenæus, the metropolitan of France, reproved his presumption. In the year 250, the African bishops peremptorily refused to submit to the mandate of the bishop of Rome, and received again their heretical bishops. The Church of Spain also, a few years afterwards, refused submission to the Roman pontiff, when he insisted on their restoration, after they had been deposed for offering sacrifice to idols. These facts prove the early assumption of power, and the continued ambition of the popes in the primitive ages, and the refusal of the independent episcopal Churches to submit to their dominion.

The political divisions of Italy in the fourth century considerably increased the influence and power of the see of Rome, the ecclesiastical divisions of the Church being made conformable with those of the empire. Every province had its metropolitan (Hallam, vol. ii. p. 21), and every vicariate its ecclesiastical primate. The bishop of Rome presided in the latter capacity over the Roman vicariate, which comprehended southern Italy, and the three chief Mediterranean islands. But none of the ten provinces which formed this division had any metropolitan, so that the popes exercised all metropolitan functions within them, such as the consecration of bishops, the convocation of synods, the ultimate decision of appeals, and many other acts of authority. These provinces were called the Roman Patriarchate, and by gradually enlarging its boundaries, and by applying the maxims of jurisdiction by which it was governed to all the western Churches, the asserted primacy was extended and strengthened over the fairest portion of the empire. Illyricum, for instance, was added to the patriarchate of Rome, by an act of primacy, and no consecration of bishops was permitted without the sanction of the bishop of Rome. This took place before the end of the fourth century.

Another principal circumstance which contributed to the establishment of the power of the Church of Rome, was the removal of the seat of empire from that city to Constantinople. The political influence always attendant on the immediate presence of the sovereign consequently ceased; and the principal magistrate at Rome was the head of its Church. The sudden power which was thus unavoidably, though unintentionally, conferred on the pontiff, was increased by the abandonment of Rome and of Italy by its principal senators. To this cause of influence we must add the progress of the conversion of the northern nations, and the grant of patriarchal power to Pope Damasus, by Gratian and Valentinian, over the whole western Church, sanctioning the custom of appeals to Rome. The renewal of this edict by Valentinian the Third still further increased the power of the pontiff. The custom of pilgrimages to the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul; the introduction of the Gregorian Litany; and, more than all these, the granting the title of Universal Bishop by Phocas, completed the worldly structure of ecclesiastical ambition, which had now usurped the name of the Church of Christ, and appeared to be the rolling stone which should become the predicted mountain, and fill the whole earth.

III. Progress and Triumph of the Church of Rome.

The universal good which Christianity will eventually produce to the world will be accomplished in that one only manner which results from our state of trial—the gradual overruling of evil. The freedom of man's actions counteracts for a time the designs of his Creator. The increasing divisions among nations, the general ignorance, the continued ambition of Rome, and the speculative philosophy which was founded on words and imaginations, all conspired to obscure the simplicity of Christianity. Every corruption was made permanent by the establishment of the power of Rome by the authority of Phocas. From this period to the time of the Council of Trent, the history of Christianity in Europe presents us with little else than a detail of increasing errors in its doctrines, the gradual additions to the temporal dominion of the Roman pontiffs, and the continued opposition to the falsehood which abounded on the one side, and to the encroachments which prevailed on the other.

Though many superstitious practices and unscriptural opinions had debased the purity of the early faith, there can be no comparison between the state of religious error when the grant of Phocas conferred political power on the Roman pontiff, and the extent to which the system of imposture, deceit, and falsehood, subsequently attained, by the time when the Council of Trent impressed its seal on the great charter of papal slavery. The published works of Pope Leo, who sent Augustine to England, prove that the religious faith of that day was essentially different, in the most important doctrines, from the creed which was sanctioned by the Council of Trent. The parallel between the faith of the two periods has been drawn at some length by an eminent divine of the last century. I have elsewhere extracted from Bishop Stillingfleet the passage to which I refer. It will be seen that the doctrines of solitary masses, masses for the dead, transubstantiation, the supremacy of the pope, the equal authority of Scripture and tradition, the equal authority of the apocryphal with the canonical books of Scripture, the power of good works to deserve salvation, the confession of sins in private to the priest, communion in one kind, and the worship of images, were all condemned by Pope Leo; and were all decreed to be articles of faith, and as such to be implicitly received on pain of damnation, by the Council of Trent. This remarkable act destroys at once the truth of the assertion so generally made, that the Church of Rome has retained an unchangeable creed. The faith of that Church is an embodied collection of true and false opinions; partly derived from misinterpreted Scripture, but principally invented in the course of the controversies and discussions which have ever prevailed in the world, and which would have escaped from the memory of mankind, with other absurdities of the age of ignorance, if they had not been preserved, and sanctioned, and enforced, by the asserted infallibility of the most fallible Church on earth. Like the ghosts, and sorcerers, and witches, and magicians, of the midnight darkness, which the morning beams of our knowledge have dispersed, all would have fled for ever, if the usurper of the throne of God had not said, Let there be night, and it was, and is night. The Council of Trent, with the Gorgon look of an intellectual death, has gazed on the chaos which extends over the ages of ignorance. Spurious decretals, useless vows, abominable doctrines, unreasonable and idolatrous and superstitious practices are frozen into one solid bridge; and error and falsehood pass freely from hell to earth to enslave and to curse mankind.

If the absurdities to which I allude had been harmless and innocent; if falsehood could be publicly taught, and the peace and happiness of nations continue; he who opposed error, and maintained the cause of truth, might be justly condemned for disturbing the peace of society, whatever were the falsehoods which were received by the community. If the volumes of theologians only recorded the weakness of human intellect, the tale might excite contempt or pity; and the Protestant objector to falsehood be regarded with the same lofty contempt as we now entertain for its proposer and defender. But the history of Christian nations is nothing else but a detail of the consequences of the prevalence of certain religious opinions. The voice of prophecy would not have stigmatized the corruptions of Rome by its stern and bitter reproach, if the falsehood which it teaches had been consistent either with the temporal or future happiness of nations. From considering the gradual success of erroneous principles, let us look to their consequences, as they are recorded by history. From the grant of Phocas, to the age of Luther, the annals of Europe are filled with one long catalogue of crime, produced by the influence of the corruptions of the Church of Rome. The depositions of princes, the fomenting of rebellions, the flagitious lives of the popes, the scandalous decrees against the freedom of opinion, the persecutions of the objectors to the power of Rome, which disgrace this sad portion of the history of the world, have been so amply and so frequently related, that it is only now necessary to allude to them. The principles which produced these deplorable effects on religion, and liberty, and happiness are still maintained. They are triumphant on the continent; they are reviving in England. Their defenders are heard with applause; their opponents are treated with insult.

IV. The Reformation both in its good and bad Effects.

The friends of the Church of Rome had long endeavoured to effect its reformation before the age of Luther. Indignant remonstrances, the most energetic appeals, the most affecting entreaties, the most bitter and galling satire, were alike in vain exerted to induce the removal of abuses. The natural reason of thinking men was shocked at the consequences of the papal doctrines. I could select, from the writings of the Romanist divines themselves, a collection of recorded immoralities, the unavoidable result of the religious principles inculcated by the Church of Rome, which would not be credible if they had been related by a Protestant. In this state of things, the injudicious enforcement of one of the more objectionable doctrines of its absurd creed elicited the spark which fired the long-prepared train of public indignation. Permissions to commit sin were publicly sold, under the pretence of remitting the penalties of the guilt which their commission would have contracted; the quarrel between the rival societies of monks, who were desirous of participating in the profits of this scandalous traffic, occasioned that gradual, open, and indignant opposition to the Church of Rome, which ended in the alienation of its fairest provinces, and the restoration of that pure religion, and unfettered liberty of mind, which it had been among the original objects of Christianity to secure to its adherents.

We shall never be able to appreciate, to their full extent, the blessings which the Reformation has restored to the world, unless we remember the evils which the preceding superstition had proposed and confirmed. The Scriptures were opened. The oracles of God had long been silenced, and the approbation or condemnation of human actions, as well as the articles of faith itself, had long been pronounced by an usurping priesthood. It is needless to enlarge upon the praises of the Volume of Inspiration as a preferable guide of conduct, to the mandates of the maintainers and teachers of unauthorized tradition. The Almighty was restored to his dominion over conscience. The saint, the relic, and the image were deposed together. Prayer again became the homage of the heart to God, instead of the unmeaning routine of unintelligible words, into which it had been slowly but effectually degraded. Marriage was restored to the priesthood; who became again the leaven of society, the salt of the world, mingling with the mass, and preserving it from the putrefaction of vice and error. The sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper again became the two pillars of the visible Church; and the human mind was permitted and encouraged to think and reason for itself, within those limits only which God and his Revelation had fixed, at once the barrier, and yet the unlimited theatre of its exertion.

The evil which has resulted from the Reformation is the abuse of the privileges which that event conferred upon mankind. Christianity had been so long identified with Romanism, that much of its proper restraint upon both speculation and action were thrown off, with the rejection of its corruptions. The result of contempt on one side, and adherence to these corruptions on the other, has at length appeared, in that terrible convulsion which assumed the form of presumptuous and avowed infidelity, and tore asunder the remaining chains of Romanism. That effort has passed away, and the chains are again riveting. The next violent reaction will probably introduce the only remedy for the diseases of the world—the principles of the great Reformation.

I will not weary the reader with a detail of the battles which were fought, the treaties which were made, or the crimes which were committed, by both parties, before the Reformation became permanent in Europe, or in England. With each there was much to be condemned. Each party may be proud, or ashamed, of its saints, its hypocrites, or its martyrs. The consequences will deserve our gratitude, while the Scriptures of truth, the freedom of intellect, the establishment of pure religion, and the principles of civil liberty, can be appreciated by the natives of Europe. Public happiness had been destroyed, because the morality on which it rests had been corrupted by the religion of Rome. The Reformation was the effect of the desire of the people of Christendom to throw off the yoke of an immoral and enslaving despotism; and the providential overruling of apparent accident caused that Luther should become the successful organ of expressing the general opinion, and accomplishing the overthrow of the usurpations and errors of the ages of ignorance.

V. History of Christianity since the Reformation, with the Prospect of its future Dominion over all Mankind.

The enactment of the decrees of the Council of Trent, and the general adoption of Protestant principles in Germany, Sweden, France, and England, occasioned long and fierce wars, and many opposite religious theories, systems, and confessions of faith. The federated republic of Europe was divided by a religious civil war, of which Spain and the Pope were the leaders on the one part; and England and Holland the heads of the Reformation. It is not necessary to enumerate the various collisions which took place between these parties on the Continent, the efforts of the Jesuits, the wars of the league in France, the persecutions under Charles V. and Philip II. in the Netherlands, or the changes of fortune, and the fluctuations of opinion, which were the unavoidable result of religious contentions, and which, with all their evils, were infinitely preferable to the preceding darkness, and persecution, and ignorance. Sufficient of the history of any party, sect, or country, may be learned from the history of its chiefs. The review of the conduct of Elizabeth and of Spain, immediately after the principal question had been discussed by the opposite theologians, will be sufficient to enable us to form a right estimate of the state of religion at the completion of the Reformation.

On her accession to the throne, Elizabeth found three distinct religious parties eagerly imploring the sanction of the state—the adherents of the old religion; the partisans of the establishment of her brother Edward; and the admirers of a system of ecclesiastical polity which had been lately invented by a learned theologian of Geneva. To all these the modern opinion of toleration had not yet become generally known. It was a sentiment which some few men of enlarged minds had endeavoured to recommend, but to which no attention had been paid. Nor did either party desire toleration. They aimed at union in religious opinions, by promoting truth; and they so entirely considered truth to be with themselves respectively, that their efforts were wholly directed to the recommendation of their own doctrines. The queen, as I have elsewhere attempted to show, was not zealously attached to either creed. The temporal rights of princes were involved in the controversy, and Elizabeth decided on adopting the principles of the Reformation, and restoring, with but few alterations, the establishment which had already received the general approbation of her people under her brother Edward.

The testimony of any modern theologian, who may profess himself to be attached to the Church of England, will be received with jealousy and suspicion, on account of his supposed biased preference. It may be only necessary therefore to refer to facts, and to avoid any enlargement on those reasons which appear to compel an impartial inquirer to conclude that the form of Church government established in England is preferable to that of any other religious society, now claiming the approbation of a Protestant Christian. It may be sufficient to remark, that the reformers, in the reign of Edward, wisely endeavoured to retain as much of the religion of their ancestors as possible; and to receive nothing as good, either because it was novel, or because it differed more widely from the Church of Rome. The consequence of this great moderation was, that the people were generally united in the reign of Edward in support of the Protestant Church; and the union would have continued, if two unfortunate circumstances had not prevented it: the obedience of the Romanists to the bull of the pope, in the reign of Elizabeth, which commanded the people not to continue to frequent their parish churches—and the desire of the exiles who returned to England from the continent, after the death of Mary, to introduce the new, and, as they believed, the purer form of ecclesiastical regimen, which they had imbibed in the lecture room of Geneva.

I may be permitted to observe here, that the long controversy, which has been so frequently agitated between various parties in England, respecting the origin of some of the doctrinal articles of faith professed by the Church of England, may be said to have been decided by the most unbending of all testimonies—that of dates. It has been affirmed by many, that the articles in question were borrowed from the opinions which were taught by the Reformer of Geneva. A reference to the dates when those documents, upon which the articles of this Church were founded, were first published, will demonstrate that the establishment was settled rather on Lutheran or Melancthonian, than on Calvinian principles. This point has been amply discussed by two of our modern divines, Mr. Todd and the Archbishop of Cashel.

At the time when Elizabeth in England had peacefully restored the Protestantism of our early reformers, Philip was busily engaged in extirpating the adherents of the same opinions by means of the sanguinary inquisition, and proscriptive decrees, both in Spain and the Netherlands. So great was the power, at this time, of the Church of Rome throughout Europe, that it seemed impossible but that Protestantism must be extinguished under the universal persecution, if it had not pleased the providence of God to grant his protection to its sacred cause. Though we no longer witness the manifestations of the Holy One from above, nor hear the thunders of Sinai, nor wonder at miraculous interpositions, the course of this world is as uniformly and as certainly ordered now as formerly, by the invisible providence of God. The designs of the Almighty are still accomplishing. One plan it has always pleased Him to adopt for the protection of truth. When the blood of martyrs is shed in vain, and the Church is threatened with its utmost danger, its deliverance is effected by the elevation of some one nation to defend and rescue the ark. If the King of Spain had succeeded in his attempted conquest of England, the banner which the pope had blessed would have now waved victorious over England and the continent. The Protestant witnesses who had escaped persecution would have been reduced to the condition of the Waldenses; and so probable was the success of the head of the cause of Rome, that it seems most rational and wise to impute the victory of Elizabeth to the immediate interposition of the Almighty. Hitherto the Protestants had been without an ostensible head. It was only in the moment of the greatest danger to their cause, when the united strength of Europe was ready to overwhelm them, that the sovereign of England was prepared to avert the storm which must have destroyed the public profession of the reformed religion. The errors of Rome appeared, for the first time in its history, to be embodied in the form of a general armament against truth; and then, for the first time, the Protestant sword was wielded by the hands of England, never to be again returned to its scabbard, till the danger from the same enemy shall utterly and finally cease.

In the reign of James an attempt was made to unite the Romanists of England by the bond of a new oath of allegiance. The union was forbidden by the pope.

The ancient jealousy has not ceased. The opinions of the people and the wisdom of the legislature are alike divided respecting the extent of the privileges which may be allowed to the adherents of the corruptions of Christianity. This is not the fittest opportunity of discussing the question whether the genius of Romanism is altered, or whether the liberality of the Protestants is degenerating into weakness.

When the danger which had threatened the establishment effected by Elizabeth had nearly ceased, another evil arose, from the opposition of the partisans of that church polity, and of those theological doctrines, which had been submitted to the world by the Reformer of Geneva. The monarchy and hierarchy yielded to the tempest.

During this struggle, the people had become divided into the austere and the profane. On the restoration of the monarchy, the latter were for a time triumphant. Infidelity infected the higher classes, and a gloomy discontent brooded over the lower; while the intermediate ranks of society preserved the temperate attachment of their fathers to the institutions of the country. The utmost jealousy prevailed among them, against both the extremes which had thus threatened the extinction of the Protestant Church. In the next reign the decision of the people was irresistibly declared against the appearance of the influence of Rome; and the most solemn national act which has ever yet adorned the annals of a great country, gave the throne to a Protestant, on condition of the perpetual exclusion of Romanism from the councils of the state.

It was necessary thus briefly to allude to these transactions, that we may understand the manner in which the true religion, which confirms the existence of civil liberty and perfect toleration, has been maintained among so many fluctuations. England still continues (as we have abundant reason to offer up our prayers to God, that it may continue till Christ shall come to judgment) to be the only powerful state whose government is exclusively Protestant. It is necessary to the existence of truth, and freedom, and human happiness, that this sublime distinction should continue.

In the mean time, when national profligacy, in the reign of Charles the Second, had usurped the place of national austerity, the restored clergy distinguished themselves by endeavouring to heal not only those wounds which religious enthusiasm had inflicted, by introducing a better style of instruction; but also those which infidelity had inflicted, by devoting their own attention, and by directing the people in general, to the study of the evidences of Christianity. They thus established religion on that firm and immovable basis, from which it can never be thrown down. While they kept this object steadily in view, they were no less unanimous in writing and preaching against the ancient enemies of their Church, and of the religion of Christ in general. The good consequence of their exertions was effectually demonstrated by the overthrow of the remnant of papal influence at a moment when they accomplished the downfall of the despotism which would have fastened the yoke on the neck of England. By the labors of the clergy, civil and ecclesiastical tyranny fell together; and never was the nation so powerful, or the Church so pure, as at the period of that glorious Revolution, which sealed the charter of that political and religious liberty for which we had contended through so many centuries.

After the period of the Revolution, till that dreadful shaking of nations, which commenced with the convulsions in France, a general religious repose seemed to tranquillize the world. The influence which the Church of England exercised over the people was rudely shaken by the efforts of two of her ministers, who afterwards separated from her communion; and who in different ways have strengthened the various religious parties which still survived the restoration of the monarchy. Wesley and Whitfield were of opinion that the clergy were inactive, and they endeavoured to supply their defects. Instead of attempting to interest the hierarchy and the state in the reformation of supposed evils, they appealed to the people against their teachers, whom they stigmatized as negligent; while they approved of their religious opinions, and acquitted them of immoral conduct. The effects of the labors of these zealous teachers still continue; and when the alienation of the public mind from the institutions of the country, which they too much induced, shall be removed, the consequences of their exertions will be increased morality, and unobjectionable good.

The results of the French Revolution are so extensive, that I shall not enter at present into this subject.

Twelve years have now elapsed since the great contest which terminated this convulsion. We cannot so interpret the prophecies of God, that we may certainly predict the future. The present, however, is before us, and is worthy of our attention. A new spirit seems to be infused into a large number, while elsewhere there appears to be either much religious indifference, or a revival of the influence of the corruptions of the Church of Rome. In Europe, we see its finest countries, France, Spain, Portugal, and others, submitting to the ancient error; and prevented from breaking their chains by the union of their rulers; all of whom are desirous of perpetuating the dominion of that enemy of civil liberty and true religion which tolerates no opposite opinion, and has been hitherto refused admission, on this account, into the senate of England. The protestantism of Geneva is deadened—its gold has become dim—the Divinity of Christ has been deposed from the school of Calvin. In Germany, the purity of faith has been sullied by the speculative Deism of its more celebrated theologians. Michaelis, Semler, Eichhorn, and many others, deserve the censure of Protestants. Africa and the East are still lying prostrate before the altars of the dark idolatries of their fathers. The voice of England has been heard in the recesses of their groves. It has resounded through their temples. Their gods are trembling in their shrines, and Dagon is falling before the ark of Jehovah. The Church and the State of England have at length adopted the only effectual plan of accomplishing good. Without repressing by useless persecution the desultory efforts of unauthorized, and sometimes of ill-judging zeal, they have clothed the truth of God with the robes of rightful authority, and invited the heathen and ignorant, whom they are able to influence, to receive the Scriptures, and become free, happy, enlightened, and holy Christians.

It is difficult to speak of the actual religious condition of England without appearing to design needless offence against some one party or class among the people. This would be equally unnecessary and unwise; and I need not say it is contrary to my intention. I well know that I cannot even mention some few facts without offence, even though I would speak as a Christian to all classes, not as a partisan to one. I would otherwise have observed, to what extent the three great divisions of religious opinion which prevailed in the reign of Elizabeth still exist among us—and have attempted to form an estimate of the influence of each, both upon the people in general, upon the government, and upon the various parties in our senate. All this, however, would be misplaced, and I defer such inquiries till a future opportunity. The age is characterized by benevolent intention and active exertion. Insurmountable difficulties appear to prevent the accomplishment of the only plan, by which the greatest, most permanent, and certain good would be effected; namely, that all the designs of approvable usefulness, which are now attempted by various popular societies and by pious individuals, should be conducted by a national Church in its corporate form. The spirit of Christian zeal should be made the bond of union at home while it devises schemes of benevolence abroad. I could suggest much on this subject, if I was not fully aware, that the most useful and unobjectionable designs must be considered visionary when they appear to be impracticable.

With respect to the future, I consider history to be the only interpreter of prophecy, and I dare not be guilty of the presumption of asserting what God has not revealed. Some facts, however, appear to be so plainly predicted, that we may confidently affirm they will certainly take place:—the eventual conversion of the Jews—the overthrow of the Mahometan power in the East—the overthrow of Romanism, the apostacy of the West, and of idolatry and infidelity over the whole world, may be anticipated by every believer in Scripture. But through what variety of untried ways it may please God that the visible Church should pass is not related. The Millennium, or universal reign of virtue, is the most rational opinion which a man can form, who believes in a Providence, and is satisfied of the true Christian doctrine of the original dignity and present degradation of man, as a spiritual though fallen being. The blood of the Atonement cannot have been shed in vain. The revolted province of earth must be recovered to the dominion of the KING of kings, from the Prince of Darkness. The time must arrive when the progress of knowledge shall have banished ignorance; and the influence of holiness and virtue be more prevalent than that of wickedness and vice. Then will the perfection of the human race be completed, and evil be overruled by good. Then the human race shall have attained to the highest state of good which this lower existence can afford them; and after the object of man's creation shall have thus been answered, and the tree of life bloom again in this Paradise, where it was first planted, the fullness of time will have come, when the enlarged and purified faculties of man shall be prepared for a higher state of existence; and the heaven and the earth shall pass away but the word of these prophecies shall last for ever, though clouds and darkness, and thick darkness, may now veil His glory from the reason and curiosity of man. The happiness of man is the object of all the dispensations of God; and the temporary existence of evil cannot counteract the designs of Omnipotence. Our Father, which art in heaven, may thy kingdom of glory come!

ON

THE HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS.

PART I.

NOTE I.—PART I.

THE place assigned in this Arrangement to Mark i. 1. is sanctioned by the authorities of Dr. Campbell^a, Le Clerc^b, and Pilkington^c; the last of whom prefixes it to his Harmony as an appropriate preface to the whole of the evangelical narrative. The word εὐαγγέλιον, in this passage, appears to bear the same signification as in another text of the same Evangelist, Mark xiv. 9. ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅπου ἔαν κηρυχθῇ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον^d τοῦτο εἰς ὅλον τὸν κόσμον, κ. τ. λ. In both these passages the more obvious sense of the word seems to be, ‘The narrative, or record, of our Lord’s life and actions,’ Mark i. 1. “The beginning of the History of Jesus Christ,” &c.—and in Mark xiv. 9. “Wherever the relation of my actions shall be told, through the whole world, there also,” &c. To this opinion, however, are opposed the eminent authorities of Michaelis^e, Bishop Marsh^f, Archbishop Newcome^g, Lightfoot^h, Doddridgeⁱ, Markland^j, Whitby^k, Grotius^l, Kuinoel^m, and many others, who consider the passage in question but the first phrase of a long sentence, and consequently not to be separated from the context. They would render the passage thus, —“The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was made by John, who baptized in the wilderness, and preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins; as it is written,” &c. It is thus translated in the German New Testament of Michaelis, and Bishop Marsh is of opinion that it is correct; “If the first sentence,” he observes, “‘The beginning of the Gospel of,’ &c. was used as a title only to the rest of the book, then St. Mark’s Gospel would have begun with ὡς γέγραπται, which would be an unsuitable commencement to any narrative.” But to this it may be answered, that the commencement, which would be unsuitable to a profane writer, who carefully studied the arts of composition, and weighed his sentences, and balanced his periods, would be by no means so to the evangelical writers, who are careless on these points, and express themselves with that simplicity, which is the distinguishing characteristic of every composition solely aiming at the plain narration of facts. The sacred penmen expressed themselves in the common idiom of their country, and the commencement of a narrative with an appeal to their ancient prophets would not have appeared unnatural, or singular, to the persons to whom St. Mark’s Gospel was addressed. Dr. Campbell very justly observes, that the expression ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἐγένετο Ἰωάννης βαπτίζων, &c. is in no wise agreeable to the style of the sacred writers, whereas ἐγένετο Ἰωάννης βαπτίζων is quite in their idiom. The point itself, indeed, is comparatively unimportant; but, after an attentive perusal of the references, I cannot but decide in favor of one of these two readings,—“The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. John was baptizing in the wilderness, and preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. As it is written in the Prophets, ‘Behold I send my messenger before, &c. the voice of one crying in the wilderness”—or, as Campbell renders it, “The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God—As it is written in the Prophets—‘Behold I send mine angel before Thee, who shall prepare thy way: the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord,’ for thus came John baptizing.” I deduce no argument from the superscriptions to the Gospels, εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Ματθαῖον, εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μάρκον, &c., because these superscriptions were not written by the Evangelists themselves, as Father Simonⁿ shows from St. Chrysostom. They are, however, so ancient, that Tertullian reproves Marcion for having no title at the head of the copy of St. Luke’s Gospel, which Marcion acknowledged to be genuine.—Vide the chapter of F. Simon, and Dr. Campbell’s note on Matt. i. 1. vol. ii. p. 345, of his Translation of the Gospels.

NOTE 2.—PART I.

THE Harmonists have generally agreed in placing the introduction to St. Luke’s Gospel as the preface to their respective works; among whom are the five whose labors form unitedly the basis of the present Arrangement—Lightfoot, Archbishop Newcome, Michaelis, Doddridge, and Pilkington. This preface of St. Luke may be considered as demonstrating to us the very great care with which the first disciples of Christ inquired into every circumstance of the life of their Divine Master, before they delivered them to the world as authenticated. It is necessary, in this part of our Arrangement, to pay some attention to this fact. Even the enemies of our Lord acknowledged Him to have been an eminent and wonderful personage. His mode of teaching, his astonishing knowledge, the sanctity of his character, the boldness of his public censures, the number of his followers, and the devoted attachment of his more immediate adherents, would have been sufficient to have excited the general attention of the people, and of their rulers. Many persons, therefore, would have been naturally led to inquire into, and collect, the various circumstances and actions of a life so extraordinary. Spurious works must have been published (such as the Gospels according to the Nazarenes, Hebrews, and Egyptians; of Nicodemus, Thomas, Matthias, and of the twelve Apostles; the Gospels of Cerinthus, Basilides, and others, all of which were rejected by the Churches without hesitation, as they were scrupulously cautious of what they admitted^o), and it became the duty of those who possessed accurate information, and were anxious for the honor of their beloved Teacher, and for the propagation of his Gospel, to transmit to posterity an authentic history of the life and death of their crucified Lord. Such were the motives by which this Evangelist professes to have been actuated, when he wrote his Gospel to Theophilus, a convert of Antioch.

Three hypotheses have been submitted to the world to account for the very singular coincidences of language and paragraphs which abound in the first three Gospels. Of these, the chief, adopted by Dr. Townson^p, Grotius, Wetstein, Owen, Mill, Hales, Harwood, and Griesbach, is, that the Evangelists copied from each other. St. Luke, however, seems to speak of his intended work as an original history, not as a series of extracts from accredited writers. For though many circumstances are not related by St. Luke in their exact chronological order, the most important are detailed in their natural succession, καθ’ ἑξῆς—“in a continued series.” (Vide Kuinoel in loc.) He begins with the conception and birth both of John and of Christ, and proceeds with the events of his conversing with the doctors in the temple, his baptism, &c. See some admirable observations on the difference between the historian and annalist, and the necessity of exact observance of chronological order, in Bishop Marsh’s Notes to Michaelis^q. The second hypothesis is, that the Evangelists derived their information from one common source, or document, which contained those passages which so frequently occur in the three Gospels in nearly the same words. This hypothesis is adopted by Le Clerc, Lessing, Michaelis, and Eichhorn. Its chief advocate in later times has been the present learned^r Bishop of Peterborough^s. He supposes that St. Luke, in this preface, alludes to the common document in question, which was known by the title Διήγησις περὶ τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν πραγμάτων, καθὼς παρέδωκαν ἡμῖν οἱ ἀπ’ ἑσχῆς, αὐτόπται, καὶ ὑπάρχειαι γινόμενοι τοῦ λόγου—“A narrative of those things which are most firmly believed among us, even as they, who from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word delivered them unto us.” The omission, however, of the article τὴν before διήγησιν is considered by the late lamented Bishop of Calcutta^s to be fatal to this supposition. His rule is, "When a title to a book is prefixed to the book itself, the article may be omitted, but when the book is mentioned, or referred to, the article should be inserted." The hypothesis itself, although very ingenious, is attended with so many difficulties, that it is seldom adopted. The third hypothesis is that of Mr. Veysie¹, who supposes that many of the hearers of the discourses of Christ, and the witnesses of his actions, committed to writing an account of what they had heard and seen; and from the most authenticated of these sources the Gospels were compiled. This theory indeed seems to solve the difficulty, but Bishop Gleig², in his excellent edition of Stackhouse, prefers the more obvious and general opinion, and therefore perhaps the least discussed, that the only common document which may be called the foundation of the four Gospels was the preaching of our Lord Himself. Lightfoot³, by a singular coincidence, has given the same idea. The learned bishop quotes the valuable tract of the late Bishop Randolph. Bishop Gleig's illustration of the mode in which many of our Lord's miracles and doctrines might have been recorded, from the manner in which the extempore lectures of a professor at Edinburgh were preserved by his pupils, is very curious, and deserves attention. "In looking up to him, as the Author of our faith and mission, and to the very words in which he was wont to dictate to them, which not only yet sounded in their ears, but were also recalled by the aid of his Holy Spirit promised (John xiv. 26.) for that very purpose, they have given us three Gospels, often agreeing in words (though not without much diversification), and always in sense." With this hypothesis, the preface of St. Luke seems to agree. St. Luke, originally a physician, probably one of the Seventy, was a native of Antioch, and, according to Bishop Pearson, a companion of St. Paul in his travels from the year 43, attending that Apostle through Phrygia, Galatia, and Mysia, to Troas⁴. He accompanied him also to Samothrace, Neapolis, and Philippi. He was one of those who went with him, and remained with him at Jerusalem; sailed with him in the same ship from Cæsarea to Rome, and continued with him during the whole of the two years' imprisonment, with the account of which he concludes his book of the Acts of the Apostles. St. Luke therefore must have had abundant opportunity of conversing with the eyewitnesses and hearers of our Lord's actions and discourses, and of making himself acquainted, from the most undeniable evidence, with every circumstance which had not passed under his own immediate observation. Perhaps, as Dr. Townson judiciously remarks, he enjoyed the additional advantages of seeing the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark at Rome, the former of whom was an undoubted eyewitness. And it is probable he left that city after the release of St. Paul from his two years' imprisonment, and went to Achaia, where he is generally supposed either to have finished or written his Gospel, and the Acts, for the use of the Gentile converts.

It is my wish to point out in these notes the peculiar propriety of the various actions recorded of our Lord, according to the several situations and circumstances in which he was placed. In order to do this, it will be sometimes necessary to show the unimpeachable nature of the evidence on which the narrative rests. Religion is an appeal to faith. Its truth was at first established by an appeal to the senses and judgment of the first witnesses and converts, and their testimony, with every other evidence, has been handed down for the examination and benefit of all succeeding ages.

The Gospel of St. Luke was always, from the very moment of its publication, received as inspired as well as authentic. It was published during the lives of St. John, St. Peter, and St. Paul, and was approved and sanctioned by them as inspired; and it was received as such by the Churches, in conformity to the Jewish canon, which decided on the genuineness or spuriousness of the inspired books of their own Church, by receiving him as a Prophet, who was acknowledged as such by the testimony of an established Prophet⁵. On the same grounds, St. Luke must be considered as a true Evangelist; his Gospel being, as many suppose, dictated and approved of by an Apostle of whose authority there can be no question. There is likewise sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusions of Whitby⁶, that both St. Mark and St. Luke were of the number of the Seventy, who had a commission from Christ to preach the Gospel not to the Jews only, but to the other nations—that the Holy Ghost fell on them, among the number of the Seventy, who formed a part of the hundred and twenty assembled on the day of Pentecost, and from that time they were guided by the influences of the Holy Spirit in writing or preaching the Gospel. And if the Universal Church from the first ages received this Gospel as divinely inspired on these satisfactory grounds, distance of time cannot weaken the evidences of truth, and we are required to receive it on the same testimony. The necessity of inspiration rests on the necessity of Revelation itself. Without Revelation the mercy of God to man had not been complete, and it was absolutely necessary that this Revelation should not only be divine, but that it should be clearly proved to have been so. And of the books of the New, as well as of the Old Testament, therefore (for the inspiration of the latter is here taken for granted), we may justly say with Mr. Rennell^z, "We believe that Holy Scripture was written by men who were under the superintendence and control of the Spirit of God; but we believe also, that, whether in writing, speaking, or acting, they were left in full possession and use of their own natural faculties. The Spirit of God directed, elevated, and purified their souls; all that was necessary He supplied, all that was erroneous He corrected. Every line, therefore, of the New Testament we believe to be stamped with unerring truth; and to be the voice of God, speaking in the language of man."

³ Vide the account of this hypothesis in Horne, vol. iv. p. 319.

NOTE 3.—PART I.

MACKNIGHT, in the Notes to his Harmony (4to. London, 1763, p. 2.), quotes Gomarus, Cameron, Capellus, Witsius, and Wolf, as referring this expression "of the Word," to Christ, one of whose titles is Λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, Apoc. i. 2. xix. 13. Archdeacon Nares has adopted the same opinion, (Nares, Veracity of the Evangelists, p. 40–43.) Should this remark be correct, it will prove, what many will consider a material point, that our Lord was distinguished by the word Logos before it was applied in the same sense by St. John. See the Notes to the next section.

NOTE 4.—PART I.

THESE simple coincidences convince Whitby that the Theophilus here mentioned was a real personage. Lardner does not venture to decide. A passage from Josephus, quoted by Lightfoot, has escaped the attention of both these writers: "King Agrippa, removing Jesus, the son of Gamaliel, from the high priesthood, gave it to Matthias, the son of Theophilus—ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ Μαθθία τῷ Θεοφιλου."—Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8. It proves that a man of high rank among the Jews, of the name of Theophilus, was contemporary with St. Luke, and might possibly be the person whom he addressed. The supposition that he was a real person, whether at Antioch or Jerusalem, strengthens the authenticity of the narrative.

NOTE 5.—PART I.

DISSERTATION ON THE LOGOS.

IT is necessary to devote particular attention to this introduction to St. John's Gospel, as it has been made the subject of more extensive and disingenuous controversy than perhaps any other passage in the New Testament. The Preface of St. Luke has been eloquently described as "the beautiful gate of the Christian Temple, the entrance into the glorious and royal fabric of the Gospels^a;" while that of St. John may be denominated the solid and deep foundation on which it rests.

To understand the expressions of any writer, particularly when they are at all dubious, or liable to misrepresentation, we must endeavour to place ourselves in the situation of those to whom they were addressed. Dr. Lardner^b fixes the date of the publication of St. John's Gospel as early as 68, and Michaelis^c as early as 70. The weight of the evidence, however, appears greatly in favor of the much later date 96 or 97. St. John evidently speaks in his Gospel to those who were not well acquainted with many Jewish customs; as he gives various explanations of things, which would be entirely unnecessary if the persons for whom he principally wrote had been already conversant with the usages of the Jews^d. And we might have expected that one, at least, of the apostles would live after the destruction of Jerusalem, not only as a witness of the accomplishment of those prophecies he had heard himself delivered, but to sanction and confirm the doctrines set forth by the other apostles in the books of the New Testament, and to communicate his final instructions to the Church, after that fearful event. But either of these dates will be consistent with the whole, or with the greater part of the theory we are now about to consider, which will enable us more perfectly to comprehend the great object which St. John had in view, when he wrote his introduction to this Gospel. In all our inquiries into the New Testament, we must remember, that if the Jews, in consequence of their rejection of Christianity, were not always first addressed, they were so much in the minds of their countrymen the Apostles, that they must be considered as the silent tribunal, to whom the evangelical writers may be said to appeal, when they deliver any thing to the world in general, on the one system of religion, which was of equal importance both to Jews and Gentiles^e. The Jews were the chosen people of God—his eldest born—the countrymen of the apostles—for whose salvation the apostles were always most anxious, and to whose conversion they had devoted all the fervor and zeal of their first labors. They were the elect guardians of the ancient prophecies, and the favored witnesses of their accomplishment. The first question, therefore, which proposes itself is, What sense would the Jewish reader attach to the account given by the Evangelist of the Logos? or, in other words, what were the sentiments of the Jews in the time of St. John concerning the Logos, and in what respects did he design either to confirm or rectify the opinions of his countrymen on that subject? ^f

Throughout the whole of the Old Testament, from the history of the fall of man to the Book of Malachi, we read of the appearance of a wonderful personage who is sometimes called Jehovah, sometimes the Angel Jehovah, or Jehovah Angel, or the Angel of Jehovah^g. In addition to numerous divines who have demonstrated the same thing, Dr. Allix, in his valuable though sometimes inaccurate work on The Testimony of the Ancient Jewish Church, has proved, by a great number of references to the targums

^e Vide Schœtgenius—Pref. *Hor. ^f A learned and laborious friend has collected much valuable information on the subject of the controversies which prevailed among the Jews at the time of our Lord and his apostles. Though he has withheld his MSS. from the world, I trust they will be given to the Christian student at an early day. They will not detract from the well-earned fame of their respected author.

^g Vide Dr. Pye Smith's valuable work On the Scripture Testimony to the Messiah. Dr. Smith prefers translating the phrase מלאך יהוה by the latter epithet. Mr. Faber, too, in his Hore Mosaicæ, vol. ii. p. 48. (one of the most useful books published by this eminent writer) translates it in the same manner. Both these authorities, however, strenuously defend the Divinity of the Being who was thus manifested to mankind as a messenger from Jehovah, who himself bore also that incommunicable name. The term the Angel Jehovah, or the Jehovah Angel, seems to express more accurately the meaning of the phrase; though this interpretation cannot be established by such evidence as approaches to certainty. Smith's Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, vol. i. p. 333. Faber's Hore Mosaicæ, vol. ii. p. 48. 2d edit. 1818. See also Bishop Horsley's Notes on Hosæ—Biblical Criticisms, vol. iv.

and talmuds of the Jews, that the general term, which was applied to the Divine Personage who is called by this name in the Old Testament, was “the Word of God,” “מִימְרָא דִּי.” Before we can deduce, however, any argument from this remarkable circumstance, we must inquire into the authority of the several targums and Jewish writings which give this interpretation of the above passages of Scripture. Though our Saviour, as Bishop Blomfield has well observed^h, censured on all occasions the multiplied and unauthorized traditions of the Jews, he still appealed to their own expositions of Scripture, as furnishing irrefragable arguments in proof of his divine mission. It was no new interpretation to the Jews, that it was the Word of God which was revealed in their Scriptures as the Creator of the world. By the reading of the Paraphrase, or the interpretation of the Hebrew text, written in the Chaldee language, the people were constantly taught that the Word of God was the same with God, and that by that Word all things were made.

“I conceive this Chaldee Paraphrase,” says Bishop Pearsonⁱ, “which was read in the Jewish synagogues in the time of Christ, to express the sense of the Jews of that age, as being their public interpretation of the Scripture. Wherefore, what we find common and frequent in it, we cannot but think the vulgar and general opinion of that nation. Now it is certain that this paraphrast doth use מִימְרָא דִּי, the Word of God, for יְהוָה, God himself, and that especially with relation to the creation of the world. As Isaiah xlv. 12. אֲנִי עָשִׂיתִי אֶרֶץ וָאָדָם עָלֶיהָ, בְּרָאִי, ‘I made the earth, and created man upon it’—which the Chaldee translateth אֲנִי עָבַרְתִּי אֶרֶעָ. במִימְרֵי. ‘I by my word made the earth, and created man upon it.’” So also Jer. xxvii. 15. Isa. xlviii. 13. Gen. iii. 8. and many others. The action ascribed to Jehovah in the Sacred Text is given in the Chaldee Paraphrase to the Word.”

We should be careful to distinguish between the multiplied and fanciful refinements which the Jews, from the time of the Selucidæ, had built upon the Law of Moses, and the more ancient and traditionary interpretations of the prophetic parts of Scripture, the origin of which may be with probability dated from the Babylonish captivity. By the former, as our Saviour told them, “they made the word of God of none effect;” but the latter are no where made the object of his censure; on the contrary, both our Lord and his Apostles very frequently refer to them, as sound and legitimate expositions of God's word. St. Paul, who had been brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, scruples not to allude, in some instances covertly, in others openly, to the traditions of the elders: and in his Epistle to the Hebrews he assumes throughout, that the comments of the rabbins upon the prophetic parts of the Bible were in the main founded upon truth^j.

After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, their native language had undergone a change so considerable, on account of their adoption of numerous words from the vernacular languages of the countries in which they were settled, that when the Scriptures were appointed by Ezra to be read, they were utterly unintelligible to the greater part assembled. On this account, Ezra commanded the Levites to interpret the original to the people, by rendering it into Chaldee. These interpretations, or paraphrases, were originally merely oral. There is no proof that there were any collected written paraphrases, till the Targums, or Paraphrases, or Explanations, of Onkelos and Jonathan were compiled. These targumists are supposed to have lived about the time of our Saviour: though, in the opinion of Eichhorn, the Targum of Onkelos was not completed till 300 years after that period, in consequence of the interpolations that continued to be made in it. Ten Targums are handed down to us, of which those of Onkelos and of Jonathan ben Uzziel are the most highly esteemed, and considered by the Jews as the authorized and infallible expositions of the Sacred Text^k.

These Paraphrases then, in innumerable instances, translate the Hebrew word Jehovah by "the Word of the Lord." Some, it is true, have maintained that this implies a personal existence of the Word, in some sense distinct from the personal existence of the Supreme Father—that the Word of the Old Testament is the same as the Logos of the New Testament, and that this coincidence is a proof of the belief among the Jews of the preëxistence, personal operations, and Godhead of the Messiah. Others again argue, that these words are to be regarded as a mere idiom, implying the person's self who speaks. The latest writer^l on this point, after examining the different opinions at great length, comes to this general conclusion: that from the mere use of the phrase, "the Word of the Lord," in these Paraphrases, no certain information can be deduced on the doctrine of the Jews with respect to the Messiah, during the interval of the Old and New Testament, and this opinion is further corroborated by a celebrated critic. But though such may be our conclusion with regard to the Chaldee Paraphrases, it will not follow that the Jews of the same age, or a little after, did not employ the term "Word" with a personal reference, and that reference to the Messiah. The use of this term by Philo, and by the Christian Evangelist

St. John, appears unaccountable, except on the supposition that it had grown up to the acceptance supposed, at least among the Jews who used the Greek language. Such an extension of meaning and reference, agreeably to the ordinary progress of language, would flow from the primary signification, or medium of rational communication, and thus it would be a rational designation of a Mediator between God and man. We have also another evidence, which is entitled to the greater weight, as it comes from a quarter the most hostile to the Christian religion^m. Celsus, whose words are recited by Origen, reproaches the Christians with absurdity and folly, for imagining that such a mean and contemned person as Jesus could be the pure and holy Word, the Son of God; and, personating a Jew, which is his manner in the construction of his work, he declares their belief that the Word was the Son of God, though they rejected the claims of Jesus to that honor.

The authority, however, most to be depended upon, with regard to our attempts to ascertain the opinions of the Jews concerning the Logos at the time of Christ, is that transmitted to us by the celebrated Philo, who was born at Alexandria, of Jewish parents, and was the contemporary of our Lord and his Apostles. Some years before St. John wrote his Gospel, this celebrated man, being then about sixty years of age, was sent on an embassy from Alexandria to the emperor at Rome, to lay before him a petition, praying for protection to his countrymen against the persecuting spirit of the Alexandrians. He has left on record a very curious detail of this expedition. The manner in which, after much delay and many vexatious difficulties, the embassy, when at last admitted to the long-desired audience, was received by Caligula, presents us with a most singular and characteristic picture of the haughty sovereign and his courtiers. Caligula first abruptly addresses them, by inquiring if they were "the odious race" who refused to acknowledge him as their god; and, after having obliged them to follow him as objects of general ridicule and reproach, while he inspected some rooms in one of his villas, asked them, with a "grave and serious countenance, why they abstained from swine's flesh;" and, after many more sarcasms, dismissed them with this compassionate sentiment, "That those men who would not believe in him as a god were, in his opinion, rather miserable than wicked." Jerome and Eusebius inform us, that when Philo was at Rome, he was accustomed to converse with St. Peter, and that he cultivated the society of that Apostle. Photius tells us, that he was a Christian, though he soon separated from their communion: and Dr. J. Jones has lately attempted to revive this opinion; including Josephus also among the number of primitive Christians. Eusebius further assures us, that Philo devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, and diligently examined the truths received from his ancestors; that he had made the most profound research into the mysteries of the Platonic system, and discovered so much knowledge of the doctrines of the Grecian philosopher, and all his abstruse notions, that it was commonly said, either "Plato Philonizes, or Philo Platonizes." By mingling the theological opinions of his countrymen with the reveries of the Platonic school, and the undoubted truths of his own Scriptures, he has given to the world, in his multifarious productions, a strange compound of truth and falsehood, from which, however, may be collected, without difficulty, the prevailing opinions of the learned Jews of that age respecting the "Logos," the "Word of God," the manifested Jehovah of the Hebrew Scriptures.

The following is a list of some of the particular terms and doctrines found in Philo, with parallel passages from the New Testament.

1. The Logos is the "Son of God"—υἱὸς Θεοῦ. De Agric. vol. i. p. 308. De Profug. ib. p. 562. Compare Mark i. 1. Luke iv. 41. John i. 34. Acts viii. 37.

2. "The Second Divinity"—δεύτερος Θεὸς λόγος. Fragm. vol. ii. p. 625. Compare John i. 1. 1 Cor. i. 24.

3. "The first-begotten" of God—λόγος πρωτόγονος. De Somniis, vol. i. p. 653. Compare Heb. i. 6. Coloss. i. 15.

4. "The Image of God"—εἰκὼν τῆ Θεῆ. De Mundi Opific. vol. i. p. 6. 414. 419. 656. Compare Coloss. i. 15. Heb. i. 3. 2 Cor. iv. 4.

5. "Superior to angels"—ὑπεράνω πάντων (ἀγγέλων) λόγος Θεῖος. De Profug. vol. i. p. 561. Compare Heb. i. 4. 6.

6. "Superior to all the world"—ὁ λόγος—ὑπεράνω παντός ἐστι. De Leg. Allegor. vol. i. p. 121. Compare Heb. ii. 8.

7. "By whom the world was created"—τὸν Θεὸν λόγον τὸν ταῦτα διακοσμήσαντα. De Mundi Opific. vol. i. p. 4. Compare John i. 3. 1 Cor. viii. 6. Heb. i. 2. 10.

8. The great "Substitute of God"—ὑπαρχος τῆ Θεῆ. De Agricult. vol. i. p. 308. Compare John i. 3. and xvii. 4. Eph. iii. 9. Phil. ii. 7.

9. "The Light of the world"—φῶς κόσμου and "Intellectual Sun"—ἡλιος νοητός. De Somniis, vol. i. p. 6. 414. 632, 633. Compare John i. 4-9. and viii. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 9.

10. "Who only can see God"—ὃ μόνω τὸν Θεὸν ἑξέξει καθορᾶν. De Confus. Ling. vol. i. p. 418. Compare John i. 18. and vi. 46.

11. "Who resides in God"—ἐν αὐτῷ μόνω κατοικήσει. De Profug. vol. i. p. 561. Compare John i. 18. and xiv. 11.

35. "The Logos in his mediatorial capacity"—λόγος ἀρχιερεὺς μεθοριῶς of whom he says, θαυμάζω καὶ τὸν μετὰ σπεδῆς ἀπνευστὶ δραμόντα συντόρως ἱερὸν λόγον, ἵνα ᾗ μέσον τῶν τεθνηκότων καὶ τῶν ζώντων. "I am astonished to see the holy Logos running with so much speed and earnestness, that he may stand between the living and the dead." Quis. Rer. Divin. Hæres. vol. i. p. 501. Compare 1 Tim. ii. 5. Heb. viii. 1. 6. and ix. 11, 12. 24.

These extracts contain the sum and substance of the doctrines of Philo concerning the Word. Whatever the Old Testament applies to the Angel Jehovah, or Jehovah, this distinguished author applies to his Logos; and he is supposed to have expressed only the prevailing opinions of his time. Yet, if his opinions be attentively considered, many striking inconsistencies will be found in them respecting the Logos, as he frequently confounds all the personal qualities and attributes assigned to the Logos of the Old Testament, with a Logos so purely spiritual, or, as Dr. Smith calls it, so merely conceptual, that it could be capable only of being manifested to the spiritual or the intellectual part of man. We accordingly find Philo asserting that the Divine Word would not assume a visible form, or representation (ἰδέα), and that it was "not to be reckoned among the objects known by sense." An assertion which will furnish us with a solution to some of his discordant expressions, and which very satisfactorily explains the train of associations which leads him to such contradictory opinions on this subject; opinions, indeed, so strangely at variance, that the Unitarian writers have claimed Philo as a Platonist, who has transmitted no kind of evidence in favor of the generally received opinion that the Logos treated of in his works was the Messiah of the Christian and the Jew, or the Angel Jehovah of the Old Testament; while, on the other hand, the Trinitarian writers have considered him, from the age in which he lived, as the great strength and support of their cause. The inconsistency is plainly to be traced to this circumstance; Philo, as a Jew, had imbibed all the opinions of the orthodox and learned of his own countrymen, and believed with them and their Church that the Logos was personal, and had been and could be visible, both in his person and in his actions, and he has accordingly, in some places, endowed his Logos with personal attributes. But Philo was a philosopher also, and, with the assistance of a very fertile imagination and fancy, devised the conceptual Logos; which he delineates as something resembling an abstract idea, which can be manifested only to the intellect. In various parts of his work he has blended these descriptions, and by confusing his own associations or trains of thought, he confounds himself as well as his readers. But the book was well known in the time of St. John: and the Apostle, to correct the erroneous opinions of Philo, that the Logos was conceptual, and in order to substantiate the undoubted personality of the Logos, begins his Gospel in these simple but forcible words—"The Word was made flesh"—it was not a conceptual Logos, as the philosophers vainly imagine; it was a true and real Being, who took our nature, appeared in our flesh—"He was made flesh." He was tangible and visible, and we beheld visibly his glory.

The same opinion of a double signification of the Logos, a conceptual and a personal, has occurred to some of the German Scripture critics. "In the phrase used by the Chaldee paraphrasts, most critics suppose that nothing is comprehended but a designation of the Deity; but it has been admirably demonstrated, chiefly from the targums, by Dr. Charles Aug. Theoph.

" They are selected from the abridgment of Bryant's work On the Logos, by Dr. Adam Clarke, in his note on 1 John i. 15. Both Lightfoot and Dr. Pye Smith have given copious extracts from Philo; each has added also a summary of Philo's peculiar opinions.

Keil (in the Essay De Doctoribus Vet. Eccl. culpâ corruptæ per Platonicas Sententias Theologiæ liberandis), that the Jews, by their Memra Jah, designed to convey the notion of a Divine Subsistence, which they held to be begotten of God, and to be in the highest sense near and like to God. The same learned writer shows that the doctrine of Philo contained the notion of a twofold Logos, the one comprehended in the Divine Intellect, the other begotten of God; just as the conception in one's mind is different from the word uttered in speech."—Rosenmüller, in Joann. i. 1. The following abstract from the German Commentaries of the celebrated Dr. H. E. G. Paulus, theological professor in the university at Jena, is given by Dr. Kuinoel, in the Prolegomena to his Commentary on the Gospel of John. "Paulus maintains that Philo was not the author of this doctrine of the Logos as a subsistence emanating from God, most like to God, and intimately united with him; but that it was generally received by the Jews of Alexandria, in the time of Philo. He is of opinion that it was invented by the philosophizing Jews of that city, with a view to obviate the arguments of the Gentile philosophers, who defended their popular system of a multitude of inferior deities, by affirming that the care of the material world, a particular providence, and the government of the affairs of men, were objects too low for the majesty and purity of the Supreme Deity. He thinks that the Alexandrine Jews might the more readily adopt this opinion of the Logos being an intelligent nature, because of their own doctrine of angels and guardian spirits, and because the Jews of Palestine were in the habit of using, as expressions for the Divine Being, the phrases Memra of Jah, Word of God, Wisdom of God; as also they personified the wisdom of God, Prov. viii. 22. Therefore, as Paulus has observed, the form of expression ὁ Λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'The Word of God,' was used in the age of the Evangelist John in a twofold sense. The Jews of Palestine employed the expression merely as a periphrasis for the Deity, and very often as a personification of the power and wisdom of God. But, on the other hand, Philo, and with him many of the Alexandrine Jews, understood by 'The Word,' an intelligent subsistence, absolutely unique, an emanation from God, and next to the Supreme God. Professor Paulus further remarks, that the Evangelist did not deliver his doctrine of 'The Word' (as an intelligent nature emanating from God, and next to God, and that this intelligent nature had united itself with the man Jesus), because the Alexandrine Jews professed the same sentiments with respect to their Word; but because Christ had in express terms made almost the identical attributions of dignity and honor to himself, which those Alexandrians were accustomed to ascribe to their 'Word of God.'"—Kuinoel, vol.

iii. p. 80. 82. Smith's Scripture Testimony, &c. note c, to chap. vii. book ii. vol. i.

John Benedict Carpsovius and Stephen Nye, an English clergyman, have also maintained the hypothesis of the twofold notion of the Logos in Philo's writings. The one derived from the doctrines of Plato, Νοῦς ὁ πάντων αἰτίας—denoting merely the conception formed in the Divine Mind, and then emanating as a model from which the earth was to be framed. The other doctrine is of a more exalted nature, and is derived from the genuine principles of the Jewish religion°.

The works of Philo became so popular, that although the writer was a Jew, and therefore obnoxious to the Roman nation, they were enrolled in the public libraries at Rome. From this circumstance we may infer, that his ideas of the Word of God, the Jehovah Angel of the Old Testament, called by Philo, in his native language of Alexandria, Λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, were as well known to the heathen or gentile converts, as the term מִמְרָא דִּי, "Memrah Jah," or "Word," was familiar to the Jews of Palestine: and as the same actions in the targums and in the works of Philo are given to this Divine Personage, which the Scripture itself ascribes to the Angel Jehovah, we may justly conclude that the targumists and Philo intended to express the same idea, and to give to the Jehovah of the Old Testament the attributes of Godhead, assigned to the Word. Philo confused the two ideas of a personal and conceptual Logos, because he derived his opinions from the two opposite sources of Heathenism and Judaism. The Logos of the Old Testament is plainly personal, the Logos of Heathenism conceptual. The same error was committed by the targumists; their notions of a Logos being derived from two sources—one of which was from the corrupted, the other the purer, traditions of their fathers; and so confused was the popular opinion on this point, that we may almost say it was necessary, considering the importance of the subject, that an inspired teacher should correct the prevalent errors. St. John, therefore, writing at a period when the public opinions on the subject were so unsettled, begins his Gospel by declaring to the Jews, that both the Logos of one party, and the Memrah Jah of the other, possessed the very same attributes ascribed in the Jewish Scriptures to Jehovah, or the Angel Jehovah, who the Evangelist asserts was in the beginning with God—that all things were made by Him, and without Him was not any thing made that was made: an article of faith which the Jews and Philo alike acknowledged.

° See Vitringa, De Synag. veterc, p. 634. I have extracted this account of the opinion of the German critics, on the twofold nature of the Logos, from Dr. Pye Smith's Testimony to the Messiah, vol. i. p. 452.

After establishing this truth, concerning which there may be said to have been (excepting in the confounding a personal and conceptual Logos) no real difference of opinion, St. John proceeds to the application of the wonderful doctrine. He proceeds to affirm that the Jehovah of the Old Testament, the Memrah Jah of the targumists, the Logos of Philo, when rightly explained, was the promised Messiah of the Christian Church—that he had lived among them—that he had become flesh—that they had beheld his glory, the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father (another title given by Philo to the Logos), full of grace and truth^p.

The double signification of the word Logos unavoidably produced many heresies and divisions in the Christian Church. The Church, says Tillemont^q, was from the beginning disturbed with two opposite heresies, each of which produced different sects. Simon, the founder of the Gnostics, or Docetæ, held two principles, and taught that our Saviour was man in appearance only. The other heresy was that of the Cerinthians, who embraced Christianity in part only. These acknowledged one principle, and one God, and the reality of the human nature in Jesus Christ; but they denied his divinity, and were fond of the ceremonies of the Law. Contrary as these opinions are to each other and to truth, the Cerinthians found means to unite them, and they were adopted in different forms, and with different variations by many others; to whom it will be necessary to allude.

It is possible that these contending opinions had begun to agitate the Church as early as the first date assigned to St. John's Gospel. But it is more probable that they did become sufficiently formidable to disturb its peace till towards the conclusion of the first century, when the Gospel of St. John is more generally allowed to have been written. The time when Cerinthus lived is uncertain; but the earliest date assigned to him is after the year 70, with the exception of Baronius, who speaks of him as living within some few years after our Lord's ascension. Le Clerc asserts, that he flourished in the year 80; Basnage, 101. Lampe^r, from the discrepancies in the accounts of Irenæus and Epiphanius, entertains the very erroneous opinion, that the Gospel of St. John was valued by the Cerinthians; and endeavours to prove that Cerinthus was a heretic of the second century. Even this, however, does not invalidate the argument that St. John's Gospel was written to oppose the principles professed by Cerinthus; for they are said by Irenæus to have been inculcated by the Nicolaitans. Yet, as Irenæus, who asserted that St. John wrote against Cerinthus, was a disciple of Polycarp, who was personally acquainted with St. John, his testimony, which was given a hundred years after, appears most likely to be correct. The best evidence, therefore, that the scanty records of antiquity have handed down to us, corroborates the presumption that Cerinthus sowed the seeds of his principles during the life of the excellent Evangelist St. John, and, we might well suppose, that the Apostle would be most anxious to refute and repress them.

Michaelis therefore observes, with equal force and justice, that "If Irenæus had not asserted that St. John wrote his Gospel against the Gnostics, and particularly against Cerinthus, the contents of the Gospel itself would lead to this conclusion. The speeches of Christ, which St. John has recorded, are selected with a totally different view from that of the first three Evangelists, who have given such as are of a moral nature, whereas those which are given by St. John are chiefly dogmatical, and relate to Christ's divinity, the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, the supernatural assistance to be communicated to the Apostles, and other subjects of a like import. In the very choice of his expressions such as 'light,' 'life,' &c. he had in view the philosophy of the Gnostics, who used, or rather abused, these terms. That the first fourteen verses of St. John's Gospel are merely historical, and contain only a short account of Christ's history before his appearance on earth, is a supposition devoid of all probability. On the contrary, it is evident that they are purely doctrinal, and that they were introduced with a polemical view, in order to confute errors which prevailed at that time respecting the person of Jesus Christ. Unless St. John had an adversary to combat, who made particular use of the words 'light,' and 'life,' he would not have thought it necessary, after having described the Creator of all things, to add, that 'in Him was life, and the life was the light of men,' or to assert that John the Baptist 'was not that Light.' The very meaning of the word 'light' would be extremely dubious, unless it were determined by its particular application in the oriental Gnosis. For without the supposition that St. John had to combat with an adversary who used this word in a particular sense, it might be applied to any divine instructor, who by his doctrines enlightened mankind. Further, the positions contained in the first fourteen verses are antitheses to positions maintained by the Gnostics, who use the words λόγος, ζῶη, φῶς, μονογενής, πλήρωμα, &c. as technical terms of their philosophy. Lastly, the speeches of Christ, which St. John has selected, are such as confirm the positions laid down in the first chapter of his Gospel: and therefore we must conclude that his principal object throughout the whole of his Gospel was to confute the errors of the Gnostics^s."

^p The propriety of the term מִימְרָא דִּי, used by the targumists, of the term דְּבַר יְהוָה, Psalm xxxiii. 6, (rendered by the Septuagint as in other places by the term ὁ Λόγος, used by St. John in his preface,) and of Logos by St. John and the Platonists—(Obs. Ps. xxxiii. of the Hebrew, corresponds with Ps. xxxii. in the Sept.) appears from the connexion, or the analogy, or relation which speech bears to an act of the mind. As language may be called an embodied thought, or the manifest of the acts of the understanding, so may the Divine Personage, which bears the above names, be considered as the Manifest of the designs of Deity. Language, in another sense, may be said to be the same, the self, the same very self, as thought, or any act of the mind. So may the Logos be called by the like analogy, what it is represented in Scripture, the same, the self, the same very self, as God.

It must in all these cases be remembered, that we cannot comprehend God: we cannot by searching find him out. But He is revealed to finite beings through the medium of language, which is seldom able to express adequately the efforts of the human mind, when it would endeavour to understand, in this stage of being, subjects so much beyond us; to this imperfection of language may be principally ascribed much of the varieties of metaphysical opinions, both in ancient and modern times.

That we may understand the design and order of St. John's Gospel, it will be necessary to take a brief review of the tenets of Cerinthus, in opposition to which the Evangelist purposely wrote it. This will not only reflect considerable light on particular passages, but make the whole appear a complete work—regular, clear, and conclusive.

Cerinthus was by birth a Jew, who lived at the close of the first century: having studied literature and philosophy at Alexandria, he attempted at length to form a new and singular system of doctrine and discipline, by a monstrous combination of the doctrines of Jesus Christ with the opinions and errors of the Jews and Gnostics. From the latter he borrowed their Pleroma or fulness, their Æons or spirits, their Demiurgus or creator of the visible world, &c., and so modified and tempered these fictions, as to give them an air of Judaism, which must have considerably favored the progress of his heresy. He taught, that the Most High God was utterly unknown before the appearance of Christ, and dwelt in a remote heaven called Pleroma, with the chief spirits or Æons:—That this Supreme God first generated an Only-begotten Son, who again begat the Word, which was inferior to the First-born:—That Christ was a still lower æon, though far superior to some others:—That there were two higher æons, distinct from Christ; one called Life, and the other Light:—That from the æons again proceeded inferior orders of spirits, and particularly one Demiurgus, who created this visible world out of eternal matter:—That this Demiurgus was ignorant of the Supreme God, and much lower than the æons, which were wholly invisible:—That he was, however, the peculiar god and protector of the Israelites, and sent Moses to them; whose Laws were to be of perpetual obligation:—That Jesus was a mere man, of the most illustrious sanctity and justice, the real son of Joseph and Mary:—That the Æon Christ descended upon him in the form of a dove when he was baptized, revealed to him the unknown Father, and empowered him to work miracles:—That the Æon Light entered John the Baptist in the same manner, and therefore that John was in some respects preferable to Christ:—That Jesus, after his union with Christ, opposed himself with vigor to the God of the Jews, at whose instigation he was seized and crucified by the Hebrew chiefs, and that when Jesus was taken captive and came to suffer, Christ ascended up on high, so that the man Jesus alone was subjected to the pains of an ignominious death:—That Christ will one day return upon earth, and, renewing his former union with the man Jesus, will reign in Palestine, a thousand years, during which period his disciples will enjoy the most exquisite sensual delights.

Bearing these dogmas in mind, we shall find that St. John's Gospel is divided into three parts, viz.

Part I. contains doctrines laid down in opposition to those of Cerinthus, (John i. 1–18.)

Part II. delivers the proofs of those doctrines in an historical manner, (i. 19. xx. 29.)

Part III. is a conclusion, or appendix, giving an account of the person of the writer, and of his design in writing his Gospel, (xx. 30, 31. xxi.)

Besides refuting the errors of Cerinthus and his followers, Michaelis is of opinion that St. John had also in view to confute the erroneous tenets of the Sabæans, a sect which acknowledged John the Baptist for its founder. He has adduced a variety of terms and phrases, which he has applied to the explanation of the first fourteen verses of St. John's Gospel, in such a manner as renders his conjecture not improbable. Perhaps we shall not greatly err if we conclude with Rosenmüller, that St. John had both these classes of heretics in view, and that he wrote to confute their respective tenets^t.

The Docetæ^u taught that Christ was a man in appearance only, and not in reality. In opposition to these, St. John says in his Epistles, which were published before his Gospel, "Every spirit which confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God;" and, in his Gospel, "The Word was made flesh." From this sect originated the Ebionites, whom Bishop Horsley has proved to have a great affinity to the Simonians: observing with equal force and truth, "That as the ancient Ebionæan doctrine passes by a single step, the dismissal of the Superangelic Being, into the modern Unitarianism, that too is traced to its source in the chimeras of the Samaritan sorcerer. And thus both the Ebionites of antiquity, and the Unitarians of our own time, are the offspring of the ancient Gnosticism^v."

The general prevalence of these erroneous notions concerning the Logos, and the frequent mistakes of the primitive converts, who united their own philosophical opinions with the inferences deducible from Revelation, produced an ample stock of other heresies; many of which did not obtain celebrity till the Church became so extended, that the greater number of any particular sect attracted public attention: and frequently the heresiarchs, or leaders themselves, were not generally distinguished till their opinions had been widely disseminated. Thus we often find the several errors they adopted had been long in existence before even the names of their principal supporters were known. Those, for instance, embraced by Cerinthus, Saturninus, the Docetæ, and Basilides, may be traced to the perversions of Jewish tradition, the reveries of Platonism, and the fancies of the half-converted and speculative^w.

The Gnostics^x, among many errors on the origin and continuance of evil, anticipated with eagerness the arrival of an eminent personage, who should deliver the souls of men from the bondage of the flesh, and rescue them from the evil genii who governed the world. Some of these, being struck with the miracles of Christ, conceived Him to be the Being they expected. Many of his doctrines, therefore, they willingly embraced; while they refused to believe in the reality of his apparently material body. To these, or to such as these, that passage might have been addressed, "The Word was made flesh." He, who descended from an invisible state to deliver man from evil, was made flesh. Whether the Evangelist alluded to the Gnostics or Docetæ, we cannot positively decide.

Saturninus^y was another philosophizing heretic, who believed in the existence of an independent, eternal evil principle. He supposed the world to have been created by seven angels, which were the same as the people of the East believed to reside in the seven planets. One of these angels he supposed to be the ruler of the Hebrew nation, the Being that brought them up out of the land of Egypt, and whom the Jews, not having knowledge of the Supreme Being, ignorantly worshipped as God. His other reveries may be found in Mosheim.

Upon his conversion to Christianity (if we may so denominate that monstrous combination of his own absurd, and, falsely called, philosophical opinions with Christianity), he endeavoured to reconcile his former efforts to account for that baffling mystery, the origin and continuance of evil, with his new creed. In consequence, he supposed that there was a rebellion of these seven angels and their dependants against the Supreme Being, and that, on their involving mankind in their revolt, the Son of God descended from above, and took upon him a body, not indeed composed of depraved matter, but merely the shadow or resemblance of a body. He came to overthrow all evil, its authors and agents, and to restore man, in whom existed a divine soul, to the Supreme Being. His notions on this point, therefore, might likewise have been alluded to by St. John in the Preface to his Gospel: He who came from God, the true Logos, was made flesh, and they beheld his glory.

Carpocrates, an Alexandrian, was also a contemporary of St. John. Baronius speaks of his followers as distinguished for their opinions in the year 120—Basnage 122—Tillemont 130—Dodwell 140. He taught that the world was made by angels much inferior to the Eternal Father; that Jesus was the real son of Joseph and Mary; and he consequently denied his Divinity, though he considered Christ as superhuman. In opposition to Carpocrates, St. John taught that the world was created, not by angels, but by the Logos, who was revealed to man, as the Christ, the Divine Personage promised by the prophets, and expected by the world.

I omit much more, that might be made applicable to this argument, concerning the Elcesaites, Valentinians, and other heretics, enumerated by Irenæus and Epiphanius, and discussed by Mosheim and Lardner, as well as the arguments of Michaelis respecting the Sabæans, which is too long to extract, and too condensed to be further abridged.—Marsh's Michaelis, vol. ii. part 2. p. 288, &c.

Neither is it necessary to enter here upon the question, so warmly discussed by Bishop Horsley and Dr. Priestley, concerning the ancient Ebionites.

The sentiments of Basilides of Alexandria^z may, in the same way, be traced to the perversion of the doctrine of the Logos. He is supposed to have forsaken the communion of the Church about the time of Trajan, or Adrian. Basnage speaks of him at the year 121. Mill says that he flourished 123—Cave 112. Clement of Alexandria tells us, that Basilides was accustomed to boast, that he had been taught by a disciple of St. Peter.

Irenæus observes, that Basilides, in order to appear to have a more sublime and probable scheme than others, outstepped them all; and taught, that from the Self-existent Father was born Nous, or Understanding; of Nous, Logos; of Logos, Phronesis; of Phronesis, Sophia and Dunamis; of Dunamis and Sophia, powers, principalities, and angels, that is, the superior angels, by whom the first heavens were made; from these proceeded other angels, which made all things. The first of these angels he represents as the God of the Jews, who, desiring to bring other nations under the dominion of his people, was so effectually opposed, that the Jewish nation was in danger of being totally ruined, when the Self-existent and Ineffable Father sent his first-begotten Nous, who is also said to be Christ, for the salvation of those who believed in him. He appeared in the world as a man—taught—worked miracles—but did not suffer—for Simon of Cyrene was transformed into his likeness, and was crucified; after which Christ ascended into heaven. Basilides taught also, that men ought not to confess him who was in reality crucified, but him who came in the form of man, and was supposed to be crucified. Any reader of St. John's Gospel, who acknowledges the authority of that Evangelist, must be convinced of the errors of Basilides, as this inspired writer plainly declares, that the Logos itself was made flesh, had become a teacher of the Jews, had dwelt among them, and, as a man among men, was crucified.

Basilides taught, says Vitringa^a, according to the testimony of Irenæus (Adv. Hær. c. 23.) and Epiphanius (Hær. 24. s. 1.), that Nous was first born from the Self-existent Father—then succeeded the Logos—from the Logos, Phronesis—from Phronesis, Sophia and Dunamis—from Dunamis and Sophia, or from Power and Wisdom, proceeded Virtues, Princes, and Arch-angels who made the heavens.

Vitringa gives the following scheme of the opinions or theory of Basilides.

He then gives the annexed brief outline of the notions of Valentinus.

Vitringa concludes his Dissertation^b by summing up the precise objects for which each verse of St. John's Introduction might have been more especially written, in allusion to the heresies prevalent at the time of the writing of his Gospel. They will be found, he concludes, to overthrow all the subtilties of each of the Gnostic heresies.

I. There was one true God, without cause, or origin, or birth, or procession. In opposition to the doctrine that He sprung from Σιγή and Βίθος.

II. The Son existed with the Father in the essence of the same real divinity, the second ὑπόστασις of Deity, which, in the language of the Scriptures, is justly called ὁ Λόγος. Ratio, Sapientia, vel oraculum Divinitatis.

III. That this Logos was the first offspring of procession from the Father, "primam processionem Patris," truly and personally existing; the Logos ἐνυπόστατον, the Only-begotten Son of the Father, who was in the beginning with the Father: in opposition to the opinion of the Gnostics, who placed between the Father and the Logos, Νοῦς and Ἀλήθεια, and called the former, both only-begotten, and first-begotten.

IV. That the Logos was very God, and partaker of the perfection of the divine nature: in opposition to the sentiments of the Platonists, who represent the Logos as inferior to the Most High God, and produced by him at his pleasure.

^a Vitringæ Observationes Sacræ, vol. ii. p. 152.

V. That all things were made by the Logos, and that he is the Ἀρχηγός of all things. Here St. John condemns the notion which distinguishes between the Demiurgus, the Maker of this world, and the Logos; and which denies also that the world was made by the Logos.

VI. Without the Logos nothing was made that was made: that is, the Patriarchal and Levitical dispensations, which were enacted before the incarnation, were appointed by the Logos, the Son and Ambassador of God. This clause was written to confute that error of the Gnostics, which distinguishes between God, or the Angel, the Author of the old covenant, who came from God, the Father of Christ, and from his son Christ, by whom the new or Christian dispensation was instituted.

VII. The Logos was the Life of Man. Against the subtilty which, in the Gnostic system of divine emanations, distinguished between Ζωή, Life, and the Logos, and made the latter inferior to the former.

VIII. That the Logos was always in the world, and from the very beginning of all things, and from the fall of man had frequently manifested himself in the Church which he had in the world; that he was the true Light; that as such he had illumined his own, the members of that Church, although by the greater part of the world, and by the carnal-minded Jews, he was not acknowledged. The Evangelist here wrote against those who would assert, that the Son of God before his incarnation had not manifested himself, nor was known to the world.

IX. That the Logos (who had thus manifested himself occasionally as the Angel Jehovah) became flesh: that is, assumed from his mother a human nature similar to our own, sin only excepted. Refuting those who deny that Christ, the Logos, put on real flesh; or who separate Christ from Jesus the person of the Man, the Mediator.

X. Lastly, from the fulness (πληρότης, the favorite word among the Gnostics) of this only and first-begotten Son of God, all were to receive grace upon grace: that is, all, of every kind and degree, who believe in Christ, and called in this life to be partakers of his grace, and to the hope of his glory.—Consequently, that error of the Gnostics was to be rejected, which taught that the adherents of their sect only, who had been initiated into the mysteries of their philosophy, could aspire to the highest happiness of the first fulness of the Divinity; and allotting an inferior degree of happiness to the souls of all other believers.

In addition to the Jews, and the heretics of his day, the third class of persons to whom St. John addressed his Gospel, were his contemporaries among the primitive Christians. The word Logos has been supposed by many to have been used in several passages of the New Testament, in the same sense as in this passage of St. John. Luke i. 2. Acts xx. 32. Heb. iv. 12. Apoc. xix. 13. are particularly adduced^c. If from the writers of the New Testament we turn to the Apostolic Fathers, we shall find, that, though their testimony is express in favor of the Divinity of Christ, their evidence is not deduced from the doctrine of the Logos. The reason of this might be, that St. John had in their opinion so completely decided the question, that the necessity of their resuming the argument had been superseded. The Fathers who succeeded to the apostolic age, however, lived at a time when the discussions respecting the identity of the Messiah and the Logos required further attention; and we accordingly find that, from the time of Justin Martyr to Athanasius, the works of the Fathers abound with arguments in proof of this fundamental doctrine of Christianity. The greater part of these authorities are contained in the works of Bishop Bull^d. I have selected a few of these to complete the list of evidences in support of the doctrine, that the Logos of St. John was the Angel Jehovah of the Jewish, as certainly as he was the Messiah of the Christian Church.

"He who appeared to Abraham under the tree in Mamre," says Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, "was Christ. He was the Lord who rained down from "the Lord fire and brimstone out of heaven." He it was who appeared to Jacob in his sleep, who wrestled with him in the form of a man, who appeared to Moses in the burning bush.”

^c Witsius comes to the same general conclusions as those adopted in this note. He says that Luke i. 2. refers to the Logos, as well as Acts xx. 32. and Heb. iv. 12. After enumerating the arguments in defence of, and against this opinion, he hesitates to decide in favor of either. "Si mea mihi hic quoque dicenda est sententia, equidem fateor tam speciosa in utramque partem argumenta videri, ut utra eligenda foret animo hæsitaverim." See the Treatise of Witsius, Περὶ τοῦ Λόγου, in his Miscellaneous Sacra, vol. ii. p. 87.

^d The Defensio Fidei Nicænæ of Bishop Bull, and the other works of the same great writer, edited in one volume folio, by Dr. Grabe, are a complete collection, from which Bishop Horsley and others have drawn many of their irrefragable arguments. There is little or nothing in the improved version of the New Testament, Lant Carpenter's Unitarianism, the Doctrine of the Gospel, or in The Raccorian Catechism, which has not been either answered, or anticipated, by this profoundly learned writer. The following is the title of the thesis which he lays down and defends in his first section, to which I am now alluding. "Jesum Christum, hoc est, eum qui postea Jesus Christus dictus est, ante suam ἐκπαύσεσιν, sive ex beatissima virgine secundum carnem nativitatem, in natura altera, humana longe excellentiori, extitisse; sanctis viris, velut in præludium incarnationis suæ, apparuisse; Ecclesiæ, quam olim sanguine suo redempturus esset, semper præfuisse, ac prospexisse; adeoque a primordio omnem ordinem divinæ dispositionis (ut Tertullianus loquitur) per ipsum decurrisse: quin et ante jacta mundi fundamenta Deo Patri suo adfuisse,—perque ipsum condita fuisse hæc universa, Catholici doctores trium primorum sæculorum uno omnes ore docuerunt."—Defen. Fid. Nic. p. 7.

Irenæus also has laid down the same doctrine as Justin, concerning Him who appeared to Moses and to Abraham. “He,” says Irenæus, “who was worshipped by the prophets as the living God, He is the Logos of God who conversed with Moses, and of late reproved the Sadducees. Man had already learned, in the example of Abraham, to follow the Word of God; for this patriarch followed the command of the Word, freely offering his dear Son a sacrifice to God.”

Theophilus of Antioch declares that it was the Son of God who appeared to Adam immediately after his fall, taking upon him the form of the Father, even the Lord of all^e.

Clemens Alexandrinus repeats the same things as Justin; and, from that time to the present, the same opinion has prevailed. The Chaldee paraphrases have asserted of the Word the same things which the Old Testament declares of the Angel Jehovah, and which the Christian Fathers declare of Christ. The Word of God was the term by which both the Jews and the Christians recognised this Divine Personage. Many other writers could be quoted to prove the same point, if accumulative evidence were essential to conviction in an argument of this nature.

In addition to the evidence derived from this source, we might mention the manner in which the writers of the New Testament allude to those passages in the Old Testament which refer to the Jehovah Angel^f. Thus Isaiah saw in a vision the glory of Jehovah in the temple. In John xii. 41. John declares that the glory which the prophet saw, was the glory of Christ; plainly affirming thereby that the Jehovah of the Old Testament, the Christ of the New, was the common God of both dispensations^g. St.

^e So I translate τὸ πρόσωπον τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ κυρίου τῶν ὄλων, according to Granville Sharp’s rule: “When two or more personal nouns of the same gender, number, and case are connected by the copulative καὶ, if the first has the definite article, and the second, third, &c. have not, they both relate to the same person.”

^f See particularly on this subject Scott’s Christian Life—a treatise on the Angel Jehovah, at the end of his second book—Works, folio edition. See also Faber’s Horæ Mosaicæ, vol. ii. sect. i. cap. 2. The whole chapter is admirable.

^g I have not thought it advisable to enter into the criticisms of the Unitarian writers on this and many other passages which I have referred to. We are told that in some few manuscripts the reading is Θεός, in other few Κύριος. Yet the greater proportion has the usual reading Χριστός. I have been rather anxious to exhibit the ancient, universal, and, as it appears to me, the undoubted faith of the Christian and Jewish Churches, without needlessly entering into verbal criticisms, or the wilful misinterpretations of the enemies of the Divinity of Christ. I do not undervalue the minutest verbal criticisms. On the contrary, we are under infinite obligations to the laborious writers who

Paul alludes to this doctrine also, when he applies to Christ the expression of David (Ps. lxxviii. 56.), “they tempted and provoked the Most High God.” “Neither let us tempt Christ,” says St. Paul, “as some of them also tempted^h.” On such passages as these, and on the application by our Lord to himself of many of those phrases by which Philo and the Chaldee paraphrases were accustomed to designate the Word of God, or the Angel Jehovah, the primitive Christians founded this opinion. Their principal reasons, perhaps, in addition to these, were derived from the manner in which St. Paul, still more decidedly, applies to Christ such expressions as “the Image of God,” “the Glory of God,” “the Image of the Invisible God,” “God manifest in the flesh.” Reasoning from these and similar expressions, the primitive Christians justly concluded that the Logos of the targumists and Philo, and the Christ of the New Testament were the same as the Angel Jehovah of the Jewish Scriptures.

The fourth class of persons, whom St. John may be supposed to have addressed, were the unconverted heathen. Of these the more ignorant were familiar with the doctrine of the incarnationsⁱ, and the Evangelist might desire, have attended to this part of theological literature; but, after perusing with some attention much of the Unitarian controversy, I cannot but repeat my conviction, that the opposers of the Divinity of Christ have been guilty of wilful misrepresentation, both of the arguments of their opponents, and of the plain text of the Christian Scriptures.

^h For an account of the manner in which the original ideas concerning an incarnation became perverted among the ancient nations into the vulgar and foolish stories related in the Metamorphoses of Ovid, and in the silly legends of the later pagans, vide Faber’s Origin of Pagan Idolatry. So prevalent were these notions among the heathen, that Dr. Townson ingeniously supposes that St. Luke, who wrote his Gospel for the converted Gentiles, has avoided a word which was adopted without hesitation by the two other Evangelists. In his relation of the transfiguration, St. Matthew, who wrote for the Jews, has used the term (Matt. xvii. 2.), καὶ μετεμορφώθη ἑμπροσθεν αὐτῶν, &c. St. Mark, who wrote for the Proselytes of the Gate, who had embraced Christianity, and who were well acquainted therefore with the opinions of the Jews, and were not likely to be misled, has used the same phrase. But St. Luke, in describing the same event, has used a word which seems to have been cautiously selected—τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ ἔτερον. Townson On the Gospels, vol. i.

ⁱ I have never met with any arguments which militate against the opinion I have espoused (chiefly on the authority of that once highly-esteemed but now neglected work, Gale’s Court of the Gentiles), that Pythagoras, during his travels into Chaldea, Syria, Egypt, and Palestine, conversed with the Jews then partly in captivity at Babylon, partly dispersed in Egypt, and partly remaining in their own land; and that he learned from them much of his discipline, and many of those opinions which gave rise, in their different variations, to the principal schools of philosophy in Greece. Gale traces the original idea of a Logos to the times of Pythagoras. Plato, the Stoics, and others, derived their notion of a Logos, which, however, in the lapse of ages, had become perverted and corrupted, from this when any of them should become converts to the Christian religion, that they should have correct ideas of the incarnation of the Eternal Word. The more educated of the heathen were of course well acquainted with the popular philosophy of their day^j, and would learn also, should they ever be brought to a knowledge of the truth, that the only real doctrine of the Logos was that which was maintained by the Christian Church, and is so satisfactorily set down by St. John in the commencement of his Gospel.

Thus does it appear, from a careful investigation of the principal authorities that can be now collected, that the Preface to St. John's Gospel is the most important passage in the whole of the New Testament. It is the passage which is the foundation of the Christian doctrine of the Divinity of Christ—the point where the Jewish and Christian Churches meet and divide—the record which identifies the faith of the Mosaic Church with that of the Christian. The government of the Jewish Church was consigned by the Father to that Being who assumed the titles and exercised the powers, and declared himself possessed of the attributes of the Most High God. Without the consent of this Being, the Jewish Church could not have been overthrown. He was accustomed repeatedly to appear. He called himself the Captain of the Lord's host (Josh. v. 14, 15. and primary source. Plato acknowledges that he received many mysteries from the ancients, which he did not understand, but expected some interpreter to unfold them. The reader who would engage in the study of the ancient metaphysicians, or speculators, or philosophers, by whatever name they are called, may derive ample entertainment in Cudworth's Intellectual System, Gale's Court of the Gentiles, and Philosophia Generalis, Enfield's History of Philosophy, and their original authorities.

It would be an easy, useful, and pleasant task to any student who has leisure, and is interested in theological studies, to convince himself of this concurrent testimony to the Divinity of Christ, as the Logos of St. John, by the targumists, the Old Testament, the Septuagint, the primitive Christian writers, and the New Testament, where it refers to our Lord; if he would put down in a tabular form the evidence of the whole five. As in this manner, on tempting the Divine Personage in the wilderness:—

Targumists.	Hebrew Bible.	Septuagint	New Testament.	Fathers.
Targum of Jonathan and the Targum of Jerusalem, quoted by Allix, p. 152. assert that it was "The Word" against whom Israel murmured. Vide Allix in loc.	וְיָסַד אֱלֹהִים בְּיִשְׁמֵאל Ps. cvi. 14.	Kαὶ ἐπέ- ρασεν τὸν Θεὸν ἐν ἀ- νθρώπῳ. Ps. cv. 14. Ps. cvi. in Hebrew.	Μηδὲ ἐκ- πεύραζομεν τὸν Χριστὸν. 1 Cor. x. 9.	Primasius quoted by Whitley. Others could be found, but I merely put this down to illustrate my plan of drawing up a table of testimonies to the Divinity of Christ. Primasius lived in the sixth century.

vi. 2.), the Angel in whom the name of God was (Exod. xxiii. 21.), and to the Angel, or Jehovah, are attributed all the great actions recorded of God in the Old Testament. We do not read any where in the Old or New Testament, that this Being ceased at any time to protect the Jewish nation and its Church. The Prophet Malachi, in a passage (Mal. iii. 1–6. iv. 2–6.), which has been uniformly considered by the Jewish as well as Christian commentators to refer to the Messiah, declares that this Angel Jehovah, "the Jehovah whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple"—to the temple which had been rebuilt after the return from the captivity, and which was destroyed by the Roman soldiers. But we have no account whatever, neither have we any intimation in any author whatever, that the ancient manifested God of the Jews appeared in the usual manner in the second temple between the time of Malachi and the death of Herod the Great. The Christian Fathers, therefore, were unanimous in their opinion, that this prophecy was accomplished in the person of Jesus, and in him only. They believed that Christ, even Jesus of Nazareth, was the Angel of the Covenant, that he and he only was Jehovah, the Angel Jehovah, the Logos of St. John, the Memrah Jah of the targumists, the expected and predicted Messiah of the Jewish and Christian Churches. This is the doctrine rejected by the Unitarian as irrational, by the Deist as incomprehensible, by the Jew as unscriptural—but it is the doctrine which has ever been received by the Christian Church in general with humility and faith, as its only hope, and consolation, and glory.

NOTE 6.—PART I.

ON THE ARRANGEMENT OF THESE THREE VERSES.

THOUGH the Baptist is here mentioned, and the passage is consequently an anticipation of his testimony, the apparent reference of v. 16. to v. 14. has induced me to follow the authority of Archbishop Newcome, in preference to that of Lightfoot, Michaelis, Pilkington, and Doddridge. Verse 18 declares also, as Newcome has observed, the reason for which the Word was made flesh; that it was to manifest the Father to the world. The circumstances of the Baptist's testimony will be mentioned below. Whiston places the whole of this preface after the events recorded in St. Luke, i. ii. Mr. Hele^k places John i. 1–5. after St. Luke's preface. He then places John i. 6–14. after Luke iii. 2. and John i. 15–18. after the account of the temptation.

NOTE 7.—PART I.

ON THE MIRACULOUS EVENTS WHICH PRECEDED THE BIRTH OF THE MESSIAH.

WITH the exception of Simon the Just¹, who, according to Jewish tradition, had received the last rays of the setting sun of prophecy, and completed the Canon of the Old Testament, it is generally believed by the Jewish Church that Prophecy and Miracle had ceased since the time of Malachi. A learned writer^m, however, has attempted at great length to show, that though Prophecy, properly so called, had ceased during this interval, yet extraordinary revelations were vouchsafed to some few individuals: and he instances the prediction said to have been delivered by Hillel, Schammai, and Menahem. But there is no satisfactory evidence to prove this assertion. Josephus, who repeats them, doubts their truth. Drusius supposes that the reading in Josephus is corrupt. Gorionides, Abraham Ben Dion, and even Josephus, are not quoted by Vitringa with any degree of confidence in their authority; and we have no allusion in the New Testament to any instance of the effusion of the Holy Spirit after the closing of the Canon of the Old Testament. The inspired writers of the New Testament appeal only to the Law and the Prophets, that is, to the Old Testament in its present form. And they appeal to the miracles and prophecies of the Apostles and their Master, as novelties in their own age, affording undeniable witness that God had at length visited his people.

After a long cessation, therefore, of miracle and prophecy, the time approaches when the first proof is to be given that the Creator of the world was still mindful of the favored house of Israel, and of the whole human race. The Spirit of prophecy revives—an angel descends from heaven; and, as if more immediately to connect the new dispensation with that which it was to supersede, this blessed messenger begins by foretelling the very same event, in the same words which had been used by Malachi in delivering the last prophecy vouchsafed to the Jewish Church:—

“Behold! I will send you Elijah the prophet Before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the LORD:

And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children,

And the heart of the children to their fathers.”

Malachi iv. 5, 6.

To Zacharias it is foretold:—

^m Vitringa, in his Observ. Sacrae, vol. i. b. vi. p. 294, &c.

“And he shall go before Him in the spirit and power of Elias,

To turn the hearts of the fathers to the children,

And the disobedient to the wisdom of the just.”—Luke i. 17.

The first prophecy of the New Testament is given in the very same language as the last of the Old Testament; thereby offering to the Jews the strongest evidence in favor of their long-expected Messiah. The birth of John, the forerunner of the promised Saviour, was announced by the testimony of an angelic vision—the return of the Spirit of prophecy—and the revival of miracles, in the dumbness of his father, its definite continuance, and its predicted removal. The attention of the people must have been powerfully excited by these remarkable circumstances; and the beginning of the New Dispensation was distinguished by the same superhuman characteristics which had proved the divine origin of that which was now to be done away.

The number of each of the twenty-four courses of the priests was so great, that many thousands were constantly in attendance upon the service of the temple. The most solemn of the daily services was that which had been appointed by lot, in the usual manner, to Zacharias. When he entered into the holy place to burn incense, the congregation of Israel stood without in profound silence, offering up their prayers, and waiting till the priest should return, as was customary, to dismiss them with his blessing. The congregation consisted of the whole course of the priests, whose weekly turn of attendance was now going on, and of the Levites that served under these priests—the men of the station, as the rabbis called them, whose office it was to present the whole congregation, by putting their hands on the heads of the sacrifice,—and of the multitude from the city, whom devotion would now have drawn to their temple, including of course the presidents and overseers of the temple, and others of the first rank and chief note at Jerusalem.

Lightfoot supposes, from the expression, v. 10., “the whole multitudeⁿ,” that a larger crowd than usual was then assembled; that it might have been a Sabbath: and upon the hypothesis, which he has attempted to defend at length, he calculates that the course of Abia served in their turn at this time, in the eighth week after the Passover, and that the lessons read in the temple were the law of the Nazarites, Numb. vi. and the conception of Samson. But this, though ingenious, must be in some degree conjectural.

When we remember the scrupulous exactness with which the Jews attended to every part of their ceremonial ritual, and the consequent sensation excited by every thing connected with their divinely-appointed worship, we shall be able to represent to ourselves, in some degree, the impression produced by this event. The people, including, we may suppose, the great majority of the men of leisure, education, and eminence, either of Judæa or Jerusalem, were anxiously waiting to learn the cause of Zacharias's unusual delay. The concluding and accustomed blessing had not yet been pronounced. At length their officiating Priest presents himself at the door of the holy place. His countenance now expresses the greatest agitation, and he endeavours in vain to fulfil his unfinished duties. He is unable to give the expected blessing. The congregation, from anxious curiosity and astonishment, we may reasonably suppose, remained for some time in silent suspense—but when they found that Zacharias continued both deaf and speechless, they perceived, as the Evangelist relates, “that he had seen a vision.” His silence was miraculous. The circumstance would be recorded and enrolled in the archives of the temple, and preserved by the priests of the course of Abia. As his dumbness was not a legal uncleanness, and no law of Moses prescribed the exclusion of a priest from the temple service on that account, and as St. Luke (i. 23.) mentions, that “as soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he departed to his own house,” he must have continued in office during his appointed course, and would certainly take his professional station in the temple, although incapable of performing all his ministerial functions;—thereby presenting to the Jews, in the very centre of their sanctuary, an undeniable proof of the revival of miracle, and exciting in their minds the strongest expectations of some wonderful occurrence.

As Zacharias had now become both deaf and dumb, it is highly probable that he wrote down an account of the heavenly vision, which must by this means have been well known throughout Judæa. The prediction of the Angel was quite consonant to the generally-received opinions of the day. Elias was first to appear, and the first revelation therefore of the approaching change in the dispensations of God must have reference to his Messenger, rather than to the Messiah himself. It had been prophesied that the forerunner of Immanuel was to resemble Elias in his spirit and power, in the effects of his mission, in the austerity of his character, in the boldness of his preaching, and in his successful reform of the Jewish Church. He was to be the

Prepare ye the way of the LORD,
Make his paths straight;”—

“To turn the hearts of the fathers to the children,
And the disobedient to the wisdom of the just.”

Many things worthy of remark occur in considering the dumbness of Zacharias. It was at once a proof of the severity and of the mercy of God. Of severity, on account of his unbelief; of mercy, in rendering his punishment temporary, and in causing it to be the means of making others rejoice in the events predicted by the Angel. His condemnation and crime were most appropriate and merciful warnings to the Jewish nation, and seem almost to prefigure the general unbelief that was so soon to prevail, as well as to foreshow the approaching dumbness, or dissolution, of the Levitical priesthood.—Vide Witsius, De Vitâ Johannis Baptistæ, and the opinion of Isidorus Pelusiota on the dumbness of Zacharias, there quoted: Miscell. Sacra, 4to. vol. ii. p. 500.

NOTE 8.—PART I.

ON THE DOCTRINE OF THE MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION.

THE doctrines both in the Old and New Testaments would be utterly incredible, if they were not confirmed by the most unquestionable and convincing evidence; and if they were not also so interwoven together that they must all be received, or all be rejected. They are so involved with the history of the world, that the latter alternative is impossible to a rational mind; and the various absurdities and inconsistent conclusions to which men have been uniformly betrayed, when they have endeavoured to believe one part of the system of Revelation, and to reject another, are almost sufficient reasons of themselves to compel us to receive the whole of what is revealed to us. The doctrine of the miraculous conception, which contains so much that contradicts experience, and seems at first sight so incredible; is founded upon evidence the most complete and satisfactory. It is intimately blended with the whole system of Revelation. The fabric would not be complete without it. It is supported by the general interpretation of the first promise, and is repeated and corroborated by the ancient prophets of the Old, and the positive assertions of the writers of the New Testament.

In what manner mind acts upon body, and body upon mind, we are totally ignorant. We know only from daily experience, that the will gives an impulse at pleasure to the limbs and body. We know also, by observation, that the mind of an individual, which thus controls or directs the body, is often biased in the very same manner as the mind of his progenitor. One earthly bias, or tendency, seems to be impressed upon the human race, which compels or induces one generation of men to be the same as the generation which preceded them.

Man, since the fall of Adam, has never, with any one exception, been born with a spiritual bias;—the innate tendency which always shows itself is uniformly directed towards earthly, or natural, or merely animal objects; that is, to objects which have their origin, connexion, progress, and end, in this life only. This bias, or tendency, is what divines call Original Sin. It is that disposition^o which is born with us; which was entailed upon us by our first parents, and has reduced us to a state little superior to the animal creation below us. When originally created, the mind of man was not thus biased to earth. The spiritual prevailed over the inferior, or carnal, nature. The fall was the triumph of the animal nature of man; and to restore the human race to its original spirituality is the great object of that one religion, which has been gradually revealed to mankind, under its three forms, the Patriarchal, Levitical, and Christian dispensations.

When man had fallen, we read that Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; whereas Adam had been formed in the image of God. The son of Adam was born therefore after a different image from that in which his father was originally created. The first man Adam had been created spiritual; but he became earthly. His sons, and his sons' sons, and all their descendants, from that moment even to this day, partook of a nature, earthly, inferior, and animal. The fallen man Adam ever did, and ever will, produce creatures of a similar nature to himself^p. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh."

Such being the law of animal life, impressed upon matter by the will of the Supreme Being, it becomes evident that no creature can be free from the inferior nature in which he is begotten.

"Behold! I was shapen in iniquity,
And in sin did my mother conceive me."

Ps. li. 5.

No mere man can be exempt from the laws of his kind. If then a long succession of prophecies foretold that a Being should come into the world to perform certain works, which necessarily implied perfection, and therefore an exemption from the universal law of human nature, our reason tells us that his birth must take place in some peculiar or miraculous manner, differing from that which is entailed on the imperfect beings around him: or, in other words,—an immaculate conception was the only mode in which a sinless or spiritual being could be born into a sinful or animal world, without partaking of its common nature.

If it be said, that our Lord partook of this inferior nature as the Son of the Virgin, as much as if he were the offspring also of Joseph; we answer,—In the same way as Adam, when he was created in the image of God, and therefore sinless, received from the hands of his Maker a body formed from the dust of the ground, so likewise did the second Adam receive from the Virgin an earthly body, as free from sin as that with which the first Adam sprang from the ground, yet, like that, subjected to all the weakness, infirmities, and sufferings of humanity. When we can comprehend in what manner the inanimate dust became an organized being at the first creation, we shall be able to comprehend the mystery of the creation of the second Adam. But we may as reasonably disbelieve the one as the other, if our understanding must comprehend the difficulty before we receive it.

The whole doctrine of creation is one of the truths which baffles the intellect of man. We must, in this stage of our being, be contented to believe, and to be ignorant. If we will believe only what we can comprehend, we must believe nothing but mathematical demonstrations.

The declarations of Scripture, from the very beginning, assert, that "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." It is evident that this term, "the seed of the woman," cannot be applied to mankind in general. It must refer to a Being to whom it could be applied in some peculiar sense: and the ingenuity of man has never yet devised a mode in which this passage can be properly applied to any of the human race, unless in that manner in which the believers in divine Revelation have applied it to the promised Deliverer, the second Adam. The first Adam was called the Son of God, because he was created in the image of God, in a way different from his descendants. Christ also is called the Son of God, on account of his miraculous conception. Both were created spiritual beings; and the true worshippers of God, in various parts of Scripture, are called by the same name, in an inferior sense, because they aspire to the recovery of that superior nature which the first Adam lost, but which the second restored.

The ancient Jews were decided, and, so far as we can ascertain from their remaining books, were unanimous in their opinion, that the Divine Person who was appointed to deliver man should be the seed of the woman in some manner differing from mere men. This they principally learned from two passages in their prophets, which have consequently been much discussed; these are Isa. vii. 14. and Jer. xxxi. 22., both of which require attention.

When the invasion of Rezin and Pekah had reduced the Israelites to extremity, their king, Ahaz, who in the days of his prosperity had sacrificed and burnt incense to the gods of the surrounding nations, in the groves and in the high places of their worship, and consequently had paid little attention or respect to the prophet, now, in this period of distress and calamity, applies for relief to Isaiah. The Prophet assures him that he shall be delivered from the two kings; but that, within sixty-five years, the ten tribes should be carried away captive, (Isa. vii. 9.) The king is incredulous, doubting, perhaps, the inspiration of the Prophet; who requests the king to require any miraculous proof he pleases that the prophecy he had delivered should be accomplished. The king refuses to do so, when Isaiah immediately declares,—“The LORD himself shall give you a sign—Behold! a Virgin (or, more properly, the Virgin, הַעַלְמָה with the emphatic ה) shall conceive and bear a son.” He tells him that the name of this son should be Immanuel; and, before he was of sufficient age to discern between good and evil, the country should be delivered from its invaders. The virgin in question is supposed, by Abrabanel, and other Jewish writers, to denote Mahershalahashbaz, whom Isaiah married soon after. By others the word הַעַלְמָה is rendered damsel, instead of virgin, and is supposed to refer to the queen of Ahaz, who was then pregnant of Hezekiah. Dr. Pye Smith² follows the authority of Trypho, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and Abrabanel, in giving this last signification to the word הַעַלְמָה. The Inspired Writings, however, do not appear to confirm this interpretation; for they give us no account of a child born at that time who either received the name of Immanuel, or a name that would bear the same signification.

If the prophecy had ended at the 16th verse of the seventh chapter, it might perhaps bear a literal interpretation. But it seems to have been forgotten by those who would thus limit its signification, that it is only a part of one prophetic discourse which is completed at ver. 4. chap. x., and includes that still more eminent prophecy, rendered in our translation,—

² Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, vol. i. p. 271; but this supposition is founded on the idea that some error has crept into the account in the Sacred Text of Hezekiah's age, 2 Kings xvi. 2. 2 Chron. xxviii. 1.—and it is scarcely admissible to build the right interpretation of one part of Scripture on the possible error of another.

“Unto us a Child is born,
Unto us a Son is given;
The government shall be upon his shoulder,
And his name shall be called Wonderful,
Counsellor, the Mighty God.”

The object then of the prophet in pronouncing the words, “A Virgin shall conceive,” &c. must be collected from the scope of the whole discourse. If it be thoroughly examined, it will appear, like other prophetic discourses, to make the present distress and predicted deliverance serve as a figure of some more distant and more glorious event. No king of Israel could be justly styled the Wonderful—Counsellor—the Mighty God (which latter epithet is rendered by a learned critic¹, God, the Mighty Man),—the Everlasting Father—the Prince of Peace. This prophecy from necessity must be, as it always has been, both by Jewish² and Christian writers, referred to the Messiah, and as such is quoted by St. Matthew in his Gospel, i. 23³.

I shall close this part of the present note with a statement of Dr. Kennicott's hypothesis.

He conceives that “the text contains two distinct prophecies; each literal, and each to be understood in one sense only; the first relating to Christ, the second to Isaiah's son.” The one is contained in ver. 13, 14, and 15; and the other in ver. 16. Dr. Kennicott paraphrases them thus:—

“I. Fear not, O house of David! the fate threatened you: God is mindful of his promise to your father, and will fulfil the same in a very wonderful manner: Behold! a virgin (rather, the virgin, the only one thus circumstanced) shall conceive, and bear a son; which son shall therefore be, what no other has been or shall be, the seed of the woman, here styled THE VIRGIN: and this son shall be called (i. e. in Scripture language he shall be) ‘IMMANUEL, God with us;’ but this Great Person, this God visible amongst men, introduced into the world

thus, in a manner that is without example, shall be truly man: he shall be born an infant, and as an infant shall he be brought up: for butter and honey (rather milk and honey) shall he eat; he shall be fed with the common food of infants (which in the East was milk mixed with honey) till he shall know (not that he may know, as if such food was to be the cause of such knowledge, but) till he shall grow up to know how to refuse the evil and choose the good.

"II. But before this child (pointing to his own son) shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings.

"— הנער should be rendered, 'this child?'—a son of Isaiah, Shearjashub; whom God had commanded the prophet to take with him; but of whom no use was made, unless in the application of these words; whom Isaiah might now hold in his arm; and to whom therefore he might point with his hand when he addressed himself to Ahaz, and said, 'But before this child shall grow up to discern good from evil, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings.'

"The child's name is evidently prophetic; for it signifies, a remnant, or the remainder, shall return. This prophecy was soon after fulfilled. And therefore this son, whose name had been so consolatory the year before, was with the utmost propriety brought forth now, and made the subject of a second prophecy—namely, that before that child, then in the second year of his age, should be able to distinguish natural good from evil, before he should be about four or five years old, the lands of Syria and Israel, spoken of here as one kingdom, on account of their present union and confederacy, should be forsaken of both their kings: which, though at that time highly improbable, came to pass about two years after; when those two kings, who had in vain attempted to conquer Jerusalem, were themselves destroyed, each in his own country."—Kennicott's Sermon on Isaiah vii. 13–16. Oxf. 1765.

The celebrated prophecy of Micah (ch. v. 2.) which St. Matthew likewise, as his countrymen would approve, applies to Christ, was written

"Since the application of this passage to the Christian Messiah, the Jews have been accustomed to refer the words to other circumstances than their ancestors had done. "Noli, Lector," says Schoetgen (vol. ii. p. 213), "hanc diversitatem mirari—(I consider myself as possibly addressing some of the sons of Israel in these notes, and I omit therefore the next clause of the quotation)—hic autem Marcus Marinus, Censor a Pontifice constitutus, textus ad confirmationem religionis valentes corrupt. In loco Sanhedrin (fol. 98. 2. had been just quoted) signum castrationis, lacuna scilicet. ubi vox הַיִּשְׁרָאֵל, impium, ommissa est, aperte conspicitur: in loco autem priore longe plura deesse videntur." "Dixit R. Giddell. Quare autem Hillel excipitur a consortio istius beatitudinis? Quia dixit: nullum amplius Messiam Israelim expectandum esse: (Glossa: Quia Hiskias fuerit Messias, et de ipso dictæ sint Prophetiæ Ezek. xxix. 21. et Micha v. 3.)" Menschen N. T. ex Talmude illust. 4to. Leipsic, 1736, p. 30.

twenty years after the event by which this prophecy of Isaiah (Is. vii. 14–16, &c.) was occasioned. Both Dr. Hales^v and Bishop Lowth^w are of opinion, that Micah in this passage alludes to the former passage previously delivered by Isaiah. "Micah," says Bishop Lowth, "having delivered that remarkable prophecy which determines the place of the birth of the Messiah, the Ruler of God's people, whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting, adds, that nevertheless God would deliver them up to their enemies, till she who is to bear a child brings forth." Archbishop Newcome also confirms the authorized version^x.

The uncommon expression also, "the holy offspring," Luke i. 35., seems to be especially adapted to denote that the child would be produced in a way different from the generation of the rest of mankind. On the appellation, Son of the Most High, Kuinoel observes, "that it seems to be used to signify that Christ was procreated by an immediate divine intervention: in which sense Adam also is called the son of God^y."

The next prophecy which our present subject leads us to consider is given by Jeremiah, (xxxii. 22.)—

"The Lord hath created a new thing in the earth,

A woman shall compass a man."

That new "creation of a man is therefore new, and therefore a creation, because wrought in a woman only, without a man compassing a man: which interpretation is ancient, literal, and clear^z." This is the opinion of one of our most ^z Pearson On the Creed, Oxford edit. 8vo. vol. i. p. 270, and vol. ii. p. 201. "It is not to be denied," he observes, "that the proper signification of סָבַב is circumdare or cingere. R. Judah has observed but one interpretation of the verb, and Kimchi says, that all the words which come from the root סָבַב signify compassion, or circuition. Those words therefore (Jer. xxxii. 22.) נִקְבָּה הַכּוֹבֵב נָבִיר must literally import no less than that a woman shall encompass, or enclose, a man; which, with the addition of a new creation, may well bear the interpretation of a miraculous conception. On this account the Jews applied the passage determinately to the Messiah. This appears in Berashith Rabba Parash, 89. where, showing that God doth heal with that with which he woundeth, he saith, as he punished Israel in a virgin, so would he also heal them with a virgin, according to the prophet, 'The Lord hath created a new thing on the earth, a woman shall compass a man.' By the testimony of R. Huna, in the name of R. Iddi, and R. Joshua, the son of Levi, הַמֶּלֶךְ הַבָּרִיךְ שֶׁנֶּאֱמָר בְּפֶתַח הַבַּיִת 'This is Messiah the King, of whom it is written, (Psalm ii. 7.) This day have I begotten thee.' And again in Midrash Tillim, upon the second Psalm, R. Huna, in the name of R. Iddi, speaking of the sufferings of the Messiah, saith הַמֶּלֶךְ הַבָּרִיךְ Iste est Rex Messias, that when his hour is come, God shall say, וְכֵן הוּא אֹמֵר אֲנִי עָלַי לְבִרְאֹתִי בְרִית חֲדָשָׁה הַיּוֹם eminent divines, who proceeds to demonstrate, from the rabbinical and talmudical writers, that the ancient Jews gave the same interpretation to this passage, and referred it to the miraculous conception of the expected Messiah.

The greater part of the events which are predicted in the Old Testament are shadowed forth by types, or partial, intended resemblances to the event prefigured. The miraculous conception also is repeatedly typified in the Old Testament. Various women, Anna the wife of Elkanah, Sarah the wife of Abraham, the wife of Manoah, and others; as well as Elisabeth the wife of Zacharias, are recorded to have brought forth children after their old age had begun. These events seem to have been designed to afford the Church of God, which expected a Messiah who should be in a peculiar sense the seed of the woman, a certain and miraculous proof, that, as nothing was impossible with God, he would in his own time give ולדתו: I must create him with a new creation; and so (by virtue of that new creation) he saith, This day have I begotten thee. From whence it appeareth that this sense is of itself literally clear, and that the ancient rabbins did understand it of the Messiah; whence it follows that the later interpretations are but to avoid the truth which we profess, that Jesus was born of a virgin, and therefore is the Christ." Vide also Schoetgenius, vol. ii. p. 99. Locum general. 50. 2. In Sohar Genes. fol. 13. col. 52. apud Schoetgen, vol. ii. p. 202, the words נקבה הטובב נבר are applied to the Church. 'Die sexto applicat se uxor (Ecclesia) ut præsto sit marito suo (Deo) qui vocatur justus, eique die Sabbathi mensam instruat. Et hoc ipsum est, quod Scriptura innuit, dicens: (Creabit Dominus.) Et hoc fit temporibus Messiae, qui sunt dies sextus.'" Dr. Blayney, in his new translation of the prophecies of Jeremiah, renders the phrase "a woman shall put to the rout a strong man," and defends this interpretation by observing, that the words (even if טבב be translated to encompass) can only mean to contain or comprehend in the womb; and as this is not a wonderful thing, he concludes the passage has some other meaning. But the fact is, that this encompassing in the womb being called a wonderful thing has been referred on that very account to the miraculous conception. He supposes the woman to be the Jewish Church, which should put to the rout all its powerful enemies. The word טבב, in Hiphil or Pihil, may certainly signify to cause to turn about, i. e. to repulse. But this was by no means a thing so unusual, that it should be called a new thing in the earth; for the Church of Israel had repeatedly overpowered its enemies, or been delivered from them in a most wonderful manner. The interposition of Providence for this cause was by no means a new thing in the earth. The sense of "repulsed," or "put to the rout," also is very forced and without sufficient authority. Blayney's Jeremiah, 4to. 1784. Oxford, p. 86, and notes 194. Calvin, an author always entitled to our most impartial attention, comparing the passage with Isa. xliii. 19., interprets it to signify the triumph of the Jews over the Chaldeans. By the "woman," he understands the Jews; by the "man," the Chaldeans; and by the "compassing," the triumph of the Jews over these, their enemies. Luther once maintained the same opinion. This interpretation, however, is entirely overthrown by the recollection of the fact, that neither the Chaldeans, nor the Persians, nor the Medes, were ever conquered by the Jews, who them the promised Messiah; of whose birth the births of the children of these women were but types.

That the doctrine of the miraculous conception of the Messiah is laid down in the New Testament, as well as the Old, the Christian reader does not require to be informed. The account is contained in the commencing chapters of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and is to be found in every version and manuscript of the New Testament extant. As these chapters maintain the Divinity of Christ, by asserting the fact of his miraculous birth, they have been attacked with a variety of theoretical arguments by the Socinian writers, as well as by all, whether Deists or nominal Christians, who would reduce the Gospel to a good and valuable system of morality; and represent the promised Messiah as merely the blameless man, the exemplary teacher, and possibly a superior prophet^a. On the same authority which were freely released from their captivity. Not only does this fact overthrow the interpretation given by this eminent man, but the word נקבה is never used figuratively. Pfeiffer adds many very curious interpretations of the passage. Vide Pfeiffer, Dubia Verata, p. 760. The passage is interpreted by Christian divines to refer to the miraculous conception. The "woman" is the mother of Christ. The "man" encompassed (the אל נבור of Isaiah ix. 5.) is the Messiah; the "encompassing" is the enclosure of the promised infant created in the womb. The "new thing in the earth" is the creation of the infant by supernatural power, a circumstance unusual, unknown, unthought, and unheard of before. That this is the meaning of the passage is gathered from the context, the former and latter passages connected with it referring to the Messiah. This intelligence only could give complete comfort to the pious Jews at the period when they were thus distressed. They were assured not only that they should return to their cities, but that the ancient promise should be accomplished, and the seed of the woman be born. Three arguments have been adduced by some against this mode of interpreting the passage. The first is, that נקבה is the epithet applied only to the female sex in general, and not to any individual; more especially that the term is by no means applicable to a virgin. To this it is answered, that the word is applied to an individual in the following passages: Gen. i. 27. and v. 2.; Lev. iii. 1. and 6. and ix. 28. and 32. and xxvii. 4.; Num. xxxi. 15.; and that it is not unusual to use the same word in opposition to זכר, an individual of the other sex. And, in Levit. xii. 15. the word נקבה is applied to a female infant, newly born. The second argument is, that the word נבר is never used to denote a newly-born male infant. The Targum of Onkelos, however, on Gen. iv. 1., uses the word in this sense, and it is also so applied in Isa. ix. 5., "unto us a child is born," &c. אל נבור. The third argument is, that נקבה never refers to conception. The word, however, signifies in general "to enclose," "to surround;" and its use in the present instance is sufficiently enforced and applicable. Vide Pfeiffer, Dubia Verata, p. 760-762, and his references.

^a I will notice but one objection which has lately been again brought forward against the doctrine of the immaculate conception, as it has frequently been urged by the Socinian writers, and is so admirably answered by a gentleman to whose valuable work I am much indebted. In his Calm Inquiry into the Scripture Doctrine of the Person of induced the first ages to receive these chapters as authentic and genuine, Christians in all ages have made the doctrine of the miraculous conception an article of their faith. They have believed in Him “who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary.” See the whole of the admirable third article of Pearson On the Creed.

NOTE 9.—PART I.

ON THE SALUTATION OF MARY.

THE learned Joseph Mede remarks on the salutation of the Angel, “Hail, thou that art highly favored,” χαῖρε κεχαριστομένη—that it must be rendered, not, as Dr. Hammond and the Vulgate represent it, “Hail thou that art full of grace,” but in the same sense in which the house of Levi was highly favored above the rest of the tribes of Israel. The word קדש, “holy,” does not always mean “holy in life,” but “holy to the Lord,” which implies a relative holiness, and as the word חסיד, which sometimes is considered a synonym of קדש, is used in the same twofold sense, he concludes the salutation of the Angel ought so to be understood in this place. The sermon in which Mede expresses this opinion is upon Deut. xxxiii. 8.—“Let thy Urim and thy Thummim be with thy holy one.” The Hebrew is יְרֵחַ וְתֻמִּים, which Junius expounds, “with thy favored one;” not ἀνδρὶ ὁστώ σου, as the Septuagint, but κεχαριστομένη σου. “The word,” says Lightfoot (vol. i. p. 411, fol. edit.), “is used by the Greek scholiast to express חסיד, μετὰ κεχαριστομένης χαριτωθείσης, Ps. xviii. 25., in the sense of χάρις, mercy, or favor, as Ephes. i. 6. ἐχαρίτωσεν ἡμᾶς.” The salutation of the Angel means, therefore, “Hail, thou that art the especially elected and favored of the Most High, to attain to that honor which the Jewish virgins and the Jewish mothers have so long desired—thou shalt be the mother of the Messiah.” For an account of the peculiar manner in which the Jewish women desired offspring, in the hope that they might be the mother of the promised Messiah, vide Allix’s Reflections on the Books of Moses. Mede’s Works, fol. edit. London, 1677, p. 181. Lightfoot, vol. i. fol. edit. p. 411. See also Kuinoel and Rosenmüller in loc.

Christ, Mr. Belsham observes, “If the relation given of the miraculous conception were true, it is utterly unaccountable that these extraordinary events should have been wholly omitted by Mark and John, and that there should not be a single allusion to them in the New Testament, and particularly that in John’s history, Jesus should be so frequently spoken of as the son of Joseph and Mary, without any comment, or the least hint that this statement was erroneous.”—“This objection,” says Dr. Pye Smith, “is plausible; but we ask a fair attention to the following considerations. The fact in question was of the most private and delicate nature possible, and, as to human attestation, it rested solely on the word of Mary herself, the person most deeply interested. Joseph’s mind was satisfied with regard to her honor and veracity, by a divine vision, which, in whatever way it was evinced to him to be no delusion, was still a private and personal affair. But this was not the kind of facts to which the first teachers of Christianity were in the habit of appealing. The miracles on which they rested their claims were such as had multiplied witnesses to attest them, and generally enemies not less than friends. Here, then, we see a reason why Jesus and his disciples did not refer to this circumstance, so peculiar, and necessarily private. The account in Matthew had probably been transmitted through the family of Joseph and Mary; and that in Luke, through the family or intimates of Zacharias and Elisabeth; a supposition which furnishes a reason why the two narratives contain so little matter in common. It is objected also that this doctrine is not alluded to in the other books of the New Testament. The same reason will account for the absence of reference to this miracle in the epistolary writings of the New Testament, if that absence be admitted to the fullest extent; for there is, at least, one passage which appears to carry an implication of the fact. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in explaining the symbolical representations by which it pleased the Holy Spirit, under the former dispensation, to prefigure the blessings of Christianity, seems to put the interior sanctuary, or ‘holy of holies,’ as the sign of the heavenly state; and the outer tabernacle as that of ‘the flesh,’ or human nature of the Messiah. As the Aaronical high priest, on the great anniversary of expiation, was first to officiate in the tabernacle, offering the sacrifices and sprinkling the blood of symbolical pardon and purification, and then was to advance, through that tabernacle, into the most holy place, the representation of the divine presence; so Christ, our ‘Great High Priest,’ and ‘Minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle,’—‘entered into the sanctuary—through the greater and more perfect tabernacle,—his own blood.’ Now, of this tabernacle it is declared that ‘the Lord pitched it, and not man;’ that it was ‘not made with hands,’ that is, not of this creation. The expression in Scripture, ‘not made with hands,’ denotes that which is effected by the immediate power of God, without the intervention of any inferior agency. It, therefore, in the case before us, intimates that the fleshly tabernacle of our Lord’s humanity was formed, not in the ordinary way of nature, but by the immediate exercise of Omnipotence.”—Smith’s Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, vol. ii. p. 17–19. Many modern interpreters, it is true, understand “the tabernacle” in these passages as signifying the heavenly state. Yet these writers make “the sanctuary” also to signify the same object; thus confounding two very distinct images. The propriety of the figures, the argument of the connexion, and the frequent use of σκήνος and σκήνοισιν to denote the human body (2 Cor. v. 1–4. 2 Pet. i. 13, 14.; and this use of at least σκήνος is common in Greek writers: see Wetstein on 2 Cor. v. 1. and Schleusneri Lex.) satisfy me of the justness of the interpretation of Calvin, Grotius, James Cappel, Dr. Owen, &c. It is no objection that in Heb. x. 20. “the veil” is the symbol of the Messiah’s human nature; for the veil, as one of the boundaries of the tabernacle, in a natural sense belonged to it; and the passage relates to our Lord’s death, so that the veil is very fitly introduced, marking the transition out of life into another state. The text was partially quoted above, for the sake of presenting alone the clauses on which the argument rests. It is proper here to insert it at length. The reader will observe the

NOTE 10.—PART I.

THERE is very little doubt that Hebron was the city here spoken of. In Joshua xxi. 13. we read that Hebron, with her suburbs, was given to the children of Aaron the priest, and in ver. 11. of the same chapter, and in chap. xi. 21. it is described as a city in the hill country of Judah. After the return from the captivity of Babylon, the priests were anxious to take up their abode in their appointed heritage. Hebron is celebrated for many events. Here Abraham received the promise of the miraculous birth of Christ. Here circumcision was probably first instituted, (many being of opinion that it was known before the time of Abraham): here Abraham had his first land, and David his first crown. John was born at Hebron, and here he first appointed and administered the ordinance of baptism^b.

The talmudists^c inform us of a very singular custom in the temple service, which had a reference to Hebron. Before the morning sacrifice was offered, the president of the temple was used to say every morning, "Go and see, whether it be time to kill the sacrifice." If it was time, the answer was, "It is light." Those in the court replied, "Is the light come so far, that thine eyes may see Hebron?"

How far this tradition may be received I do not venture to decide; it is certain that Hebron was always regarded with particular attention by the people of Israel, and, if this tradition be correct, it must have been typical of some predicted and expected event. What place, then, in the land of Israel could have been so appropriate for the true light first to dawn before the perfect sacrifice could be offered, as the city of Hebron? Here John the Baptist was born; and here the rays of truth first shone, when, through the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, the appointed Saviour was hailed for the first time near this place, as the Lamb of God, the true Sacrifice, who should take away the sins of the world.

Can these remarkable and wonderful events be regarded only as coincidences? To me they appear to point out the beautiful connexion and harmony in minute points of the two dispensations, and to prove that nothing has come to pass, but what was ordained of old.

If the account of Josephus (Bell. Jud. lib. 5. c. 7.) may be depended upon, Hebron was not only celebrated for the great events which had there taken place, but was renowned for its antiquity, and considered of more ancient date than Memphis in Egypt. Jerome and Eusebius likewise mention that there still remained at Mamre, near Hebron, the oak under which Abraham entertained his angelic visitors; and that the surrounding Gentiles held it in great veneration.

NOTE 11.—PART I.

THE native Jew who reads in St. Luke's Gospel this expression, would be reminded of a tradition of their fathers, that when the Israelites came to the Red Sea, the children in the womb leaped for joy.

ואפילו ואיגון עוברין במע אמיהן הו ומשבחן : לק"בה : imo etiam embryones, qui in utero matris erant, viderunt id, et Deum S. B. celebrant." Possibly it was in allusion to this tradition that the phrase is here used. Elisabeth may be supposed to express the greatness of her joy at the sight of her cousin, which so agitated her as to produce this effect. Elisabeth compared her happiness, in beholding the mother of the expected Messiah, to that of her counapposition of "the tabernacle" and "the blood." But Christ having presented himself, a High Priest of the blessings to come, through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands (that is, not of this creation), and not through the blood of goats and calves, but through his own blood, entered once (i. e. once for ever, never to be repeated) into the sanctuary, having acquired eternal redemption." Grotius's note is so judicious and satisfactory, that it deserves to be inserted. The design of the writer is to declare that Christ entered the highest heavens, through his sufferings and death. To keep up the comparison with the high priest under the Law, his object is to declare that Christ entered through his body and blood; for the body is very properly put by metonymy for bodily sufferings; and it is common in all languages to use the term blood to denote death, as death follows upon any very copious effusion of blood. Yet he does not express the body by its proper word, but uses a symbolical description suitable for carrying on the comparison. The Hebrews were accustomed to call the body a tabernacle; and from them the disciples of Pythagoras deduced the expression. In particular the body of Christ is called a temple, on account of the indwelling divine energy, John ii. 21. Here, this body is said to be 'not made with hands,' and the writer explains his meaning by adding, 'that is, not of this creation,' understanding by creation the usual order of nature; as the Jews apply the talmudical term Beriah ('creation,' 'any thing created'); for the body of Christ was conceived in a supernatural manner. In this sense he properly employs the term not made with hands, because in the Hebrew idiom any thing is said to be made with hands which is brought to pass in the ordinary course of nature. See v. 23. and Mark xiv. 58. Acts vii. 48. xvii. 24. Eph. ii. 11. The prophets frequently give to idols the appellation made with hands, as the opposite to any thing divine."—Grotii Annot. in Heb. ix. 11. Dr. P. Smith's Messiah, vol. ii. p. 29, 30. NOTE 12.—PART I.

THIS speech of Mary is evidently the offspring of a mind thoroughly imbued with the language and sentiments of the ancient Scriptures. A learned modern author has selected the original of this verse as an instance of the adoption in the New Testament of the parallel couplet, so usual in the Old Testament. It certainly may be considered as one collateral proof that the New Testament is from the same spirit of inspiration as the Old, that these singular parallelisms and forms of composition are found in each. In the present instance, however, and no doubt in the great majority of others, the composition of the speech appears to have been evidently unstudied. The effusion of those who were actually inspired did not require any labored arrangement, according to the laws of studied composition.—Bishop Jebb's Sacred Literature, p. 210.

NOTE 13.—PART I.

THE Jews divide the worship of God into that which is offered מֵאֵהבָה “from love,” and that which is offered מֵיִרְאָה “from fear.” In allusion to which distinction, St. Paul, one of the most learned Jews of his time, uses the expression, Rom. viii. 15. πρεῖψα δαυλεῖς. In the Old Testament dispensation the Laws of Moses were delivered under circumstances calculated to excite the strongest fear and apprehension—the most rigid obedience was required; and the people were anxiously alarmed lest any thing should be done by them, whereby they might become polluted, and incur the anger of their God. This Law was a yoke which neither they, nor their fathers, were able to bear. But in the Law which was now to be ushered in by the Messiah, Zacharias announces, in this sublime prophecy, the introduction of a new worship; not from slavish fear, but from pure love to God, which is inconsistent with, and casteth out, fear. He was singing the death song of the Jewish Church. He prophesied the overthrow of the system of ceremonies, rites, and all their burthensome minutiae; and the establishment in their place of a holy and perfect system, wherein God should be served and honored as with the love and worship of children. Both this, and the phrases (ver. 79.), as well as others, can only be fully understood by thus keeping in view the

NOTE 14.—PART I.

IT was the custom among the Jews to allow some interval between the יְחֻוּר “the espousals and the nuptials,” and הַכְנָסָה “the bringing of the espoused into the husband's house.” See Deut. xx. 7. The words (v. 18.) πρὶν ἢ συγγεῖθαι αὐτῷ, may apply to either of these. The object of the law was to satisfy the husband of his wife's chastity. In this probationary period, after her return from her cousin Elisabeth, we are told that the Virgin Mary was found with child.

Had the Virgin been espoused, under these circumstances, to any other than a just and humane man, such as Joseph, she would in all probability have been immediately exposed, with inconsiderate rashness, to public scorn and derision: but, as it was, we find that she was treated with kindness and indulgence; and that Joseph listened to her defence. Her vindication, we may infer from the narrative, was received by her espoused husband with much surprise and incredulity; but we may suppose that he was too well acquainted with the prophecies of his Scriptures, to doubt the possibility of this event. In addition to which, he must have been informed of the object of Mary's journey into the hill country, of the vision, and consequent events in the temple. He pondered, he hesitated—he knew not what to decide—still hoping that his unsuspected and beloved spouse was in truth the elected and favored Virgin Mother of the Holy One of Israel. But while he thought on these things, and had at last resolved (perhaps from fear of ridicule) to put her away privily, “Behold! the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream,” and at once dispelled all his doubts and fears, by revealing the gracious designs of Providence, and assuring him of the innocence of his spotless wife.

NOTE 15.—PART I.

ON PROPHEPIC DREAMS.

THE occasion seems to call for the next merciful intervention of divine power that was vouchsafed, at the dawning of the day of the Messiah. The approach of the kingdom of the Messiah had been already announced by the appearance of angels, and the return of the Spirit of prophecy to two of the kindred of Mary, and now likewise to herself. It is more than probable that Joseph knew this, but, as he was still unconvinced, a peculiar demonstration was given to him, in the revival of prophetic dreams; another way in which God had formerly made known his will to mankind.

In the ancient and purer times of patriarchism, as well as in the earlier ages of Judaism, the Deity frequently revealed his will in this manner, both to his own people, and to some individuals of other nations. Not only were Joseph, Abraham, and Jacob thus favored; but Laban, Abimelech, Pharaoh, and even Nebuchadnezzar, received similar communications from on high. This, with every other miraculous evidence of God's superintendence over the Jewish Church, had been now long discontinued; and the Jews, who placed the greatest dependence on dreams, and had even formed rules and a regular system for their interpretation, had particularly regretted the want of this medium of divine communication.

The revival, therefore, of this ancient mode of revealing the will of God must have convinced the pious Joseph that the anxiously anticipated event, the birth of the Messiah, was near; and that his betrothed spouse, who was of the family of David, from whom the Messiah was to descend, was certainly the virgin upon whom the honor of his birth was to be conferred. Under all the circumstances of the incarnation, it appears that the Virgin was espoused to one who was more likely than any other to secure her from scorn—to protect her in danger—to relate the truth to the believing Jews; and, by affirming that another distinct branch of evidence had been afforded him, to strengthen the conviction, that would now begin to obtain some influence, that God had visited his people.

Philo, in his tract, Περὶ τῆ θεοπέμπτης εἰρᾶς ὁρεῖσιν, has described at length the difference between prophetic and monitory dreams.

His first sort of divine dreams he thus defines, τὸ μὲν πρῶτον ἦν ἄρχοντος τῆς κινήσεως θεῶ, καὶ ὁπληκέντος ἀσφαλείας τὰ ἡμῖν μὲν ἄδηλα, γινώριμα δὲ ἑαυτῷ. The first kind was when God himself did begin the motion in the fancy, and secretly whispered such things as are unknown indeed to us, but perfectly known to himself. Of this sort were the patriarch Joseph's dreams.

The second kind is this, Τῆς ἡμετέρας διαβολῆς τῇ τῶν ὅλων συγκινουμένης ψυχῇ, καὶ θεοφορήτως μαρτυρῶν ἀνακηρυχθέντων. When our rational faculty, being moved together with the soul of the world, and filled with a divinely-inspired fury, doth predict those things that are to come. In this definition he permitted his heathen philosophy to supersede his better theology. The God of his fathers was the Lord of the world, not the soul of the world. Though he fills all space, he rules all space. One mode of communicating his will to man is well described; if, for "soul of the world," we read, "the influences of the Supreme Being."

The third is thus laid down—Συμίσταται δὲ τὸ τρίτον εἶδος, ὅποταν ἐν τοῖς ὕπνοις ἐξ ἑαυτῆς ἡ ψυχὴ κινουμένη, καὶ ἀναδοροῦσα ἑαυτήν, κορυθαυτῇ καὶ εὐθεσιῶσα, δυνάμει προγνωστικῇ τὰ μέλλοντα θεσπίζει.—i. e. the third kind is, when in sleep the soul being moved of itself, and agitating itself, is in a kind of rapturous rage, and in a divine fury doth foretell future things by a prophetic faculty.

These things are also contrary to present experience, but they are not contrary to philosophy. An event or action which has actually taken place convinces our reason by means of our senses, that the event was real; so did the miraculous impressions of prophetic dreams or visions, distinguish themselves from the sensations occasioned only by the common circumstances of life, in such a manner that the prophet or person favored with them could not mistake the effect of the extraordinary impulse for any common feeling arising from ordinary situations and events. Ideas, it is true, are usually suggested by the senses only, but why should we not believe that the Father of spirits can affect our mind with images and ideas, produced by other agency than that of the senses? Smith On Prophecy, vol. iv. Watson's Tracts, p. 306. Vide Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 243. Calmet's Dict. Art. Dreams. Witsius, Miscell. Sacra, vol. i. p. 27. De Insomniis, and p. 289, De Prophetis, in Evang. laudatis.

It may be observed here, how uniformly the idea of a spiritual Messiah is preserved. Joseph, in common with his countrymen, may justly be supposed to have entertained the opinion that a temporal Messiah was coming to deliver his people from the Romans; the Angel informs him that he should be called Jesus (from ἰϋς, to save), for he should save them from their sins. He should save them not merely from the consequences of their sins by his atonement, but from the dominion of their sins by his gift of the Holy Spirit, to lead them both into obedience and truth. We must not hope to be delivered hereafter from the consequences of evil, unless we are at present delivered from its power.

The name Jesus, say Castalio and Osiander, Heb. יהושע, may possibly signify "the man Jehovah," or "Jehovah incarnate," "God in human nature." It is compounded of יהוה and ישׁ; the letter שׁ being interposed from the latter word, the two others י and ה being rejected as serviles, and therefore added or rejected at pleasure. This name is given at full length by Moses to the Angel Jehovah who conducted the Israelites through the wilderness, "The LORD is a man of war," יהוה אישׁ מלחמה. The same name is given likewise at length in the exclamation of Eve, in which she expressed a hope that her son was the promised deliverer, קִנִּיתִי אִישׁ אֶת יְרֻדָּי

The angel commands that the name Jesus be given to the Messiah, "because he shall save his people from their sins." The Angel Jehovah led his people through the wilderness, and saved them from their enemies, and from the hands of all who hated them. Christ was to do the same. The analogy between the enemies of Israel and the enemies of the soul of man is complete. Christ in the former instance was the Saviour of his people from their temporal enemies. He was now to be revealed as their Saviour from their more dangerous and inveterate adversaries, Death, Satan, and the evil of their own nature.

Pfeiffer is of opinion, with the generality of commentators, that the name must be derived from יָשַׁע to save, and he rejects therefore the above derivation, which is given with little variation from Osiander, Reuchlin, and Sebastianus Castalio. See the whole Dissertation De Nominis Jesu—Pfeifferi Dubia Vexata, p. 1154, particularly Th. 6 to 18 inclusive.

I have placed the appearance of the Angel to Joseph after Mary's return from the house of Elisabeth, as she came back from Hebron before the birth of John, three months after the annunciation of the Messiah. On her arrival at her own house, when her pregnancy became evident, the fears and suspicions of Joseph, we may justly suppose, were excited. Before that period he could have no reason for suspicion. Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 421.

NOTE 17.—PART I.^a

THE Christian may believe that this passage refers to the Messiah on the authority of St. Matthew; and the Jew may likewise believe it, on the authority of the ancient targumists, who, with their countrymen in general, were accustomed to refer these expressions of their early prophets to the expected Messiah. To overthrow the force of the prediction, they have, however, in later days, made use of arguments which their ancestors would have disdained.—Vide Kidder's Demons. of Mess. vol. iii. p. 90, &c.

NOTE 18.—PART I.

ANOTHER proof was now to be afforded to the whole Jewish nation, that the time of the Messiah had arrived. The Father of the patriarchs had long prophesied that the sceptre was not to depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh, "the Sent,"

"the Messiah" come, (Gen. xlix. 10.) The people, though they had long been subjected to the Romans, had been hitherto more immediately under the control of their high priests, and of the family of Herod, who called himself a Jew, though he was of the race of Edom; they were now reduced to a mere province; they were commanded by a heathen, a stranger and a foreigner, to enrol their families in the public registers; to take the oath of fidelity, and, probably, to pay tribute to him as their sovereign and ruler^b. What could have been a stronger argument and appeal to every individual Jew, that the sceptre had entirely departed, and that Shiloh was to be immediately expected, than this individual taxation, or badge of subjection?

NOTE 19.—PART I.

THE word πρώτη must be construed in the same sense of priority as to time; it bears this sense in some, though not many instances. It is much better thus to render the passage, than to adopt any conjectural emendation; whether πρὸ τῆς, with Whitby, or πρώτη πρὸ τῆς, with Michaelis, which his translator so decidedly condemns; or than Mr. Benson's, which is very ingenious, but unsupported by the only authority which ought to induce us to receive any alteration of the vulgate text of the New Testament, the authority of manuscripts. It is certainly a very slight alteration, but it must be rejected, in the absence of other proof.

He would read αὐτὴ ἡ ἀπογραφὴ πρώτη ἐγένετο ἢ (ἀπογραφὴ ἢ ἐγένετο) ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς, &c., ^a The Targum of Onkelos gives this interpretation—"Non recedet עביר שולחן faciens potentiam ex domo Judæ וכפרא, et scriba ex nepotibus ejus in æternum, donec veniat Messias;" and the Targum of Jonathan, "Non cessabunt reges, et præsides ex domo Judæ, et scribæ docentes legem ex semine ejus, usque ad tempus, quo veniet Rex Messias;" and the Jerusalem Targum gives the same interpretation. See also a large number of authorities from the early Jewish writers, all to the same effect, in Schoetgenius, Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. ii. p. 492, &c. On the sceptre of Judah, see the Dissertation of Schoetgenius De Schiloh Dominatore; and a curious and most ingenious dissertation by Bishop Warburton, who thus interprets the prophecy—"The Theocracy shall continue over the Jews, until Christ come to take possession of his Father's kingdom."—Divine Legation, vol. iv. p. 245-266. "Quod nomen habet Messias? Qui sunt de domo שילח R. Schilæ seu scholastici ejus, dixerunt שילח Schilo esse nomen ejus: quia dicitur Gen. xlix. 10. Usquedum veniet Schilo."—Meuschen N. T. ex Talmude, p. 30, and 902. See also Leslie's Case of the Jews, Dublin, 1755, p. 6.

^b About this time Augustus, as is related by Josephus, ordered the oath of fidelity to be taken to him, as the superior and sovereign of the land. In that oath, Herod was considered as secondary to the emperor, and the people were not required to give him their personal allegiance. It is possible that the enrolment ordered by Augustus was the same as the ἀπογραφὴ of St. Luke. See next note.

inserting only the single letter η , between $\epsilon\gamma\epsilon\nu\epsilon\iota\omicron$ and $\eta\gamma\epsilon\mu\omicron\nu\epsilon\upsilon\omicron\rho\iota\omicron\varsigma$ —and thus render the passage, “This taxing took place before that, which took place when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.”

The suggestion of Mr. Benson, that the decree for the taxing, or $\alpha\pi\omicron\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\eta$, of St. Luke, was the same as the taking the oath of allegiance to Augustus, mentioned by Josephus, is well supported; and, if his hypothesis did not require an alteration of the sacred text, which is not warranted by the requisite authorities, might be received without hesitation. See the next note on the solution of the difficulty in this verse. Vide Benson's Chronology of the Life of Christ.

NOTE 20.—PART I.

It has been asserted, that this verse contradicts some well-supported facts in history. Cyrenius, it is said, was not governor of Syria till eleven years after this enrolment. At the time of Christ's birth, Saturninus and Volumnius were presidents of that country.

The following is a correct statement of the fact, according to the best authorities who have carefully studied the subject. Herod, some few years before his death, had been misrepresented to Augustus. The Roman emperor, to punish his imputed crime, ordered that Judea should be reduced to a Roman province, and a register be taken of every person's age, dignity, employment, family, and office. When this decree was first promulgated, Cyrenius was only a Roman senator, and collector of the imperial revenue. Its execution was postponed, through the influence of Nicholas of Damascus, who was sent by Herod to Rome, to vindicate his conduct to Augustus; and it was only carried into effect eleven years afterwards, when Cyrenius had been advanced from the inferior dignity of collector of the public tribute, to the office of governor of Syria.

The difficulty, therefore, respecting the words in the original will disappear, when the passage is considered in reference to this statement. Dr. Lardner, who is followed by Dr. Paley, proposes a solution, which has now been generally adopted. “This was the first enrolment of Cyrenius, who, though a Roman senator only, when it was decreed, was governor of Syria, and is known among the Jews by that title.” When St. Luke wrote the Gospel, Cyrenius was known by his latter title. Lardner's Works, 4to. p. 136, &c. Paley's Evidences, vol. ii. p. 177. Hales's Analysis, vol. ii. p. 705, &c.

NOTE 21.—PART I.

THERE does not appear to have been any necessity, from the nature of the tax, for the personal attendance of Mary at Bethlehem. When we consider her situation, it is not improbable she might have been induced to have accompanied her husband to insure his protection, and to preserve herself from the insult or contumely of her unbelieving neighbours, to which she might have been already exposed. To avoid reproach, or derision, she might have encountered fatigue and inconvenience. However this may be, it shows us the manner in which the prophecies of the Old Testament were accomplished by circumstances apparently accidental. No mortal wisdom could have foreseen the journey of Joseph to Bethlehem, and the consequent fulfilment of that prediction of Micah, which the Jews had long referred to, as an undoubted prophecy of the birthplace of Christ. When Herod called the priests together, to demand of them “Where Christ should be born,” they assured him it was at Bethlehem, from the prophecy of Micah, (Mic. v. 2.) This authority, however satisfactory to a Christian, is not, I have heard, sufficient for the modern Jew, who is more inclined to depend on the testimony of his ancient rabbis. I refer him to Joma, f. 10. 1. apud Meuschen N. T. ex Talmude, p. 19. (in p. 28. it is only a repetition of the same reference,) and the targum on Micah, $\text{יִמְנֵן קִדְמִי יִפּוֹק מִשִּׁיחָא}$, “Ex te ante me prodibit Messias, ut faciat potentiam super Israel.”—Apud Schoetgen, vol. i. p. 3.

NOTE 22.—PART I.

ON THE GENEALOGIES OF ST. MATTHEW AND ST. LUKE.

THE apparent discrepancies between the genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke, contained in this section, have given rise to much discussion. The enrolment ordered by Augustus must have compelled every family to review their tables of pedigree, which were always preserved among the Jews with more than usual attention—we may therefore justly conclude that if any error had crept into the pedigree of Joseph and Mary, it would then have been rectified. In addition to this, we may observe, that St. Matthew and St. Luke published their Gospels at a time when the general tables of pedigree were still preserved, and when every genealogical table which professed to trace the descent or one who claimed to be the expected Messiah, would be inspected with the most scrupulous and jealous anxiety. Yet we do not read that any objection to the accuracy of the Evangelists was raised by their contemporaries. Satisfactory solutions of the apparent differences have been given by Archbishop Newcome, Grotius, Whitby, South, Julius Africanus, and others, as well as Lightfoot, whose opinion on this point is generally the most approved. This learned divine supposes that St. Matthew wrote his Gospel more particularly for the Jews: he therefore proves Christ to be their Messiah, the heir of the throne of David, by legal descent from Abraham and David. But St. Luke, addressing himself to the Gentiles, to whom the promise had been given before the Levitical dispensation, proves the same Christ to be the predicted seed of the woman, the son of Adam, the son of God.

From perusing the various schemes of the theologians who have discussed this point, we may, however, come to these general conclusions:—

From Abraham to David the genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke coincide.

It is commonly agreed that Matthew gives the legal, and not the natural, pedigree of Joseph.

Matthew traces the descendants of David through Solomon to Jechonias; in whom the descendants of Solomon became extinct.

The legal successor of Jechonias was Salathiel; who was descended from David through his son Nathan.

Hence Salathiel appears in Matthew as the son of Jechonias; though he was really the son of Neri, as stated by Luke.

Zorobabel had two sons, Abiud and Rhesa.

Whether the line of Abiud became extinct in Matthan is disputed.

It is agreed that from Heli upwards, in Luke's genealogy, the natural succession is given.

It is disputed whether Joseph was Heli's actual son, or his legal son, or his son-in-law.

According to Julius Africanus (apud Euseb.) Joseph was the actual son of Jacob, and the grandson of Matthan. An opinion adopted by Whitby.

According to Grotius, Joseph was the actual son of Heli, and the legal successor of Jacob. This makes Luke's genealogy the natural pedigree of Joseph throughout.

Lightfoot supposes that Joseph was the son-in-law of Heli, his wife Mary being the daughter of Heli.

All seem to agree that both Joseph and Mary were lineally descended from Zorobabel.

Therefore from Zorobabel upwards their natural pedigrees, as given by Luke, coincide.

Whether the pedigree from Zorobabel downwards, in Luke, be that of Joseph or Mary, is uncertain.

Whether the pedigree in Matthew from Zorobabel downwards be the real, or the legal descent of Joseph is uncertain.

Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary, has devoted much attention to this subject, and his conclusions appear so satisfactory, that I shall here lay them before the reader.

1. "Being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph." This phrase is used by Herodotus, to signify one who was only reputed to be the son of a particular person, τοῦτου παῖς νομιζέσθαι, "He was supposed to be this man's son."

2. Much learned labor has been used to reconcile this genealogy with that of St. Matthew, chap. i., and there are several ways of doing it: the following, which appears to me to be the best, is also the most simple and easy.

3. Matthew, in descending from Abraham to Joseph, the spouse of the blessed Virgin, speaks of sons properly such by way of natural generation: Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob, &c. But Luke, in ascending from the Saviour of the world to God himself, speaks of sons either properly or improperly such; on that account he uses an indeterminate mode of expression, which may be applied to sons putatively or really such. "And Jesus began to be about thirty years of age, being as was supposed the son of Joseph—of Heli—of Matthat," &c. This receives considerable support from Raphael's method of reading the original, ὃν (ὃς ἐνομιζέσθαι υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ) τοῦ Ἡλὶ, "being (when reputed the son of Joseph) the son of Heli," &c. That St. Luke does not always speak of sons properly such is evident from the first and last person whom he names: Jesus Christ was only the supposed son of Joseph, because Joseph was the husband of his mother Mary; and Adam, who is said to be the son of God, was such only by creation. After this observation, it is next necessary to consider that, in the genealogy described by St. Luke, there are two sons-in-law, instead of two sons.

4. As the Hebrews never permitted the names of women to enter into their genealogical tables, whenever a family happened to end with a daughter, instead of naming her in the genealogy, they inserted her husband as the son of him, who was, in reality, but his father-in-law. This import, Bishop Pearce has fully shown, νομιζέσθαι bears in a variety of places. Jesus was "considered according to law," or "allowed custom," to be the son of Joseph, as he was of Heli.

5. The two sons-in-law who are to be noticed in this genealogy are Joseph the son-in-law of Heli, whose own father was Jacob, Matt. i. 16.; and Salathiel, the son-in-law of Neri, whose own father was Jechonias, 1 Chron. iii. 17. and Matt. i. 12.; this remark alone is sufficient to remove every difficulty. Thus, it appears, that Joseph, the son of Jacob, according to St. Matthew, was son-in-law of Heli, according to St. Luke. And Salathiel, son of Jechonias, according to the former, was son-in-law of Neri, according to the latter.

6. Mary, therefore, appears to have been the daughter of Heli, so called by abbreviation for Heliachim, which is the same in Hebrew as Joachim.

7. Joseph son of Jacob, and Mary daughter of Heli were of the same family; both came from Zerobabel; Joseph from Abiud, his eldest son, Matt. i. 13. and Mary by Rhesa, the youngest. See ver. 27.

8. Salathiel and Zerobabel, from whom St. Matthew and St. Luke cause Christ to proceed, were themselves descended from Solomon in a right line; and though St. Luke says that Salathiel was the son of Neri, who was descended from Nathan, Solomon's eldest brother, 1 Chron. iii. 5., this is only to be understood of his having espoused Nathan's daughter; and that Neri dying probably without male issue, the two branches of the family of David, that of Nathan and Solomon, were both united in the person of Zerobabel, by the marriage of Salathiel, chief of the regal family of Solomon, with the daughter of Neri, chief and heretrix of the family of Nathan. So that Jesus, the son of Mary, reunited in himself all the blood, privileges, and rights, of the whole family of David, in consequence of which He is emphatically called, the Son of David. It is worthy of remark, that Matthew, who wrote principally for the Jews, carries his genealogy to Abraham, through whom the promise of the Messiah was given to the Jews: but St. Luke, who wrote for the Gentiles, extends his genealogy to Adam, to whom the promise of the Saviour was in behalf of all his posterity.

v. 36. The insertion of the word Cainan has occasioned much difficulty; as Cainan, the son of Arphaxad, and father of Sala, is not found in any other Scripture genealogy. The best solution, because it does not violate the text, is that Cainan was a surname of Sala, and that the names should be read together, thus—the son of Heber—the son of Sala Cainan—the son of Arphaxad.

The opinion of Africanus, long received by the Church, as the only legitimate mode of reconciling these difficulties, is as follows.

The names of kindred among the Jews were reckoned in two ways.

1. According to nature, as in the case of natural generation. 2. According to law, as when a man died childless, his brother was obliged to take his wife, and the issue of that marriage was accounted to the deceased brother. In this genealogy some succeeded their fathers as natural sons, but others succeeded who bore their names only. Thus neither of the Gospels is false: the one reckoning the pedigree by the natural, the other by the legal line. The race both of Solomon and Nathan is so interwoven by those second marriages, which raised up issue in the name of a deceased brother, that some appear to have two fathers—him, whose natural issue they were, though they did not bear his name; and him, to whom, having died childless, the children of his wife and brother were accounted for a seed, assuming his name.

If we reckon the generations according to Matthew, from David by Solomon, Matthan will be found the third from the end, who begat Jacob, the father of Joseph; but if we reckon according to Luke, from Nathan the son of David, then the third person from the end will be Melchi, whose son was Heli, the father of Joseph; for Joseph was the son of Heli, the son of Melchi. Matthan and Melchi having successively married the same wife, the latter begat children, who were brethren by the mother. Matthan, descending from Solomon, begat Jacob of Estha. After the death of Matthan, Melchi, who descended from Nathan, being of the same tribe, but of another race, took his widow to wife, and begat Heli: thus Jacob and Heli were brethren by the mother. Heli dying without issue, Jacob married his widow, and begat Joseph, who, by Law, was accounted the son of Heli; because the Law required the seed to be raised up to the deceased brother. Matthew therefore says, very properly, Jacob begat Joseph, but Luke says Joseph was the son of Heli; and it is worthy of remark, that St. Luke does not use the term begot or begetting, but traces this genealogy by putative, and not by natural sons.

The late learned Dr. Barrett has studied this difficult subject with the deepest attention, and by a new line of argument has reconciled the apparent discrepancies of the two genealogies. After examining the hypothesis of Africanus, he rejects it on the principle that it refers wholly to the descent of Joseph from David, without proving that the son of Mary was the son of David.

Dr. Barrett then states his own solution, viz., that Matthew relates the genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary. Hence it appears probable, that, after Matthew had given his genealogy to the world, another should be added by Luke, to prove that Christ was fully descended from David, not only by his supposed father Joseph, but by his real mother Mary. Those who agree in this opinion may be divided into two classes. 1. Those who affirm, that the families of Solomon and Nathan met in Salathiel and Zerobabel, and afterwards divaricated, till reunited in the marriage of Joseph and Mary. 2. Those who assert that Salathiel and Zerobabel were distinct individuals, and that no union took place between the families previous to the marriage of Joseph and Mary. To the latter opinion he objects, as being contradictory to the divine promise, 2 Sam. vii. 7. 12. 16.; for, according to this hypothesis, neither Mary nor Christ were descended from David by Solomon. He therefore proposes to support the other hypothesis, and to clear away its difficulties. As Irenæus, Africanus, and Ambrosius assert that Luke has some names interpolated; to detect this error, Dr. Barrett divides the genealogy into four classes; 1. From God to Abraham. 2. From Abraham to David. 3. From David to Salathiel. 4. From Salathiel to Christ. He examines these at length, and concludes there have been some interpolations, omissions, and transpositions. To give a satisfactory view of this subject, he introduces a synopsis of the principal various readings of MS. versions, &c. on Luke ii. 24–31.

From this collation of authorities, after correcting the omissions and interpolations, he concludes with Irenæus, that these generations should be laid down in the following order. 1. Jesus. 2. Joseph, (or Mary, the daughter of Heli.) 3. Heli, the grandfather of Christ. 4. Matthat. 5. Levi. 6. Melchi. 7. Janna. 8. Joseph. 9. Matthias. 10. Amos. 11. Naum. 12. Esli. 13. Nagge. 14. Semel. 15. Joseph. 16. Juda. 17. Joanna. 18. Rhesa. 19. Zerobabel. 20. Salathiel. 21. Neri. 22. Melchi. 23. Addi. 24. Cosam. 25. Elmodam. 26. Er. 27. Jose. 28. Eliezer. 29. Jorim. 30. Matthat. 31. Levi. 32. Simeon. 33. Juda. 34. Joseph. 35. Jonan. 36. Eliakim. 37. Mattatha. 38. Nathan. 39. David. 40. Jesse. 41. Obed. 42. Booz. 43. Salmon. 44. Naasson. 45. Aminadab. 46. Aram. 47. Esrom. 48. Pharez. 49. Juda. 50. Jacob. 51. Isaac. 52. Abraham. 53. Terah. 54. Nahor. 55. Serug. 56. Ragau. 57. Peleg. 58. Eber. 59. Sala. 60. Canaan. 61. Arphaxad. 62. Shem. 63. Noah. 64. Lamech. 65. Mathusala. 66. Enoch. 67. Jared. 68. Mahalaleel. 69. Canaan. 70. Enos. 71. Seth. 72. Adam.

From the generations thus laid down, there will be found fifty-one names between Christ and Abraham, excluding the latter, which agrees both with Africanus and Ambrosius. Now let thirty years be reckoned to each generation between Christ and David, Salathiel will then appear to have been born anno 570 before Christ, which will be found near the truth; and David 1140. David was in fact born 1085 B. C., whence there appears an error of fifty-five years, or about the twentieth part of the time, in so many generations. But according to the received text of Luke, Salathiel must be born B. C. 630, and David 1260; this would be an error of 175 years, or a fifth part of the whole interval.

Dr. Barrett endeavours to solve the principal difficulty by adopting the genealogy of David, as delivered 1 Chron. iii. In this chapter, and in the Book of Kings, the whole is laid down in the most accurate manner till the reign of Jechonias, after which he supposes some errors have been admitted into the text, on account of many inconsistencies, chronological difficulties, and various readings, which he enumerates.

From these considerations it appears, that those who are mentioned 1 Chron. iii. 18. were neither the sons of Jechoniah, nor of Salathiel, and consequently were the sons of Zerubbabel, as he has satisfactorily proved—that Pedaiah, or Peraiah, is the same who, in verse 21, is called Rephaiah, who is mentioned Nehemiah iii. 9., and that Jechamiah is the same as Joachim, who, according to Esdras v. 5. was the son or Zerubbabel. Both these names, Pedaiah or Peraiah, and Jechamiah, occur 1 Chron. iii. 18., consequently a verse is transposed; a thing not unfrequent in the Sacred Writings. He therefore contends that the text of 1 Chron. iii. 18–22. should be read in the following order:—

Verse 18. And the sons of Salathiel, Zerubbabel and Shimei; and the sons of Zerubbabel, Meshullam, Hananiah, and Shelomith their sister.

Ver. 19. Hashubah, and Ohel, and Berechiah, and Hasadiah, Jushab-hesed.

Ver. 20. And Malchiram, and Rephaiah, and Shenar, Jechamiah, Hoshamah, and Nedabiah; six.

Ver. 21. And the sons of Hananiah, Pelatiah, and Jesaiah; the sons of Rephaiah; Arnan his son; Obadiah his son; Shechaniah his son; (reading, according to Houbigant, בֶּנוֹ, beno, for בְּנֵי beni.)

Ver. 22. The sons of Shechaniah; Shemaiah; the sons of Shemaiah; Hattush, and Igeal, and Bariah, and Neariah, and Shaphat; six.

He then shows the propriety of substituting בֶּנוֹ, beno, his son, for בְּנֵי, beni, sons, in ver. 21. supposing the latter to be corrupted.

Dr. Barrett, having thus far made his way plain, proceeds to lay down a table of the regal line, taken from 1 Chron. iii., placing on each side the genealogies given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, that the general agreement may be more easily discerned.

Matt. i.	1 Chron. iii.	Luke iii.
Salathiel.	Salathiel.	Salathiel.
Zorobabel.	Zerubbabel.	Zorobabel.
First generation omitted.	Rephaiah.	Rhesa.
Another generation omitted.	Arnan, or Onon.	Joanna, or Jonan.
Abiud.	Obadiah.	Juda.
Eliakim.	Shechaniah.	Joseph, or Josech.
A third generation omitted.	Shemiah.	Semei.
	No corresponding generation.	Matthias.
	No corresponding generation.	Maath.
Fourth generation omitted.	Neariah.	Nagge.
Azor, who is also	Azrikam, who is	Esli, from whom descended Mary
From the above descends Joseph who espoused Mary.	Elioenai.	Naum, or Anum.
	Joanan Joanam.

Dr. Barrett then proceeds to lay down the following propositions:—

I. That Salathiel in Matthew is the same with Salathiel in 1 Chron. iii., both being descended from David through the same ancestors; both lived at the same time, viz. of the captivity; and both were born of the same father.

II. That Salathiel in Luke is the same with Salathiel in 1 Chron. iii. 17., the same as in Matthew i. and consequently that Mary the mother of Jesus, descending from Salathiel in Luke, descends lineally from David by Solomon, a matter of vast consequence according to the opinion of Calvin, who asserts “if Christ was not descended from Solomon, he cannot be the Messiah.” Taking for granted, then, that Salathiel in Matthew is the same with Salathiel in 1 Chron. Dr. Barrett deduces the following consequences from his hypothesis.

1. Zerubbabel in 1 Chron. is the same with Zorobabel in Luke: as they agree in name, time, and in having the same father.

2. Rephaiah in 1 Chron. is the same with Rhesa in Luke, where a notable coincidence occurs in the names.

3. Arnan in 1 Chron. is the same with Joanna in Luke; which appears probable from the great diversity of forms in which the name is written in ancient MSS.

4. Obadiah in 1 Chron. is the same as Juda in Luke. In this name may be found that of Abiud, mentioned Matt. i. 13. who is the third from Zerubbabel; whence it is evident, that in St. Matthew two generations are omitted. The MSS. in St. Luke also vary considerably in the name; some write it Ιωαδα, which answers to the Hebrew Joida, or even עֲבַדְיָה, Obadiah; the same as Iddo, who returned with Zerubbabel.

5. Shechaniah in 1 Chron. is the same with Joseph, or Osech, between which names there is a considerable similitude.

6. Shemaiah in 1 Chron. is the same with Semei in Luke. In this place the names perfectly agree. Thus, through six successive generations in the same line, the names either perfectly agree, or are manifestly similar; each preserving the same order. Hence it may be legitimately concluded, that the preceding hypothesis is perfectly correct; and that Salathiel in Luke is the same with Salathiel, 1 Chron. iii., especially when we consider that the time which elapsed between David and Christ was nearly bisected by the captivity; so that the number of generations between them was divided into almost two equal parts by Salathiel. The two generations which occur after Semei, in Luke, after Mattathias and Maath, of which no trace is found, 1 Chron. iii. are rejected from the text of Luke as interpolations. Immediately after Shemaiah, the writer of 1 Chron. iii. subjoins Neariah, in which Dr. Barrett supposes he has found the person called Nagge in Luke iii. 25. as the names in the original languages do not materially differ.

In some following observations Dr. Barrett thinks that the family of Salathiel divided into two branches, one of which is traced by Matthew, the other by Luke. It is therefore not surprising that the genealogies of the two Evangelists should differ from this period. The Ešli mentioned by Luke had a son called Naum, or Anum; among the sons of Elioenai, mentioned in 1 Chron. iii. was Joamam, or Joanam—names which considerably resemble those recorded by St. Luke.

Having thus fixed the genealogy, by proving that Salathiel in Matthew and Luke is the same with Salathiel in 1 Chron. iii. 17. he proceeds to inquire whether chronology will support him in the times of these generations.

From examining the chronology, it appears that there is no place for the supposititious Pedaiah, and that Naum begat Amos B. C. 290, himself being fifty years old. After Amos let thirty years be computed for each generation, or a hundred years for three, the dates will then appear thus:—

MATTHEW.	LUKE.	A.A.C.
Azor born B.C. 380 . . .	Elioenai, or Ešli, born . .	380
A generation omitted . .	Naum	340
Another generation omitted	Amos	290
Sadoc	Mattathias	260
Achim	Joseph	230
Eliud	Janna	200
Eleazer	Melchi	165
Matthan	Levi	130
Jacob	Matthat	100
Joseph, husband of Mary	Heli	65
	Mary, mother of Christ	25

Dr. Barrett then inquires, whether by the proposition it appears that Salathiel in Luke and Salathiel in 1 Chron. are the same person, provided the generations be traced up to David; he acknowledges the difficulties of the inquiry, and that the utmost to be expected is, to show the invalidity of the arguments against it.

Matthew states that Jechonias was the father of Salathiel: but Luke says, that Neri was his father: this may be reconciled by supposing that Neri was the maternal grandfather of Salathiel, and hence, according to the custom of the Hebrews, put down for his father. The truth of this hypothesis is next examined.

It is a received opinion of the Jews, that Sussanna was the wife of Jechonias, and mother of Salathiel, which is confirmed by Biblioth. Clement. Vatic. tom. i. p. 290. and she was undoubtedly nearly allied to the throne, from the magnificence in which she lived. (See the account in the Septuagint version of Daniel, compared with 2 Sam. xv. 1. 1 Kings i. 5.)

He next inquires into the genealogy of Neri, whom he supposes to be the same with Neariah, mentioned so frequently by Jeremiah, and who was the father of Baruch and Seraiah. Baruch was certainly of an illustrious family, as we learn from Josephus, who calls him the son of Neri; which Dr. Barrett establishes by several considerations, showing that Baruch, and consequently Neariah, sprang from Nathan the son of David.

As nothing is related of the ancestors of Neariah, he again recurs to conjectures, which are chiefly the following:—Masseiah, or Melchi, the father of Neriah, was probably the same mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8. as governor of the city. It is also probable Simeon, the son of Juda, mentioned Luke iii. 30. is the same person called Maaseiah, the son of Adaiah. in 2 Chron. xxiii. 1., the two names being written with the same letters, and differing scarcely except in situation. It is well known to all biblical critics, that the names of the Old Testament have been much corrupted, not only in different translations, but in different copies of the original.

Admitting the above hypothesis, Dr. Barrett shows that the family of Nathan was concealed in an obscure situation, till the greater part of the family of Solomon was destroyed by the treachery of Athaliah; when Maaseiah, or Simeon, moved with pity towards his relative Joash, by the assistance of Jehoiada, removed Athaliah out of the way, and set Joash upon the throne; from which time the dignity of the family increased, till the line of Solomon becoming extinct, Jechonias, his only remaining heir, took to wife Susanna the daughter of Neariah. Supposing this hypothesis to be true, Dr. Barrett thus constructs his genealogical table, beginning at the division of the line of Solomon, omitting Melea and Mainan as interpolations.

1	Solomon.	1	Nathan.
2	Rehoboam	2	Mattathu
3	Abiah	3	Eliakim
4	Asa	4	Jonan
5	Jehosaphat	5	Joseph
6	Jehoram	6	Judah, or Adaiiah
7	Ahaziah	7	Simeon, or Masseiah
8	Joash	8	Levi
9	Amaziah	9	Matthat
10	Uzziah	10	Jorim
11	Jotham	11	Eliezer
12	Ahaz	12	Jose
13	Hezekiah	13	Er
14	Manasses	14	Elmodam
15	Amon	15	Cosam
16	Josias	16	Addi
17	Jehoiakim	17	Melchi, or Maaseias
18	Jehoiachin, or Jechonias	18	Neri
		19	Susanna.

In treating of the ancestors of Mary, and the consanguinity between her and Joseph, Dr. Barrett shows that the Virgin was not (as was formerly supposed) descended from the tribe of Levi, but from the family of David; and brings several additional arguments to prove that St. Luke traces the genealogy of Mary, and St. Matthew that of Joseph.

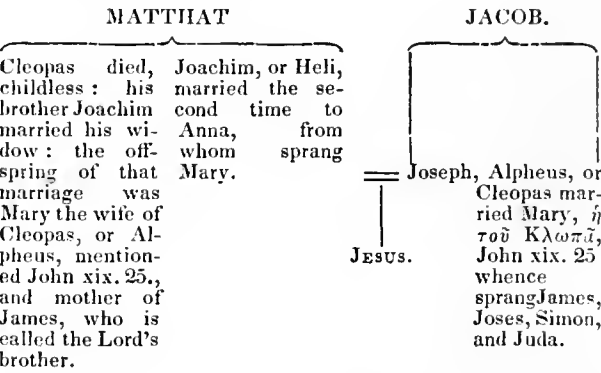

According to the universal voice of antiquity, the father and mother of the Virgin were called Joachim and Anna. Dr. Barrett thinks it indisputable that Joachim is the same name with Heli, Luke iii. 23. or Eliakim, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4., which is rendered probable by the Virgin being called by some Jewish writers, Mary, the daughter of Heli. Thus it may be taken for granted, that Heli was the father of Mary, and maternal grandfather of Christ, and that he is considered by St. Luke as the real father of Christ. He next considers the family of Anna, the mother of Mary. It is generally agreed that the father of Anna was named Matthan, and he is supposed by some to have been a priest—and as the daughters of the priests might intermarry with any tribe, it accounts for Mary's being the cousin of Elisabeth (who was really of the tribe of Levi), though her father Joachim, or Heli, was a descendant of the tribe of Judah.

Dr. Barrett next proceeds to the family of Joachim; but in this examination he finds very few documents to guide his inquiries. It however seems probable that James, Joses, Simon, and Judas, mentioned in Matt. xiii. 55. and Luke vi. 3. as the brethren of our Lord, were in reality his cousins, being the sons of Mary, the wife of Alpheus, and sister to the Virgin.

Concerning Cleopas, or Klopas, there are various opinions, but that conjecture of Calmet seems the most probable, that Cleopas was the husband of that Mary who was sister to the blessed Virgin, and father of James the less.

Dr. Barrett thinks that these apparently discordant systems may be harmonized into the following scheme:—

Having thus investigated this difficult question, Dr. Barrett concludes by observing, that his principal object was to prove, by the agreement of the Evangelists, that Christ descended from David by the line of Solomon.

To effect this he has formed a genealogical table of the family of David, according to the principal genealogical tables given in the Old Testament; and to this test, supported by fair criticism and the comparing of MSS., he brings the table of descent given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, and finding that they both agree with his conclusions, he of course concludes that they necessarily agree with each other. From their mutual agreement with the line of descents collected from the Old Testament, without any other collateral evidence, he further concludes, that the genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke are genuine, authentic, and accurate.

Vide Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Luke iii. (from whose abridgment of Dr. Barrett's work, the above is compiled), Whitby, and the commentators.

NOTE 23.—PART I.

It is not necessary to enter into the investigation of the question, whether these two chapters of St. Luke are genuine; for the whole Gospels rest upon the same evidence: that is, they are now found in every manuscript and version extant, and were always received as authentic from the commencement of the Christian æra. A class of writers, however, falsely assuming the name of Christians, have framed to themselves many arguments against the truths contained in these and the first two chapters of St. Matthew; and having persuaded themselves that the doctrines they contain are indefensible, they proceed to attack the authenticity of the chapters which assert them. Their principal reason for this conduct is, that a heretic, named Marcion, used a copy of St. Luke's Gospel, in which these chapters were omitted. The whole question has been fully and most impartially examined by Dr. Loefer, and the conclusions of his careful investigation are these:—

1. The Gospel used by Marcion was anonymous.

2. The four Gospels were all alike rejected by Marcion, who maintained the authenticity of his own anonymous Gospel in place of these inspired compositions.

3. His followers assert that Christ himself, and St. Paul, were the authors of Marcion's Gospel.

4. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Epiphanius, had no reason for regarding Marcion's Gospel as an altered edition of St. Luke's; their assertion is mere conjecture^c, resting on absurd and frivolous allegations. The great difference of the two Gospels is inconsistent with this supposition.

5. No reasonable motive can be assigned, which could have induced Marcion to use a garbled copy of St. Luke's Gospel; the motives assigned by the fathers being inconsistent and self-destructive.

It is supposed, therefore, that he adopted some apocryphal composition, combining much of the matter given by St. Luke with his own ideas of theology and revelation.

NOTE 24.—PART I.

IN the first fourteen generations, the people of Israel were under prophets—in the second, under kings—in the third, under the Asmonæan priests. The first fourteen brought their kingdom to glory, under the reign of David; the second to misery, in the captivity of Babylon; and the third to glory again, under the Messiah-ship of Christ. The first division begins with Abraham, who received the promise; and ends with David, who received it again with greater clearness. The second begins with the building of the temple, and ends with its destruction. The third opens with a deliverance from temporal enemies and return from captivity, and terminates in their spiritual delivery from every enemy by Christ; to whom each successive generation pointed as the Prophet—King—and Priest of his people.—See also Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 418.

NOTE 25.—PART I.

THIS too might have been expected, that, when the Messiah was born, some visible expression of angelic joy and sympathy would be demonstrated at the mercy of God displayed towards the human race. To the angels of heaven the system of redemption is represented as a subject of surprise and astonishment. In the cherubic emblems the angels are drawn as bending over the ark; and, in allusion to the cause of this position, we are expressly told "which things the angels desire to look into".

The address of the angel is formed with peculiar allusion to the plan of redemption. "Behold I bring you," who are Jews, the favored sons of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, the chosen people of God—I bring you "tidings of great joy." But this great joy shall not be confined to you—it "shall be to all the nations:" for the desire of all nations is come—the Christ—the Messiah is born. Although the Saviour of all mankind, he is more especially your Saviour. "Unto you is born," this very day, in a city of your former king, the "Saviour, which is Christ the Lord;" or more properly Messiah, the Jehovah Angel of your fathers.

At every step of our progress into the magnificent world of the Christian revelation, we meet with new proofs of one wise scheme of Almighty Providence in accomplishing the salvation of man—

"Lord! what is man that thou art mindful of him, Or the son of man, that thou so regardest him?"

When the long-promised Christ is born, the universe seems to be agitated. The age of miracles, of prophecy, of supernatural vision, of angelic appearances returns. But to whom does the Almighty vouchsafe to reveal himself? not to Augustus at Rome, not to Herod at Jerusalem: not to the philosopher who depended on his reason, or the Pharisee who relied on his traditions, and forgot the spirit of his Scriptures! At the creation of the world the sons of God had shouted for joy (Job xxxviii. 7.): at the reconciliation of the world, the joyful tidings were to be given to all people, and the sons of God again descend as the delighted and exulting messengers. They appear to the shepherds in the field, to the humble, the poor, and the unprejudiced. The world is buried in sleep and unconcerned, though God himself was present—the shepherds, removed from all temporal distinctions, are awake, watchful, and obedient; and receive the good tidings of great joy, listening to the song of the heavenly host, saying,

^d 1 Pet. i. 12. εἰς ἃ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν ἄγγελοι παρακρίσται.

“Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace,
Good-will toward men.”

The glory of the Shechinah, the visible manifestation of the presence of God, is now beheld for the first time during many centuries^e, and the heavenly multitude were the attendants of our blessed Lord when he left the glory of his Father, to enter on the scene of his humiliation and suffering, for which his mortal body was now prepared. The Logos, or the divine nature, might at this time perhaps have united itself to the body ordained to receive it. It might now only have left the glory in which it had tabernacled in heaven. That which was within the womb of the Virgin was human only: a human body, and a human soul. It was perfect man. That which was divine might have been only united to the body in this state, when the perfect child was born. Then the perfect God became united to the perfect man, “of a reasonable soul, and human flesh subsisting.”

Dr. Lardner, in his treatise, Whether the Logos supplied the place of a human soul in the body of Christ? confounds the twofold nature.

NOTE 26.—PART I.

THE Messiah being now born into the world as a man, became subject to the Law of Moses, that he might fulfil all righteousness, and thereby be able, as the perfect sacrifice, to redeem those who had violated that Law. At the usual time, therefore, and with the ceremonies appointed for the Jews, he received the name which designated him as a man in all respects like unto us, sin only excepted. The name Christ, or the Anointed, was given him from above. He was now called Jesus, the Saviour, who in the likeness of sinful flesh was born to obey, and to atone. By the circumcision also he was taken, as a man, into covenant with his Father, whose glory he had so lately left.

^e The expression in the original δόξα Κυρίου περιλαμπρυνεν αὐτούς, is the same as the Hebrew כְּבוֹד יְהוָה, the Shechinah, or emblem or token of the presence of the Divine Majesty, which appeared so often to the patriarchs in the earlier ages of the world. Bechai in Legem, fol. 100. 1. “Apparitio Majestatis divinæ in Scriptura dicitur כְּבוֹד יְהוָה, GLORIA DOMINI, stilo vero sapientum Shechinah: et huc pertinent leca Exod. xxiv. 16. et Ps. lxxxv. 10.”—Schoetgen. Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. i. p. 542, and p. 261.—Jalkut Rubeni, fol. 2.

NOTE 27.—PART I.

WHISTON, contrary to the united opinions of Lightfoot, Doddridge, Newcome, Lardner, Michaelis, Pilkington, and others, has placed the offering of the Magi before the purification. If he had assigned sufficient reasons for this difference, it had been entitled to more attention; but it is certain that if the reputed parents of Christ had had the power, they would have had with it the most anxious wish to conform, with the utmost scrupulousness, to the Law on this occasion; had the Magi, therefore, presented their gifts before the purification, Joseph and Mary would doubtless have offered a lamb, instead of the sacrifice of the poorest of the people, a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons.

NOTE 28.—PART I.

THE prophecy of Simeon, who is supposed by Lightfoot to have been the father of the celebrated teacher Gamaliel, completes the evidence in favor of the Messiahship of Christ, derived from the return of the spirit of prophecy. It is not certain whether Anna spake by the Spirit of prophecy; or only expressed her conviction of the truth, from hearing and studying the evidences already afforded to the reflecting and pious, in proof of the claims of our Lord. The glory of the second temple now appeared in it for the first time. The miraculous power of his Holy Father attended his entrance there; and, though an infant, he was openly acknowledged by the inspired effusions of the most eminent among the Jews for learning, piety, and obedience to the Law. The most satisfactory and irresistible evidence was given, on all occasions, to those who really waited in joyful expectation, for that Saviour who should give redemption to Israel, and deliver them, according to their own ideas, from the power of the Romans. For among the Jews, the human and divine character and actions of the expected Saviour were much blended. Every testimony

^f “I apprehend,” says Bishop Blomfield, “that the true state of the case may be this—The Jews knew from their Scriptures that the promised Messiah was to be of the race of David; they knew also that he was the Son of God, the same Being which had satisfied and confirmed their fathers in the faith had now been vouchsafed to them: the spirit of prophecy—the vision of angels—the return of miracles and of dreams. If greater evidence than this had been afforded—if the more public and stupendous miracles afterwards wrought by our blessed Saviour had taken place at this time, the silent and tranquil obedience of our Lord would have been interrupted, before the time, by the homage, the wonder, the persecuting hatred and jealousy, of the Jewish people. The time was not yet fully come, when his Divinity and power were to be publicly manifested. Before he preached to others, he became perfect himself. The root was planted in the dry ground of retired and obscure life, and from this unkindly soil it became the tree of life, yielding its fruits for “the healing of the nations.”

NOTE 29.—PART I.

ONE consolation the house of Israel may derive from the testimony of the Prophet Simeon: The child of whom he spake was set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel. It is not necessary to confine the meaning of the words to the primary reception or rejection of our Saviour by the Jews of that age. Christ is set both for the fall and rising again of the whole house of Israel. The time may not perhaps be far distant when the veil shall be taken from their eyes, and, in acknowledging a spiritual Messiah, they will no longer either expect, or desire, a mere temporal deliverer. Then will they restore the temple on Mount Sion, and all the nations of the world will again resort to Jerusalem, the joy of the whole earth. “Glorious things shall be spoken of thee, thou city of God.”

NOTE 30.—PART I.

“THE Holy Family (says Archbishop Newcome^e) return from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, and not to Nazareth; to which they did not retire till after their retreat from Egypt. Mary, who had guarded them in the wilderness, and who had descended in the Shechinah. That these two qualifications should be at one and the same time united in the same person, was perhaps a doctrine of which they found it difficult to give a satisfactory account. They probably expected that the Messiah would not manifest his divine character, till he should have fulfilled all the particulars predicted of him, as the Son of David, and his kingdom should be fully established. This notion will perhaps solve some difficulties, which present themselves after considering the treatises of Allix and Wilson.”—Knowledge of Jewish Tradition essential, &c. p. 35, note.

who attentively considered every circumstance relating to her Son, might prefer Bethlehem, from Micah v. 2., and from the remembrance of the angelic vision.” But on this point there is much difference of opinion. Pilkington supposes^h, that they returned from Jerusalem into Galilee, to their own city, and not to Bethlehem. Pilkington’s Dissertation is curious, but the subject is not of sufficient importance to occupy further attention. The curious reader may peruse it at leisure. It seems natural to suppose, that if Joseph and Mary went from Bethlehem to Jerusalem solely to perform the religious ceremony prescribed by the Law, of presenting the child Jesus at the temple, they would as certainly return again to Bethlehem, as a man would return to his own house, if he left it merely to go to a place of worship. The concurrent testimony of antiquity also, which is never to be despised, as well as the letter of Scripture, Matt. ii. 9, 10, 11., are unfavorable to Pilkington’s theory.

NOTE 31.—PART I.

THE Jews believed that the glorious reign of the Messiah should commence with a long series of calamitous events, which accounts for the agitation that the intelligence of his birth occasioned in Herod, and “all Jerusalem with him.” These expected visitations are enumerated, from the ancient traditions of the Jews, at great length by Schoetgenius (Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. ii. p. 512, &c.); who, after relating many afflictions of a moral and religious nature, which would not have affected the mind of a man of Herod’s character, mentions, that the Jews, in addition to these evils, anticipated—“Many wars”—(Bereschith Rabba, sect. 42, fol. 41.1. “Dixit R. Eleasar filius Abina: si videris regna contra se invicem insurgentia, צפה לרגלו של משיח tunc attende, et aspice ad pedem Messiae”)—“Earthquakes”—(Sohar Exod. fol. 3. col. u. ex versione Sommeri, p. 81.)—“Revolts and insurrections of the better citizens”—(Sohar Numen. fol. 102. col. 407.)—“Scarcity of corn and provisions”—(Sota, fol. 49. 2; and Pesikta Sotarta, fol. 58. 1.)—“Poverty”—(Sanhedrin, fol. 97. 2.)—“Plague”—(Pesikta Rabathi, fol. 2. 1. and 28. 3.) with many others. It is curious to notice these traditions, as they all unite to prove that many causes might have combined to render both Herod and all Jerusalem agitated at the announcement of the Magi. These coincidences also tend to demonstrate the utter impossibility, that the histories given us by the Evangelists can be otherwise than the authentic and genuine documents, which they are believed to be by the Church of Christ.

NOTE 32.—PART I.

PIRKE ELIEZER, c. 3. applies this passage to the Messiah, וְנִצָּנְתָּ מִן הַבְּרִיָּת “His goings forth have been from the beginning,” that is, עַד שְׁלֵשׁ נִכְרָא “When the world was not yet founded;” and the Targum on Micah v. 1., the passage referred to by St. Matthew—מִנֵּן קִדְמִי יִבּוֹן מִשִּׁיחָא “From thee, before me, shall go forth the Messiah.”—Schoetgen. vol. i. p. 3. I quote this passage to show that the Jewish teachers interpreted this passage of Micah in the same manner as the Evangelist St. Matthew: it is probable, therefore, that the Evangelist in this, as in other instances, referred to the prophet in the manner usually adopted by his contemporaries. He appealed to them on their own principles.

NOTE 33.—PART I.

ON THE VISIT OF THE MAGI.

YET one additional evidence, that the Messiah had come, seemed to have been equally necessary with the others, and that also was granted. He was promised to the Gentiles; and the Great Prophet had long since predicted,

“The Gentiles shall come to thy light,
And kings to the brightness of thy rising.”

Is. lx. 3. The brightness of the rising of the morning star of the Gospel we have already seen. The rays of reviving prophecy, miracle, and angelic appearance, began to penetrate the dark night that had now overspread the Jewish Church. Yet the heathen world was in a state of still grosser darkness. The light was to beam upon it also in its meridian splendor; we might anticipate, therefore, that one ray of his earlier glory would descend on the Gentile world. This was accomplished in the visit of the Magi to Bethlehem.

That large tract of country extending from Mesopotamia on the north, Arabia on the south, and Persia on the east, was occupied in the earlier ages of the world by populous and powerful tribes, all of whom, according to their authentic and traditional history, professed the same religion, and were distinguished for their reverence of fire, which they considered as the most perfect representation of the Deity, and the worship of which was the most ancient form of idolatry. The philosophers and learned men of this region were called Magi; and it is not improbable, that, as the whole territory originally professed the religion of the one true God, their adoration of the sun proceeded from their considering that body as a permanent Shechinah, or emblem of the Shechinah. The incipient error, from whatever source it originated, gradually sunk into a grosser idolatry, and mingled much superstition with the traditional knowledge of a purer religion. Abraham himself, according to Maimonides, was educated in the Sabian faith (see Josh. xxiv. 2.), which he was afterwards considered to have purified and reformed. Its doctrines were generally received and propagated, and were supposed to have originated in Chaldea: they were afterwards adopted in Persia and Egypt, where they became extremely polluted and debased.

The Egyptians in a subsequent age abused their knowledge, and professed to dive into futurity by astrology and the other arts of divination; and from this illicit application of the Sabian doctrines arose the term Magi, or Magician, when used in its opprobrious sense. The evidence of history (Mr. Franks' remarks) traces the Goetic arts to Egypt, as their birth-place, of which country were the first magicians mentioned in history.

But it can be equally made evident by the testimony of a variety of profane authors, that the most ancient signification of this word was applied, as a term of distinction, to the philosophers and wise men of a much earlier age. By the word Magus, says Hesychiusⁱ, the Persians understand a sacred person, a professor of theology, and a priest; and Suidas^k tells us, that, among the Persians, the Magi are those who devote themselves to philosophy, and to the worship of the Deity. Dion, Chrysostom, and Porphyry assert the same: and many more authorities might be enumerated in confirmation of this opinion.

The principal object to which the Magi, or the Chaldean, or Eastern philosophers in general, devoted their attention, was the study of astronomy. When the Israelites came out of Egypt, Balaam, the last prophet under the patriarchal dispensation, was summoned by the king of Moab, from Petorah, to curse them. Many suppose that Balaam, from his knowledge of astronomy, was himself a Magus: it is certain that he was much esteemed in that part of the country, where the Magians were so much celebrated. This prophet, it is well known, predicted,

“There shall come a Star out of Jacob,
And a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel.”

As astronomy was the favorite pursuit of the day, this promised star, from generation to generation, would be anxiously looked for and expected. The prophecy itself was, without any exception, the most peculiar and most important which had been given to the world. It was uttered at the most eventful period in the annals of the postdiluvian ages, on the establishment of the Levitical dispensation, and the overthrow of the patriarchal; and it might therefore have been received by the Gentiles as a prediction of their restoration to the favor of their common Father; Christ being uniformly spoken of as the Light of the Gentiles, who should bring all nations under his splendid dominion. Elated with these hopes, at the appearance of the long-desired star, we may suppose the wise men hastened to Jerusalem to make their eager inquiries respecting the newly-born Deliverer, to whom their traditions or purer knowledge had ascribed the name of "King of the Jews."

By this confident inquiry, these strangers became witnesses to the Jews of the coming of Christ, and, drawing from the Scribes a testimony respecting his birthplace, might themselves receive an additional confirmation of his Messiahship. That they considered the infant as a royal child was evident from the gifts which they presented to him. It was the custom of the East uniformly to make presents according to the condition in life of the person to whom they were offered. If they had judged from appearance only, a citron, a rose, or any the least gift, would have been sufficient for the infant of the poor Mary. But, mean as his appearance was, they treated him as a royal child; and even after they had discovered the poverty of his parents, they presented him with presents of the richest kind, gold, frankincense, and myrrh, such as the queen of Sheba presented to Solomon in his glory¹. At Bethlehem, the place of his nativity, he was acknowledged king both by Jew and Gentile, and in both instances by means of a miraculous revelation. The wall of partition was now about to be destroyed.

Bishop Warburton^m has shown that prophetic writing may be defined, a speaking hieroglyphic. Emblems and hieroglyphics had long been used before alphabetic writing; and the phrases which originated from these emblems are the foundation of all that beautiful and metaphorical style which we still admire, as the ornament and strength of a language. The word Star, he proceeds to demonstrate, does not merely signify "a sovereign," or "ruler," but "a god."

The metaphor of a "sceptre," he observes, was common and popular to denote a "ruler:" but the "star," though it also signified in the prophetic writingsⁿ a "temporal prince or ruler," yet had in it a secret and hidden meaning likewise: a "star" in the Egyptian hieroglyphics denoted "God." Thus, in Amos v. 26., we read, "Ye have borne the star of your god;"

that is, "the image of your god." Hence we conclude that the metaphor of a "star," used by Balaam, was of that abstruse and mysterious kind, that it is so to be understood, and, consequently, that it related only in the mysterious sense to Christ, the Eternal Son of God.

Such is the testimony of this eminent writer; and that the Jews applied this emblematical prediction to their Messiah needs no proof. That the Magians remembered the traditions of their fathers is less certain; yet even on this point we have some degree of evidence, collected from the remaining documents of that remote period. We are informed, that when an individual put himself at the head of a tumultuary insurrection, he obtained many followers by assuming an epithet derived from the expected appearance of a long-predicted star^o. The idea, therefore, must have been very prevalent and very popular, otherwise it would not have been adopted by an impostor.

There is much difficulty with respect to the question, "What the star in the East may have been?" Lightfoot^p supposes it was the light or glory of the Shechinah, which shone round the shepherds, when the angel brought them tidings of Christ's birth, which, seen at a distance, assumed the appearance of a star—others suppose that it was a comet—others, a meteor,—which is by far the most probable opinion, as it solves the phenomena, and is most consistent with the scriptural account. The circumstances related of many singular meteors also serve to confirm this solution^q.

Whatever, then, may have been the source of the knowledge which induced the Magi to travel from the East to Jerusalem; whether they were instructed by the traditions of their fathers, handed down to them from the times of Balaam; or directed by the traditional knowledge of their ancestors, received perhaps from Daniel and his countrymen; or acquired from the perusal of the Hebrew Scriptures during the captivity—whether that which guided them were a meteor, a comet, or a star, the wisdom and harmony of the dispensation of God is equally manifest: Christ was promised as the Saviour and Deliverer of all nations, and proofs of his descent into this world, to fulfil his high mission, were given to the pious Jew, and also to the Gentile. To both were declarations made, while he was yet an infant, of his high official character. The Magi^r, as well as the shepherds, were brought by divine direction to pay their homage to him, not as to one who had yet to earn the dignity ascribed to him, but who was already invested with it. In the poverty and seclusion of his humble condition, he received unequivocal proofs of their belief in his exalted, and, probably, in his divine nature. Such testimonies as these we can only attribute to the Deity; imposture or collusion on his part, during a state of infancy, was a physical impossibility; and it certainly appears impossible to reconcile such evidences with the supposed mere humanity of Christ.

It has been supposed by some, that the Magi were proselytes to the Jewish religion—and by others, that they were of the descendants of the ten tribes. Dr. Doddridge justly calls this latter opinion “a wild hypothesis.”

The various opinions which have been, at different times, proposed to the world, respecting the place from whence the Magi came, may be found in Calmet, Art. Magi, and in Franks' Prize Essay on the Magi. The more generally-received opinion is that of Sir Norton Knatchbull*, that they came from that part of Arabia which was conterminous to Judæa. Bryant's conclusions respecting the situation of Pethor agree very well with the result of Sir N. Knatchbull's arguments†.

I have not here discussed the question respecting the time when the Eastern sages came to Jerusalem: Lightfoot supposes it was one or two years after the nativity of our Lord: Archbishop Newcome thinks that it was near the end of our Lord's first year. Mr. Benson, in his System of the Chronology of the Life of Christ, (whose hypothesis is here adopted,) has examined the subject with much care, and appears to have decided the controversy, that the Magi came from the thirty-ninth to the forty-second day after the birth of Jesus‡.

The Jewish tradition informs us, that it was always expected that a star should appear at the time of the coming of the Messiah. Thus we read in one place of the much-esteemed Zohar—“The king Messiah shall be revealed in the land of Galilee, and to a star in the East,” &c., and again—“When the Messiah shall be revealed, there shall rise up in the East a certain star flaming with various colors.” Other traditions might be quoted.

THE expenses of the journey of Joseph and Mary, who were too poor to pay even for the lamb required by the Law of Moses, we may justly suppose were defrayed from the offerings of the wise men: their future exigencies, by the overruling providence of God, would be equally supplied. Lightfoot quotes, on this point, the Babylonian Gemara, which states that the Jewish families, assembled at this time in Egypt, were so numerous, that the artificers sat by themselves in their companies—the silver-smiths—the braziers—the weavers, &c., so that if a poor stranger came into the city, he might know his own fellow-workmen, and betake himself to them, and thence receive sustenance for himself and family. Lightfoot, vol. ii. Works, folio, p. 111.

NOTE 36.—PART I.

THE Evangelist here seems to apply the passage in Hosea xi. 1. in a very peculiar manner to our Lord. This text is generally included among those prophecies which have a double signification. It was referred in its primary sense to God's deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt; but in its secondary and figurative sense it is applied to Christ. “A type is fulfilled,” says Dr. Whitby in loc., “when that is done in the antitype, which is done in the type.” Israel, as a type of Christ, is called in the Old Testament, “My son, my first-born,” Exod. iv. 22.—to fulfil the types, therefore, as well as the prophecies, it seems that our Lord should have gone down into Egypt. This country may be considered as a type of the world,—that “great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt,” Rev. xi. 8. All the patriarchs successively went down into Egypt for protection and support, till at length the Israelites, the spiritual people of God, “were called from Egypt,” by the power of their divinely-appointed Lawgiver and Deliverer. Egypt and Israel may also be considered as types of the twofold character of man, the natural, and the spiritual. The natural man is fed on the bread of Egypt alone; he has no hope, nor fear, nor thought beyond this life, its advantages, wealth, and honors. The spiritual man, by the grace and power of God, is so delivered and called out of Egypt, or from the bondage and vanities of this life, that he keeps himself unspotted from the world; and lives not by the bread of Egypt alone, "but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

Under the Levitical dispensation, all connexion and intimacy were prohibited between the Israelites and the Egyptians; and every transgression of this prohibition, which seemed to imply a desire to trust to human wisdom and power, in preference to that which was spiritual and from above, was uniformly attended with failure or calamity. (See also Warburton's Divine Legation, on the Connection between Israel and Egypt.) St. Matthew, under the influence of the Spirit of God, appears to apply the passage of Hosea to the Messiah according to this sense. Christ in his human nature, as our representative, went down into Egypt, to be nourished there; and, like Israel of old, was called out of it by a divine interposition.

He was baptized in the river Jordan;—tried in the wilderness forty days;—and after the crucifixion of the flesh, attained the promised land, the Heavenly Canaan.

The Israelites were baptized in the Red Sea, tried in the wilderness forty years, and because they did not crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, forfeited the promised land, the typical Canaan. Numb. xi. 4, 5, 6, 33, 34, and xiv. 27, 29, &c.

Midrash Tehillim, Ps. ii. 7., has these remarkable words, "I will publish a decree:"—this decree has been published in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Hagiographa. In the Law "Israel is my first-born," Exod. iv. 22. In the Prophets, "Behold my servant shall deal prudently," Isa. lii. 13. In the Hagiographa, "The LORD said unto my Lord." All which passages the Jews refer to the Messiah; and St. Matthew, even if he had not spoken by inspiration, would have been justified, according to the custom of his countrymen, in applying the passage in question to the Messiah.

NOTE 37.—PART I.

BECAUSE Josephus has omitted to notice the massacre of the infants in Bethlehem, which is related in Matt. ii. 16., the evangelical narrative has been pronounced a "fabrication! and a tale that carries its own refutation with it." This assertion was first made, we believe, by Voltaire, whose disregard for truth, especially in matters connected with the sacred history, is sufficiently notorious. But the evidence for the reality of the fact, and consequently for the veracity of Matthew, is too strong to be subverted by any bold and unsupported assertions.

For, in the first place, the whole character which Josephus ascribes to Herod, is the most evident confirmation of the barbarous deed mentioned by the Evangelist.

Secondly, The Gospel of Matthew was published about the year of our Lord 38, at which time there doubtless were persons living, who could, and, from the hostility then manifested against the Christian faith, who would have contradicted his assertion, if it had been false or erroneous: their silence is a tacit proof, that the Evangelist has stated the fact correctly.

But, thirdly, the reality of the fact itself (though mentioned in his usual scoffing manner) was not denied by the philosopher Celsus, one of the bitterest enemies of Christianity, who lived towards the close of the second century, and who would most unquestionably have denied it if he could^x.

Fourthly, Matthew's narrative is confirmed by Macrobius, a heathen author, who lived about the end of the fourth century, and who mentions this massacre in the following terms: "Augustus having been informed that Herod had ordered a son of his own to be killed, among the male infants about two years old, whom he had put to death in Syria, said, It is better to be Herod's hog than his son^y." Now although Macrobius is far too modern to be produced as a valid evidence in this matter, unsupported by other circumstances, and although his story is magnified by an erroneous circumstance, yet the passage cited from him serves to prove how universally notorious was the murder of the children in Bethlehem, which was perpetrated by the order of Herod.

Fifthly, With regard to the silence of Josephus, we may further remark, that no historian, nor even annalist, can be expected to record every event that occurs within the period of which he writes.

Sixthly, Contemporary historians do not relate the same facts. Suetonius tells us many things which Tacitus has omitted, and Dion Cassius supplies the deficiency of both.

Seventhly, It is unreasonable to make the silence of the Jewish historian an objection to ^x See the passages in Lardner's Works, vol. iv. p. 122, 4to.

^y Macrobius, Saturn. lib. ii. c. 4. The emperor, according to this writer, seems to have played upon the Greek words, rr, a hog, and vior, a son; the point of the saying perhaps consists in this, that Herod, professing Judaism, was by his religion prohibited from killing swine, or having any thing to do with their flesh; and therefore that his hog would have been safe where his son lost his life. Macrobius states this massacre to have been perpetrated in Syria, because Judæa was at that time part of the province of Syria. Gilpin and Dr. Clarke, on Matt. ii. 16. The massacre of the infants is likewise noticed in a rabbinical work, called Toldoth Jeshu, in the following passage—"And the king gave orders for putting to death every infant to be found in Bethlehem; and the king's messengers killed every infant according to the royal order." Dr. G. Sharp's first Defence of Christianity, &c p. 40.

the credibility of the sacred writer, while there is equal and even superior reason to confide in the fidelity of the latter.

Eighthly, Herod would naturally be supposed to take such precautions as he might think necessary without being scrupulous concerning the means.

Ninthly, Voltaire, either from ignorance or dishonesty, asserts that fourteen thousand children must have lost their lives in this massacre. If this were true, the silence of Josephus would be a very important objection to the veracity of St. Matthew's narrative: and with this view the assertion is made by Voltaire, who every where shows himself an inveterate enemy of revealed, and not unfrequently of natural, religion. But as the children whom Herod caused to be put to death (probably by assassins whom he kept in his pay) were only males of two years old and under, it is obvious, according to Voltaire's statement, that more children must have been born annually in the village of Bethlehem, than there are either in Paris or London. Further, as Bethlehem was a very small place, scarcely two thousand persons existed in it, and in its dependent district; consequently, in the massacre, not more than fifty at most could be slain. In the life of such a tyrant as Herod, this was, comparatively, so trifling an act of cruelty, that it was but of small consequence in the history of his sanguinary government.

Lastly, As the male infants that were to be slain could easily be ascertained from the public tables of birth, or genealogies, that circumstance will account for the reputed parents of our Saviour fleeing into Egypt, rather than into any city of Judæa^z.

Any of these arguments would be sufficient to vindicate the Evangelist's narrative; but, altogether, they form a cloud of witnesses,

Among the Barrington papers, I find an unpublished letter of Dr. Lardner to Lord Barrington, in which the learned writer argues at length, with his usual judgment and accuracy, against depending on the authority of Macrobius, in the following passage:—"I the less regarded it (the passage in Macrobius), because the objection relating to the slaughter of the infants, taken from the silence of Josephus, appeared to me of no moment. When we have but one history of the affairs of a country, and that history a brief one, the omission of some particular event is no difficulty. Josephus was a firm Jew, and there was therefore a particular reason for his passing over this event; because he could not mention it without giving the Christian cause a very great advantage. To write that Herod, at the latter end of his reign, had put to death all the infants at Bethlehem, under two years of age, on occasion of a report spread that the king of the Jews had been lately born there, abundantly sufficient to overbalance the negative evidence attempted to be drawn from the silence of Josephus.

NOTE 38.—PART I.

Ἀπὸ διετούς καὶ κατωτέρω. Sir Norton Knatchbull, in his Annotations on difficult Texts, has endeavoured to prove that it is not necessary to suppose from these words, that Herod killed all the children in Bethlehem who had completed, but those only who had just begun, their second year, or who had just ended their first year. The Hebrew expression would have been בן-שנה־filius duorum annorum. P. 6. Cambridge, 8vo. edit. 1693.

NOTE 39.—PART I.

MR. MANN conjectures that Antipater, who was the heir apparent to the crown of Herod, when Christ was born, was one of the principal advisers of the massacre at Bethlehem. He had already procured the death of his two elder brothers, to prepare his way to the succession. His alarm would be as great as that of his father, when he heard that a king of the Jews was born. As this Antipater was executed only five days before Herod died, both might be referred to in the words of the Angel—"They are dead which sought the young child's life." The very same words are applied to Moses, under similar circumstances, Exod. iv. 19. Vide Doddridge's Family Expositor, 8vo. edit. vol. i. p. 86.

would have greatly gratified the Christians, whom Josephus hated; since it was well known that about thirty years after the slaughter, and the latter end of Herod's reign, Jesus (who was said to be born at Bethlehem), being then about thirty years of age, styled himself king of the Jews, and did many things, to say no more in proof of it." Dr. Lardner then proceeds to discuss, at some length, the time and occasion of Augustus's jest. That no argument against this part of the Gospel narrative can be derived from the silence of Josephus, is ably shown also by Bishop Warburton, who mentions several very important omissions of this writer. See his Divine Legation of Moses, vol. iv. p. 281, 282. A German writer has written a whole treatise on the wilful omissions of Josephus. He makes them, if I remember rightly, sixty-two in number. The remark of Michaelis, that historians generally know little of the events of the thirty years immediately preceding them, and that on this account it was probable that Josephus had not heard of the slaughter of the innocents, does not appear sufficient to account for his silence. It seems utterly impossible that Josephus could have been ignorant of this event. His silence was more likely to have been in this instance, as in others, wilful and interested.

NOTE 40.—PART I.

THE reign of Archelaus commenced inauspiciously; for, after the death of Herod, before he could leave the kingdom to obtain the confirmation of his father's will from the emperor at Rome, the Jews behaved themselves so tumultuously in the temple, in consequence of his having refused them some demands, that this king ordered his soldiers to attack them, on which occasion upwards of 3000 were slain. It was, probably, from his knowledge of this circumstance, and a general apprehension of the cruelty of the character of Archelaus, that Joseph was afraid to return to his own country.

NOTE 41.—PART I.

ST. MATTHEW seems in this passage to apply, as it were in a collective sense, all the prophecies in the Old Testament that refer to the abject and low condition in which the Messiah should appear. Nazareth, whither Christ was now conducted, was the most contemned part of the Holy Land, agreeing well with that prediction—"He was despised and rejected of men."—"The Evangelist," says Lightfoot, "does not quote one prophet (τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ τῶν Προφητῶν) but all. All the prophets do teach the vile and abject condition of Christ; but none that his condition should be out of Nazareth. Christ seems destined to that abject place, to fulfil in a general sense these prophecies." This seems to be the best interpretation of the passage; preferable to those which represent St. Matthew as playing upon the words בִּצְר, and נִזְר. Vide Lightfoot, Heb. et Talm. Exerc. vol. ii. p. 112.

NOTE 42.—PART I.

THE canons of the Jewish Law required parents to instruct their children in their intended trade at twelve years of age. It is probable, therefore, that this also was the period when they began to comply with the Law, Exod. xxxiv. 23. which required all the male children to present themselves at Jerusalem three times every year. As the Jews were accustomed to go up in (συνοδαὶς, Heb. אֶרְחָה,) "caravans," in parties composed of great numbers, it cannot excite surprise that the Holy Child Jesus was not at first missed by Joseph and Mary. They found him, Lightfoot attempts to prove, in the hall, or room adjacent to that of the Sanhedrin, proposing and answering questions, as the Jewish youths were permitted to do, to the doctors of the law. There were in the temple, 1. The great Sanhedrin in the room Gazith, consisting of seventy-one members, with the "nasi," or prince, or president, at their head; and the father of the court, the "Ab beth den" on his right hand.—2. Twenty-three judges in the gate of the court of Israel.—3. Twenty-three judges in the gate of the court of the Gentiles. Sanhedr. cap. xi. hal. 2. In each of these it was permitted to ask questions concerning the Law. Instances are given in Lightfoot, from Hieros. Taanith, fol. 67-4. R. Gamaliel said to a disciple, "To-morrow, in the consistory, do thou come forth and question me on this matter." There was often a full audience of many people^a.

The brief narrative of the Evangelist, which confines itself to the simple statement of facts, without either detail or embellishment, ought not to prevent us from considering the very peculiar circumstances in which the "Glory of the second temple" appeared in the house of his heavenly Father. He had now arrived at that age when the Jews were accustomed to instruct their children more fully in the arts of life, and the knowledge of their religion. At this period Christ showed himself to be perfectly versed in the Mosaic Law. Two remarkable circumstances now occurred: the death of Hillel, the most eminent of the Jewish expounders of the Law, and the banishment of Archelaus. By the first event the Sanhedrin was deprived of its greatest ornament; by the second the power was more evidently shown to be in the hands of the Romans; and another more decisive proof was afforded to the people that the sceptre was departing. Is it not probable that the appearance of our Lord in the temple, and his conversation there, might have been designed to prove to the doctors that there was One among them more learned than Hillel; and that One also by his well-known pedigree from the direct line of David, was the heir to the long-lost and now vacant throne of Israel? At his first appearance as an infant in the temple, the spirit of prophecy revived;—at his present appearance he showed himself to be worthy of the homage of his people, as the learned successor of their most learned instructor, and as their lawful sovereign, the heir to the crown of David.

The conversation of Jesus must have made a deep impression upon the minds of all that heard it; and must not only have excited the attention, but the curiosity and admiration of the Sanhedrin. That the object of our Lord's sitting among the doctors was something more than hearing or asking questions concerning the difficulties of the Jewish Law, is evidently implied in his answer to the expostulation of his mother, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" or, as it may be translated, "Wist ye not that I must be in the house of God my Father?" The Messiah did not come merely to excite the amazement, or to gratify the curiosity of the Jews. He came to impress some lesson upon them, suitable to the peculiar circumstances of the moment, and in accordance with, or to the furtherance of, his divine mission.

Lightfoot has shown the probability that Hillel had died some short time before our Lord visited the temple at this period. Should his opinion be erroneous, there might have been assembled round our Lord, when he conversed with the Jewish doctors, Hillel and Shammai, the two most celebrated rabbis of the Jews; R. Judah and R. Joshua, the two sons of Bethira; Jonathan Ben Uzziel, the author of the Chaldee Paraphrase; and R. Jochanan Ben Zacchai. Before these distinguished men our Lord displayed that knowledge of the Law which overwhelmed them with astonishment and admiration^b.

NOTE 43.—PART I.

THE Spirit of prophecy came upon John when he was thirty years of age: this was the time appointed in the Law for the commencement of their ministry by the Priests and Levites. He preached in the desert, where the greatest multitudes passed;—he wore a garment of camel's hair, the most coarse and common garment, similar to that worn by the prophets of old, to express his contempt for the vanities and ostentations of life. His food was the spontaneous produce of the country, showing his self-denial, and the subjection of all his appetites;—his days were passed in the wilderness, far removed from the world, preparing and preaching the way of the Lord. He avoided wine and strong drink, like a Nazarite, being separated and holy to the Lord, Numb. vi. 2, 3. He was to others the example of all that he taught. Whether the locusts he ate were the animals so called, prepared in the manner usual among the Jews, or whether it was a peculiar herb growing about that country (which seems more probable) is uncertain. Many have conjectured that the wild honey, the μέλι ἄγχιον, ought to be read μέλιαιον, which they imagine to be likewise a species of herb indigenous in Judæa. Witsius, however, considers this opinion as quite unfounded^c.

^b Doddridge, Fam. Expositor, translates the word ἐξίστατο, "they were in a transport of admiration." "Ἐξίστατο, obstupescabant, mirabantur. Verbum ἐξίσταμι de quacunque animi commotione vehementiori, imprimis etiam de admiratione summâ usurpatur."—Rosenmüller in loc.

Had a messenger of a different character been chosen as the forerunner of the Messiah, the Jews would have been confirmed in their preconceived ideas of a temporal prince; but the austerity of the Baptist's habits, his seclusion from the world, and his contempt of all its pleasures and distinctions, were in direct opposition to all those opinions, and ought to have contradicted them. Had he been the ambassador of any worldly sovereign, he must have been invested with all the external splendor and pomp which he was appointed to represent;—but as the ambassador of a spiritual Lord and a spiritual kingdom, all these things were laid aside;—his robe of state was of camel's hair,—the luxuries of his table were the honey of the wilderness,—and the message that he brought from his Sovereign was an invitation to repentance and faith.

NOTE 44.—PART I.

THE desert in which St. John preached was not a barren and desolate wilderness^d. According to Lightfoot he first taught in the wilderness near Hebron^e, but afterwards removed towards Jordan, probably near Jericho; a tract of country which was wild and desert, yet having in it several large cities. Jericho itself contained twelve thousand men, of the courses of the priests; and the road from Jerusalem to that city, and to Peræa, especially near the time of the Passover, was frequented by great multitudes, about which time, it is supposed, John began his ministry. The country was very convenient for food, and its valleys abounded in palm trees, which trees, if we may credit Diodorus Siculus^f, yield much wild honey.

NOTE 45.—PART I.

LIGHTFOOT ascribes the first use of baptism to Jacob, when he admitted into his family and into the Church of God, the proselytes of Shechem, and other heathens. "Put away your strange gods, and be ye clean, and change your garments." Aben Ezra interprets the word והטהרו, Gen. xxxv. 2., "and be ye clean," to be שירצו הנות, "the washing of the body," or "baptism:" but this would not prove that the rite of baptism was then used as the commencement of a permanent institution. It might have been a useful and expressive ordinance of Jacob, but no more.

The Israelites assert, that all Gentile proselytes were brought into their church by baptism. The question is, whether they were so initiated before the time of John, by a customary rite which might be dispensed with at pleasure, or by a positive law. Lightfoot quotes Maimonides, who lived only in the fourteenth century, and whose authority, in the absence of other proofs, is not therefore decisive.—Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. p. 117.

We have no evidence to prove that baptism, among the Jews, was of divine appointment. It was principally administered to the Gentiles, who were considered after that ceremony as new creatures, and worthy of admission into the church. A Jew, if he had lived as a Gentile, even for a day, would undergo this ceremony, which makes it appear more like a legal washing, or purification, than an ordinance divinely instituted. The Jews must have well understood this ceremony as emblematical of the introduction of a more perfect dispensation, which required the greatest purity of heart and life. When the Jews baptized the heathens, they admitted them into their own church, into a new religion; and John now calls upon the Jews themselves to be baptized, and to become members of another church, under another dispensation different from that of Moses.

In this then consisted, in some measure, the essential difference between the baptism of John, and that of any other teacher. The Law required the washing of polluted persons, on account of legal uncleanness: the baptism of John required the purification of those who were legally clean. It exacted obedience to the spirit, not to the letter of the Law. If we consider the Christian dispensation, therefore, as commencing with the preaching of John, we shall find there were three forms of baptism; that of John, who baptized in the name of the Messiah about to come upon the earth;—that of the disciples of Christ, when he was incarnated and living among them;—and that of the Apostles, who received, at the ascension, an express command from Christ himself to proselytize all nations, and to baptize them "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The ministers of the Church of God have ever since baptized in the same holy name, using the same form of words.—Vide Lightfoot's Works, vol. i. p. 465, 466.

NOTE 46.—PART I.

MALACHI predicted of the Elias who was to come, that

"He shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, And the heart of the children to their fathers^g."

The Angel predicted of John the same things. The event corresponded to the prediction. When John began to preach to Israel, the Jews were divided into three principal, and innumerable smaller sects, differing both in religious opinions and ceremonies. The Pharisees and Sadducees were inflamed with the most bitter hatred against each other. The expounders of the Law were at variance. The dissensions in the synagogues disturbed the repose of families. Children and their parents disputed: all was confusion. The ministry of the Baptist withdrew the people from under the banners of the leaders of these sects, and directed them to the One Great Teacher, who was now at hand to decide all controversies, and unite them to himself.—Witsius, De Vitâ Johan. Bap.: Misc. Sacr. vol. ii. p. 518.

NOTE 47.—PART I.

THE different addresses of St. John to those who came to him, given in this section, could not have been delivered at one time. They may be supposed to contain the sum and substance of his general preaching.

We may observe, that all the exhortations of John refer to the spiritual dominion of the Messiah over the hearts and consciences of men. He never once speaks of it as a temporal or earthly power. He exhorts to repentance and confession of sin, μετανοια, a total renewing of the spirit of the mind—a change of the whole man. In the same way all those of the present day, who have lived unmindful of their spiritual covenant with God, are called upon by the ministers of God's word to adopt that mode of returning to their Almighty Father, pointed out by the Baptist; and, by a true repentance and confession of sins, to renew their baptismal vow, and become spiritual members of his spiritual church.

In Luke iii. 14. we read that certain soldiers came to John the Baptist, while he was preaching in all the country about Jordan, and demanded of him, saying, "And what shall we do?" An important question in Christian morality. It has been asked, who these soldiers were; for it does not appear that the Roman soldiers then stationed in Judæa were engaged in any war. Now it happens that the expression by the evangelical historian is not στρατιῶται, or "soldiers," but ἐκτετεύοντες, that is, men, who were actually under arms, or marching to battle.

^g The passage in Malachi, ch. iv. 6., is supposed by Dr. Owen to have been both corrupted and altered by the Jews, both in the Hebrew copies, and in the copies of the Septuagint, and to have been originally exactly as three of the Evangelists have delivered the citation of it to us.—Owen's Inquiry into the State of the Septuagint Version, p. 54.

It is not to be supposed that he would use this word without a sufficient reason, and what that reason is we may readily discover, on consulting Josephus's account of the reign of Herod the tetrarch of Galilee. He tells us^h, that Herod was at that very time engaged in a war with his father-in law, Aretas, a petty king of Arabia Petræa, whose daughter he had married, but who had returned to her father in consequence of Herod's ill-treatment. The army of Herod, then on its march from Galilee, passed of necessity through the country where John was baptizing; and the military men, who questioned him, were a part of that army. So minute, so perfect, and so latent a coincidence was never discovered in a forgery of this or any other ageⁱ.

NOTE *48.—PART I.

ON THE PERIOD THAT ELAPSED BETWEEN THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE MINISTRY OF JOHN AND THE BAPTISM OF CHRIST.

MUCH discussion has at various times taken place respecting the period which elapsed between the commencement of the ministry of John and the baptism of Christ. Lightfoot (Harmony, p. 8. Works, vol. i.), and Newcome (Harm. not. in loc.), suppose six months.—Bedford (Scrip. Chron.) the same.—Benson (Chron. of the Life of Christ) five months.—Dean Prideaux three years and a half. It is the general opinion, that about the same interval elapsed between the commencement of the ministry of the Messiah and of his forerunner, as had previously elapsed between their births. Pilkington, however, has supposed there were about seventeen months between these events; and, contrary to the united authorities of the most learned harmonizers, and perhaps to his general good judgment, he has adopted the fanciful theory of Whiston, who supposes thirteen months to have transpired, and that the baptism of Christ followed the calling of Andrew, Philip, and Nathanael,—the marriage at Cana,—the first driving of the buyers and sellers from the temple, and the conversations which were held, in the course of that period, in Jerusalem, and with Nicodemus. It is after this last event, that Whiston inserts the baptism of Christ. Pilkington goes on to arrange, in addition to these events, the baptizing by Christ himself of many disciples in Judæa, and his conversation with the woman of Samaria,—the believing of many of the Samaritans and Galileans, and the healing of the nobleman's son at Capernaum: it is not till then, that he proceeds to the account of the baptism of our Lord, and his subsequent temptation; both of which events these two commentators concur in placing, as the Scripture expressly asserts, immediately after that event.

Whiston's arguments, together with those of Pilkington and Marshall, in favor of the later date assigned to the baptism of Christ, may be thus enumerated and answered.

1. Eusebius asserts that the three Evangelists omitted the former part of Christ's ministry, which took place before the imprisonment of John.

This assertion of Eusebius, as is easily proved by examining the several harmonies, is totally groundless; the more public ministry of Christ certainly did not begin till that event: and even if it were correct, John nowhere declares that the date of the baptism of Christ was that which is assigned to it by Whiston.

2. It appears, from Matt. iii. 14., that Jesus baptized before his own baptism.

In reply to this remark, Archbishop Newcome has observed, that John, acknowledging Christ to be the Messiah, exclaims, "I have need to be baptized of Thee," (by the Holy Spirit).

3. The baptism of Christ is placed after the history of John's ministry, and before his imprisonment.

The Evangelists, like the writers of the Old Testament, do not exactly observe the chronological order, as Whiston supposes they did in this instance. As John was the forerunner of Christ, it might have been expected that they would follow the plan they have actually adopted; that is, would put together all those actions of John which characterized the second Elias; and would then proceed to the ministry of our Lord, beginning with his baptism, in which he was solemnly anointed by the Holy Spirit to his high office.

4. It appears, from Luke iii. 21., that Christ did not come to be baptized till all the rest of the people had been baptized.

The expression, ἐν τῷ βαπτισθῆναι, implies that Christ came to John while the people were still continuing to desire baptism from John; it is not μετὰ τὸ. Campbell translates the passage, "Now when John baptized all the people, Jesus was likewise baptized."

5. The Baptist was imprisoned immediately after the baptism of Christ, Luke iii. 19, 20.

But this observation has been already answered. Whiston assumes that St. Luke wrote in order of time; whereas he has merely anticipated the relation of the imprisonment of John, that he might better conclude for a time the history of the Baptist.

ⁱ For the above illustrative coincidence we are indebted to Michaelis, vol. i. ch. ii. sect. 11 p. 51.

To these arguments Pilkington adds, that John did not know Christ till he had seen the Spirit descending on him;—but before his baptism, when the Spirit descended, he declared he knew him.

To this the Archbishop replies: “John i. 31. 33., may be reconciled with Matt. iii. 14., by supposing that John, for wise reasons, knew not Jesus personally till he came to be baptized; though he must have heard before of Jesus’s name and wonderful birth, from his own relations. God seems to have revealed to the Baptist, soon after he entered on his ministry, that the visible descent of the Spirit should point out to him the Messiah, John i. 33. When Jesus came to be baptized, Matt. iii. 14., it is probable John knew him by a supernatural impulse, as Samuel knew Saul and David, 1 Sam. ix. 17. and xvi. 12.; and as Ahijah discovered the wife of Jeroboam, 1 Kings xiv. 5. See also Luke ii. 28. 38.; and afterwards the sign foretold, John i. 33., confirmed the Baptist in his belief that Jesus was the Christ. Le Clerc’s Paraphrase of Matt. iii. 14., is, ‘Quod afflatu prophetico ab eo dicebatur: nam Jesum non nōrat.’—Harmony, p. 40. And F. Spanheim says, Dub. Evang. 2. p. 147, ‘Nihil aliud propositum Joanni Baptistæ nisi ostendere se non ex familiaritate aliquā ante contractā Christum novisse; sed ex merā revelatione cœlesti; adeoque nihil a se dari nec cognationi, nec amicitiae, nec gratiæ, nec collusioni alicui clandestinæ.’ The Baptist is not to be understood as saying, he did not know Jesus, but by a sign from heaven; see Dr. Priestley’s Harmony, p. 78.; but that he knew him not, before he came to be baptized, and that God had promised a sign by which he should be known; which sign, intended for a full confirmation, was preceded by an inspired knowledge of Jesus.”—Newcome, Harmony, notes, p. 6.

These apparently inconsistent passages have been reconciled in various other ways. Hales, vol. ii. part ii. p. 731., is of opinion that John knew Christ personally, but was not informed of his dignity and office, till he was assured of it by a miracle.

Lightfoot supposes that John knew not that Christ was in the world till he came to be baptized—when, knowing him by the Spirit, John forbade him;—and the sign of the Holy Ghost, descending from heaven, was the sign given him for assurance and confirmation. Vide Elsley on John i. 33.

I have discussed this question at greater length than to many will appear necessary; because Pilkington is one of my authorities, and has written a Dissertation expressly on the subject.

NOTE 48.—PART I.

THE time had now arrived when the Messiah was to begin his public career, and to break forth from the obscurity of his lowly life. He commenced it in that manner which was most suited to his dignity as a spiritual Being, by an act of obedience to the established law of his heavenly Father, accompanied with the most fervent prayer. On this important occasion, in the presence of the assembled multitude, a voice from heaven declares him to be “The beloved Son of God, in whom he was well pleased.” His divine mission now received the miraculous confirmation which had always satisfied the ancient patriarchs and fathers of the Jewish Church. It received the testimony of the “Bath Col,” or “voice from heaven;” and the visible glory of the Shechinah hovered over him.

The question, whether the inauguration of Christ into his high office was not as public, and therefore as generally known, as that of Moses, will be discussed in the note to 2 Peter i. 16. Danzius, in a learned tract preserved by Meuschen, in his N. T. ex Talmude, has treated this curious and interesting subject at some length.

NOTE 49.—PART I.

CHRIST came to John to be baptized. He was baptized by John not of necessity, not for his own sake, but for ours. He was baptized that he might confer honor on John, sanction his ministry, and commend it to the doubting Jews. By this act he made himself the head of all who by baptism confess their sins, and are admitted into the Church. He sanctified baptism by thus subjecting himself to it, that man might not despise it as a useless or unmeaning ceremony. He would not that men should refuse to come to the baptism of their Lord, when he had not disdained the baptism of his servant. By baptism he shadowed out the difference between the carnal and spiritual state of man, and between our fallen condition and his own; first mean, then glorious;—first earthly, then heavenly;—first mortal, then immortal;—first buried under the earth, as the worshipper was buried under the water, and rising therefrom spiritual, changed, and glorious. Christ by his baptism renewed his covenant with his Father; and fulfilled all righteousness, by complying with every law, which proceeded from the wisdom of God, and was designed only for the happiness and restoration of man.—Vide Witsius, De Vitâ Johannis:—Miscell. Sac. vol. ii. p. 537.

NOTE 50.—PART I.

As a dove hovers over her nest with an undulating and gentle motion, so did the emblem of the presence of God wave and bend, and rise and fall over the head of our Saviour. Such seems to be the most defensible, as well as the most generally-received interpretation. It is consistent also with the analogy that may be found between the old and new covenants^j. At the beginning of the material creation the Spirit of God moved on the face of the waters; the Spirit of God, “dove-like, sat brooding on the vast abyss^k.”

NOTE 51.—PART I.

ON THE TEMPTATION OF CHRIST.

In order to understand the passage of the New Testament which is contained in this section, and is justly supposed to be attended with many difficulties, it is necessary to consider the Messiah under that name which is alike given to him in the Old Testament, in the New Testament, and in those of the Jewish traditions, which may be received with most confidence. Christ must be considered under the character of the second Adam, who came into the world to fulfil the same law which the first Adam had violated. That he might more evidently and effectually accomplish this object, it was appointed that he should be tempted like unto Adam, and undergo the same trial.

^j This view of the analogy between the action of the Spirit at the Creation, and at the baptism of Christ, I find confirmed by a singular tradition among the Jews. In a note in Brescith Rabba, sect. 2. fol. 4. 4. on Genesis i. 2. we read, “Et spiritus Dei: intelligitur Spiritus Regis Messiae, de quo dicitur, Isa. xi. 1. Et quiescit super illum Spiritus Domini. Post quæ verba allegata statim hæc addit R. Ephraim in Ir Gibborim ad Genes. i. 2. כרחפת ‘Incubuit, sicut columba, quæ volitat super nido, illum attingens, et non attingens.’ Pergunt vero in Brescith Rabba: ‘Quomodo vero ministratur Spiritus Messiae, et venit movens se super faciem aquarum? Resp. Quando vos movebitis corda vestra, sicut aquas per pœnitentiam; quemadmodum dicitur,’ Thren. ii. 19. ‘Effunde, sicut aquas, cor tuum coram Domino.—Intelligitur Spiritus Messiae. Quum primum enim ille se super aquis legis commovit, statim facta est redemptio.’”—Vide Schoetgenii Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. i. p. 9 and 10. This, then, is another instance of the wonderful fulfilment, in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, of many of the singular traditions entertained among the Jews respecting their Messiah.

^k The word in Genesis כרחפת without points, must be considered as a participle of Hiphil, the causative; with points it is the participle of Pihel, the intensive; a signification much more consistent both with the sense of the passage in Genesis, and the description of the descent of the emblematical representation of the power of the Spirit in the Evangelical narrative.

If we consider the Messiah in this point of view as the second Adam, it seems possible that we shall more easily solve many of the difficulties which have been supposed to attend the literal interpretation of this interesting narrative. The Old Testament begins with an account of the preparation of the material world for the accomodation of the first Adam; the New Testament relates the preparation of the spiritual world, or Church, for the reception of the second Adam.

When the time of his creation came, the first Adam was formed by the power of God out of the then unpolluted earth; the second Adam was created by the same power of the Most High, in a similar state of innocence and perfection.

When the first Adam was ushered into the world, he was a perfect man, and his Father blessed him. When the second Adam had attained to the fulness of manhood, he was, while submitting for our sakes to the rite of baptism, blessed from above: both were sinless; both were, in a peculiar sense, the sons of God, and partakers of the human nature. The first Adam was placed in Paradise, and fell into the Wilderness. The second Adam was placed in the Wilderness, and regained that Paradise which his predecessor had forfeited. Adam was driven out of Paradise into the Wilderness, and banished from the tree of life. Christ was led or driven into the Wilderness by the same Spirit, to undergo the same trial, and by a sinless obedience to revoke the sentence of condemnation, open again the gates of Paradise, and regain the tree of life. In Him, we have another perfect man, as yet untouched by the Tempter. To Him therefore, as to the first Adam, the Evil Spirit makes his approaches from without, proposing his suggestions in a personal conversation; for as the nature of Christ, like that of Adam, was uncorrupted by sin, the wicked spirit had no immediate access to the heart. It was for this cause that Eve was tempted in a personal conversation; so also was tempted the seed of the woman, who was to bruise the serpent's head.

To show, however, still more clearly the evident parallel that exists, between the temptations of the first and second Adam, it will be necessary to examine the peculiar circumstances of each event.

According to St. John, all the sin that tempts mankind may be comprised in these three terms:—the lust of the flesh; the lust of the eye; and the pride of life; and to these three may be reduced the temptations both of Adam and of Jesus. In the temptation in Eden these three principles of evil are evidently alluded to in the description of the forbidden fruit. In the temptation in the wilderness, Christ was tempted like unto Adam; and in a more general sense, like unto all the children of Adam.

Adam was first tempted to the lust of the flesh by indulging his natural appetite for food, in a manner which was contrary to the express command of God. Christ was tempted to gratify his wish for food in a manner forbidden by the spirit of the law of God. He was tempted to supply himself with provision, by devoting that miraculous power which was given him for the benefit of mankind, and for the more effectual demonstration of the truth of his mission, to the gratification of his human nature.

Adam was, secondly, tempted to the lust of the eye: "He took of the fruit, because it was pleasant to the eye." And the Evil Spirit enforces the power of the motives to disobedience by perverting the understanding, in misrepresenting Scripture itself. Our Lord was, secondly, tempted by the perversion of Scripture itself, to indulge that feeling which is gratified by the admiration and homage of the world. He was invited by the Tempter to proclaim himself at once, by the performance of a useless and ostentatious miracle, the promised Messiah of the Jews. He was invited to encourage their false notions of a Messiah, and to obtain immediate possession of his promised kingdom, by throwing himself from the pinnacle (or wing, or battlement, or royal portico, for the word πτερυγιον is thus variously rendered) of the temple, and claim the homage of the crowds assembled to worship there. For the Jews interpreted literally the prediction of Malachi iii. 1., and expected that the Messiah, by some extraordinary demonstration of his power, would suddenly come to his temple. The pilgrimage which our Lord came to undergo was one which was expressly and painfully opposed to all that train of feelings and dispositions, so pleasing to our fallen nature. The Captain of our salvation was to become perfect through sufferings. He was to be poor, despised, insulted, and rejected. At the time when his painful career was beginning, he was tempted to avoid his appointed course of suffering, and to assume at once his destined honors, as the Messiah of Israel. No evil, he was assured, could happen to him, if he were the Son of God;—for He shall give his angels charge over thee,—they shall bear thee up, and protect thee from suffering and from danger.

Adam was, thirdly, tempted to that kind of evil which most alienates the human race from their Creator; he was tempted to the pride of life. "It was a tree to be desired, to make one wise." The wisdom which an evil spirit would recommend to the approbation of an accountable being must partake of his own nature; it must be different from that spiritual wisdom which is from above, and of which Adam was a partaker. It was the wisdom of this world, which is elsewhere called "earthly, sensual, devilish." It is that human wisdom by which the pride and glory of life is attained,—by which ambition triumphs, and conquerors obtain their temporal crowns and kingdoms. To this temptation likewise, our Saviour is now subjected. The Devil takes him up into an exceeding high mountain, "and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them," and promises them all to Christ on one condition only, that he will worship him,—that is, provided he will exchange his spiritual kingdom, which is to be purchased with the most excruciating agony and suffering, for the kingdoms of this world, all temporal power over every nation under heaven. In the second temptation he had invited Christ to obtain the homage of his own people, and to gratify his vanity and ostentation by hearing and receiving the acclamations of the Jews. In this he is solicited to become the sovereign of the universe, the powerful chief of one great empire, embracing alike under his dominion the subdued pride of Rome, and the submission of all mankind.

Thus was Christ, the second Adam, tempted in the same manner as the first Adam; on the same principles, and by the same Tempter. But he was also tempted as we are. The object of Satan, from the creation of Adam to the present moment, is to render man unfit for a spiritual condition, by inducing him uniformly to act from natural, or earthly, motives. The Spirit of Evil does not desire to diminish the supposed happiness of man in this world; he endeavours to immerse him in the pursuit of worldly enjoyments, comforts, and vanities, in such a manner, that the soul becomes embruted and embodied in material objects. The Spirit of Evil so endeavours to sensualize and animalize the intellectual and moral faculties of man, that his inferior nature may be triumphant; and consequently, that, when he shall be summoned into another stage of existence, he may be rendered totally unfit to be the eternal companion of God, the Judge of all,—of Christ the Mediator,—of holy angels,—and of perfect spirits.

Other circumstances may be adduced to complete the parallel between the two temptations. The first Adam fell through the act of eating; the second Adam reversed the sentence of condemnation by the opposite act of fasting and mortification. The first Adam was tempted in Paradise, surrounded by all the animals of creation, over which he ruled in a state of innocence: the second Adam is described by St. Mark, i. 13., to have been in the wilderness with the wild beasts. He sat among them, as their acknowledged Lord, in the same state of innocency, as the first Adam had enjoyed before his fall. When the temptations were completed, we read in both instances of a most curious and impressive circumstance, which in a wonderful manner completes this parallel.

When the first Adam fell, the angels of God were placed at the gate of the garden of Eden, to keep him from tasting the fruit of the tree of life. When the second Adam triumphed, angels came and ministered to him of that immortal food, which the flaming sword of divine wrath had denied to the children of disobedience.

For the passages in the Old Testament which prophesy the coming of Christ as the second Adam, compare 2 Sam. vii. 18, 19. with 1 Chron. xvii. 16, 17. When David desired to build the temple of Jerusalem, he was commanded to leave the performance of that task to his son, because he had himself been throughout his life engaged in wars. The message to this effect was delivered by the prophet Nathan, who consoles the king by declaring that from him the Messiah should descend. The king, on receiving this communication from the divine messenger, goes up to the tabernacle, and returns thanks to God for the promise. He thanks God that he has been regarded according to the law^l, or order^m, or arrangementⁿ, of the Adam that is hereafter to be from above.

Among the titles given in the Old Testament to the Messiah, collected by Dr. Pye Smith, in his valuable work on the Scripture Testimony to the Person of the Messiah, I find this, "the Adam from above." He cites in support of the interpretation which he has there given of 2 Sam. vii. 18, 19. and 1 Chron. xvii. 16, 17. the learned criticism of Dr. Kennicott, from which, however, he has in some measure departed, by rendering the word תורה "order," instead of "law." Bishop Horsley translates it "arrangement." His criticism is very ingenious. The words in the original are as follow—2 Sam. vii. 19. וזאת תורת האדם ארני יהוה—1 Chron. xvii. 17. וראיתני כתור האדם המעלה יהוה אלהים &c.; on which Dr. Kennicott observes, "From David's address to God, after receiving the message by Nathan, it is plain that David understood the son promised to be the Messiah, in whom his house was to be established for ever. But the words, which seem most expressive of this, are in this verse now rendered very unintelligibly, 'and is this the manner of man?' Whereas the words וזאת תורת האדם literally signify, 'and this is (or must be) the law of the man, or of the Adam,' i. e. this promise must relate to the law, or ordinance, made by God to Adam, concerning the seed of the woman; the man, or the second Adam; as the Messiah is expressly called by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 45–47. This meaning will be yet more evident from the parallel place, 1 Chron. xvii.

17., where the words are now miserably rendered thus: 'And thou hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree.' Whereas the words וראיתני כתור האדם literally signify, 'and thou hast regarded me according to the Adam that is future, or the man that is from above,' (for the word המעלה very remarkably signifies hereafter as to time, and from above as to place;) and thus St. Paul, including both senses: 'The second man is the Lord from heaven;' and 'Adam is the figure of Him that was to come,' or the future, Rom. v. 14."

It is upon this passage that Bishop Horsley has remarked (whether כתור or בתור be read in 1 Chron. xvii. 17.) "When these two passages are considered in their respective contexts, it is manifest that they are exactly parallel; and both, when rightly understood, must render the very same sense. The varieties in the expression being only such as the writer of the Book of Chronicles has introduced, according to his manner, for the sake of greater accuracy in relating the words of another, or to explain words and phrases that might seem doubtful in the narrative of the more ancient author. Hence it is to be inferred that the words תורה in Samuel, and תור in the Book of Chronicles, are words of the very same import, and are to be referred to the same root, differing only in the gender, which is feminine in Samuel, and masculine in Chronicles. The writer of the Book of Chronicles probably preferred the masculine form to prevent the necessity of referring the noun to the root ירה, from which the feminine תורה may, but the masculine תור cannot, be derived. The true root, therefore, in the judgment of the inspired writer of the Book of Chronicles, was תור; and the two passages may be thus expounded:—

"2 Sam. vii. 19. 'And this (namely, what was said about his house in distant times) is the arrangement about The MAN, O Lord Jehovah!'

"1 Chron. xvii. 17. 'And thou hast regarded me in the arrangement about the MAN that is to be from above, O God Jehovah!' That is, in forming the scheme of the incarnation, regard was had to the honor of David, and his house, as a secondary object, by making it a part of the plan, that the Messiah should be born in his family. This is indisputably the sense of both passages, though far more clearly expressed by the later writer^o. Dr. Kennicott, not perceiving the identity of the two words תורה and תור, was not aware that the two passages render the very same sense, with no other difference than the advantage of perspicuity, and perhaps of accuracy, in reciting David's very words, on the side of the author of the Book of Chronicles. I owe, however, to Dr. Kennicott the important hint, that הָאָדָם, in Samuel, and הָאָדָם הַמִּצִּלָּה, in Chronicles, allude to Christ, and to none else; which led me to the right understanding of both passages.”—Horsley’s Biblical Criticisms, vol. i. p. 184. See also Arrangement of the Old Testament, in loc.

It is difficult to say why Bishop Horsley, after this confession, should have differed in another point from Dr. Kennicott, and translated הָאָדָם by “the Man,” instead of “the Adam.” Dr. Pye Smith has very justly observed, from Dr. Kennicott’s translation, that the inferences to be drawn from this passage are, that the Messiah would, at a period remotely future, descend from David, and that he would sustain a relation to the human race analogous to that of the first man.

In the New Testament also our Lord is called the Adam from above. We read these remarkable words, (1 Cor. xv. 47). “The first man is of the earth earthy, the second man is the Lord from heaven.” Through the greater part of that beautiful chapter St. Paul draws a parallel between the first and second Adam. In the Epistle to the Romans (v. 14.) he calls the first Adam “the figure of Him that was to come.” Compare also John iii. 31. and viii. 23.

The Jewish traditions also affirm the same doctrine, and St. Paul, in this passage (1 Cor. xv. 47.) uses the very same expression which is found in the book Zohar on this subject: a circumstance which may be considered as affording a proof of the real date of that curious book. It is said to consist principally of a recital of the expositions and doctrines of Rabbi Simeon^p, the son of Jochai, who was the contemporary of the Apostles, and probably known to St. Paul, himself one of the most learned of his day.

The Messiah is there called אָדָם לְעֵילָא, “the Adam on high,” and is said to have dominion over all things, as the first man, “the Adam below,” אָדָם תַּתָּא, had by divine appointment over the inferior creation of this world. The same idea repeatedly occurs in the rabbinical writings. “Plura adhuc ibi habentur,” says Schoetgenius, “sed hæc sufficient.” I have selected a few of the very curious traditions dispersed through his book^q.

Nam Adamus primus semper et ubique fere audit הָאָדָם הָרִאשׁוֹן, et in libro Sohar קְדָמָא אָדָם.”—“Sohar Genes. fol. 14. col. 53. Quum nondum consummati essent septem ordines dierum superiorum, nondum absolutus erat אָדָם לְעֵילָא Adam supernus. Cum absolveretur אָדָם לְעֵילָא superius, dictus est אָדָם לְעֵילָא Adam superior: cum absolveretur inferius, dictus est אָדָם תַּתָּא Adam inferior. Et quemadmodum, postquam omnia absoluta sunt, Adamus inferior dominatur omnibus quæcumque in mundo creata sunt, sic Adam superior עֵלְ כָּלָא, omnibus omnino rebus dominatur.”—Schoetgen. *Hor. I would here conclude the attempt to prove that Jesus of Nazareth was the one Messiah, from his being the second Adam, as the Old Testament, the New Testament, and the Jewish traditions assert the Messiah to be; but Mr. Jones has added some ideas on the time during which the temptation lasted, which may confirm the propriety of the reasoning now adopted. According to tradition, Adam and Eve are supposed to have been tried forty days in Paradise. Jones, in his interesting dissertation on the Temptation of Christ, arguing on this supposition, concludes that the period of forty days will, from this circumstance, naturally occur in other transactions; and particularly in this of our Saviour’s temptation. The flood brought upon the world by sin committed in Paradise (Gen. v. 29.) lasted for forty days—and so long were the rains descending, that the sin and its history might be recognised in the punishment. When the Israelites searched the land of Canaan, the second Paradise, they had a foretaste of it for forty days (Numb. xiv. 33, 34.), and the people who murmured at the evil report of those faithless messengers were condemned to wander forty years (a year for a day) in the wilderness.—(Jones’s Works, vol. iii. p. 173.)—To which may be added many other symbolical coincidences. Moses, as the founder and the great lawgiver of the Jewish Church, fasted twice forty days and forty nights on Mount Horeb, when he first received the tables of the Law, and after they had been broken and were again restored. Elijah also, the reformer of the Jewish Church, by the same superhuman power, after he had crossed the river Jordan, fasted for the same number of days, and in the same wilderness, as Moses had formerly done. Are these mere coincidences? Is it not rather probable that Christ, who came to fulfil the Law to the uttermost, and to establish on it a more perfect dispensation, should be appointed to give the same evidence of his divine mission, and to undergo the same preparation as his typical predecessors had already fulfilled?

עֵילָא ה’ דָּוִד שְׁלֵמָה ‘David superior et David inferior. ה’ דָּוִד שְׁלֵמָה ‘superior est Deus primus, et inferior est Deus postremus.’”—Schoetgen. vol. i. p. 673. In another passage of one of the talmudical writings we read, that since the first Adam was in the transgression, the Messiah will be the last Adam to take away sin. Nere Schalom, fol. 160. 2. citante Edzardo ad Berachoth, c. 1. p. 176. apud Schoetgen. vol. i. p. 671. In the commentary on Proverbs xxx. 4. we read—“What is his name?—the heavenly Adam, or the Adam from above—and what is his son’s name? the earthly Adam, the Adam from below.” Sohar ad Genes. xxxix. 2. “In the hour in which Adam received the celestial image, all creatures came to him, and acknowledged him king of the earth.” Jalkut Rubeni, fol. 21. 1. Schoetgen. vol. i. p. 673. בְּשַׁעֲתָא דְּנִחְיָא עֵילָא—“He was with the wild beasts.” There is much curious matter also of a similar nature on these words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 49. Εἰκόνα τοῦ χοίρου. Εἰκόνα τοῦ ἰντρονίου—“As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.”—Schoetgen. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 673.

NOTE 52.—PART I.

THOSE who reject the literal interpretation of the account of our Lord's temptation, have laid great weight on this phrase, "in a moment of time," ἐν στιγμή ἡρώρου, as demonstrating the whole scene to be a vision. The real state of the case seems, however, to be, that the Tempter conveyed, or took, or accompanied, our Lord to the mountain, and showing him in a moment of time the kingdoms of Judæa, which were then before him, suggested to him at the same moment the superior glory of all the other governments and dominions of the earth, the greatest of which (the Roman empire) was then at the height of its power. Bishop Porteus remarks on this passage, that Abbé Mariti, describing this mountain, speaks of it as extremely high, and commanding the most beautiful prospect imaginable. It overlooks the mountains of Arabia, the country of Gilead, the country of the Ammonites, the plains of Moab, the plain of Jericho, the river Jordan, and the whole extent of the Dead Sea. These various domains the Tempter might show to our Lord distinctly, and might also at the same time point out (for so the original word sometimes signifies), and direct our Lord's eye towards several other regions that lay beyond them, which might comprehend all the principal kingdoms of the Eastern world. According to tradition, the mountain on which our Saviour was tempted is called Quarantania. Maundrell describes it as exceedingly high, and difficult of ascent, having a small chapel at the top, and another about half way up, on a prominent part of a rock. Near this latter are several caves and holes, originally used by hermits, and by some even to this day, during the period of Lent, in imitation of the example of our blessed Saviour. The words of the Evangelists are so clear and distinct, in their account of this transaction, and it was so evidently a premeditated scheme on the part of Satan, availing himself of the first symptom of human weakness, beginning his attack at the moment that our Saviour "was an hungered;" that, had we no other evidence, there can be no reasonable grounds for considering the temptation in any other point of view than as a real contest.

The temptation of Christ, as well as that of our first parents, must be considered as a real scene. We are not justified in making our present experience the criterion of truth, and rejecting the positive testimony of Revelation, on account of theoretical difficulties. The whole question concerning the origin and continuance of evil is involved in insuperable mystery. But we may with as much propriety deny the origin of evil, as refuse to believe in its remedy; which it cannot be irrational to conclude would be, in some manner, correspondent to the disease. Till the next stage of our being has developed the unrevealed mysteries of the Deity who made mankind, we must be contented, like obedient children, to believe much that we cannot yet understand.

NOTE 53.—PART I.

THE Evil Spirit in this temptation is called by the three names which unitedly characterize him as the destroyer of man. He is at once their enemy (Σατανᾶς), their accuser (ὁ Διάβολος), and their tempter (ὁ Πειράζων).

NOTE 54.—PART I.

ON THE DIFFERENCE IN THE ORDER OF THE TEMPTATIONS AS RELATED BY ST. MATTHEW AND ST. LUKE.

IN this history of the temptation, St. Matthew's order is, 1. "Command that these stones be made bread." 2. "Cast thyself down from the temple." 3. "I will give thee all thou seest from this high mountain, if thou wilt fall down and worship me."—St. Luke's order is, the first temptation the same as St. Matthew; the third temptation is placed by him for the second, and the second for the third. But St. Luke does not affirm this order. He has only καὶ ἀναγαγὼν, ver. 5; and καὶ ἤγαγεν, ver. 9. Whereas St. Matthew uses particles, which seem to fix his order; as, τότε, ver. 5; and πάλιν, ver. 8. Le Clerc says, "Hoc repugnantia haberi non potest, cum neuter evangelistarum profiteatur se, hâc in re, ordinem temporis accurate secutum."—Newcome's Notes to his Harmony, p. 6, fol. edit. Dublin, 1778.

Possibly the reason of the difference in the order of the account of the temptations given us in these two Evangelists, may be in some measure ascertained from a consideration of the respective purposes for which they originally composed their Gospels. St. Matthew wrote for the Jews of Judæa. The title of "King" was the most usual name given to the Messiah by the Jews. "Vulgatissimum est hoc nomen Messiæ, quem Judæi ubique vocant, מלך המשיח," says Schoetgenius, Horæ Hebr. vol. i. p. 13, and instances abound throughout his book. But he was not only considered as king of Israel, but king over all the world. Thus we read (Zohar Genes. fol. 128. col. 509. ad verba, Genes. xlix. 11. ex versione Sommeri, p. 96, apud Schoetgen. vol. ii. p. 638-9.) "So the King Messiah will show favor to Israel, but he will be a terror to all people who profess not the true religion." St. Matthew, therefore, seems to point out to his Jewish readers, that Jesus, who was the true spiritual Messiah, first conquered all desire for the luxuries of life.—He then refused to declare himself, by any useless though stupendous miracle, the expected King of Israel, by proving himself at an unfit time, and in an unsuitable manner, the Messiah they expected; for his course was that of toil and suffering, of neglected and lowly poverty and scorn, till the time came for the establishment of his spiritual kingdom. In repulsing the third temptation he showed his contempt of all worldly power, and wisdom, and distinction, till the promised period when the converted heathen should be given him for his spiritual inheritance, and the utmost parts of the earth for his spiritual possession. The Evangelist thus preserves the climax. He ascends from one gradation of virtue to another, and shows how our Lord, by resisting the Tempter, attained to that height of excellence which ought to impress the mind with the greatest veneration.

St. Luke wrote for the Gentiles of Achaia. He places before them the same triumph of Christ, and teaches the same doctrine; that he conquered the desire of the pleasures of this life, the love of temporal dominion over the world at large, and all the dazzling glories and triumphs to which that dominion led. But he teaches this doctrine in the manner the most likely to impress the minds of his Gentile readers; for which purpose he changes the order to preserve the appropriate climax, and the gradation of the power of the temptation. Christ conquered the desires of the appetite: this was the first temptation. In the second he was offered that which the Gentiles esteemed the highest point of human happiness—universal dominion over all the kingdoms of the world. And, lastly, he was invited to throw himself from the pinnacle of the temple, and to receive at once all those divine honors which the heathen paid to their gods; for such a demonstration of divine power would have been immortalized, and would have placed him above all their other deities. It is well known in what high estimation temporal ambition and sovereignty were at that time held by the unconverted pagans. The well-known compliments which Horace, in various passages, pays to Augustus—

Purpureo bibit ore nectar.'—CARM. lib. iii. Od. 35. or the

"Præsens divus habebitur

Augustus," &c.—CARM. lib. iii. Od. 5.

were not merely expressions of flattery which had only a courtly meaning; but they may be considered as conveying the real opinion which the heathen world entertained of those who obtained universal empire; they esteemed such as gods, and actually, as all ancient history proves, paid them homage and offered sacrifices to them and to their statues, as to gods. St. Luke, therefore, represents our Lord, not only as rejecting the sovereignty over the world, but as refusing to obtain, by a mere exertion of his power, all the servile homage and flattering pomp attendant on such an elevation. This, in the opinion of a heathen, would be the highest test of virtue. The inference in both instances would be the same; he who performed all the great works recorded in the Evangelists alike contemned and declined those objects which, in the opinion of both Jew and Gentile, were the most highly to be prized and valued. From the narrative of the temptation they would learn that Christ was the Lord and Giver of greater and more estimable blessings than the luxuries, the honors, or the most enviable distinctions and advantages of this life.

Thus will the accounts of the two Evangelists be reconciled. Both relate the same facts, both enforce the same doctrine; the order is different, because each considered the opinions and modes of thinking prevalent among those they addressed, and were anxious to impart the greatest interest to their narrative.

It will be observed, that this interpretation is submitted to the reader, on the supposition that the popular interpretation of the πάσας τὰς βασιλείας τοῦ κόσμου (Matt. iv. 8.) be the correct reading; that it is rightly rendered, "the kingdoms of this world," and that consequently the corresponding phrase in St. Luke, πάσας τὰς βασιλείας τῆς οὐκουμένης (Luke iv. 5.), must have the same signification, and is not to be referred principally to the kingdoms into which Judæa was at that time divided. The reading proposed by Michaelis in this passage appears conjectural, and Archbishop Laurence has endeavoured to prove it unfounded. It is, however so curious, that I shall append to this note both the remarks of the learned German, and the objections of his critic. The reader will then be able to decide.

Michaelis is laboring to prove that the Gospel of St. Matthew was composed in Hebrew, and derives one argument in support of his opinion from Matt. iv. 8. The Tempter conducts Christ to the top of a lofty mountain and shows him πάσας τὰς βασιλείας τοῦ κόσμου. If we take this in a literal sense, the thing is impossible: if it was a mere illusion, there was no necessity for ascending a lofty mountain. Here then it appears, that some word was used in the Hebrew original which was capable of more than one translation: perhaps הארץ, which signifies "the land," as well as "the earth;" or הבֶּל, which, as well as διαβουλή, may denote the land of Palestine: or thirdly, which is perhaps the most probable conjecture, it is not unlikely that St. Matthew wrote כָּל מַמְלָכוֹת הָעֲצָבִי, that is, "all the kingdoms of the Holy Land," and that the translator mistook עֲצָבִי for צָבָא, which in the Septuagint is sometimes rendered by κόσμος. It is even possible, as עֲצָבִי signifies literally "beauty," and κόσμος has likewise this sense, that the translation in question was occasioned by a too literal adherence to the original. Now all the kingdoms which existed in Palestine in the time of Christ could be seen from the top of Mount Nebo. St. Matthew, therefore, meant all the kingdoms of Palestine, which his translator converted into all the kingdoms of the world.—Marsh's Michaelis, vol. iii. part 1. p. 155.

Archbishop Laurence contends, however, that there is no adequate proof that the Gospel of St. Matthew was compiled in the Hebrew language, and that no arguments can, or ought to be founded on conjectures of this nature. In reply to this remark of Michaelis, he observes that עֲצָבִי is used for Palestine only in four instances, three times by Daniel, and once by Jeremiah, and each time metaphorically, as "the pleasant or agreeable land;" and that the Seventy do not thus translate it either literally or metaphorically: and it is not likely that an appellation of this peculiar description would have been adopted in a plain narrative. Neither could κόσμος, in the sense of "the world," be put for צָבָא, the proper meaning of which is "an army," and which is only translated κόσμος by the LXX, when the host of heaven is mentioned; or for עֲצָבִי, in its literal signification of "beauty, honor, and glory." But it is not necessary to interpret the word κόσμος, in the sense of "the world." In Rom. iv. 13. the expression κληρονομήσων τὴν κτίσιν is interpreted by Beza, of the "land of Canaan;" and Glass, in his Philologia Sacra, expressly limits its meaning to denote the land of Canaan.—Sermon on Excess in Philological Speculation, note 12, p. 36.

NOTE 1.—PART II.

MICHAELIS and Lightfoot begin this part of the history at John v. 15.; and Doddridge has placed ver. 15–18. by themselves, before the baptism of Christ. In the note to part i. sect. 2. I have mentioned the reasons for preserving the present order and preferring the authority of Archbishop Newcome.

Having now been inaugurated by the waters of baptism, the testimony from heaven, the anointing of the Spirit, and the conquest over temptation, into his high office, the Messiah presents himself to his forerunner, who immediately hails him, as the atoning sacrifice for the sins of the world. John, as a prophet, spoke under the influence of divine inspiration: in no other manner could he have obtained power to make the declaration. As our Lord had come into the world for the express object of expiating the sin of man, there is an obvious propriety in the salutation of the Baptist. It seems to mean, that as far as man was concerned, all the other offices, characters, and attributes of the Holy One of God are of comparatively inferior moment, unless he be considered as the spotless lamb, that should die for mankind. The testimony of the ancient prophets had but gradually revealed the various perfections of the Messiah; and the hope and faith of man had been continually excited and cherished by the wise and merciful ordinance, which appointed a succession of prophets, each of whom added some additional information respecting him who was to come. This salutation of the Baptist was the completion of all prophecy. From this time the voice of prophetic inspiration, under the Law of the old covenant, utterly ceased. The Messiah had come, and he was before them. The Lamb of God was preparing himself for the fearful sacrifice.

In support of the doctrine of the atonement, there is more authority than for any other revealed in the Jewish or Christian Scriptures. It was taught in the beginning of the patriarchal dispensation, the first after the fall, in the words of the promise, and in the institution of sacrifices. It is enforced by the uniform, concurrent testimony of the types, prophecies, opinions, customs, and traditions of the Jewish Church. It is the peculiar foundation and principal doctrine of the Christian Church, in all ages, which has never deviated from the opinion that the death of Christ on the cross was "the full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world."—See particularly Archbishop Magee On the Atonement, with the notes and dissertations appended; the commentators; Outram; and the principal authors referred to by Archbishop Magee. Dr. P. Smith's Sermon also on the Atonement is a valuable tract.

NOTE 2.—PART II.

THE messengers from Jerusalem could not or would not understand the answer of the Baptist, when he told them he was neither Elias returned from heaven, nor Jeremiah risen from the dead, though he was the predicted voice of one crying in the wilderness. They demanded of him, therefore, by what authority he baptized. Though baptism had long been known and practised among them, it had been applied to the Proselytes only; and they believed that Elias and Jeremiah, the immediate precursors of Christ, were the only persons authorized to baptize the Jews themselves, for the purpose of forming a new and more select society, separated from the mass of the nation.—Rosenmüller in N. T. vol. ii. p. 309. Kuinoel, Comment. in lib. N. T. Hist. vol. iii. p. 130.

Joh. And. Danzius, in a very valuable treatise on the Baptism of Proselytes among the Jews, written to illustrate this passage of St. John's Gospel, and the passages in Matthew, chap. iii., has considered at length the baptism of John. His treatise is bound up in Meuschen's Nov. Test. ex Talmude. As the work is not often to be procured, I have selected some of the points he discusses.

To determine whether the baptism of John was divinely appointed or not, two inquiries appear to be necessary.

1. Was such a rite as baptism practised in the Jewish Church by divine appointment before the time of John?

2. If so, was the baptism of John distinct from that previously established among the Jews?

In reply to these questions, Danzius affirms that the baptism of John was not totally distinct from that in use amongst the Jews, (p. 262. § 25.) Josephus speaks of baptism as a rite of long standing in the Jewish Church. John is represented to have been more bent upon correcting the abuse of the existing institution than establishing a new one.

Baptism was appointed by God himself, (p. 266. § 30.) It was the received opinion among the ancient Jews, that baptism was appointed thus, and had obtained in their nation from the promulgation of the Law. The sanctification enjoined (Exod. xix. 10.) is thought to have been baptism.

(P. 288. § 7 and 11.) St. Paul, 1 Cor. x. 2., says, ἐν τῇ νεφέλῃ καὶ ἐν τῇ θαλάσσῃ ἐβαπτίσαντο. These words may be taken literally, without any figurative signification. They were baptized, ἐν νεφέλῃ, "in rain water," and ἐν θαλάσσῃ, "in the sea."

(P. 301. § 85 and 86.) The Jewish elders did not inquire into the baptism of John, as a thing the nature of which was new and unheard-of amongst them;—but 1st, Because he, on his private authority, usurped a public function, which belonged to three persons (triumvirati) commissioned by the Church.—2dly, Because he baptized those for whom it might seem unnecessary, viz. Jews under the covenant, who had been baptized before in their ancestors, and needed not baptism as an initiatory rite for admission into the Jewish Church, (p. 305. § 102.)—And, 3dly, Because in his baptism he differed from their ancestors in the end proposed.

The Jews believed baptism to have been instituted by God himself. If this opinion was true, and the baptism of John was not totally distinct from that in use among the Jews, John must be allowed to have been divinely commissioned to exercise that function.—See the treatise of Danzius.

Gorionides, however, asserts of John, that he was the institutor of baptism. "This is he who (עשה מבילה) made, instituted, or practised baptism."—Lib. v. c. 45. (ap. Gill.)

NOTE 3.—PART II.

THE events of the new dispensation were shadowed forth by the many circumstances under the former system of worship. St. John baptized at Bethabara. This place, the name of which denotes "a place of passage," is said to have been the very spot where the Israelites, under the command of Joshua, advanced into the Holy Land. It was over against Jericho. There is reason to believe (vide Lightfoot in loc.) that St. John was baptizing in the very place, therefore, where the Israelites passed over; and that our Lord was baptized in that spot where the ark rested in the bed of the river. These coincidences are so very appropriate and numerous, that we shall do well to hesitate before we call them all accidental.

Jerome^r and Origen^s have preserved the tradition that John baptized in Bethabara. The place was pointed out to strangers in their time.

NOTE 4.—PART II.

THE observations of Lightfoot on the time when, and the circumstances under which, this expression was used, deserve to be noticed.

John, in his opinion, could not have selected a more characteristic expression than that of the morning and evening lamb that was offered at Jerusalem.

1. John addressed Priests and Levites, whose chief employment was to make a sacrifice of that lamb.

2. It was about the time of offering the sacrifice when John used these words.

3. The lamb declared the innocency of Christ, in being without spot; and the death of Christ, in being offered up.

4. It was pertinent to the doctrine of John; for he had spoken of remission of sin to all who came near, and declared, when Christ came in sight, in what manner the sins of those who repented were to be forgiven, by the sacrifice of this very Lamb of God, who should bear away the sins of the world, as the lamb offered in the temple took away in a figure the sins of the Jews.—Lightfoot, second part of the Harmony of the Evangelists, Works, vol. i. p. 529.

“To take away sin” was a common phrase among the talmudists.—Bresith Rabba, sect. 22. fol. 23. 2. ad verba Caini, “Cainus Deum sic alloquitur: superna et inferna tu portas, ולפני אין אתה סובל, sed peccata mea tu non portas.” Eadem repetuntur in Debarim Rabba, sect. 8. fol. 260. 2. Jalkut Rubeni, fol. 22. 1. Tanchuma, fol. 2. 3. Jalkut Rubeni, fol. 30. 4. “משיח סובל עונות ישראל,” Messias portat peccata Israelitarum.”—Schoetgen. vol. i. 325.

In the Levitical dispensation, when a sacrifice was offered for sin, he that brought it laid his hand upon the head of the victim, according to the command of God, Lev. i. 4. iii. 2. iv. 4., and by that rite transferred his sins upon the victim, who is said to take them upon him, and to carry them away. In the daily sacrifice of the temple, the stationary men, who were the representatives of the people, laid their hands upon the unoffending lamb thus offered for them; and those appropriated for the morning and evening sacrifice were bought with that half shekel, which all the Jews paid yearly, εἰς λύτρον τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτῶν ἐξιλάσασθαι περὶ τῶν ψυχῶν αὐτῶν, “as the price of the redemption of their lives to make an atonement for them.” Exod. xxx. 12. 14. 16. This Lamb of God was to be offered to take away at once the guilt of sin, and to put an end to the sacrifices required by the Law.

Vide Whitby in loc., Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 531. and Archbishop Magee, On the Sin Offering among the Jews. I beg to entreat every man who would desire to understand thoroughly the cause why Christ came into the world to peruse this latter book.

NOTE 5.—PART II.

KUINOEL, comparing this verse with ver. 30., has discussed both passages at length, and decides, after an impartial examination of the various meanings assigned to them by others, in favor of the generally-received opinion, that the Baptist intended to enforce on his hearers the Scriptural doctrine of the preëxistence of Christ.—Kuinoel, In Libros Historicos N. T. vol. iii. p. 117–121.

NOTE 6.—PART II.

THIS expression of the Evangelist, “I knew him not,” appears at variance with the passage Matt. iii. 13., where John, knowing his superiority, declares, “I have need to be baptized by thee.” There are several ways of reconciling this apparent difference; the most natural interpretation seems to be, that John, being made acquainted by his own parents with the miraculous circumstances that preceded the birth of his relation, and having known the extraordinary purity and holiness of his life, declares, “I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?” But although John knew him personally, he knew him not officially as the Messiah, till the promised token had been vouchsafed to him; till a voice from heaven proclaimed him the beloved Son of God, and the Spirit descending like a dove hovered over him. The Jews in general must have known our Saviour personally, as the reputed son of Joseph and Mary, but they knew him not then, although he was in the midst of them, as the Christ; nor shall they know him till the veil be removed from their eyes. See John xiv. 9.

Some commentators suppose that John, when Jesus came to Jordan to be baptized of him, knew him to be the Christ by the same divine impulse which directed Simeon, when he hailed the infant Jesus in the temple as the promised Messiah. See also 1 Kings xiv. 1–7., where the wife of Jeroboam is made known to the prophet Ahijah. We have every reason to suppose that John must have had a personal acquaintance with our Saviour, from the connexion and intimacy between the two families, and that they would meet each other at Jerusalem at the great festival three times a year; but his Messiahship was revealed to the Baptist by some miraculous and indubitable evidence, for confirmation of his own faith, and that of all succeeding ages.—Hales’ Analysis, vol. ii. p. 731. Witsius, De Vita Johannis, ad fin. Miscel. Sacra, vol. ii.

Archdeacon Nares interprets the passage, “I knew him not as the Messiah.” Doddridge endeavours to prove, that either accidentally, or providentially, they might very possibly have been unknown to each other.—Archdeacon Nares's Remarks on the Socinian Version of the New Testament, p. 34, 35.

Nonnus, who lived in the fourth century, has left a Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John in Homeric verse. The principal use of this work in the present day is to show us the sense in which the more controverted passages of St. John's Gospel were understood at that period. Nonnus has thus paraphrased the expression, "I knew him not," in verse 31.

Ἐγὼ δὲ μὴ οὐ πάρος ἔγνων

Ὁμῆσιν, &c.—Par. ch. i. l. 108, 109.

The corresponding passage in verse 33 leaves out the word ὁμῆσιν, line 118.

NOTE 7.—PART II.

ON the day following, John calls the attention of his disciples to Jesus; and, as if he would remind them of the preceding conversation, he again gives his testimony to the office of Christ, in the same words, "Behold the Lamb of God!" and immediately these two disciples become the followers of Christ. In this circumstance also is another evident propriety through the ordinance of an overruling Providence. No persons could be so fitly chosen by God to be the first disciples of Christ, as those who had previously been followers of his great Forerunner. By this event our Lord at once united the Mosaical and Christian Dispensations. The disciples of John, who now began to attend him, were witnesses before all Israel of the testimony of John, whom all acknowledged to be a prophet. Wherever he went, Christ was now, or was soon to be, accompanied by those who were enabled to confirm his Messiahship, by the declaration of the last prophet of the Old Dispensation. This event also enabled his disciples to preach more decisively to the people the great truths which they received from John; that repentance was the beginning and foundation of faith; and that all who depend upon the Lamb of God as the atoning Sacrifice for mankind must be brought to him by the ministry of repentance.

Andrew was the first who followed Christ, and the Evangelist St. John is supposed to have been the other. St. Peter was brought to Christ by Andrew his brother. It does not, however, appear, from the narrative, that they certainly forsook their occupations at this time, for we read, ver. 39., that they abode with him only that night; and in the next section, which is placed according to the order of St. John's narrative, we find that his disciples were at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, and we hear of no other disciples but these and Philip and Nathanael, whom Christ met on his setting out to go into Galilee; we may conclude they attended him to that place, and then resumed their occupations, while Christ continued at Capernaum. Nathanael is supposed to have been chosen a disciple under the name of Bartholomew, in the same way as Peter received the name of Jona, or Cephas; as throughout the whole of the evangelical writings he is always coupled with Philip, and (in John xxi. 2.) he is named, with other disciples who were all apostles.

NOTE 8.—PART II.

PETER, like Nathanael, received a title which, while it alluded to his own name, described also his future dignity, in being selected to preach the Gospel to the Gentile world. Christ had come to call the Gentiles to God, and he proves by his address to St. Peter, that this great object of his mission was always before him. The members of the Church of Rome imagine that this name, given to St. Peter, proves that he was appointed head of the Universal Church, whose seat was to be at Rome. A solid foundation for this notion, however, cannot be laid, before some stubborn facts are removed, which are utterly inconsistent with this opinion. These are the parity among the apostles;—the total absence of evidence that the Church, even in that early age, submitted in any one instance to St. Peter;—the election of St. James to the episcopal office at Jerusalem;—the manner in which St. Paul addressed St. Peter, and the uncertainty, indeed, whether St. Peter was ever at Rome, the seat of his supposed dignity. Vide Barrow's Inquiry whether St. Peter was ever at Rome. This is a posthumous work, and had not received the last correction of its author. It contains, however, a valuable collection of materials on this subject. The brief Introduction to the work, by Archbishop Tillotson, to whom Dr. Barrow, when dying, intrusted his manuscripts, also deserves attention.

NOTE 9.—PART II.

FOR some very curious remarks on this passage, see King's Morsels of Criticism. The singular theory of the universe, and its government, proposed by this author, will interest, even when it does not convince, all who engage themselves in these studies. Mr. King rejects the usual interpretation of this passage, and, after endeavouring to prove that the prophecy of our Lord was not fulfilled during the lifetime of Nathanael, he concludes "that this wonderful prophecy was a promise to Philip and Nathanael, and through them to all mankind; that the time would certainly come, when they should see a free communication between our heaven (that is, as he supposes, the sun) and the angels of God descending, and ascending, and conversing with men.”—King’s Morsels of Criticism, vol. i. 8vo. p. 320.

NOTE 10.—PART II.

THE remainder of the events in this part to the imprisonment of John, are harmonized in the same order by Whiston, Lightfoot, Michaelis, Doddridge, and Newcome. Pilkington inserts before that event the baptism and temptation of Christ; a difference which has already been considered.

NOTE 11.—PART II.

THE third day means, either the third day from Christ’s coming into Galilee, John i. 43.—or the third day from the conference with Nathanael—or the third day from his disciples first following him—or the third from the commencement of the marriage feast, which usually lasted seven days.

ON THE MIRACLE AT THE MARRIAGE IN CANA.

The obscure life of Christ till he was thirty years of age had obliterated, in a great measure, the impression produced upon the people by the circumstances which had attended his advent. But the time had now arrived for our Lord’s manifestation of himself to the world. The voice from heaven had proclaimed him the Son of God,—his great Forerunner had acknowledged him as such, and an act of Omniscience had convinced and drawn to him a disciple. The hour was now at hand when a more public testimony of his Messiahship was to be given, in the revival of miracles. Galilee was the place predicted, and appointed, (Isaiah ix. 1, 2.) See also the Jewish traditions on this subject, in Schoetgen, for the first display of the power and majesty of the Messiah; and we accordingly find that his first miracle was wrought in Cana of Galilee. Lightfoot has endeavoured to prove, from the hints which are given in various parts of the Gospels, concerning the kindred and family of our Lord’s mother, and particularly from this account of the festival, and of the manner in which she is represented as possessing more influence and authority than was usual for a mere guest, that this marriage took place at the house of Mary, the sister of the mother of Jesus, and wife of Cleophas (who was the same as Alpheus), and that the bride was of that family. I cannot but think it highly probable, that our blessed Saviour wrought this his first miracle in the presence of all his assembled family and connexions, to confirm their faith before he entered upon his public ministry. The object of the miracle must be judged by its effect. The disciples whom he had taken from John saw and believed.

It may be worthy of observation, however, that the Evangelist St. John, who has written the account of the event in his character of historian, is asserted to have been himself the bridegroom. Dr. A. Clarke, in his Preface to the Gospel of St. John, is of this opinion. Lampe, in his Prolegomena to his laborious work on St. John’s Gospel, asserts the contrary, on the authorities of Ignatius, Tertullian, Augustine, Epiphanius, and Jerome.

The best explanation I have met of this transaction is that which is given by Rosenmüller (in loc.) from Chrysostom^u, who supposes that the mother and brethren of our Lord were impatient that he should perform some splendid action, and manifest himself to the world, that they might obtain some degree of honor through him. His mother, probably, intimated by some tone, voice, or manner, her desire that he should perform some of those wonderful miracles which he had sometimes wrought (as many conjecture) for the relief of the domestic poverty of his family. “It does not seem unworthy of our Lord’s character,” says Rosenmüller in loc., “that he should have given this consolation to his mother and friends. The idea is suggested by the strong hope expressed by the Virgin Mary on this occasion. But as there is no other support for this opinion, it may be accounted for, from the conviction his mother entertained of his divine mission, and from the anxiety she would naturally feel, that her son should manifest himself as the promised Messiah. In reply to the suggestion, our Lord, instantly understanding her wishes, checks the half-uttered request, by giving her to understand that she was not to direct him in the exercise of his divine powers, and that the period which her affection anticipated had not yet arrived. The words, ‘Mine hour is not yet come,’ are supposed to signify that his public demonstration of himself was not to commence till John was imprisoned.” Rosenmüller and Kuinoel in loc. quote from Dion Cassius, lib. 51. the expression of Augustus to Cleopatra, to show that the words of ver. 4. are not to be understood in an unkind or harsh sense—Θάλασσει ὃ γύραι, καὶ θυμὸν ἔχε ἀγαθόν. That the word γύραι was used also as a title of honor among the more ancient Greeks appears from its use by Æschylus.

The general opinion, however, of the ancient fathers was, that our Lord used the language of reproof to his mother, as guilty of some indiscretion or precipitancy in thus speaking; as desiring ἀκαλῶς τι ζητεῖν, καὶ ἐγκόπτειν τι τῶν πνευματικῶν, says Chrysostom, as quoted by Whitby. Lampe also, in his Commentary on St. John, maintains this latter opinion, vol. i. p. 504. He supposes that our Lord used the Syriac term ܐܢܬܐ, instead of ܡܝܬܪܐ, which is the more honorable appellation. It seems most probable that reproof was intended, and it was clothed in the language of affection, kindness, and respect.

We have now arrived at the first miracle of our Lord mentioned in the New Testament. It will be remembered, that all the writers of the books of the New Testament addressed themselves in the first instance to the Jews; and as one object of these notes is to point out to the sons of Israel, in this their last captivity, the internal evidence, as it gradually arises before us, that the Founder of the Christian Church was the predicted Messiah, it may be worth our while to draw some comparison between the miracles recorded in the Old, and those related in the New Testament. I think it can easily be made to appear, that they are both supported by evidence of the same nature; and, consequently, that if the former are received, the latter, on the same grounds, are not to be rejected.

As I make no reference here to those who require arguments to overthrow the paradoxical opinion of Mr. Hume, "that no human testimony can prove a miracle," I shall not stop to consider this or any other speculation of modern infidelity. We may be contented with observing, that "a miracle is an event, which is contrary to experience and the established constitution or course of things, effected by power more than human." This regular course of things is generally known by the expression, "the laws of nature;" the word "nature" being used as if it was intended to express some occult quality, which is in itself independent of a creating or preserving Providence. In this sense of the word, there is no such thing as nature. "Nature," as Cowper has beautifully observed, "is but a name for an effect, whose cause is God:" and the uniform routine of circumstances in animal and vegetable life, in creation, &c. which we daily see, or experience, and on which we may always calculate, does not proceed from any innate principle of life and motion in the inert masses of which the visible universe is composed, but from the immediate and continued agency of that Omnipotence which first created them, and appointed the laws that now govern them. The various results of this will of Omnipotence may, in one sense, as they are more than human power could effect, be called constant but unregarded miracles; while the deviations from the uniform results thus commanded are only unusual, and therefore more regarded miracles. In both instances, the same active superintendence of an invisible agent is always discoverable. He who ordained the regularity of the universe, and appointed the powers and properties of its beings, can suspend the ordinary laws which govern this lower world. The credibility of the one class of uniform miracles depends upon the testimony of the senses and daily observation: the credibility of the unusual miracles depends upon the evidence of the senses of those who behold them. If the miracles which at present are daily exhibited were from this moment to cease, and another uniform course of events were to demonstrate in another manner the power of God, then, indeed, the experience of one generation would be contrary to the testimony of that which preceded it; but this experience would not falsify the testimony of the former generation. So, also, we are no longer witnesses of the unusual miracles of God, yet we should act very irrationally to reject them, and to disbelieve them on that account, since they are transmitted to us by the concurrent testimony of the then existing generation of credible and unprejudiced witnesses.

The Jews, as well as others who believe in the authenticity of the Old Testament, and receive it as a divine revelation, declare their conviction of the certainty that the public miracles recorded therein are true, principally for the six following reasons:—

1. The object of the miracles was worthy of its Divine Author.
2. They were publicly performed.
3. They were submitted to the senses in such a manner that men might judge of their truth.
4. They were independent of second causes.
5. Public monuments were set up and outward actions performed to commemorate them.
6. And this was done at the very time when the events took place, and continued afterwards without interruption.

The miracles of Moses, of Elias, and others, recorded in the Old Testament, may be divided into those of a private and public nature; each of which are to be received on different grounds according to the object proposed. The public miracles were designed to impress a whole tribe, or nation, or large body of men, with the conviction of a truth, or to confirm them in the profession of the true faith, in the days of indifference, apostacy, and idolatry: those of a more private nature were designed to convince individuals, or smaller bodies of men, of the same truths; by relieving human wants, or sufferings, by raising the dead, or in some cases by inflicting punishment, thereby demonstrating the divine mission of the prophet, and the importance and truth of all that he was appointed to teach.

1. Do the Jews believe in the miracles which were wrought by Moses to deliver the Israelites from Egyptian slavery, because it was an object worthy of the Divine Being to save his people at the time when the prediction of his servant had announced their release? How much more worthy of the divine goodness was that greater deliverance of the descendants of the same Israelites from a worse bondage than that of Egypt,—from the captivity of sin and death!

2. Were the miracles of Moses, which effected this deliverance, publicly performed? Was darkness brought upon the land? Were the fruits of the ground destroyed? Was the river changed into blood, and was the Red Sea opened for their rescue? And were all these things publicly and instantaneously performed? Equally wonderful was the darkness at the crucifixion of Christ; the feeding of a multitude with seven loaves and a few small fishes; and, above all these, the public resurrection of the dead to life.

3. Could the senses of the people perceive and know the miracles of Moses and of Elias? So the miracles of Christ appeal to the scrutinizing examination of the multitudes who witnessed them.

4. Were the accumulations of the waves of the sea, as the gathering waters on each side of the passing Israelites rose in heaps, instead of smoothly proceeding on their course, evidently independent of second causes? So was the miracle of Christ, when he rose from his slumber in the endangered vessel, at the entreaties of his terrified disciples, to rebuke the raging of the winds, and the roaring of the sea, and command the elements to subside into a calm. What human power could have enabled Moses to divide the sea, or Joshua to roll back the tide of Jordan, or Elijah to part the river, and go through dry shod, or Christ to walk himself, and to enable Peter to walk, on the bosom of the deep? They were the manifestations of the providence of the same God watchful over the same people.

5. Were public monuments set up, or outward actions performed, to celebrate the miracles that delivered Israel from Egypt? Was the Passover appointed as a lasting memorial? Equally is it demonstrable that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was ordained as a continual remembrance of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and likewise the Christian Sabbath for a testimony of his resurrection: and, to come to the sixth criterion of public miracles, if the Passover was instituted at the time when the Exodus took place, to be continued from that day to the time of the true Paschal Lamb, we also, who glory in the name of Christians, can demonstrate, by the most indisputable authority, that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was instituted but a few hours before the death of our beloved Master, and has ever, from that period, been commemorated by his followers in remembrance of his precious death.

Let us refer also to other circumstances, and compare the character of the witnesses who have testified the truth of these miracles under the separate dispensations. The most decided impugner of the truths of Christianity, who receives the Old Testament, will be satisfied with the evidence in favor of our sacred faith. In whatever point of view we consider these witnesses, we shall find them distinguished by the same characteristics. Their motive, circumstances, and conduct, wonderfully correspond. It appears graciously designed by Jehovah, that the whole system of Revelation should be established on the same evidence—that if one was worthy of faith and acceptance, the other was equally so.

Was Moses, the legislator of his people, appointing for their government a new code of laws? So also was Christ the great Lawgiver of his people. If Amos was an ignorant and obscure man, “neither a prophet, nor a prophet's son,” but a herdsman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit, it cannot be necessary to show that the majority of the Twelve Apostles were equally unlearned, and so much without pretension, that when the high priests desired to repress the incipient dawning of Christianity, they permitted them to remain at Jerusalem, as too inferior, both in rank and attainments, to excite either apprehension or suspicion. If the testimonies of Isaiah and Amos be received, and thereby, as a necessary consequence, demonstrate the divine origin of the Old Testament, what reason can be assigned why St. John and St. Paul, and the Apostles, should not be equally regarded as credible witnesses to the truth of Christianity?

Was Moses brought before Pharaoh, or Daniel before Darius, or the three children before Nebuchadnezzar, to appeal by the miracles that evidenced the superiority of Jehovah, to all the wise, and learned, and noble of their own day, and to confirm the truth of their religion for ever? So was Christ brought before Herod, before the Roman governor, and the assembly of the priests, who had heard of his mighty deeds. It was in the presence of the rulers of the people, that Christ raised the dead, and healed the sick, and created new limbs to the maimed; while they, hating his doctrine, were keenly and maliciously intent upon all his actions, to denounce him as an enthusiast, or to prove him an impostor. St. Paul struck the sorcerer with blindness at the tribunal of Paulus; and St. Peter restored the lame man, who was known to all the heads of the priests, and the rulers of Israel.

Did Moses work his miracles in that place where detection would have been the most easy? So did Christ, when he multiplied bread in the wilderness, which produced only roots and herbs, the scanty provision of nature. Did the ancient Prophets so entirely and unanimously agree with each other, that no contradiction whatever is to be found between them? So neither can any variation of doctrine be discovered between the testimonies of the Evangelists, and the writers of the Epistles. Was Isaiah tortured with the saw, and Jeremiah cast into prison? So also were the apostles and first martyrs crucified, stoned, imprisoned, or otherwise persecuted. If we believe, therefore, the writers of the Old Testament, the same laws of reasoning and judgment require that we should give equal credence to those of the New Testament. Of both it may be justly asked,

* * * * * *

“Why should men of various age and parts
Weave such agreeing truths, or how or why Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie—
Unasked their pains, unheeded their advice, Starving their gains, and Martyrdom their

The writers of the New Testament, like the writers of the Old, express themselves with the artless simplicity of truth; no real contradiction exists between them; their deviation is only an additional testimony in their favor, as it proves there could have been no intended deception, where was no premeditated scheme, not even the reconciliation of apparent differences.

If the representation of this agreement between the writers of the Old and New Testaments be not satisfactory to the Jewish reader, let him further consider the singular contrast between his past and present condition.

Unless the Messiah has really come, and the Jews have despised and crucified him, as we assert, by what means can they reconcile to themselves the fearful change that has taken place in their circumstances? Let them tell the Christian, for what reason it is, that the sons of Abraham, so long the peculiarly favored children of God, who were honored with miracles, admonished by prophets, directed by visions, and visited by angels, should, for so long a period, be permitted to wander over the whole world, a by-word, and the very scorn of all nations, without a king, a temple, or a prophet? When their proud and noble city was destroyed, idolatry had long ceased. They were zealous for the letter of the Law—they venerated even the characters in which it was written, and the parchment on which it was inscribed. The gods of the Gentiles were abhorred. They ventured even to encounter the hatred of the merciless Caligula, rather than admit an image into their sacred temple. Jehovah was the God they worshipped with an enthusiastic adherence to the minutiae of their difficult and burdensome ritual. The most embarrassing of their appointed ordinances was their pride and boast. Wherefore, then, has God forgotten to be gracious? They have endured, and suffered, and hoped, and prayed for mercy, for centuries; they have called upon the Jehovah who from the beginning promised them a Messiah—yet no prophet has appeared—no miracle has been wrought in their favor. Since the destruction of their beloved Jerusalem, which took place forty years after the crucifixion of their Redeemer, they have been scattered over the face of the whole earth, an astonishment, and a proverb among all nations (Deut. xxviii. 37.) by the command of an overruling Providence, an undeniable evidence of the fulfilment of prophecy, in their own blindness of heart, and of the truth of Christianity. Can any cause whatever be assigned for this standing miracle, this wonderful dispersion, so long and faithfully predicted by their great lawgiver (Deut. xxviii. 64–68.) than that which is given by inspiration itself? “He came to his own, and his own received him not;” and they remain, as Moses foretold they should remain, “a sign and a wonder,” till the day in which they shall say, “Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.”

Limboreh’s Amica Collatio cum crud. Jud. 4to. p. 172, where this learned writer shows that the divine mission of Christ is less dubious than that of Moses. “Quæro nunc: Si de alterutrius mirabilibus factis dubitari a quoquam possit, in quem magis alienijus artis, quare non prorsus veras nec tantas ignaro populo persuasit, cadere possit suspicio; an in virum doctum, aulicum, potentem, liberatorem populi e durâ servitute, et omnia pro nutu suo moderantem; an in paupereulum, contemptum, doctoribus populi invisum, magistratui exosum, et omni humanâ ope, ac favore destitutum? Non solum ea in auctoribus et utriusque religionis fundatoribus est differentia; sed in ipso populo, qui hæc accepit, et posteris tradidit. Tempore enim Mosis, populus diuturnâ et durissimâ servitute fractus non poterat non esse rudis, et ignarus valde, et, uti est oppressæ plebis animus, paratior ad quævis magnifica de liberatoribus suis credenda, et de iis posteris suis majora tradenda; quam ii, qui jam libertati assueti, patriis institutis imbuti, legi, quam divinam habebant, addicti, nullo magno beneficio ab hoc suo Messia in præsentem hanc vitâ affecti, nullo mundano splendore, vel felicitate moti, et diversa plane expectantes; quibus igitur nihil aliud nisi rerum ipsarum claritas argumento esse posset, ut vel ipsi crederent, vel alii pro veris narrarent.” This is admirably done. The whole work abounds with eloquence, as well as sound argument. Leslie, in his Preface, acknowledges his obligations to Limboreh, and confesses that his work was principally compiled from the Amica Collatio.

NOTE 12.—PART II.

A VERY curious but too forced and mystical an interpretation of this miracle is given by Lampe, in which he endeavours to show, that by the bridegroom is meant the governor of the Jewish Church—the bride is the Jewish Church itself—the marriage is the Christian Dispensation. The failing of the wine is the departure of the Spirit of God from the Jewish Church, which had begun to depart from the purity of the Law—the mother of our Lord is the heavenly Jerusalem, bringing into the liberty of the Gospel the children of the Jewish Church; but she is reproved for impatience, not knowing the times and seasons, or the hour which had not yet come. The water is changed into wine, that is, Prophecy and the Law are changed into the Gospel: with much more of the same kind. Lampe, vol. i. p. 518-520.

NOTE 13.—PART II.

THE expression, “not many days,” is used in Acts i. 5. In that passage it denotes ten days only, being the interval between the Ascension and the day of Pentecost.

NOTE 14.—PART II.

WE are informed by Josephus^u that a stranger was not allowed to pass into the holy place, that is, into the second court of the temple, where the Jews and circumcised proselytes, when not legally unclean, were admitted. The third court was without the sacred limits, and divided from the other by little pillars, or columns, with this inscription—Μὴ δεῖν ἀλλόφυλον ἐντὸς τῆς Ἁγίας παριέναι, and the reason is assigned, τὸ γὰρ δευτερόν τερρον Ἁγίον ἐκαλεῖτο. This part of the temple was intended for the Jews who were unclean, and the devout Gentiles, the Proselytes of the Gate. Although the Jews held the Gentiles in the greatest contempt, stigmatizing them with the opprobrious epithet of “dogs,” refusing all intercourse or familiarity with them, still we find them so inconsistent as to suffer them to carry on, even in the very precincts of their temple, in the courts appointed for the Gentiles, a traffic in oxen, sheep, and doves, which were required by the worshippers, for their sacrifices and purifications. In every age of the Jewish Church many Proselytes of the Gate united themselves to the congregation of Israel; but in consequence of the constant merchandise going on, which must be attributed to the negligence of the governors of the temple, the devout Gentiles were at all times disturbed in their devotions; and at the greater festivals must have been nearly or altogether excluded from the place of worship. It was worthy then of the Messiah to commence his public ministry by cleansing the temple, by driving from it the profane and worldly; an action by which he declared himself at once the Lord of the temple, and the protector of all those from among the mass of mankind, who sought him in the way he had appointed. It was impossible that the composure of spirit, and serenity of mind, which are necessary to the duty of prayer^x, could have been preserved among the loud talking and disputing of buyers and sellers, the jingling of money, the lowing of oxen, and the bleating of sheep. Yet it was among these only that the Gentile worshippers could find admission. Our Lord's motive, in the second instance, for thus cleansing the temple, is given by St. Mark, xi. 17., which passage, says the learned Mede, ought to be translated—“My house shall be called a house of prayer to, or for all nations” —παῖσι τοῖς ἔθνεσι^y. Though the Jewish Dispensation was not yet completed, the dawning of the New Dispensation had begun. It is in the plans of Providence as it is in the works of creation. The God of nature is the God of revelation. As in nature the seasons so beautifully and so gradually blend with each other, as the closing day insensibly changes into night, or the darkness of the night slowly gives place to the dawn of the morning, and the splendors of the rising sun, so do the various dispensations of an overruling and wise Providence gradually and slowly accomplish his own prophecies, appealing to our reason, as the visible creation appeals to our senses. This action of our Lord was a visible and open manifestation of his claim to the character of the Messiah^z; and it was the most significant proof that the temple of Jerusalem must be purified or overthrown, and that the Gentiles should be admitted into the Church of God his Father.

^x That great master of our noble language, Jeremy Taylor, in his second Sermon on the return of prayers, has this beautiful passage:—“Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest. Prayer is the issue of a quiet mind and untroubled thoughts; it is the daughter of charity—it is the sister of meekness; and he that prays to God with a troubled and discomposed spirit is like to him that retires into a battle to meditate, or chooses a frontier garrison to indulge in contemplation.”—Taylor's Discourses, &c. vol. i. p. 88. NOTE 15.—PART II.

THIS final address of the Baptist cannot be understood unless we keep in view a peculiar custom which prevailed among the Jews. At every wedding two persons were selected, who devoted themselves for some time to the service of the bride and bridegroom. The offices assigned to the paranymp, or שושבין were numerous and important; and on account of these, the Baptist compares himself to the friend of the bridegroom. The offices of the paranymp were threefold—before—at—and after the marriage. Before the marriage of his friend it was his duty to select a chaste virgin, and to be the medium of communication between the parties, till the day of marriage. At that time he continued with them during the seven days allotted for the wedding festival, rejoicing in the happiness of his friend, and contributing as much as possible to the hilarity of the occasion. After the marriage, the paranymp was considered as the patron and friend of the wife and her husband, and was called in to compose any differences that might take place between them. As the forerunner of Christ, the Baptist may be well compared to the paranymp of the Jewish marriages.

One of the most usual comparisons adopted in Scripture to describe the union between Christ and his Church is that of a marriage. The Baptist was the paranymp^a, who, by the preaching of repentance and faith, presented the Church as a youthful bride and a chaste virgin to Christ. He still continued with the bridegroom, till the wedding was furnished with guests. His joy was fulfilled when his own followers came to inform him that Christ was increasing the number of his disciples, and that all men came unto him. This intelligence was as the sound of the bridegroom's voice, and as the pledge that the nuptials of heaven and earth were completed.

From this representation of John, as the paranymp; of Christ as the bridegroom; and the Church as the bride; the ministers and stewards of the Gospel of God may learn, that they also are required, by the preaching of repentance and faith, to present their hearers in all purity to the Head of the Christian Church.

^b “Applicatio totius rei est facillima. Christus est sponsus, Ecclesia sponsa. Ministri Ecclesiæ est adductus, qui in eo elaborant, ut Christo virginem puram et illibatam adducant, huc omnis eorum labor tendit, hæc re gaudent.”—Schoetgen. Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. i. p. 340.

It is for them to find their best source of joy in the blessing of the Most High on their labors—their purest happiness in the improvement and perfecting of the Church confided to their care^b.

Smaller circumstances and coincidences sometimes demonstrate the truth of an assertion, or the authenticity of a book, more effectually than more important facts. May not one of those unimportant yet convincing coincidences be observed in this passage? The Baptist calls himself the friend of the bridegroom, without alluding to any other paranymp, or שושבין. As the Jews were accustomed to have two paranymps, there seems, at first sight, to be something defective in the Baptist's comparison. But our Lord was of Galilee, and there the custom was different from that of any other part of Palestine. The Galileans had one paranymp only^c.

NOTE 16.—PART II.

THE expression, “this my joy is fulfilled,” ἡ χαρὰ ἡ ἐμὴ πεπλήρωται, corresponds with the Hebrew expression שמחה שלימה, a phrase which is used by the rabbinical writers to express even the happiness of heaven; and which most powerfully delineates therefore the joy and rapture which the Baptist felt, and which a Christian minister ought to experience, when he perceives that his labors in the vineyard are attended with success. Schoetgen gives several instances of this application of the phrase. Sohar Chadasch. fol. 42. 2. “Quidnam agunt animæ piorum in cælo? Resp. Operam dant laudi divinæ. אשתלימת. כרין חרור קמן et tunc gaudium coram te est perfectum.”

Ibidem, fol. 49. 4. “Et Deus S. B. gaudebit cum justis בחרור בשלומן gaudio perfecto.”

Siphra, fol. 188. 4. “Quamvis homo in hoc mundo gaudeat, gaudium tamen ejus non est perfectum. Verum seculo futuro Deus S. B. deglutiet mortem in æternum אורה השמחה תהיה אורה שלימה illud gaudium demum erit perfectum, q. d. Psalm cxxvi. 2. Tunc os nostrum risu, et lingua cantu implebitur.”

^c Ketuvoth, fol. 12. 1. “Olim in Judæa duos שושבין constituebant, unum sponso, alterum sponse, ut illis ministrarent, quando in Chuppam ingrediuntur; sed in Galilæa tale quid observatum non est.”—Schoetgen. Hor. Hebr. vol. i. p. 337. Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 605. I have not entered minutely into all the circumstances of the comparison of the Baptist to the paranymp. They may be found at great length in Lampe, Comment. Evang. sec. Johan. vol. i. p. 672. Hammond in loc., Lightfoot's Harmony, and Schoetgen. vol. i. p. 335, &c. Dr. Adam Clarke has given a copious abridgment of Schoetgen's remarks. Dr. Gill (in loc.) has inserted a curious tradition, that Moses was the paranymp to present the Jewish Church to God.

NOTE 17.—PART II.

THESE words allude to the opinion entertained by the Jews that the Holy Spirit was given in measure only to the prophets. Vaikra Rabba, sect. 15. fol. 158. 2. Dixit R. Acha, אפילו רוח הקדש אינו שורה על הנביאים אלא: etiam Spiritus S. non habitavit super prophetas, nisi mensurá quâdam.

NOTE 18.—PART II.

LIGHTFOOT inserts the imprisonment of John immediately after the delivery of his decisive testimony to the divine mission and Messiahship of our Lord. He is followed in this order by Newcome, Michaelis, and Doddridge; and on these united authorities I have inserted this event in its proper place. Lightfoot has so arranged it, because no other speech of the Baptist is recorded respecting Christ; and the Evangelists are unanimous in relating that our Saviour's journey into Galilee (the next thing they all mention) did not occur till after the imprisonment of John. Pilkington has made another disposition of the events already related, and places the imprisonment of John after the temptation and baptism, which he supposes did not take place till after our Lord's first visit to Jerusalem. It is not however necessary to discuss his arguments, as the date assigned by him, and Whiston, to our Lord's baptism, has been already considered.

NOTE 19.—PART II.

THIS account of the Baptist is confirmed by Josephus, who has related at length the history of this incestuous marriage between Herod the tetrarch, and Herodias, the wife of his brother Herod Philip. The tetrarch had married the daughter of Aretas, a petty king of Arabia Petræa. Some time after, however, when he was at Rome, lodging in the house of Herod Philip, he became enamoured of Herodias, and persuaded her to marry him, promising on her consent that he would divorce his present wife. Josephus takes care to conceal that John was imprisoned on account of his reproving the tetrarch's conduct, and represents Herod as proceeding upon more general grounds. He describes John as a good man, who persuaded the Jews to moral and virtuous living, to justice towards each other, devotion towards God, and to become united by baptism; and as he had many followers, who were entirely devoted to him, the tetrarch deemed it advisable to seize and imprison him, before any revolt or insurrection should actually begin. On this account he ordered him to be apprehended, and sent as a prisoner to the castle of Mechærus, where he was afterwards killed. Soon after this event, Josephus adds, Herod's army was defeated and destroyed by Aretas, and the Jews considered the tetrarch's loss and defeat as a punishment from God for the murder of John the Baptist.

It is possible there may be no real difference between the Evangelist and Josephus. The former relates the real cause of the Baptist's imprisonment, as part of the secret history of the court of Herod; the latter gives the public and ostensible reason. It is indeed a common mistake among historians to impute great effects to proportionate causes: the most important events in history have arisen, and do arise, more frequently from the caprice, resentment, or other private motives of individuals, than from any well-planned, or long-intended system of political conduct^d.

Laing is of opinion that John was imprisoned twice by order of Herod. The arguments by which this opinion may be supported appear to have been so ably combated by Archbishop Newcome, that it is only necessary to refer the reader to his Harmony, p. 10. of the notes.

It has been objected that the name of the brother of Herod the tetrarch was not Philip, but Herod. Griesbach (Luke iii. 19.) has omitted the word in the text, but placed Φιλλίπου in the margin. The discrepancy is easily obviated by the supposition that Philip assumed the name of Herod to distinguish his family and descent.

^d See Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 591, 592. and Josephus, Antiq. lib. 18. cap. 7.

PART III.

NOTE 1.—PART III.

THE order of events hitherto adopted in this arrangement has been nearly the same as that proposed by the five principal harmonizers, by whose authority, as well as by an examination of the internal evidence, I have been principally influenced. With this part the more difficult task arises of reconciling the clashing authorities of commentators, and assigning satisfactory reasons for the place of every fact recorded. The present section gives an account of the commencement of the more public ministry of our Lord, after the imprisonment of John. That this is the proper place for the insertion of that event may be proved by comparing John iii. 24. with Matt. iv. 12. and Mark i. 14. These passages are considered by all harmonists, as sufficiently demonstrating that Christ did not begin to preach till after the imprisonment of John; and it is worthy of remark, that our blessed Lord begins his ministry with the same words as his appointed forerunner (whose divine commission he thereby established), calling on all men to repent and to believe. Compare Mark i. 15. and Matt. iv. 17. I have inserted with Pilkington, in this section, many of the parallel passages, to render the preface to the narrative of our Lord's public ministry more complete and satisfactory.

The more public ministry of our Lord may be properly said to commence with his preaching in Galilee. Though at his inauguration into his office at his baptism, and yet further by his driving the buyers and sellers from the temple, he had manifested himself to the people, he does not appear to have assumed the public office of preaching and instructing the people, till John was cast into prison. The reason of this ordering of events seems to have been, that undivided attention might be now paid to the ministry of our Lord. The fame of the Baptist had gone through the country, preparing the way of the Lord; his preaching was known to all; and all held John as a prophet. The time was fulfilled when a greater Prophet than John the Baptist was to begin his ministration. The expectation of the people had been excited to the utmost by the declarations of the Baptist; and, at the moment when the glory of the Messiah was anticipated, according to the sublime, though confused and imperfect notions of the Jews, there appears among them the Being whom John had declared to be from above. He establishes no temporal kingdom, but he heals the sick, calms the ocean, raises the dead, demonstrates his connexion with, and knowledge of, an invisible world; and instructs his hearers in other ideas of the kingdom of God, than they had hitherto entertained. Through a great part of this period, the Baptist, though in prison, was still alive, a faithful witness of his own prophecy—"He must increase, but I must decrease." The beams of his setting sun still reflected their last lustre on the Stone which was now becoming the mountain to fill the whole earth.

NOTE 2.—PART III.

IDOLATRY was introduced into the tribe of Dan, which in after ages was called Lower Galilee by Micah. The account is contained in the 18th chapter of Judges. The first who carried captive any part of the people of Israel was Benhadad, king of Syria, who subdued Sion, Dan, Abel-beth-Maachab, Cinneroth, and the land of Naphtali, all of which were included in Galilee. A heavier calamity was brought upon the same country by Tiglath-Pileser, who again took the same towns, when they had begun to recover their prosperity, and sent the inhabitants as captives to Assyria.

The account of the manner in which the tribe of Dan became possessed of part of the land of Palestine so far north as the most northern part of Galilee, is given in the 17th chapter of Judges. The town of Laish, afterwards called Dan, was situated on the north-west boundary of Naphtali, on the border of Syria^e.

Many of the Jewish traditions assert that Galilee was to be the place where the Messiah should first appear^f; but for the more complete statement of the reasons why Christ was to dwell in Galilee, and a critical discussion of Isa. ix. 1-3, &c. vide J. Mede's Works^g.

Isa. ii. 19. When he shall arise to smite terribly the earth is expounded in the book Zohar, as referring to the Messiah. When he shall arise, וַיִּתְגַּלֵּי בְּאַרְצָא דְּגַלִּיל, and shall be revealed in Galilee; and other instances are given in Schoetgen^h.

The country beyond Jordan was called Galilee, though properly Peræa, Matt. iv. 15.

Judas is called by Gamaliel, Judas of Galilee, yet Josephus calls him a Galilonite, of the city of Gamala.

Peræa, called Galilee, because Canaan was divided into four tetrarchies—Judæa, Samaria, Iturea, and Trachonitis; the remaining fourth was called Galilee, and included Peræa.

The great estates of Galilee are said to have feasted with Herod. But the palace of Herodium was in the extreme part of Peræa. It is not probable that the great men of Peræa would have been utterly excluded.

Joshua xxii. 11. refers to a place in Peræa, and Lightfoot supposes that the word "Galilee" was derived from the name of that placeⁱ, גלילות הירדן.

Moses had predicted that Zabulon and Issachar, which, with Naphtali, were the tribes originally settled in that tract of country, afterwards called Galilee, should call the people unto the mountain of the Lord's house, to offer sacrifices of righteousness, Deut. xxxiii. 19.—And Jacob had before predicted that Naphtali, the Galilean, should give goodly words, Gen. xlix. 21. Both evident predictions of the diffusal of the Gospel in both places^j.

NOTE 3.—PART III.

WHEN it is remembered that the traditions of the Jews referred to Galilee as the place where the Messiah should be revealed—and that the prophecy of Isaiah was thus fulfilled—it seemed impossible to point out a spot on the whole world, in which the ministry of the Messiah could commence with so much propriety as in Galilee of the Gentiles. This country was the first that had offended, and the first taken captive; and, through the mercy of God, it was the first to whom the words of pardon and reconciliation were offered. In the most minute circumstances, the beautiful harmony of the Divine Dispensations is every where most evident.

NOTE 4.—PART III.

THERE is a remarkable coincidence here in the three most memorable events which had occurred at Samaria. At this place the first Proselytes were admitted into the Church of Israel, Gen. xxxiv. 29. and xxxv. 2. It was here that Christ first announced himself to be the Messiah, John iv. 26.; and it was here also that the Gospel was first preached out of Jerusalem, after the ascension of Christ. Lightfoot also^k is of opinion, that in this address to the woman of Samaria, the prophecy of Hosea ii. 15. was accomplished—"I will give the valley of Achor for a door of hope." He endeavours to prove that the valley of Achor ran along by the city of Sichem, or Samaria. And thus when our Saviour first begins to preach to strangers, and to convert them, it is in this very valley; and so he makes it a door of hope, or of conversion, to the Gentiles.

Our Lord might have had another object in view in thus addressing himself to the woman of Samaria. By his own example, he taught his followers the propriety, or necessity, of breaking down the distinctions then existing between the Jews and the Samaritans; and by so doing, he gives them an evident proof of his superiority over the Jewish teachers, who encouraged the reciprocal enmity of the two nations. It may be observed here, that Samaria was the first city addressed after the Jews, when the persecution of the Church at Jerusalem had scattered the early converts. The extinction of national hatred and prejudice was a convincing proof to the nation of Israel, that a new era had commenced. Philip the deacon had converted the Samaritans, and Peter and John were sent down from Jerusalem to confirm their faith. It is not improbable that St. John recalled to their remembrance this first interview of our Lord, at the commencement of his ministry.

The silence of the three first Evangelists on this remarkable circumstance may be accounted for from a consideration of the peculiar circumstances of the Church and of Palestine, at the time when their Gospels were written. Each Gospel was written for one specific purpose, and addressed to one description of people. If St. Matthew had inserted it, the prejudices of the Jews, to whom he addressed his Gospel, would have been more highly excited against the new religion.

The Gospel of St. Mark, which with equal justice may be called the Gospel of St. Peter, was written for the use of the converted Proselytes, particularly those of Rome, who were but little interested in these national transactions; or, as is more probable, St. Mark omitted it, because St. Peter was not present, as he did not become the constant follower of Christ till a period subsequent to this conversation; and it is supposed that St. Mark has related those events only to which St. Peter was an eyewitness. St. Luke omitted it, for he wrote to the Gentiles of Achaia, who were likewise indifferent to the controversies which prevailed between the Jews and Samaritans. St. John had been sent down from Jerusalem by the Church in company with St. Peter, and, as his own historian, could not fail to mention this circumstance in all its minuteness^l.

NOTE 5.—PART III.

CHRIST did not himself baptize, because,—

1. It does not seem fit that he should have baptized in his own name.

2. The baptism of the Holy Ghost was more peculiarly his.

3. It was a more important office to preach than to baptize.

4. The early Christians valued themselves according to the eminence of the apostle or teacher who baptized them: his baptizing,

But, after the slaughter of the Shechemites, (xxxiv. 26.), he was forced to retire to Bethel, Bethlehem, and Hebron; at which time the Amorites forcibly obtained possession of his land, which he was compelled to recover at an after period by war, with his sword and bow.—Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 537.

NOTE 7.—PART III.

THE Jews had more favorable thoughts of the temple built by Onias in Egypt than of that built on Mount Gerizim. Their respective claims are about equal. The one was built by a fugitive priest, under the pretence that that mount was the mount on which the blessings had been pronounced; the other also (that of Onias) by a fugitive priest, under pretence of a divine prophecy, Isaiah xix. 19. "In that day shall there be an altar to the LORD in the midst of the land of Egypt."

The Samaritans well knew, that Jerusalem was the place appointed by God for his worship; but they may have defended their preference of Mount Gerizim, not only from its antiquity as the place of worship among their fathers, but because the Divine Presence over the ark, the ark itself, the cherubim, the Urim and Thummim, and the Spirit of prophecy, had all departed from the second temple at Jerusalem.—See Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 541.

NOTE 8.—PART III.

IN Bishop Horsley's beautiful illustration of this passage in his twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth sermons, he has not taken into consideration the circumstance related at some length by Lightfoot, and proved with his usual learning, that although the Samaritans received only as canonical books the Pentateuch of Moses, they held in great estimation the prophetic writings. Bishop Horsley's argument, therefore, that the Samaritan woman necessarily expected a Messiah from studying the books of Moses only, is not well founded. Bishop Blomfield, in his excellent Dissertation on the Tradi- tional Knowledge of a Redeemer (notes, p. 172, 3.), has likewise made the same observation.

The Samaritan woman, he observes, uses the word Messias, which does not occur in Moses. But as Moses had clearly predicted Him, whom the prophets called Messiah, the Samaritans did not hesitate to use the prophetic designation of that person whom Moses had foretold. From the words of the woman, Οἶδα ὅτι Μεσσίας ἔρχεται, Bishop Blomfield concludes that her countrymen were expecting the speedy advent of the Messiah. Christ was first called Messiah in the Song of Hannah.—Vide Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. p. 511; and Bp. Blomfield's Dissertation, note, p. 172-3.

NOTE 9.—PART III.

THIS passage has much divided the commentators. It is one of those texts upon which much depends with respect to the chronology of the life of Christ. Some suppose that the words imply, that in four months' time would be the harvest, which took place at the Passover. On which supposition many harmonists have added another Passover to our Lord's ministry. Lightfoot (vol. i. p. 603.) is of this opinion. Whitby supposes the phrase to be proverbial. We cannot certainly conclude from these words, whether our Lord alluded to the appearance of the people who might be then in numbers approaching him, or to the actual time of the year. The extreme weariness of our Saviour seems to favor more the supposition that the conversation with the woman of Samaria was held after the Passover, immediately before the corn was reaped, during the summer season, rather than in the depth of winter. Nor is it likely that the desolation of the scenery in winter would have recalled, by natural association, the beauties and the riches of the fields, when ripe and ready for the harvest. Our Lord, as Bishop Law has proved, in his Tract of the Life of Christ, and as Archbishop Newcome, Jortin, and many others have shown, drew his comparisons and illustrations very frequently and generally from surrounding objects.—Vide Benson's Chronology, &c. p. 247-9; Archbishop Newcome On our Lord's Conduct; Jortin's Six Discourses; Law's Life of Christ, &c.

NOTE 10.—PART III.

MICHAELIS does not appear to have given so much attention to his Harmony of the New Testament, as we might have required from one whose authority is so great. He observes, on the contents of this section, "In point of chro-nology this does not belong to the present place, not even according to St. Luke ; but I place it here, because St. Luke has introduced it immediately after the preceding history. Perhaps it belongs to No. 50, though I have not placed it there, because it does not exactly agree with the accounts quoted in that article from St. Matthew and St. Mark ;" that is, it is quite uncertain, in the opinion of Michaelis. I have followed the authority of Doddridge, Pilkington, Newcome, and Lightfoot, in placing it here ; and, independently of these authorities, the internal evidence is peculiarly decisive. Christ began his public ministry in his own country, and, after having traversed Judæa and Samaria, has arrived at the town where he was brought up, there to commence his teaching.

Michaelis, however, it must be in justice observed, expressly declares, that his Harmony of the Four Gospels must not be considered as a chronological table ; though Bishop Marsh is of opinion, from examining Michaelis's Arrangement, sect. 29-42, that he intended to arrange the facts in chronological order as far as he was able. See Marsh's notes to Michaelis, vol. iii. p. 67.

THE healing of the nobleman's son at Capernaum is placed after the conversation with the woman of Samaria, by all the harmonizers. After staying two days at Samaria, he departed into Galilee (John iv. 43.) Archbishop Newcome inserts those passages which I have placed as a preface to this chapter, after the account of the interview with the Samaritan woman. He is correct in this arrangement, as to the precise time in which the events occurred. I have, however, thought it advisable to place them before that event, as a preface to the general history of his ministry, which began after the imprisonment of the Baptist. It must, however, excite some surprise, that Archbishop Newcome has not himself adopted this order ; as he has expressed (Notes to the Harmony, p. 9.) the same opinion which has induced me to adopt this deviation. To use his own words : "Matt. iv. 17., and Mark i. 14, 15., refer to a more solemn and general teaching after John's imprisonment by Herod, and Jesus's departure into Galilee ; and to a teaching according to the tenor of particular words. Though in Judæa and Jerusalem, Jesus showed his divine knowledge, taught, made disciples, and ordered his followers to be initiated by baptism, wrought miracles, and, when he had purged the temple, intimated, among other important truths, that he was the Son of God ; yet still he might, with great wisdom, choose a more remote scene for preaching publicly and plainly the completion of the time for the approach of God's kingdom, and repentance followed by belief in the Gospel." He might have added, that his first declaration of his Messiahship to the woman of Samaria, in his way to Galilee, may be considered as a kind of prelude to his more solemn teaching ; and, as it happened on his way to Galilee, the detached verses which so briefly relate the ministry in Galilee may very properly be prefixed to the account of that ministry.

On consulting the map of Galilee, it will be seen that our Lord's direct road from Samaria to Cana in Galilee would be through Nazareth. He is supposed, however, by Archbishop Newcome, to have gone by another route, in order to avoid that city for the present, that he might work his first public miracle at the same place where he had primarily manifested himself to the people. He then proceeds, as in the next section, to Nazareth, thence to Capernaum, where he continued for some time, teaching in their synagogues. He calls four disciples, cures a demoniac, and Peter's wife's mother. He then proceeds throughout Galilee, heals a leper and a paralytic, calls St. Matthew, and goes up to Jerusalem to a feast, most probably not a Passover.

Archbishop Newcome supposes the distance between Sichem, the capital of Samaria, and Cana, in Galilee, to be forty miles ; between Cana and Nazareth, ten ; between Nazareth and Capernaum, twenty-three ; between Capernaum and Jerusalem, sixty-five.

It is a very probable supposition of Lightfoot, that the word rendered in our translation "a certain nobleman" (τις βασιλικὸς), but which ought rather to be translated with the Syriac, עבד מלכא, "one of the king's servants," denoted one of those who took part with Herod the Great, and who was now a follower of his son, Herod the tetrarch. Lightfoot supposes that the preaching of John the Baptist had produced some effect at the court of Herod, and that many of the courtiers were consequently acquainted with the mission of our Lord ; and that the nobleman who now sent to Christ, that his son might be healed, was Manaen (Acts xiii. 1.), who had been brought up with Herod ; or Chuza (Luke viii. 3.), Herod's steward, both of whom were among the earliest converts.

This miracle was greater than the first which had taken place at Cana, and demonstrated a higher degree of power. Our Lord by it showed that he possessed a power superior to that which had been claimed or exercised by any merely human prophet, or teacher sent from God. It is true that the degree of supernatural agency seems to be equal in one miracle to that of another ; but in this instance the divine attribute of ubiquity was evidently manifested. Capernaum was distant from Cana about twenty-five miles.

NOTE 12.—PART III.

THIS visit to Nazareth was certainly different from that mentioned below. It was before our Saviour went to Capernaum, Luke iv. 16–31. Matt. iv. 13. The other took place after the recovery of Jairus's daughter, when he left that city. Compare Mark vi. 1. καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἐκεῖθεν, i. e. from Capernaum, with Matt. iv. 13. Luke iv. 31.

NOTE 13.—PART III.

LIGHTFOOT supposes the words, “as his custom was,” refer to the usual attendance of our Lord on the public service, when our Lord lived at Nazareth as a private individual. He now enters the synagogue as an acknowledged Prophet, and, as a member of it, joins in the service and reads publicly there, which only members were allowed to do. Hence we find that this is the only place on record where our Saviour read publicly, although he preached in every synagogue where he came. It is not to be supposed that the public worship at that time was less corrupt than ours of the present period—nor that the conduct of the Jewish teachers was irreproachable; we have, indeed, a lamentable instance to the contrary, v. 29.; yet we find that our blessed Saviour did not separate himself, as too many have since done, and continue to do, on this account, from the appointed public worship, although there was much to be condemned in it.

Our Lord's example also sanctions to us the use in all Churches of forms of prayer, or Liturgies, and the public reading of the Scriptures. Christ complied with human forms, and joined in liturgical services:—are we wrong in following the example of our blessed Redeemer?

NOTE 14.—PART III.

IT may be asked here, by what authority Christ was permitted to teach and preach in the synagogue? The tribe of Levi alone possessed the priesthood, attended the service of the temple, and was appointed to teach the people, as well as to superintend the schools or universities in their forty-eight cities, Josh. xxi. Deut. xxxiii. 10. Malachi ii. 7. Yet it sometimes happened that men of other tribes studied the Law, and became preachers, as well as the priests and Levites. They were ordained, when qualified, by the Sanhedrin to that office, they were ordained to some particular employment in the public administration, and they might not go beyond the power they had received, or intrude upon the ministry of another. The Jews also had a law, that if any man came in the spirit of a prophet, and assumed the office of a teacher on that ground, he was always permitted to preach; but the Sanhedrin was constituted the judge of his pretensions; and he who was declared by them to be no prophet, and yet continued to preach, did so at his peril. It was probably on this claim in the manner and office of a prophet, that our Saviour obtained permission to address the people of Nazareth. Vide Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 614.

NOTE 15.—PART III.

IT was the custom among the Jews to divide the Law into fifty-two or fifty-four portions for every Sunday in the year. When this was prohibited by Antiochus, a similar distribution of the prophets was substituted. The passage from Isaiah, read by our Lord, is the part of the Sacred Writings appointed to be used about the end of August; and Macknight, with other harmonists, has therefore concluded that this circumstance fixes the date of the event recorded^m.

The prophetic books were divided into five parts, to correspond with the five divisions of the Law. We may consider Genesis as corresponding with Isaiah—Exodus with Jeremiah—Leviticus with Ezekiel, &c.: the twelve minor prophets were held as one volume, or quintane.

It is of little consequence whether the portion of Scripture our Saviour fixed upon was or was not the proper lesson of the day; for, in reading of the prophets, it was customary for קריטר, or reader, to turn from passage to passage, for the better illustration of his subject; and in the twelve minor prophets he was permitted to refer from one to another—but, in all probability (see v. 20.), Christ was standing up as a member of the synagogue, appointed by the minister of the congregation, the reader of the prophets, or the second lesson of that day, according to an established custom. On these occasions the minister called the reader out, and delivered to him the Book of the Prophets; he himself standing at the desk with an interpreter at his side, to render into Syriac all that was read. “When Christ had finished, he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister,” v. 20. He did all these things according to the established order of the Jewish Churchⁿ.

It is to be remarked here, that our Saviour closed the book before he came to that part of the prophecy where he is represented as declaring the day of vengeance. This applied to events of a subsequent date: whereas he con-finer himself to those words only, which the Jews referred more immediately to the Messiah, and applying them to himself, openly declared, in the presence of all his early acquaintances, that he who had so long lived among them as their equal and their companion, was the predicted Messiah, the expected Saviour of the Jewish nation. He asserts, that his public ministry had begun; that the Spirit of the Lord had descended upon him to preach the Gospel to the meek and to the humble, עניי; to heal the broken-hearted; to preach deliverance to the captives, whether Jew or Gentile; the recovering of sight, or opening the eyes of the blind^o and idolatrous Gentiles. So far this prediction was taken from Isaiah lxi. 1, 2.; but the remainder is to be found in Isaiah xlii. 7. The first verse of Isaiah lxi. ends with the words לאכזרי פקדון, "to those which are bound the opening of the prison." The verse inserted from Isaiah xlii. 7. begins with the last word of the verse, and seems quoted by our Lord either from association of ideas, or by actual reference to the passage, לפקד עני, &c., "to open the blind eyes." This solution of the difficulty, which is agreeable to the established custom of the synagogue, which allowed the privilege of illustration from another passage of the same prophet, appears much preferable to that of Michaelis^p.

Having thus asserted himself to be the Messiah, our Lord observed the wonder and astonishment excited by his words; and, knowing the prejudices he had to overcome, as well as the inveterate obstinacy of his hearers, he declined giving them any other proof of his divine mission than that which had been already offered them, at the town of Capernaum.

We have here an account of our Saviour's preaching for the first time in his own city of Nazareth. He asserts himself to be the Messiah; he then declines working a miracle, though he had done so elsewhere. What was the cause of this refusal?

Our Lord's conduct on this occasion appears to me to afford one of the most powerful evidences of the truth of his lofty claims, and a most striking instance of that part of the plan of the divine government, which denies to man more evidences in support of any truth than are sufficient to satisfy an unbiased mind. As the commentators have not alluded to this idea, I give it with diffidence; but to me it appears satisfactory. Our Lord had lived at Nazareth nearly thirty years. At the end of that time, he commenced his office with supernatural evidences that his mission was from above. He worked miracles, to demonstrate this truth, in places where he was less known than at Nazareth, and between which and the latter city there must have been a constant communication. The people of Nazareth had known him from infancy, pure, holy, and undefiled; a man like other men, sin only excepted. They had heard of his miracles; they knew, from the testimony of others, that he had given undeniable proofs of his power; and he now came among them to announce himself as their Messiah, appealing to them by the purity and holiness of his life, and by applying to himself, and fulfilling in his own person, the predictions of their prophets. He asserted himself to be the Messiah, and required them to believe, on account of their previous knowledge of his motives, life, and conduct, and by the power they acknowledged he possessed of working miracles. Nothing can more strongly demonstrate the unimpeached and unimpeachable holiness of the Son of God, than his thus presenting himself to the attention of his envious and jealous townsmen; and by boldly asserting his Messiahship, challenging them to accuse him of sin, or of any evil, which might derogate from the necessary and entire superiority implied in his holy and lofty claim.

NOTE 16.—PART III.

THAT the Jews applied this passage, Isaiah lxi. 1. and 42. to the Messiah, see the quotations in Whitby in loc., Schoetgen, vol. ii. p. 68 and p. 192, where Kimchi is quoted, as referring the words to the Messiah; also p. 3, &c., where, in the chapter De Nominibus Messiae, the subject is fully discussed^q. The Greek original of this passage hints at the reason for which our Lord was called Christ, and his doctrine the Gospel, ἐλεηκεν EXPISEME EYALTEAIZEΣΘΑΙ πτωχοῖς &c.

NOTE 17.—PART III.

DAN. HEINSIUS in loc. in his Exercitationes Sacrae, a book of great learning, now too much neglected, has made an Iambic line of this proverb:—

Θεράπευσον ὃ λαὸν ἐγὼ σκεῖν θέλω.

Lightfoot has rendered it in the Jerusalem language אסי אסי יר, and quotes the original proverb from Bereschith Rabba, sect. 23. and Tanchuma, fol. 4. 2. אסי אסי יר הגר. — Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. p. 408.

Dr. Gill in loc. quotes another of the same kind from Zohar in Exod. fol. 31. 2. ניל אסי נפשי.

NOTE 18.—PART III.

OUR Lord's conduct in selecting this topic is worthy of our particular consideration. In the very first address which he made to his fellow-townsmen, and through them to the whole of the Jewish people, he preached the deliverance of the Gentiles from their bondage and darkness. This doctrine was for some time inexplicable, and, when understood, intolerable to his own disciples: but Christ was the Divine Being who was to redeem all his creatures, and we are assured, "Known unto God are all his ways, from the beginning to the end;" and Christ, at the commencement of his ministry, declared at once the whole design of his coming; as Elias was sent to the widow of Sarepta, in preference to those of Israel, and as Naaman the Syrian was the only leper healed in the days of Eliseus the prophet, so was Christ, a greater than these, commissioned to heal the diseases of those people and those nations who should believe on him. The transaction here recorded affords us a sufficient explanation of the motives of one part of our Lord's conduct, which has sometimes been considered as inexplicable. He is represented as not informing the people, in various instances, of the full extent of his claims; as not calling himself the Messiah; as charging those who were healed "to tell no man;" as keeping back from the people, and even from the Apostles, many things which they were desirous to learn. The necessity and wisdom of this caution are here made evident. On this occasion, when he declared himself to be the Messiah, we see the service of the synagogue was hastily and indecently terminated by the fury of the people, who became intent upon the destruction of their teacher. His ministry would have been repeatedly disturbed by similar interruptions, if our Lord had not adopted this conduct. In what manner Christ delivered himself from the fury of his enraged persecutors, we know not. Whether they were overawed by some supernatural glory, or whether they were paralyzed by a sudden exertion of almighty power, we are not informed. The brevity of the account given us by the Evangelist, like the teaching of our Lord himself, only reveals to us what is essential to faith and salvation: it never satisfies a useless curiosity.

NOTE 19.—PART III.

THE wisdom of our Lord's choice of Capernaum (after he had left Nazareth) as his fixed place of residence, is evident on many accounts. He placed himself by so doing under the protection of the nobleman whose son had been healed, John iv. 46., and whose presence was an undeniable testimony to his almighty power. Capernaum, from its situation, being surrounded with numerous and populous towns and villages, on the border of the sea of Galilee, or the lake of Tiberias, enabled him to remove with the utmost facility either by sea or land; either for the purpose of instruction, or to avoid the persecutions, the importunities, or the efforts of his adherents, to make him their king. It was here also he again met his first disciples, who, for some reason unknown to us, had resumed their former occupation. It is not improbable that they had been directed by our Lord to leave him after the miracle of Cana in Galilee. He did not require their presence at Nazareth, as he had not purposed to work miracles at that place. By dwelling at Capernaum he still continued to fulfil the prophecy of Isaiah ix. 1, &c., as that city was situated in the tribe of Naphtali.

That our Lord came to Capernaum after he left Nazareth is expressly asserted by St. Luke, chap. iv. 30, 31. The order of this section is the same with all the harmonists.

NOTE 20.—PART III.

THIS event is inserted here on the united authorities of Lightfoot, Newcome, Doddridge, and Dr. Townson, who refers also to Grotius, Hammond, Spanheim, Dub. Evang. par. 3, Dub. 72, p. 338, Chemnitius, Cradock, and Le Clerc, to confirm his opinion. Osiander, as he was compelled to do by his plan, which has been already given, has supposed that the transaction recorded in Luke v. 1–12. was different from that related in the parallel passages, (Mark i. 16. Matt. iv. 19, &c.) In reply to this part of his hypothesis, Spanheim remarks: "Non temere multiplicandas esse historias, quæ eadem deprehenduntur, quod cum Osiandro sine necessitate faciunt illi, qui nullas ὑστεροθέσεις, et προσλήψεις apud Sacros Scriptores admittunt." And it is as absurd to suppose that the inspired writers never followed the example of their predecessors in the Old Testament, and sometimes disregarded chronological order, as it would be to proceed to the opposite extreme, and to mangle the text with Whiston and Mann. The apparent differences between the Evangelists are well discussed by Townson^r.

The narrative in this section is arranged on the plan of Doddridge's division of the same history.

Eichhorn has supposed that the passages in this section do not refer to the same event; he has not inserted either the calling of Andrew, Peter, James, and John, or the miraculous draught of fishes, among the events which are related by all the three Evangelists^s.

Pilkington separates the account of the miraculous draught of fishes, from the calling of these disciples, for two reasons. One, because it is said in Mark i. 18., they forsook all, and followed him; and in Luke v. 1–11., they are represented as again pursuing their occupation—the other, because St. Peter calls our Lord Ἐπιστάτα. Both these objections, however, are obviated by Newcome, Doddridge, and Townson.

The word ἐπιστάτα, which is used chap. viii. 24. 45., and ix. 33. 49., may imply only submission of the apostle to our Lord, as his Master, without any actual previous obedience. It certainly is used in the sense of overseer, or superintendent, but it was also applied by St. Luke as expressing more correctly the word רַבִּי, the usual epithet of respect among the Jews. In Mark ix. 5., we read Ῥαββί, καλὸν ἐστὶν ἡμῶς ὧδε εἶναι. “Master, it is good for us to be here;” and in St. Luke ix. 33., the very same words are given, excepting that Ῥεπιστάτα “Master,” is put in the place of Ῥαββί, “Rabbi.”

Michaelis has strangely placed this miraculous draught of fishes after the raising of the widow’s son at Nain; an arrangement for which there is not the least authority that I have been able to discover, although much time has been devoted to the attempt. It appears merely arbitrary, equally inconsistent with the evangelical account, and the decision of all the harmonizers. Nain was upwards of twenty miles from the sea of Tiberias. Yet Michaelis supposes that our Lord on the same day left Capernaum travelled to Nain, a distance of more than thirty miles, and, after raising the widow’s son to life, proceeded to the sea of Tiberias, the nearest point of which is distant twenty miles from Nain. Bishop Marsh, his learned editor, has been aware of this difficulty, as he remarks, “Our author has not assigned his reasons for each particular transposition, and the propriety of some of them may be justly questioned.” Michaelis, in his defence, I suppose, observes, there is no note of time to inform us when this event took place.”

The narratives of the three Evangelists are thus reconciled by Dr. Townson, who observes, this account (Luke v. 1–12.) will be found on a near inspection to tally marvellously with the preceding (Matt. iv. 18–22. and Mark i. 16–20.) and to be one of the evidences that the Evangelists vary only in the number or choice of circumstances, and write from the same idea of the fact which they lay before us.

Every one knows that the sea of Galilee and the lake of Gennesareth are the same. And though St. Matthew and St. Mark do not expressly tell us that St. Peter was in his vessel when he was called by Christ, they signify as much, in saying that he was casting a net into the sea; for this supposes him to be aboard, and our Lord in the vessel with him, as St. Luke relates. The latter does not mention St. Andrew, either here or elsewhere, except in the catalogue of the apostles (vi. 14.) St. Luke further tells us, that James and John, the sons of Zebedee, assisted Peter in landing the fish which he had taken; and that when they, that is, the four partners, had brought their ships to land, they forsook all and followed Christ. And here also this Evangelist harmonizes with the two others. St. Mark says, that when Christ had gone a little further thence from the place where Peter and Andrew began to follow him, he saw James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, who also were in a ship, as Peter had been when he was called, mending their nets, their nets being torn by the weight of fish which they had hauled to shore; and straightway he called them—and they went after him in company with Peter and Andrew.

The two accounts, that of St. Matthew and St. Mark on one side, and that of St. Luke on the other, thus concurring in the place and situation in which St. Peter was called, in the promise made to him, and the time when he was called, speak evidently of the same vocation—consequently St. Matthew and St. Mark have abridged the story.”

This manner of considering the narrative seems preferable either to that of Newcome, Whitby, or Hammond.”

THE wisdom of our Lord’s conduct was eminently displayed in the choice of his apostles: they were generally chosen from the inferior ranks of life; and most of them were fishermen. If the disciples of Christ had been men of rank and distinction, of wealth or eminence; if they had been esteemed for their knowledge, or literature, or political influence, these means might more or less have been employed for promoting the kingdom of the Messiah, which nearly all the Jews imagined would be of an earthly nature. The success of the Gospel, too, would have been attributed, by its enemies at least, if not by the disciples, to mere human exertions. Hence Caiaphas inquired with so much solicitude of Christ, respecting his disciples (John xviii. 19.), from whose unpretending lifeless opposition was made to the first beginnings of Christianity: for no danger could possibly be apprehended from the efforts of such inferior and illiterate individuals. In addition to these reasons for selecting the apostles from the lowest occupations, it must be remembered, that men accustomed to a sterner and severer mode of life would be so habituated to dangers and anxieties, that they would not easily be daunted by them. By this choice, too, all pretence that the Gospel was advanced by mere human means was destroyed; and it appeared from the very beginning, that not many wise, or noble, or mighty, were called.

ON THE TYPES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

THERE is one subject in theology which has generally escaped the attention of commentators and writers—the types of the New Testament. If we consider the design of Revelation, and the plan on which the former part of the inspired pages is written, it will not appear improbable, or unreasonable, that we may discover the same union of types and prophecies in the New, as are to be found in the Old Testament.

A type is a designed resemblance between two events, one of which takes place before the other. The latter of these events is of so much importance, that it is usually the subject of prophecy. It may be observed also, respecting the types, that those circumstances recorded in the Old Testament, which are now known to be typical, were not generally understood in the complete typical signification at the time they took place. Thus we cannot be assured that the offering of Isaac by Abraham was regarded by his contemporaries as typical of the sacrifice of the Son of God. It was comprehended on a future day, and the resemblance between them was so complete, that we have internal evidence, as well as the testimony of authors, that the first event was a prophetic intimation of the latter: and we well know, that the latter was the object also of a great variety of prophecies.

The design of Revelation is likewise to demonstrate to the world, that all that can or shall take place is known to God; and that every event among all the nations of the earth concurs in accomplishing his predetermined will. That will is known and declared to be, the universal happiness of the sons of Adam, accomplished by means which shall not clash with the freedom of human will and human action.

The New Testament, like the Old, contains a great number of prophecies, many of which have already been fulfilled, many are now fulfilling, many remain to be accomplished. The same Spirit of God dictated both covenants; the design of the one revelation is uniform; the plan we may naturally conclude the same; and we may expect, therefore, that some events in the New Testament may be intended to typify those circumstances which are the subject of its prophecies.

In the instance before us, we have a plain example of a prophecy which was delivered under circumstances which may seem to typify the event foretold. Christ assured his disciples that they should become fishers of men; that is, they should be successful preachers of his Gospel. The words, in their simple meaning, must be considered only as a metaphor; but the events which took place at the time they were spoken will possibly justify us in supposing that they are to be interpreted as an intended resemblance, or type, of the fulfilment of our Lord's prophecy. As the net drew up so great a multitude of fishes, so also should the apostles on a future day bring many myriads into the Church of God.

Lampe^r, in his work on St. John's Gospel, has indulged his imagination very fully on this subject. He certainly demonstrates that the several objects, means, and terms, which are used by fishermen, and concerning fishing, were interpreted by the ancients in an emblematical sense, and similar interpretations may be found in the talmudical writers. I am always anxious to avoid any fanciful meanings of Scripture, as inconsistent with sobriety and sound judgment. The imagination is the worst and blindest guide in these things. But as the subject is curious, and may probably engage the attention of theological students, I have collected some instances, which may prove the reasonableness of the supposition in question.

Lampe first refers to the Old Testament, to show the propriety of considering the act of fishing, &c. to be emblematical. We read in Ezek. xlvii. 10. "And it shall be that the fishers shall stand upon it [the river], from En-ge-di, even to En-eglaim: they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea," &c. The prophet, in the whole passage, is comparing the future progress of the Gospel to that of rivers, giving life wherever they flow; and this same emblem is adopted in many other passages of the Old Testament, Prov. xi. 30. Isa. xix. 9, 10, &c.

En-ge-di and En-eglaim were situated at the north and south points of the Dead Sea. This sea then, as having covered the cities of the plain, which were consumed for their wickedness, may be considered as a most appropriate emblem of the state of the Heathen or Gentile world, and gives additional force to the passage: even that sea should be so changed by the waters of the river of life, that there, even there, should be the spreading forth of nets, and abundant success to the labor of the fishermen.

Archbishop Newcome translates the text more intelligibly than in our own version, which is rendered obscurely.

The instruments of fishing, Lampe observes further, are the hook and the net. Men are said to be drawn as with the bands of a man: and it is the hook of judgment and restraint with which Isaiah represents Jehovah as restraining the madness of Sennacherib.

In the mode of fishing also, two things particularly resemble the ministry of the Gospel. The persevering labor required, night and day constantly at work, and although frequently disappointed, still urging, persevering, and laboring with the hope of success. The cunning and skill requisite in this pursuit, as pertaining to the Christian teacher, is well described in Matt. x. 16. and 2 Cor. xii. 16.

Ambrose remarks on this subject, "The apostolic implements are appropriately compared to nets, which do not kill their prey, but keep them and bring them from the darkness of the deep into the light of day."

The talmudists also have used the same metaphor. The teachers of the Law are called by Maimonides, Talm. Torah. p. 7. יריגי תורה.

Petronius, Satyr. cap. 3., gives the same emblem. The arbiter elegantiarum would be surprised to find himself in this company.

Lampe quotes also from a hymn, preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus^y, in which Christ is thus addressed—

Ἀλιεὺ μερόπων	Piscator hominum
Τῶν σωζομένων	Qui salvi fiunt
Πελάγους κακίας	Pelagi vitii
Ἰχθὺς ἀγροῦς	Pisces castos
Κύματος ἐχθροῦ	Undâ ex infestâ
Γλυκερῇ ζωῇ δαλεῖζων.	Dulci vitâ inescans.

Plutarch also, in his Treatise on Isis and Osiris, affirms, that in the Egyptian hieroglyphics a fish was placed as an emblem of hatred.

"Εν Ζαὶ γούν ἐν τῷ προπόλῳ τοῦ ἱεροῦ τῶς Αθηνᾶς ἦν γεγλυμμένον βρέφος, γέρον, καὶ μετὰ τοῦτο ἱεραξ, εφεξῆς δὲ ἰχθὺς, ἐπὶ πᾶσι δὲ ἵππος ποταμῶς. In the vestibule of the temple at Zai, an infant, an old man, a hawk, a fish, and a hippopotame were sculptured. Each emblem had its appropriate meaning, and the fish represented hatred, ἰχθὺς δὲ μῖσος, ὥσπερ εἰρηται διὰ τὴν θάλατταν.

It was possibly in allusion to the same well-known emblem, that the ancient Christians called themselves Ἰχθὺς^z.

^y Pad. lib. 3. in fin.

^z Vide Bingham's Eccles. Antiq. The reason he assigns is, that the word was compounded of the initial letters, Ἰησοῦς, Χριστός, Θεοῦ Υἱός, Σωτήρ, Pythagoras also, who obtained much of his knowledge from pure sources^a, prohibited the eating of fish.

In the Epistle of Barnabas, ch. x., the wicked man is compared to fish. Μακάριος ἀνὴρ, ὅς οὐκ ἐπορεύθη ἐν βουλῇ ἀσεβῶν, καθὼς οἱ ἰχθύες πορεύονται ἐν σκότει εἰς τὰ βάθη.

Arnold proves in his notes to the Sota of the deeply-learned Wagenseil, that voluptuaries and sensualists were represented by the emblem of fishes.

Oppian, Halient. lib. 2.

Ἰχθῦσι δ' οὔτε δίκη μεταρίθμιος, οὔτε τις αἰδώς
 "Οὐ φιλότης· πάντες γὰρ ἀνάνηστοι ἀλλήλοισι
 Ἀναιμέτες πλώουσιν, ὁ δὲ κρατερότερος αἰεὶ
 Αἰνυτ' ἀφαιροτέρους ἄλλω δ' ἐπινίγεται ἄλλος
 Πότῃσιν ἄγων· ἕτερος δ' ἐτίρω πορσίτην ἰδωδῖν.

Which is an exact description not only of the manner in which fishes are represented by naturalists, but an accurate account also of the mode of life pursued by men who are without religion, and in a state of nature like the fish of the sea; they are regardless of shame, and law, and justice, and affection; always at war, and preying upon each other; the weaker the victims of the stronger^b.

NOTE 23.—PART III.

THIS event is placed after the miraculous draught of fishes, on the united authorities of Lightfoot, Newcome, Doddridge, and Pilkington. Michaelis places it after the rejection of Christ by his countrymen at Nazareth. He supposes that this event, the choosing of the twelve apostles, the sermon on the mount, the cleansing of the leper, the healing of the centurion's servant, the restoration of the mother-in-law of Peter, and of many other sick persons, took place on one day, which he therefore calls the day of the sermon on the mount; to distinguish it from the day in which various parables were delivered, which he denominates the day of parables. His reasons for this order, with the remarks of his learned editor, will be considered hereafter. It is here sufficient to observe he confirms the order proposed by the other harmonists, excepting that he places elsewhere the miracle which was given in the last section.

The scriptural authority for this arrangement is founded on Mark i. 21. After the calling of the four disciples, they immediately went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, which Doddridge (Fam. Exp. vol. i. p. 184.) supposes to have been the next day—εὐθέως τοῖς σάββασιν εἰσελθὼν εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν.

ON THE DEMONIACS.

THE event related in this section, since the time of the learned Jos. Mede, has given rise to much discussion. One class of authorities have supposed that the Demoniacs were merely madmen, others that the bodies of human beings were actually possessed, and controlled, and governed, and inhabited by wicked and impure spirits. Among the supporters of the first opinion we find Heinsius, Exercitationes Sacrae, on Matthew iv. 24. Jos. Mede^c, Dr. Sykes^d, Dr. Mead^e, Dr. Farmer^f, Dr. Lardner^g, Kuinoel, and Rosenmüller^h, on Matthew iv. 24.; and in general all those writers of every sect who would believe that origin of the Scriptures, which appears to them rational. On the other side of the question may be placed the uniform interpretation of the passage in its literal sense by the ancient church, the best commentators, and all who are generally called orthodox, as desirous to believe the literal interpretation of Scripture, and the opinions of the early ages, in all points of doctrine, whether it can be brought to a level with their reason or not. It is quite unnecessary to attempt to refer to all these writers; of those, however, of a later period, who have written on this subject, may be mentioned Macknightⁱ, Bishop Newton^j, Jortin^k (who would hardly have been expected among this number), Campbell^l, Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary, and many others. The sum of their argument is stated by Horne^m, Macknightⁿ, and Dr. Hales^o, with great fairness and impartiality. I have endeavoured to follow so good an example in the following brief summary of the respective arguments on both sides, beginning with those which are considered conclusive against the doctrine of demoniacal possessions.

1. The word demon properly signifies the soul of a dead person. It cannot be supposed that the speeches and actions recorded of the imagined demoniacs could be imputed to these.

In reply to this, it is justly said, that the word does not uniformly denote the spirits of the departed.

2. Amongst the heathens, lunacy and epilepsy were ascribed to the operation of some demons; demoniacs were therefore called larvati, and cerviti.

Several answers may be given to this objection.—One, that it is not quite impossible but that the heathens were right.—Another, that the opinion of the heathens, whether right or wrong, is no proof that the Jews were in error; for the demoniacs of Scripture are represented as differing from insane and epileptic persons. Compare Matt. iv. 24., where the δαιμονιζόμενους are opposed to the σεληνιαζόμενους, the παρὰ-λυτικούς, and the ποικίλαις νόσοις καὶ βυσάνοις συνεχομένους, and in Matt. x. 1. The power to cast out devils, or demons, by whatever name the evil spirits might be called, is expressly opposed to the power of healing all other diseases whatever. See Luke iv. 33–36.; compare also v. 41. with v. 40., where the same contrast is observable.

3. It is argued that the Jews had the same idea of these diseases as the heathen, and the instance of the madness of Saul, and Matt. xvii. 14, 15. John vii. 20. and viii. 48. 52. and x. 20. are adduced to prove the assertion. These passages certainly prove that lunatics, epileptics, and demoniacs are sometimes synonymous terms; but this admission, however, will only show that they were occasionally identified; the argument deduced from the contrast between lunatics and demoniacs, in the passages quoted above, will not be destroyed. The literal interpretation is confirmed by the recollection of the source from whence the heathens derived their ideas of demons, and their philosophy in general.

Pythagoras, as I have endeavoured elsewhere to prove, probably derived much of his philosophy, and many opinions and institutions, from the Jews in their dispersion, at the time of the Babylonish captivity^p. He was of opinion that the world was full of demons^q. Thales too, the contemporary of Pythagoras, and after them Plato and the Stoics, affirmed that all things were full of demons^r. And it is well known that the priests, in giving forth their oracles, are always represented as being possessed by their gods^s.

If they were not always known by the name of Demoniacs, they were spoken of under several other names, which signify the same thing, such

4. Christ is said to have adopted the common language of the people, which it was not necessary to change. He was not sent to correct the mistakes in the popular philosophy of the day in which he lived.

This argument takes for granted the very point to be proved. With respect also to the philosophy of the day, it would be difficult to show that our Lord sanctioned an error because it was popular.

5. No reason can be given why there should be demoniacal possessions in the time of our Lord, and not at present, when we have no grounds to suppose that any instances of this nature any where occur.

In reply to this objection, it may be observed, that these possessions might then have been more frequent, that the power of Christ might be shown more evidently over the world of spirits, and that He who came to destroy the works of the Devil should visibly triumph over him. By this act of Almighty power he confuted also the error so prevalent among the Sadducees, which denied the existence of angels or spirits (Acts xxiii. 8.), and which likewise prevailed among many of those who were distinguished for their rank and learning at that time among the Jews.

Lightfoot, when speaking on this point, supposes that the power of demons might be permitted to display itself in this peculiar manner while Christ was upon earth, because the iniquity of the Jews was now at its greatest height; and the whole world were consequently in a state of extreme apostacy from God. He adds also, that the Jews were now much given to magic; and to prevent his miracles from being attributed to this source, our Saviour evoked the evil spirits, to show that he was in no confederacy with them.

Those, on the contrary, who espouse the ancient opinion, not only adduce the arguments already mentioned in reply to the objections of their opponents, but maintain much that is laid down in the following positions, which have ever appeared to me decisive in favor of the popular opinion.

I. The heathens had an idea of beings superior to men, but inferior to the one Supreme God. Cudworth^t enumerates many instances. Among others he quotes Plato's expression, that there were ὁρατοὶ καὶ γεννητοὶ θεοί, visible and generated gods; and Maximus Tyrius, συνάρχοντες θεῶ, co-rulers with God, &c. The Jewish and Christian ideas of angels and spirits are in some respects similar. Both believe that these inferior beings may possess some influence by the permission of the Deity, in the concerns of mankind: and the opinion is neither hostile to reason or Scripture^u.

II. The doctrine of demoniacal possessions is consistent with the whole tenor of Scripture. Evil is there represented as having been introduced by a being of this description, which in some wonderful manner influenced the immaterial principle of man. The continuance of evil in the world is frequently imputed to the continued agency of the same being. Our ignorance of the manner in which the mind may be controlled, perverted, or directed, by the power of other beings, ought not to induce us to reject the opinion. We are unable to explain the operation of our own thoughts, but we do not therefore deny their existence.

III. The doctrine of demoniacal possessions is likewise consistent with reason. We acknowledge that a merciful God governs the world, yet we are astonished to observe that exceeding misery is every where produced by the indulgence of the vices of man. An ambitious conqueror will occasion famine, poverty, pestilence, and death, to hundreds of thousands of his fellow-men, whose lives are blameless and tranquil. If one man may cause evil to another, is it not probable that evils of a different kind might be produced by means of other beings, and the moral government of God remain unimpeached? We are assured that in the great period of retribution, other beings than man will be condemned by their Creator. The Scripture affirms this fact, that other accountable and immortal beings, superior to mankind, have been created, some of whom have not fallen; while others, under the influence of one who is called Satan, or the Devil, apostatized from God, perverted the mind of man, are still persevering in evil, are conscious of their crimes, and are now reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day. A future state alone can explain the mystery of the origin and destiny of man, and his rank in the universe of God. The whole supposition, that the demoniacs spoken of in Scripture were madmen, is crowded with difficulties. But let us take for granted the ancient and orthodox opinion; let us believe Christ to be divine, and preëxistent, conversant with the world of spirits, as well as with the world of men; and if we then trace the progress of that evil he was appointed to overthrow from the beginning to the end, how much more easy and rational is the belief, that he exerted over this demon the power he will hereafter display at the end of the world, when apostate devils and impenitent men will be associated in one common doom?

IV. The facts recorded of the supposed demoniacs demonstrate also that they were not merely madmen. The insane either reason rightly on wrong grounds^v, or wrongly on right grounds, or blend the right and wrong together. But these demoniacs reasoned rightly upon right grounds. They uttered propositions undeniably true. They excelled in the accuracy of their knowledge the disciples of Christ himself; at least, we never hear that either of these had applied to our Lord the epithet of the Holy One of God. They were alike consistent in their knowledge and their language. Their bodies were agitated and convulsed. The powers of their minds were controlled in such manner that their actions were unreasonable; yet they addressed our Lord in a consistent and rational, though in an appalling and mysterious manner. Our Lord answered them not by appealing to the individuals whose actions had been so irrational, but to something which he requires and commands to leave them; that is, to evil spirits, whose mode of continuing evil in this instance had been so fearfully displayed. These spirits answer him by evincing an intimate knowledge both of his person and character, which was hidden from the wise and prudent of the nation. The spirits that have apostatized are destined to future misery—their Judge was before them. “Ah, what hast thou to do with us, in our present condition,” they exclaim, “Art thou come to torment us before our time?” And they entreat him not to command them to leave this earth, and to go to the invisible world^w. The demons believed and trembled.

It is an admirable observation of Jortin on this point, that where any circumstances are added concerning the demoniacs, they are generally such as show that there was something preternatural in the distemper; for these afflicted persons unanimously joined in giving homage to Christ and his apostles; they all know him, and they unite in confessing his Divinity. If, on the contrary, they had been lunatics, some would have worshipped, and some would have reviled our Saviour, according to the various ways in which the disease had affected their minds.

V. The other facts recorded of the demoniacs are such that it is impossible to conclude that they were madmen only. The usual and principal of these is that most extraordinary event of the possession of the herd of swine, by the same demons which had previously shown their malignity in the human form. It has ever been found impossible to account for this extraordinary event^x, excepting upon the ancient and literal interpretation of Scripture.

^x The Socinian version of the New Testament

A singular instance of the absurdities into which some have been led, in their endeavours to overthrow the testimony of Scripture, and establish some proposition in its place which may seem more rational, or, as they very strangely think, more philosophical, may be found in Lardner, vol. i. p. 239; who, among the various opinions which had been advanced on the subject of the demoniacs, mentions one which endeavours to account for the destruction of the herd of swine, by imagining that Christ drove the lunacy, and not the demons, from the man into the swine.

VI. It cannot be supposed, as Doddridge observes, that our Lord humored the madmen by adopting their language, and inducing his disciples to do the same. “Hold thy peace, and come out of him—What is thy name—thou unclean spirit,” &c. These are all expressions which imply truths and doctrines of infinitely greater moment than any which could be conveyed to the minds of his hearers by flattering a madman, or increasing and encouraging the religious errors of a deluded and wicked generation.

Dr. Lardner, in his remarks on Dr. Ward’s Dissertations, quotes a letter from his friend Mr. Mole, which accurately expresses the feeling that induced so many to reject what appears to me to be the plain narrative of Scripture. “This affair of the possessions is an embarrassment, which one would be glad to be fairly rid of,” &c. It is the part of reason to examine the evidences of revelation. When reason is satisfied of its truth, as it must be, its only remaining duty is to fall prostrate before the God of reason and Scripture, and implicitly to believe the contents of the Sacred Volume in their plain and literal meaning. This stage of our existence is but the introduction to and the preparation for another, and it seems therefore but rational and philosophical to conclude that some things would be recorded in revelation, which should serve as links to connect the visible with the invisible world. Among these may be considered such facts as the resurrection—the three ascensions—the visits of angels—the sudden appearances of the Jehovah of the Old Testament—the miraculous powers of prophecy conferred upon the favored servants of God. Among these events also, I would place the fact of demoniacal possessions. As at the transfiguration Moses and Elias appeared in glory, to foreshow to man the future state of the blessed in heaven; so also do I believe that the fearful spectacle of a human being possessed by evil spirits was designed as a terrible representation of the future punishment. The demoniac knew Christ, yet avoided and hated him. An outcast from the intellectual and religious world, he grieved over his lot, yet he could not repent. In the deepest misery and distress, he heightened his own agony by self-inflicted torments. The light of heaven, which occasionally broke in upon his melancholy dwelling among the tombs, served only to make more visible the darkness of his wretchedness, and embittered every anguish and suffering by the torturing remembrance of what he was and what he might have been. Although I have not met with the opinion elsewhere, I cannot but consider, that we are here presented with a fearful and overwhelming description of the future misery of the wicked, by the visible power of the Devil over the bodies and souls of men. The account of demoniacal possessions may be regarded as an awful warning addressed to mankind in general lest they also come into the same state of condemnation. At the last day, when every eye shall see Him, and every knee bow down before Him, many, like the raving demoniac, shall hail the same Saviour, who died to redeem them, with unavailing horror and despair. Many like the demoniac will be compelled to acknowledge his Divinity—"We know thee, who thou art, the Holy One of God,"—while they join in the frantic and piercing cry, "Art thou come to torment us?"

It appears to me also, that the demoniacs powerfully represent to us the state to which all the sons of Adam would have been reduced for ever, if the Son of God had not descended from heaven, to accomplish the wonderful plan of redemption which is revealed in the Inspired Writings. The experience of common life, indeed, not unfrequently sets before us many deplorable instances of the exceeding degradation to which the human mind may fall, when it becomes the slave of the passions, uninfluenced by religious principle. We seldom sufficiently appreciate the incalculable benefit which has already accrued to the world from the influence of the Christian religion.

With respect, then, to the demoniacs of the New Testament, we may conclude, that it is with this doctrine as with many others in the New Testament. The traditional, popular, literal, and simplest interpretation is most probably correct, for this very satisfactory reason, that the difficulties of the new interpretation are always greater than of that which is rejected. We have here the actions of the Saviour and the Destroyer. On one side we have the wonderful doctrine, that it has pleased the Almighty to permit invisible and evil beings to possess themselves in some incomprehensible manner of the bodies and souls of men. On the other we have Christ, the revealer of truth, establishing falsehood, sanctioning error, or encouraging deception. We have the Evangelists inconsistent with themselves, and a narrative, which is acknowledged to be inspired, and to be intended for the unlearned—unintelligible or false. Between such difficulties I prefer the former; and, if I cannot comprehend, I bow my reason to the Giver of reason, and confess with reverence the superiority of Revelation. The difference between Christianity and philosophy, or the mode of speculating which assumes that title, may be said to consist in this:—in matters of philosophy, the vulgar may be in error, and the speculatist may be right. But, in Christianity, the popular opinion is generally right. The speculator, the philosopher, who would fashion Christianity according to his own notions of truth and falsehood, of right, or wrong, generally concludes with error.

THIS section is placed here on the united authorities of the five harmonists, and on the Scriptural authority of Luke iv. 38. Ἀναστῶς, δὲ ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς, ἐξῆλθεν, &c. The cure of Peter's mother-in-law is placed by St. Matthew after the healing of the centurion's servant. This miracle may have been wrought more particularly to confirm the faith of the apostles.

Pilkington, who has observed the order of St. Mark and St. Luke, and rejected the supposition of Osiander and Maeknight, that St. Matthew wrote in order of time, has well defended the decision of the several harmonizers on this point.—Pilkington's Evang. Hist. &c. Notes, p. 17.

NOTE 25.—PART III.

IN placing the tour throughout Galilee, after the cure of Peter's wife's mother, all the harmonists are agreed. The scriptural authority is to be found in St. Mark, i. 32. Ὅπλας δὲ γενομένης. Michaelis adds here various other cures and miracles; and Dr. Doddridge has come, in some respects, to the same conclusions. Neither are Lightfoot, Newcome, and Pilkington agreed in the texts they would combine together in this section. The Evangelists describe the journeyings of Christ through Galilee in such very general terms, that it appears impossible to appropriate every expression to its particular journey. Neither does it seem capable of demonstration that it was so designed.

Our Lord now began to manifest himself publicly by his miracles, and to direct the attention of the Jews to his claims as their Messiah.

NOTE 26.—PART III.

ON THE MEANING OF ISAIAH liii. 4–12.

THE chapter of Isaiah, from which the Evangelist quotes the above passage, has been justly considered to contain a complete description of the sufferings of Christ. Because the Evangelist has applied the words of the Prophet to the cure of diseases, the Socinian writers have endeavoured to prove that the doctrine of the atonement ought not to be, and cannot be, deduced from this passage of Isaiah. They utterly reject the propitiatory sacrifice, which is there represented as offered for the sins of men; and for the purpose of doing away the force of the expressions which so clearly convey this idea, the adversaries of the doctrine of the atonement have directed against this part of Scripture their principal attacks. They have endeavoured to prove that Christ is not here described as an קרבן, or sacrifice for sin, and that the sacrifice itself is not truly propitiatory. They further argue that the word BEAR sins, signifies to bear them away or remove them; and that consequently nothing more is meant here than the removing away from us our sins and iniquities by forgiveness. Archbishop Magee, in his invaluable work On the Atonement, has devoted much labor to the Unitarian objection, and carefully analyzed every word in the whole passage. He candidly and fully, as an inquirer into truth ever should do, submits to the readers the difficulties in question, and concludes the discussion by establishing the propriety and certainty of the usual application of the passage to the sufferings of Christ, as the vicarious sacrifice for the sins of mankind.

It would be impossible in the short space of a note to enter into all the elaborate criticisms of the learned Archbishop. His conclusions, which are most satisfactory, can only be here given. He understands דָּרְסוּ and ἀσθενείας to relate to bodily pains and distempers, and כִּסְמוֹתָם and ρόσους to refer to diseases and torments of the mind—he refers the former clause signifying Christ's removing the sicknesses of men by miraculous cures, and the latter to his bearing their sins upon the cross, and he has adduced many examples in support of this interpretation. "Isaiah and Matthew," to use his own words, "are perfectly reconciled, the first clause of each relating to diseases removed—the second to sufferings endured. And by the same steps by which the Prophet and the Evangelist have been reconciled, the original objection derived from St. Matthew's application of the passage is completely removed, since we find that the bearing applied by the Evangelist to bodily disease is widely different from that which is applied to sins; so that no conclusion can be drawn from the former use of the word,

"One point yet, however, demands explanation. It will be said, that the prophet is no longer supposed to confine himself to the view of our redemption by Christ's sufferings and death; but to take in also the consideration of his miraculous cures; and the Evangelist, on the other hand, was represented as not attending merely to the cures performed by Christ, with which alone he was immediately concerned, but as introducing the mention of his sufferings for our sins, with which his subject had no natural connexion. Now to this I reply (says Archbishop Magee) first, with regard to the prophet, that it is not surprising that so distinguishing a character of the Messiah, as that of his healing all manner of diseases with a word, and which this prophet (in chap. xxxv. 5.) has depicted so strongly, that our Saviour repeats his very words (Batt's Diss. 2nd edit. p. 109.) and refers to them in proof that he was the Messiah (Matt. xi. 4. and Beausobre in loc.)—it is not surprising, I say, that this character of Christ should be described by the prophet. And that it should be introduced in this place, where the prophet's main object seems to be to unfold the plan of our redemption, and to represent the Messiah as suffering for the sins of men, will not appear in any degree unnatural, when it is considered that the Jews familiarly connected the ideas of sin and disease, the latter being considered by them the temporal punishment of the former (for abundant proof of this see Whitby on Matt. viii. 17. and ix. 2., Drusius on the same, Crit. Sac. tom. vi. p. 288., and Doederl. on Isaiah liii. 4. and Martini also on the same passage). So that He, who was described as averting by what he was to suffer, the penal consequences of sin, would naturally be looked to as removing, by what he was to perform, its temporal effects: and thus the mention of the one would reasonably connect with that of the other, the whole of the prophetic representation becoming, as Kenicott happily expresses it, 'Descriptio Messiae benevolentissime et agentis et patientis.' (Diss. Gen. § 79.)

"That the Evangelist, on the other hand, though speaking more immediately of bodily diseases, should at the same time quote that member of the prophecy, which related to the more important part of Christ's office, that of saving men from their sins, will appear equally reasonable, if it be recollected that the sole object in referring to the prophet concerning Jesus, was to prove him to be the Messiah; and that the distinguishing character of the Messiah was to give knowledge of salvation unto his people, by the remission of their sins (Luke i. 77.) So that the Evangelist may be considered as holding this leading character primarily in view; and, at the same time, that he marks to the Jews the fulfilment of one part of the prophesy, by the healing of their bodily distempers, he directs their attention to that other greater object of our Saviour's mission, on which the prophet had principally enlarged, namely, the procuring forgiveness of their sins by his sufferings. And thus the present fulfilment of the prophecy was at the same time a designation of the person, and a pledge of the future more ample completion of the prediction. Cocceius gives this excellent explanation of the passage in question: 'He hath taken on himself (suscepit) our sorrows, or sufferings, eventually to bear them away, as he has now testified by the carrying away our bodily distempers.'

"If, after all that has been said, any doubt should yet remain, as to the propriety of thus connecting together, either in the Prophet, or in the Evangelist, the healing of diseases, and the forgiveness of sins, I would beg of the reader to attend particularly to the circumstance of their being connected together frequently by our Lord himself. Thus he says to the sick of the palsy, when he healed him, 'thy sins be forgiven thee' (Matt. ix. 2.) And that bodily diseases were not only deemed by the Jews, but were in reality, under the first dispensation, in many instances the punishment of sin, we may fairly infer from John v. 14., where Jesus said to him whom he had made whole, 'sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.' It should be observed also, that what in Mark iv. 12., is expressed, 'and their sins should be forgiven them,' is given in Matt. xiii. 15., 'and I should heal them.' See also James v. 15. and Isaiah xxxiii. 24., and observe the maledictions against the transgressors of the Law, in Deut. xxviii. 21. See also Grot. on John v. 14. and Pole's Syn. on Matt. ix. 2."

None will think this extract too long, who are aware of the great importance of the subject in discussion. The researches of this learned writer afford another proof, if any were wanting, that in proportion to the extent of inquiry, and the increase of our knowledge, will ever be the confirmation of the great doctrine of the Atonement and the Divinity of Christ. It is sincerely to be hoped, that no theological student will permit his library to be unprovided with this valuable work of Archbishop Magee On the Atonement.

NOTE 27.—PART III.

THE arguments of Newcome and Lightfoot have principally induced me to give this place to the cure of the leper, contrary to the authority of Doddridge, who has preferred the order of St. Matthew's Gospel, and arranged it after the Sermon on the Mount. The expression in St. Matthew's Gospel, on which this opinion is founded, is in Matt. viii. 1. Καταβόρῃ δὲ αὐτῷ ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄρου—and καὶ ἰδοῦ. The same expression has induced Mr. Jones, in his Vindication of St. Matthew's Gospel, to conclude that this Evangelist had observed the due order of time. But Archbishop Newcome justly observes, that, according to St. Luke, this miracle was performed in a certain city (Luke v. 12); and that the expression in Matt. viii. 1. refers only to the multitudes following him; and the words καὶ ἰδοῦ are only used as an introductory phrase for the better transition from one part of the history to another. Many expressions apparently fixing the time of events, must be considered in this point of view, such as ἰδὼν δὲ—καὶ ἐγένετο, καὶ ἐλθὼν, καὶ προσελθὼν, ἐλθόντι δὲ, περιπατῶν δὲ, καὶ ἀνελθὼν τὸ σιῶμα—τότε, μετὰ ταῦτα, ὅν, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκεταῖς, ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν."

It may be observed also in support of the arrangement now adopted, that our Lord would not have said to the leper, if he had performed the cure in the presence of the great multitudes that followed him as he came down from the mount, "See thou tell no man:" neither is it probable that the leper, being so utterly unclean, would be found among the crowd.

Lightfoot also has remarked, that St. Matthew was solicitous to proceed at once to the Sermon on the Mount, for which purpose he mentions several miracles together, without attending to the order in which they took place. Eichhorn has observed the same order. There does not appear to be sufficient reason for supposing that two lepers were cleansed.

Both among Jews and Gentiles the leprosy has been considered as a most expressive emblem of sin, the properties and circumstances of the one pointing out those of the other. The leprosy, like sin, begins with a spot, a simple hidden infection, soon spreading over the whole body, and communicating its contagious nature to every thing which it can either touch or influence.

This disorder, like sin, is hereditary, and was deemed incurable by mere human means. Among the Jews, God alone was considered able to remove it, and its cure was uniformly attributed to divine power. In like manner, the contagion of sin, its guilt and its consequences, can only be removed by the hand of God; all means without his especial influence can be of no avail.

In effecting the cure, our Lord asserted his sovereignty, by the phrase, "I will—be thou clean." Our Saviour begins by prefiguring his power to forgive sin in its fullest extent by the cure of the leper; he soon afterwards publicly proclaims it in the case of the sick of the palsy, when he said, "But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sin," &c.

NOTE 28.—PART III.

CHRIST commanded the leper not to tell any man till he had shown himself to the priest, as a testimony unto them. He charges the man to be silent on the subject of his cure, that the jealousy of the Romans, or of the Jewish rulers, should not be excited; and that his ministry should not be disturbed and interrupted by the clamors of the people, who sometimes in their zeal endeavoured to make him a king. He directed him also to the priest, and to offer the usual gift. In the Levitical Law it was the office of the priest alone to testify that the disease was cured. The man was sent, therefore, that the priest might look upon him, and declare him clean; and thus a legal proof might be given to the people, and a testimony be afforded to the priests themselves, that a Greater than the priest was among them, who could heal all diseases by a word, and even the disease of the leprosy. But if the leper who had been cured had told the priest, before he was pronounced clean, that he had been healed by our Saviour, his jealousy might have refused to acknowledge the completion of the cure; and the man was therefore charged to be silent. Our Lord could not have offered a more evident proof of his Divinity than this cure of the leper; for there was a prevalent tradition among the Jews, that when the Messiah should appear he should heal the leprosy.

As some objections have been proposed concerning the propriety of our Lord's conduct in commanding the man whom he had cured of his leprosy to keep silence on the subject, I would direct the attention of the reader to the following admirable observations of the learned Witsius.

“Si ad ea quæ sequuntur attendamus, manifestum fiet, non esse indictum huic homini perpetuum silentium; sed duntaxat usque dum purgationem sui purgasset sacerdotibus, eamque testatam fecisset doni imperati oblatione. Nimirum non modo volebat Jesus divinæ legis retinens videri, quod erat revera: sed et miraculo suo fidem fieri ab ipsis sacerdotibus, et tum demum illud publicari. Ut autem fides ei fieret a sacerdotibus præveniendi erant, antequam fama miraculi in Galilæa facti ad Hierosolymitanorum aures perveniret; ne sacerdotes, quorum ea notio erat, invidiæ veneno tacti, aut leprosum eum fuisse, aut a lepra bona fide curatum esse, negarent. Ideo eum Jesus εὐθὺς ἐξέβαλε, protinus facessere jussit, ne fama anteverteret, et silentium imperavit, donec se sacerdoti explorandum stitisset, et permissum ipsi esset munus suum offerre; quod non licebat nisi post solemnem sacerdotis declarationem. Ab eo tempore fas sanato fuit in urbem ingredi,” &c.—Witsii, Meletemata Leidensia, Dissert. v. p. 253.

NOTE 29.—PART III.

WHERE the harmonists are all agreed in the arrangement of any particular event, which very frequently occurs, it will only be necessary to refer the reader to those harmonists, by whose authority I am principally directed.

The cure of the sick of the palsy is placed after that of the leper mentioned in Matt. viii. 2–4. by Doddridge, Newcome, Lightfoot, Pilkington, Eichhorn, and Bishop Richardson, apud Usher's Annals, p. 821. For the reasons why the order of St. Mark and St. Luke is adopted here, instead of that of St. Matthew, vide Doddridge, Fam. Exp. vol. i. p. 245.

Mark connects this story with that of the leper; the word εὐθὺς, says Archbishop Newcome, fixes the order (Mark. ii. 2.) St. Luke does not specify the time, and St. Matthew, who seems to have deferred the narration of many facts, that the Sermon on the Mount might be introduced early to the Jewish reader, to whom he particularly addressed his Gospel, places several events between the cure of the leper and the paralytic. St. Luke relates the cure as happening only on a certain day, ἐγένετο ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν.

Our Lord asserts here, for the first time, his power to forgive sins, which he demonstrates also by another miracle, and declares himself greater than any prophet. He gradually reveals his mission as the minds of his hearers were able to receive it, and till the time should come when he should appear at Jerusalem before the rulers of the people.

The Jews believed that all disease was the consequence of sin, אין יכולין בלא עין, and that the diseases of the body were not healed till the sins that occasioned them were forgiven. I meet in Schoetgen this quotation. Nedarim, fol. 41. 1. “Dixit R. Chija fil Abba, nullus ægrotus a morbo sanatur, donec ipsi omnia peccata remissi sunt. אין החולה נרפא מחוליו עד שמוחלין לו על כל עונותיו.” a'T. Bab. Sabbat, fol. 55. 1. Midrach Kohelet, fol. 70. 4. apud Gill on Matt. ix. 2.

Kimchi too, on Psalm xli. 5. has observed: “When God shall heal the diseases of the soul, then, after the expiation of its sins, the body also shall be healed.” The Jews believed, on their own principles, that he, who could thus display the attributes of Deity, was the Messiah. Our Lord appeals, therefore, on his usual plan, to their received opinions, and asserted his high dignity by actions.

Whitby, in Matt. ix. 3., supposes that the paralytic was suffering under the punishment of some particular sin, and the removal of the disease signified only the forgiveness of that particular offence. Whereas Lightfoot, on the contrary, argues that the restoration of the sick of the palsy was accompanied with the remission of all his past transgressions.—

NOTE 30.—PART III.

LIGHTFOOT, Archbishop Newcome, and Doddridge, place the calling of St. Matthew in its present order, and separate that event from the feast which was given afterwards in his house. They reason, from Luke viii. 41. and Mark v. 22., that many events occurred, and much time elapsed, from the calling of Matthew to the visit of Jairus which took place at the feast, Matt. ix. 10–13. Michaelis, Pilkington, and Bedford, in his Scripture Chronology, unite these events.

Is it not probable that our Lord proposed some useful lesson by thus calling Matthew from the Receipt of Custom? The Jews expressed the utmost contempt and hatred of all those of their countrymen, who accepted the office now held by St. Matthew. In their opinion, vows made to thieves, murderers, and publicans, might be broken. These persons were regarded by them as profane—shepherds, alms-gatherers, and publicans—אלו פסולין רועין, נבאין ומוכסין. Their repentance also was considered very difficult. The Jerusalem Targum has the following canon, Demai, fol. col. 3. חבֿר שניעשח גוֹרִי דוֹחִי אוֹרִי מִחבֿר. “A Pharisee that becomes a Publican they remove from his order; but if he leaves his profession they restore him to his order again.” St. Matthew appears to have been, from his official situation, which must have made him more generally known, the most suitable of all the apostles to become the writer of the first Gospel; and he was an eyewitness also of what he records. The others, excepting St. John, and perhaps St. Peter, who probably dictated, or at least superintended St. Mark’s Gospel, were men of but little education, and not much known to their countrymen. Our Saviour, by calling St. Matthew, intended perhaps to reprove the self-righteousness and arrogance of the Pharisees; and to show them, that the most despised among men were preferred before them in the sight of God^z.

In addition to the reasons assigned by Lightfoot for separating the invitation to the feast at the house of Matthew, from the call of that Apostle, it may be observed, at that feast our Lord spake in parables. But this mode of teaching was never adopted till the Scribes and Pharisees had imputed his casting out of devils to the agency of an evil spirit.

I have not thought it deserving of consideration, whether Matthew and Levi were different persons. It is the general, and, I cannot but think the correct opinion, that they were the same. I insert the words of Rosenmüller as expressing my own opinion. “An diversa tantum sint nomina unius ejusdemque personæ, an vero duo portitores simul vocati sint a Christo, eundem definire non ausim. Quum tamen Marcus et Lucas in plerisque cum Matthæo consentiant, et alii etiam apostoli binomines fuerint (Simon Petrus, et Lebbæus Thaddæus) præferenda esse videtur eorum sententia, qui Levin et Matthæum diversa tantum esse nomina unius ejusdemque personæ existimant.”—Rosenmüller, Scholia N. T., vol. i. p. 193.

NOTE 31.—PART III.

ON THE NUMBER OF PASSEOVERS DURING OUR LORD’S MINISTRY.

THERE are four passages in St. John’s Gospel which are considered by the majority of harmonizers, as intending to express the number of Passovers, and the consequent duration of our Lord’s ministry. They are the following—ii. 13., Kal éγγυς ἦν τὸ πάσχα τῶν Ἰουδαίων, καὶ ἀνέβη εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα ὁ Ἰησοῦς. The second is, v. 1., Μετὰ ταῦτα ἦν ἑορτὴ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, καὶ ἀνέβη ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα. The third, vi. 4., Ἦν δὲ ἑγγυς τὸ πάσχα, ἡ ἑορτὴ τῶν Ἰουδαίων. The fourth, xi. 55., Ἦν δὲ ἑγγυς τὸ πάσχα τῶν Ἰουδαίων. Upon the right construction indeed of the second of these, the question of the duration of our Lord’s ministry may be said to depend. The generally-received opinion is, that our Lord’s ministry lasted three years and a half, during which time four Passovers were celebrated. The second of these passages, however, does not appear to warrant the supposition that a Passover is the feast intended, and consequently no argument can be deduced from these passages to ascertain the duration of our Lord’s ministry.

In all the other three passages, St. John uses the words τὸ πάσχα, to express the Passover, in the second he uses only the word ἑορτὴ. Now this, it is evident, does not assert that the feast here meant was a Passover. If we may judge from the other passages of St. John, without taking into consideration the other Gospels, we may say that the omission of the article demonstrates that he could not mean a Passover; as the article is inserted in every other passage where the word ἑορτὴ is used, as referring to the feast of the Passover. It is found also in the seventh chapter, where the same expression is given in reference to the feast of Tabernacles. On examining the other Gospels, we shall see, that though St. Mark has once used the word without the article, when speaking of the feast of the Passover, and St. Luke also has done the same thing, yet St. Matthew, like St. John, has uniformly preserved it; and so indeed have all the Evangelists, with these two deviations only.

^z See Talmud in Nedarim, per. 3. halac. 4. and Sanhed. per. 1. fol. 24. ap. Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 660.

Matt. xxvi. 2. τὸ πάσχα γίνεται.

5. μὴ ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ.

xxvii. 15. κατὰ δὲ ἑορτήν.

Mark xiv. 1. Ἦν δὲ τὸ πάσχα, &c.

2. Μὴ ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ.

The exception referred to is,—

Mark xv. 6. κατὰ δὲ ἑορτήν.

Luke ii. 41. τῇ ἑορτῇ τῆς πάσχα. But in xxiii. 17. κατ' ἑορτήν.

John in this instance only uses the word ἑορτή, without the article. Compare the passages John ii. 23.—iv. 45.—vi. 4.—vii. 2.—vii. 8. 10. 11. 14. 37.—xi. 56.—xii. 12. 20.—xiii. 1. 29.

These passages, in which ἑορτή is without the article, may denote the feast of the Passover, and may in fact be considered as the same: and it may be observed, therefore, that the expression κατ' ἑορτήν is an idiomatical phrase, similar and equivalent to κατ' ἔτος, the construction of which depends on πᾶς, or ἑξαετος, understood.

In this manner we must supply the ellipsis by St. Luke, who uses the expression κατὰ πᾶν σάββατον (Acts xiii. 27.), κατ' ἑορτήν therefore will mean κατὰ πᾶσαν ἑορτήν, or feast by feast; as κατ' ἔτος, signifies year by year: and as the propriety of the latter expression would be destroyed by the insertion of the article τὸ, so, to render the phrase κατ' ἑορτήν, analogous in its construction, it was necessary that the article should be omitted. This therefore is done; and though some MSS., since the time of Theophylact, have inserted the article, yet the quotations from Origen have not the article, and Irenæus refers to the verse in such a manner that there is no reason for supposing that it was found in his MS. It is omitted too in the Codex Alexandrinus, Cod. Vaticanus, Cod. Bezae, and most of the Greek MSS^a.

The course of St. John's history seems to imply rather that this feast was not a Passover. He relates that our Saviour remained in Judæa after the first Passover in his ministry, till he knew "how the Pharisees had heard that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John." He then left Judæa, and departed through Samaria into Galilee. He then went to Capernaum (vide chap. iv.), and after this, says the Evangelist, was a feast of the Jews. It is therefore, Mr. Benson^b observes, natural to imagine that this was a feast of Pentecost, or Tabernacles; because there has been nothing related by the Evangelist which can imply so great a lapse of time, as intervened between Passover and Passover.

On the other hand it has been argued, that the feast, mentioned in ver. 1, was a Passover, from what Jesus says to his disciples at Sychar (John iv. 35.) "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest." From this expression it is supposed that it then wanted four months to harvest; that is, to the Passover, at which time the Jews' barley harvest began (Lev. xxiii. 11, &c.); consequently the next of the three great feasts of the Jews would be that of the Passover; and as Christ had so lately left Jerusalem for fear of the Jews, it is concluded, by those who maintain this opinion, that no other inducement but that of a great feast would have carried him thither so soon again. In reply to this, it is said, that our Saviour in these words merely alluded to a proverbial expression among the Jews, that between the seedtime and harvest there elapsed a period of four months. And, from the context, we are still more induced to suppose it was a prevailing idiom, signifying there was no necessity for delay; that the fields were already ripe, and ready for the laborers to begin their work, figuratively alluding to his reception among the Samaritans. The words, "lift up your eyes and look upon the fields, for they are white already to harvest," seem most pointedly to refer to the actual appearance of the surrounding country; for it does not appear probable, particularly as our Saviour was accustomed to draw his illustrations from surrounding objects, that he would have adopted this metaphor had he been encompassed with the desolation of winter, or that season of the year which preceded harvest.

The history, therefore, of this portion of our Lord's ministry, is as follows: at his first Passover he went up to Jerusalem, and continued in Judæa for two or three weeks after it, baptizing, "though he himself baptized not, but his disciples" (John iv. 2.) His rapid and extensive success having excited the observation of the Pharisees, he thought it prudent to quit Judæa, and passing through Samaria in the midst of the harvest, impressed upon his disciples the readiness of the Samaritans to receive his doctrines, by an illustration very beautifully drawn from the scenes and operations which were passing before them. He then continued his journey into Galilee (it was but a three days' journey from Jerusalem to Galilee), and, after remaining there for a few weeks, returned again to Jerusalem, according to Cyril and Chrysostom, to celebrate the feast of Pentecost, or, according to others, at a somewhat later period to celebrate the feast of Tabernacles.

The most formidable objection to the supposition that the miracle at the pool of Bethesda, and the subsequent plucking of the ears of corn, took place at the feast of Pentecost, is given by Archbishop Newcome. This author supposes that a whole year probably elapsed between the conversation with Nicodemus at the first Passover, and the miracle at Bethesda; and he gives a calculation of the probable periods that he supposes must have transpired between the several events; allowing the shortest time possible for each. According to this calculation, he makes it appear that four months and a half must at least be allowed; and, as the Pentecost was only fifty days after the Passover, this statement alone will be sufficient to prove that the miracle at the pool of Bethesda could not have been wrought at Pentecost. I have endeavoured to compress his reasoning within the shortest compass.

After the Passover in which Christ conversed with Nicodemus, we read, John iii. 22., that Christ remained in Judæa, and baptized, that is, his disciples who were with him baptized, (John iv. 2.) Now, as his disciples were not at that time with him (for Andrew, Peter, James, and John were not yet called), he must first have collected disciples before he baptized; and as he continued there till he had baptized more disciples than John, it is not improbable that our Lord staid in Judæa for at least one month.

To this it may be answered, that there were many who followed Christ, and many, though they had seen his miracles, who forsook him, whose names are not mentioned. The sacred narratives leave out so many events, and sometimes glance so slightly at many of the most important, that it is not at all improbable our Lord may have been followed from Jerusalem by many, who professed themselves his disciples for a time, and baptized in his name, yet who left him as others had done, because he did not fulfil the expectations they had previously formed of the Messiah. Their notions were so contradictory, that we may very naturally suppose they were satisfied with the miraculous proofs he gave that he was more than a prophet; but they were discontented with the continued subjection of their country to the Romans, and the poverty and lowliness of our Lord himself. It is not necessary therefore to suppose that his twelve apostles, or any of them, attended him. Many who had seen, or had been assured of the miracle of the driving the buyers and sellers from the temple, might have followed him. The first intelligence of the open evident revival of miracles would have attracted the inhabitants of the surrounding districts in such numbers, that those who were baptized by Christ's disciples would soon exceed those who were baptized by John; and as the jealousy of the Jews would be soon excited, more especially as our Lord had now begun to be the object of public attention, there is no reasonable cause why a month should be the period of his residence in Judæa; seven or ten days would be amply sufficient.

The tour from Judæa, through Samaria to Galilee, Archbishop Newcome supposes must have occupied at least seven days. The distance from Judæa to Samaria is about sixty miles, from thence to Cana fifty more. It appears from John iv. 40 and 43, that our Lord remained at Samaria two days; seven days, therefore, will be sufficient to allow for this journey.

At Cana, Archbishop Newcome supposes, our Lord remained four days at least, to allow time for the nobleman of Capernaum (which was about thirty-five miles distant) to hear of our Lord's miracles, and to send the message to him respecting his son, the answer returned, &c. Four days, we may well suppose, would be occupied in the transactions related in John iv. 46. to the end.

The archbishop allows eight days for the teaching in the synagogues, mentioned Luke iv. 15., and four for the sojourning at Nazareth, Luke iv. 16. His arguments on these points are satisfactory.

Three weeks are allowed by this divine as the time of our Lord's remaining at Capernaum, Matt. iv. 13.; because it is said, "He dwelt there." But it seems to have escaped his attention, that the expression in the original, κατόκησεν εἰς Καπερναὺμ, does not uniformly mean, he took up his constant residence. The word κατοικέω sometimes denotes, to remain in a place for a short time, to reside as a guest. It appears probable that our Lord might have been invited to Capernaum, to the house of the nobleman whose son he had cured. We learn, in Matt. viii. 20., that Christ had not where to lay his head, that is, he had no habitation which he could call his own. We are informed that he dwelt at Capernaum: but the word, in the original, does not imply that he continued there for so long a period as three weeks. It is more probable that the house of the nobleman, who is supposed to have been Herod's steward, served but as a temporary residence; from whence he might conveniently visit other parts of Galilee. When we remember the diligence with which our Lord attended to the immediate design of his mission, it seems more likely that he staid at Capernaum three or four days; after which he proceeded on his tour through Galilee, from whence, when he returned, he might again go back to Capernaum. This plan would fully justify the expression of the Evangelist, that "he dwelt there." In addition to the three weeks allotted by Archbishop Newcome for our Saviour's residence at Capernaum, a period of one month is assigned to his tour through Galilee. This, however, is quite uncertain. Mark i. 38, 39. describes the same tour through Galilee, and relates the return of our Lord to Capernaum after some days, Mark ii. 1., δὲ ἡμερῶν an indefinite expression, which may possibly signify a month, but may, with greater propriety, be supposed to denote a much less time. The circuit of Galilee may be considered seventy miles in extent; if we allow ten miles a day, the tour round Galilee, till the return to Capernaum, when Matthew was called, and our Lord left Galilee for Jerusalem, will be fourteen days. The whole time, therefore, between the conversation with Nicodemus, and the event we have been considering, may be easily comprised within the compass of seven weeks; and the feast at which the miracle at the pool of Bethesda was wrought, might have been, and most probably was, not the Passover but the Pentecost.

Pilkington places this cure at the pool of Bethesda, or Beth-Chesda, immediately after the temptation (Evang. History, note to sect. 57.), supposing, as the event took place in Judæa, it was in the first visit there. But he has produced no authority for his supposition, which may be considered as merely arbitrary.

NOTE 32.—PART III.

THE authenticity of this passage has been much disputed among divines; some having considered it as an interpolation, which was inserted from the marginal notes, illustrative of the popular superstition. Doddridge, from Jerome, supposes the pool to be partly mineral, and used for general bathing, and that it was endued with a miraculous power some time before the ministry of Christ; and that after this miracle, or after the rejection, or the passion of Christ, its virtue ceased.—Lightfoot remarks: to these waters flowing from Siloām, as a type of the Messiah, it might please God to give this miraculous virtue some time before “He that was sent appeared,” (John ix. 7.); that this pool was first laid by Solomon, Josephus, De Bel. lib. 5. cap. 13, compared with Nehemiah iii., and at first called Solomon’s Pool, or now Bethesda, or the Place of Mercy, from its beneficial virtue. He adds, that the fountain Gihon (1 Kings i. 33.) is also named Siloām, Chald. Paraph. ad loc. Thus R. Solomon and D. Kimchi, Gihon is Siloām. The spring, divided into two streams, fed at some distance two pools of water, the lower pool, to the west of Jerusalem, called the Pool of Siloām, John ix. 7. Neh. iii. 15., and formed by Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxxii. 30.; and the upper pool, named the Pool of Solomon, or the Old Pool, Isaiah xxii. 11., to the southeast, which is this Pool of Bethesda. Solomon was anointed king at Gihon (1 Kings i. 45.), and the waters of Siloām were held in such estimation among the Jews, that the prophets made them a type of the kingdom of David and of Christ (Isaiah xii. 3. and viii. 6.), which is thus explained by the Targum, or Chaldee Paraphrase: “The kingdom of David that rules them quietly.” The whole of this transaction was typical of Christ. He is the true Bethesda, or House of Mercy, the fountain (foretold by Zech. xiii. 1.) open to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness, unto which all the poor, the blind, the impotent, are invited to come, to receive health, and strength, and life eternal.

Bishop Marsh, however, is of opinion (Introd. to N. T. vol. ii. p. 732, note 118.), that the fourth verse is spurious, “from its being omitted in the Codex Bezae and the Codex Vaticanus, which are the two most ancient MSS. now extant. It is likewise omitted in the Codex Ephrem (which is inferior in age to the Codex Bezae,) but written in the margin as a scholion; it is written in more modern MSS. in the text, but marked with an asterisk, or obelus, as suspicious; and in MSS. still more modern, it is written without any mark, which gives us (he concludes) the various gradations by which it has acquired its place in our present text, and a certain proof that the verse was originally nothing more than a marginal scholion, and of course spurious.” Verse four is likewise omitted in the Camb. MS. Copt., and is marked with an asterisk, or appears only in the margin of five, or six, of the Paris MSS. But in every other MS., and in all the versions, and Greek Scholiasts, Clemens Alexandrinus, Jerome, and St. Augustin, its authenticity is established.—See Elsley in loc. and Mr. Penn’s work on the Mosaical Geology, the last in which the subject is discussed.

NOTE 33.—PART III.

THIS was contrary to the letter of the Law, Jer. xvii. 21, 22., and extremely so to the traditions: for, according to them, he that carrieth any thing on the Sabbath, in his right hand or left, or in his bosom, or upon his shoulder, he is guilty. Talmud. in Lab. per 10. In this the man’s faith was tried, for in taking up his bed he risked death or scourging. Our Saviour here assumes the power of a prophet, who, the Jews held, had a right to infringe the rest of the Sabbath; justifying it from Joshua surrounding Jericho seven successive days with the ark.—Grotius, Whitby, in loc.

NOTE 34.—PART III.

IN this verse our Saviour fully declares to the Jews his Messiahship. Schœtgen considers the verse to be a continuation of a conversation which the Evangelist has omitted. The subject is the Sabbath. The words of our Lord, as the Jews perfectly understood, contain an assertion of his high office, in as plain terms as the plan of his ministry permitted. And none but a being who was invested with the offices and character of the Messiah, could have adopted such language without blasphemy. As my Father on the Sabbath day still continues the mighty works which are visible in the kingdom of his great creation, so do I likewise work in the spiritual kingdom which I am now establishing in the world. Since the day when the world was made, the sublime scheme of Providence has been maturing. God, the Creator, has been preserving the world, that his Church might be completed, and the spirits of mankind be admitted the companions of angels. God, the Son, has governed and directed the generations of Adam; imparting to them gradual revelations of his will, and appointing them institutions to preserve his mercy in their remembrance. Whether He spake by the prophets, Himself, or his apostles, He, like the God of the creation, never ceases to benefit mankind. God, the Holy Spirit, from the moment when the Angel Jehovah ordained the institution of sacrifice after the fall, has ever continued to make his appeal to the hearts of men, persuading and entreating them to accept the mercy provided for them by the mysterious atonement of the Divine Incarnate. The world was created and the plan of revelation was formed at the same time—they have their origin from the same God. His glory and the happiness of man are the objects with both; they began together, they continue together, but they will not end together. For as the soul is superior to the body, as God is superior to the universe, he has ordained that the body shall die, and the earth itself shall perish. The heavens shall pass away, but the spirit shall triumph in the ruins of the universe. The world continues till the Church is completed. The scaffolding shall be destroyed when the temple of God is built. With this system of truth the Jews were well acquainted. They knew that from the time the visible world was made, the Angel Jehovah had constantly guided the Church of God; and Christ, by the assertion in this verse, declared himself that Great Being who began to plan the happiness of mankind at the time when the Father created the world, and who continued equally with the Father to work for their benefit. I use this term, “to work,” because it is warranted by our Lord; and shall not stop to discuss the questions which have been proposed by metaphysicians, on the causes of the actions of the Deity. It may, however, be added, that we cannot entertain a more lofty notion of the Deity, than that He is eternally blessing myriads of animated worlds. Παύεται οὐδέποτε ποιεῖν ὁ Θεός· ἀλλ’ ὥσπερ ἴδιον τὸ κατεῖν πυρὸς, καὶ χιόρος τὸ ψύχειν, οὕτω καὶ Θεοῦ τὸ ποιεῖν. God never ceases from action; but as it is the property of fire to burn, and of the snow to chill, so is it the property of the Deity to act and do.—Philo, De Alleg. lib. ii. apud Schoetgen. Hor. Hebr. vol. i. p. 354.

NOTE 35.—PART III.

MR. MANN, in his Dissertation on the true Year of Christ's Death, has asserted that the sixth chapter of St. John ought to be placed before the fifth. He imagines a connexion between John iv. 54., where we read, “This is again the second miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judæa into Galilee;” and ch. vi. 1. “After these things Jesus went over the sea of Galilee, which is the sea of Tiberias.” This alteration is very suspicious, as it is proposed to defend the hypothesis maintained in his work, that the ministry of Christ lasted only sixteen months, and in it two Passovers only were observed. Neither is the supposition at all warranted by the argument. For our Lord, as Doddridge (vol. i. p. 411.) has well remarked, frequently changed his place, and came back again to that which he had formerly visited. It is inconsistent too with his own hypothesis, because, according to that which he has adopted in the harmony, “Christ had crossed the sea to Gergesa, and dispossessed the legion, after the cure of the nobleman's son, and long before the passing over the sea, that is here referred to (which was plainly not to Gergesa, but to the desert of Bethsaida), so that there is no shadow of a reason for such an unexampled transposition, which has no copy or version to support it.” So far Doddridge, who refers to the subject in other notes in his Expositor, to which it is not necessary now to refer.

NOTE 36.—PART III.

THE plucking of the ears of corn is mentioned by St. Matthew as an isolated circumstance. He has placed it in the midst of a tour through Galilee, without asserting that it took place there. The phrase, on the contrary, with which the narration is introduced, will remarkably harmonize with the order assigned to it by the other Evangelists. St. Matthew does not say, ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, but ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ ἐπορεύθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοῖς σάββασι διὰ τῶν σπορίμων. A phrase which by no means connects the plucking of the ears of corn with the event related, either before or after that circumstance. It is related by St. Mark after the feast in the house of St. Matthew, and St. Luke follows the same arrangement, adding, that the ears of corn were plucked after some great festival. As there is no other festival mentioned in the New Testament to which this allusion could be made, but that which is given in its chronological order in John v., I have followed the general authority of the harmonizers and placed this event in the present section.

It is evident that the disciples did not pluck the ears before the Passover. It was particularly forbidden to gather any corn before the sheaf of the first fruits had been waved in the temple; the Jews would undoubtedly have reproached them, had they cause for so doing, with this twofold violation of the Law, the plucking the corn before the time allowed, and the doing so also on the Sabbath; whereas they confined themselves only to the latter charge. According to their canons^c, he that reapeth corn on the Sabbath, to the quantity of a fig, is guilty. And plucking corn is as reaping: and whosoever plucketh up anything from it while growing, is guilty.

The Jews, in the days of our Lord, had, for the most part, lost sight of the spirit of their Law, and burthened the people with a number of severe and superstitious observances. Their traditional laws respecting the Sabbath were intolerably minute and wearisome. The greater part of them are collected by Dr. Wotton, in his work on the Misna, among which is the following prohibition, which our Lord and his disciples were accused of violating. It is to be found in the Schabbath^d. העושה מלאכות הרבה מעין מלאכה אחת אינו חייב אלא חטאת אחת He that doth several works under one principal head is guilty only of one sin. The Jewish masters divided works, as they relate to the Sabbath, into principal and secondary, or, as they called them, fathers and children of works. If a man does one principal work and twenty secondary ones, it is, according to them, but one sin, and consequently deserves one punishment: thus, to grind is a principal work. All dividing of things before united in their nature come under this head. The second section goes on to enumerate thirty-nine principal works forbidden on the Sabbath: the first eight of which are, sowing, ploughing, reaping, binding, threshing, winnowing, cleaning, grinding; under which last term they included the action of our Lord and his disciples. But not only was this action forbidden in the traditional law, it was prohibited likewise in that of Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 21. Our Lord, therefore, in his reply to the Jews, asserted his superiority over the traditions of the elders, and his power of dispensing with the Mosaic Law. He declares to them that he was Lord of the Sabbath. He it was who had enacted this very Law of Moses, in one of those appearances which are justly called the preludes to his incarnation^e, and he now claims dominion over the Law which he had made. By the same power which enacted, he abrogated, or dispensed, with that Law, as it was interpreted by the rigid superstitions of the elders. He restored it to its true use; allowing works of necessity and mercy to be wrought on that day, and declaring that the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath. To prove to them that such was the spirit, though not the letter of the Law, he refers them to their own customs for the justice of his assertion, to the example of David, the practice of the priests, and their own legal violations of that day, when it suited either their convenience or their interest^f.

The plan of this work prevents me from directing the attention of the reader to the devotional reflections, so evidently arising from the magnificent and interesting narrative of the conduct of our Lord during his more permanent incarnation; or it would be easy to fill many pages to an indefinite extent. Yet I would earnestly desire to remind every clerical reader of the admirable sentiments quoted by Lightfoot on this passage—the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath, and are guiltless—עבודה שהיא לשם קדושים אין עבודה שרילה. The servile work which is done in holy things is not servile; and אין שבות במקדש כלל, there is no rest at all in the service of the temple. The meanest office in the temple of God, the most laborious drudgery that aims in its result to be useful to man, is the most honorable and elevated happiness to which a human being can aspire. The clergy are especially called upon, in an age of religious indifference, to the active performance of their arduous duties. Their sacred calling dignifies the men. They are separated from among their brethren; they are admitted into the holy of holies, in communion with God himself. The service of God is the highest honor, and it is a service which will continue for ever. The remembrance of the manner in which it is performed will remain with the consciousness that defies the grave. The happiness that arises from the recollection of a life devoted to these duties will increase with the enlargement of our faculties, and the gradual perfection of our nature in that immortal state of our existence, which has been provided for mankind by the mercy of the Son of God.

second, that of Scaliger, Lightfoot, Casaubon, and Whitby, that it was the first Sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread. The third, of Grotius and Hammond, that it was the day of Pentecost falling on a Sabbath. The last opinion is adopted in the present arrangement. To this opinion the greatest objection is, that the harvest would probably be over before the Pentecost: but Grotius remarks, that the wheat harvest was going on at the Pentecost, which on this account was called "the Feast of Harvest," Exodus xxiii. 16. Though loaves made of new bread were presented at Pentecost, this will not prove that the harvest was entirely gathered in. The wheat plucked by the disciples might have been among the last ripe corn of that season^g.

this passage, is by no means conclusive against the opinion of Michaelis. "Preferenda esset sine dubio hæc explicatio si Marcus addidisset verbum γεγραπται, vel λέγει ἡ γραφή, ut Rom. xi. 2."—Bishop Marsh seems to incline to this opinion: but though the Evangelists generally adopt this mode of expressing themselves, it is not uniformly done. The contradiction is again variously reconciled by other commentators. Some suppose that Abiathar was the priest, and Ahimelech the high priest, and that Ahimelech was called Ahimelech Abiathar, אבִי־אֶחֱמֶלֶךְ, father understood; and Abiathar was called Abiathar Ahimelech, אֶחֱמֶלֶךְ, son understood; and others reconcile the histories by supposing that they both officiated in the high priesthood, and the name of the office was indiscriminately applied to either.

NOTE 38.—PART III.

MICHAELIS remarks on these words, "in the days of Abiathar the high priest," that the mode of quoting the books of the Old Testament is sometimes so rabbinical, that a critic, acquainted only with the Greek, cannot understand it: as the fact here related of David did not take place in the priesthood of Abiathar, but in that of his father Ahimelech. To account for this apparent inaccuracy, Michaelis^h considers the words, "in the days of Abiathar the high priest," as a mere rabbinism. The rabbis were accustomed to select some principal word out of each section, and apply that name to the section itself.

"Rashi, for instance, in his remarks on Hosea ix. 9., says, some are of opinion that the town here mentioned is Gibeon of Benjamin, in the concubine, or, as it is in our version, Judges xix. 14., זֶה נִכְעַן בְּנִימִין בְּפִלְגֶשׁ (Michaelis ought to have said גִּבְעֹנָה).

"The same Rabbi observes on Psalm ii. 7., כִּמוֹ שְׁנֹאמַר בְּאַבְנֵר כֹּה אָמַר יְהוָה בְּיַד דָּוִד אוֹשִׁיעַ 'As is said in Abner, the Lord spake, through David I will deliver Israel.' Abenezra on Hosea iv. 9., says, בְּאוֹמֵר כִּמּוֹן עָלִי, 'As is said near Eli.' In this manner quotations are sometimes made in the New Testament. Mark xii. 26., ὁ δὲ ἀρέργουτε ἐν τῇ βίβλῳ Μωϋσέως, ἐπὶ τοῦ βύτου Rom. xi. 2. "Ἡ δὲ οὐδαὶ ἐν Ἡλλὰ ἢ λέγει ἡ γραφή and the above mentioned passage in St. Mark, which has been thought to contain a contradiction, may be explained 'in the chapter of Abiathar,' or in that part of the Book of Samuel where the history of Abiathar is related."

NOTE 39.—PART III.

THIS section is inserted here on the authority of all the harmonizers. It is placed next to the plucking the ears of corn by each of the Evangelists. Our Lord, by action and miracle, here enforced what he had already urged, the superiority of the spirit of the Law to the tradition of the elders. It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day appears to be in direct opposition to the very extraordinary decision of the school of Schammai. Let no one console the sick or visit the mourning on the Sabbath day. It was principally against the decisions of this school that our Lord spake; for the school of Hillel had in some respects decided otherwise. By some canons of the Jewish Law, it was permitted to the people to prepare medicine, and to perform any service which was required for the actual preservation of life.

NOTE 40.—PART III.

THIS section is placed here on the concurrent testimony of all the harmonizers. The scriptural authority is to be found in Matt. xii. 15. Christ withdrew himself for a time in consequence of the enmity of the Pharisees and Herodians, which had been excited by his instructions concerning the observance of the Sabbath.

In this section we read, Mark iii. 11.—"Unclean spirits, when they saw him, fell down before him," &c. Is it probable that if these were madmen only, they would be charged by our Lord not to make him known? The exclamations and ravings of the insane are ever disregarded. There would be no meaning in this command, if we consider it as addressed to those only who were deprived of reason. It must have been addressed to those who were capable of comprehending it, that is, to evil spirits, which were visible to Christ, though invisible to mere men. It is easy on this interpretation, the only one indeed which is supported by the express language of Scripture, to understand on what account the evil spirits trembled at his appearance. They had seen and known our Lord in his preëxistent state—they knew the effect of his humiliation—they shrank back from the rays of his glory, though it was shrouded under the veil of his humanity. He refused to receive the testimony of evil spirits. His kingdom was to be established by the quiet submission of the human understanding to the silent but resistless evidence of miracle, prophecy, and his own blameless submission to the will of his heavenly Father.

This view of the subject is confirmed by Luke iv. 41. as translated by Dr. Owen, οὐκ ἔβαλον λαλεῖν, ὅτι ᾔδεισαν, “and would not suffer them to say that they knew him to be the Christ.” Dr. Owen ap. Bowyer’s Conjectures.

NOTE 41.—PART III.

It is to be remarked here, that our Saviour never undertook any important work without dedicating himself to God in prayer. After imploring the divine blessing, he authoritatively separates the chosen witnesses of the truth of his Gospel, and confirms his power by the performance of numberless miracles. When the twelve apostles were appointed, and his divine mission fully demonstrated, he declares the doctrines he came to establish in what is generally called his Sermon on the Mount.

Matthew (v. 1.) observes, Jesus sate down after he had ascended the mountain: Luke tells us that he stood on the plain. There is no inconsistency, however, between these narratives. Our Saviour might have stood up to heal the sick, and, to avoid the pressure of the multitude who sought to touch him (Luke vi. 19.), he probably retired again to the mountain, and addressed the assembled crowd seated.

The various cures and miracles wrought by our Lord, we may well suppose, would have much increased the number of his followers.

NOTE 42.—PART III.

A BRIEF statement of the reasons which induce me to follow the opinion of Archbishop Newcome, Lightfoot, Pilkington, Michaelis, Bishop Richardson, and others, contrary to the authority of Doddridge and Bedford, may be found in Archbishop Newcome’s notes to the Harmony. Michaelisⁱ observes, “that the Sermon on the Mount recorded by St. Luke is no other than that recorded by St. Matthew, appears from the events which immediately follow it. Both Evangelists relate that Jesus after the sermon went into Capernaum, and healed the servant of a centurion; a cure attended with such remarkable circumstances, that I can hardly suppose it happened twice, and that too in the same city.”

It is objected by Bedford and others, that the discourse in Matthew is different from that in St. Luke, as the former is delivered by our Lord while sitting on a mountain, but the latter standing on a plain, Matt. v. 1. compare with Luke vi. 17. But Dr. Clarke, on this latter place, has suggested “that Jesus might retire from them again to the top of the hill.” And Dr. Priestley observes, “Matthew’s saying that Jesus sate down after he had gone up the mountain, and Luke’s saying that he stood on the plain when he healed the sick before the discourse, are no inconsistencies.”

St. Luke principally relates those parts of this discourse which were more peculiarly addressed to the disciples. It is remarkable that he has mentioned only two of the beatitudes. Markland^k supposes that the discourses were the same, and delivered at the same time; but one Evangelist chose to mention one part, and one the other, as is done in various other places. These two beatitudes mentioned by St. Luke were delivered to the disciples as such; in which view, though we cannot certainly tell how the parts were connected by our Saviour when he spoke it, yet it may be supposed to have been something like this. “Happy are ye, though ye be very poor (Luke), especially those who are poor in spirit (Matthew).—Happy are ye, though ye be hungry now (Luke), especially those who hunger and thirst after righteousness (Matthew).”

The general interpretation of the word poor in St. Luke is usually considered to be given by St. Matthew. It seems more probable that our Lord used the words οἱ πτωχοὶ, and οἱ πενιτῶντες, and διψῶντες, and that St. Matthew wrote the expressions in their metaphorical, and St. Luke in their literal sense. Markland, however, supposes that our Lord used the words mentioned by St. Matthew, τῷ πνεύματι, and καὶ δικαιοσύνην, and I have united on his suggestion the words of both Evangelists.

As the high priest, passing through the holy place when he went up to the holy of holies to consult the oracle, heard the voice as of a man speaking from the mercy seat, so in contemplating this portion of the New Testament, we seem to have passed on to the most spiritual communication of God to man. Freed from the types and shadows of the Mosaic Law, and rescued from the cloudy traditions and perversions of the Pharisees, the light of the sun of truth breaks forth in all its splendor. We hear, from an infallible oracle, the utter overthrow and refutation of all the false glosses and rabbinical corruptions which had so long perverted the spirit of the divine Law. To enter into a long and labored examination of the various precepts contained in this address would be merely to transcribe the commentaries of Whitby, Lightfoot, Grotius, and others. The plan of this work precludes me from entering at length into the interpretations of a more general nature. It may, however, be useful to remark a circumstance which has not been much discussed by these commentators; and that is the thorough contrast between the Messiah and the worldly teachers of the Jewish people. The rabbis were accustomed to prefer as their pupils and disciples, the talented, the learned, the refined, and the wealthy: Christ selected the rude and unlearned, the unpolished and the poor. The rabbis scorned to associate with the despised and hated publican; Christ enrolled the neglected and hated publican among his chosen disciples. The wickedness of the nation increased, in spite of the learning of their teachers, because those teachers were corrupt, and proud, and worldly: the Church of Christ was established in holiness, because its first teachers, though ignorant and rude, were disinterested, humble, and spiritual. Rites and ceremonies had usurped the place of the prayer of the heart, and the homage of a holy life: Christ enforced the meaning of the Law, and exalted devotion and virtue above vows and sacrifices, and all the observances of superstition. The priests were endeavouring to make the Law worldly, the Messiah made it spiritual. They would have changed the Law of God into an encouragement of the propensities of the animal or inferior nature of man: Christ taught them that the entire conquest of this nature was required by their Father in heaven. The priests encouraged, under the appearance of strict obedience to the Law, ingratitude to parents, revenge, facility of divorce, and other evils: Christ commanded them to honor their parents, though they had vowed the dedication of their substance to God, Matt. xv. 5., he commanded love to their enemies, and self dominion over the most powerful passions. He offended at the same time no prejudices—he taught them to pray in a selection from their own liturgical services; he exhorts them to the fulfilment, even to the very letter, of their ritual Law. He taught in plain and simple language, such as his hearers instantly understood, and the most ignorant and unlearned in this age (with but little exception, arising from the passages particularly referring to the Jewish customs) can still thoroughly comprehend. Our Lord has here given a code of laws to the world, obedience to which will for ever annihilate all superstitious dependence upon every other mode of aspiring to the favor of the Almighty, than by aiming at spirituality of motive and holiness of life. Not even the blood of the atonement will save that man from the effects of evil, who professes to believe and hope, without repentance and anxious exertion.

NOTE 43.—PART III.

THE meaning of the word εὐαγγελισται in this passage is thought by some to be—preachers of the new covenant, who reconciled the two dispensations; who were not to enter upon the obscure and useless discussions of points of the ceremonial Law, but to preach the sublimer doctrines of the Gospel. In Ephes. vi. 15. and ii. 14. an allusion seems to be made to this idea. Vide Schoetgen. vol. i. p. 18.

NOTE 44.—PART III.

SCHOETGEN has favored the world with a laborious and learned treatise on this difficult passage. It was the peculiar characteristic of our Lord's teaching, that he drew his illustrations from common objects, which were either in all probability in the presence of his hearers when he addressed them, or were well known from their familiarity and frequency. This passage contains an allusion to salt which has lost its savour, and is afterwards trodden under foot as useless. Now salt, generally speaking, may be said never to lose its savour; neither can it be said to be trodden under foot. It is true, that Mr. Maundrell has informed us that, when he passed through the valley of salt, he broke off a part that had long been exposed to the rain and the sun, and it had perfectly lost its savour, though the inner part retained it; and we may suppose that this useless salt was trodden under foot. This, however, seems to be a much more recondite and abstruse meaning than we commonly meet in our Lord's addresses to the people; neither would the poor and ignorant, whom he was addressing, immediately perceive the aptness of the allusion. The interpretation of Schoetgenius, therefore, appears much more probable. The people would be familiarly acquainted with every custom connected with the temple service, and any allusion to any part of it would be readily understood and remembered. There was a kind of salt used in Judæa, which was principally composed of the bitumen obtained from the Asphaltite Lake. This salt, or bitumen, which had a fragrant odor, was strewn in great quantities over the sacrifices, both to prevent inconvenience to the priests and to the worshippers from the smell of the burning flesh, and to quicken the action of the fire, that the sacrifice might be more quickly consumed. Great quantities of this bituminous preparation lay in its appointed place in the temple, and was easily damaged. The virtue of the salt was soon lost by exposure to the effect of the sun and air, and it was then sprinkled over the pavement in the temple, to prevent the feet of the priests from slipping, during the performance of the service. Schoetgen. Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. i. p. 18–24.

NOTE 45.—PART III.

OUR Lord here confers on his apostles the same epithet as the Jews bestowed on their most distinguished teachers. That is, he had decreed that his apostles should take the place of the corrupt teachers of the Jewish Law. The Messiah gave to his apostles, rude, ignorant, and despised fishermen and publicans, the rank and title of their proud countrymen—"Light of the world, נר עולם" said the disciples of Rabbi Jochanan ben Saccai, "Why do you weep?" &c. Schoetgen. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 25.

NOTE 46.—PART III.

HERE are three gradations of crimes mentioned by our Lord, and three degrees of punishment respectively annexed to each. The first is causeless anger, unaccompanied with any abusive expressions to aggravate it; the second may be supposed to arise from the same source, increased by an exclamation, which denotes the triumph of vanity, mixed with insult and contempt; the third seems naturally to rise one degree higher, and occasions the opprobrious epithet, "Thou fool." The two former, we may observe, are threatened with the temporal punishment or animadversion of the Jewish tribunals, the Council and the Judgment, which were now deprived of the power of life and death, and could therefore take cognizance only of minor offences.

Now, it is highly analogous to our Saviour's reasoning to suppose, that the punishment annexed to the last crime would be of a temporal nature also, particularly as it can only be considered as an abuse of speech, like that of the preceding, though in a more aggravated form. On the contrary, to imagine that, for the distinction between "Raca," and "Thou fool," our blessed Lord should instantly pass from such a sentence as the Jewish Sanhedrin could pronounce, to the awful doom of eternal punishment in hell fire is what cannot be reconciled to any rational rule of faith, or known measure of justice. But a critical examination of the original text will remove this difficulty.

What we render "in danger of hell fire," is in the Greek, ἐροχος ἔσαι εἰς τὴν γέενναν τῆς πυρός, "shall be liable to the Gehenna of fire;" or, "the fire of Gehenna." It is well known that Gehenna is not a pure Greek word but a compound formed of γῆ, land, and a proper name to correspond with the Hebrew expression the valley of Hinnom, or rather from the two Hebrew words נַחַל, a valley, and חִנּוֹם, Hinnom, the name of its possessor. (See Schleusner in Γέεννα, and Lightfoot's Chorogr. Cent. ch. xxxix.) In this desecrated spot the Jews burnt bones, the dead carcasses of animals, the refuse and offal of the numerous victims, &c., and from the loathsome scene which this place exhibited, as well as from the fires which were kept constantly burning there, it was frequently used as the emblem or symbol of hell, and of hell torments in a state of eternity. But our blessed Lord may well be supposed to use it here in its literal sense, without any reference to its metaphorical meaning; and this will serve to clear the text of its supposed difficulty. For, when we consider what immense quantities of half-putrid and offensive animal substances must have been consumed in that valley, to prevent contagion in so hot a climate, and in such a city as Jerusalem, we may with certainty infer that a great number of persons must be constantly employed in carrying all kinds of filth and offal to the spot, in supplying fuel, in attending on the fires, &c.

Now this must have been the lowest, most degrading, and offensive employment, in the estimation of a Jew, to which any human being could be devoted; and to this wretched state Christ declares, that he who indulges himself in the habit of treating his fellow-creatures with insolence and contempt is in danger of coming. It is a common saying, that a man would rather be thought a knave than a fool; the appellation of "Thou fool," therefore, is attended with a degree of insult that is not easily forgiven; and he who practises such abuses of the tongue must every where expect to find an enemy instead of a friend; till at length he sinks to the most loathsome offices that can be allotted to him, in order to gain a wretched subsistence.

This exposition derives further countenance from the use of the Greek adjective, ἐροχος, in the original, which, connected with the future, ἔσαι, may mean, shall be held, or bound, as a slave is to his master.—See Hewlett's Commentary in loc. Matt. v. 22.

NOTE 47.—PART III.

It has excited surprise among some writers, that the Gospels should be written in Greek instead of the Syriac, or Aramaic, or Syro-Chaldee dialect. The observation will only apply to St. Matthew's Gospel; the three other Evangelists addressed their Gospels to Grecian or Roman converts. But the necessity of adopting the Greek language, as the dialect of all others most universally spoken, will appear from the remarkable fact, that the Jewish writers who were contemporary with our Lord, or the immediate successors of the apostles, have used many Greek words in their Hebrew, apparently without knowing that the Greek was foreign to their language. Many instances have occurred of this kind among the extracts I have met in Dr. Gill, Lightfoot, and Schoetgen, though it did not seem necessary to observe them. I have, however, collected some few.

Many others might be selected from the writers who have endeavoured to illustrate Scripture from the talmudical writings; but these are sufficient to justify us in asserting that the Greek language was in general use in Judæa, as well as in other parts of the Roman empire; and was the language therefore most suitable to the designs of the Evangelists.

NOTE 49.—PART III.

THAT the cure related in Matt. viii. 5. is the same as that recorded in Luke vii. 1-11. is affirmed by Lightfoot, Newcome, Doddridge, and Michaelis. There is such a perfect agreement between the speeches and circumstances, that the great majority of the harmonizers have considered the narrative of St. Luke as a more extended history only of that of St. Matthew.

Pilkington supports the arrangement adopted by Newcome and the other harmonizers. There is, he observes, a seeming difference in the evangelical accounts, relating to the application which the centurion made to Christ, in favor of his servant. St. Luke expressly saith, that the application was first made to Christ by the rulers of the Jews, and afterwards by some other friends of the centurion, whom he sent to Jesus; whereas St. Matthew relates the matter as a conference carried on between our Saviour and the centurion himself in person. In order to reconcile which, some have supposed they are two several facts that are related. But I cannot think that the difference betwixt the evangelical accounts in this particular is sufficient to vindicate that opinion, as they agree in all the other circumstances; and especially as they are easily reconcileable without such a supposition: for, (1.) Though St. Matthew relates that to be done by the centurion himself which he did by the mediation of other persons, yet we know this to be what is common in all writers, without any imputation upon their correctness; and that a message sent by another person, and an answer from him received, may be properly enough related, as what is transacted directly between the parties concerned. (2.) We find (in an instance that admits of no doubt) that St. Matthew sometimes chose to make use of this way of expressing himself; for he tells us, xi. 3. that "John (when he was shut up in prison) sent two of his disciples to Jesus, and said unto him." (3.) St. Mark also, in the same manner, relates that "the sons of Zebedee came unto Jesus, saying," &c. x. 35. Whereas we are particularly informed by St. Matthew, that the application there mentioned, was made to our Saviour by the mother of Zebedee's children in their behalf. And the same allowances being made for latitude of expression, there can be no difficulty in reconciling the accounts connected in this section; for, though the particular circumstances were as St. Luke relates them, yet St. Matthew appears not to have expressed himself in an improper or an uncommon manner.

The scriptural authority for placing here the

LIGHTFOOT and Schoetgen have shown, at length, that the various clauses of the Lord's Prayer were similar to, and were probably bor-cure of the centurion's servant, is taken from Luke vii. 1, &c.

A curious specimen of the daring and unallowable boldness of German criticism is given by Michaelis, in his Remarks on the probable Position of the Cure of the Leper, mentioned by St. Matthew as taking place after the sermon on the mount. He remarks, "St. Mark and St. Luke relate this fact on a totally different occasion, because they were unacquainted with the time, and St. Luke even with the place where it happened¹." Such criticisms are, or ought to be, destructive of all dependence on the author who proposes them.

NOTE 50.—PART III.

THIS event is inserted here on the joint authorities of Lightfoot, Newcome, Pilkington, and Doddridge. Michaelis, on what account it is difficult to say, has arranged it next to the departure from Capernaum, noticed Mark i. 35-39. Bishop Marsh justly observes, "That the propriety of some of Michaelis's transpositions might be called in question^m."

The Scriptural authority for placing this event in the present section is derived from Luke vii. 11. the day after.

In the Sermon on the Mount the Messiah had asserted his authority as a lawgiver; on coming down from the mountain he proves his power by healing the servant of the centurion, while he is at a distance from him; and, immediately after, by the stupendous miracle of raising from the dead the son of the widow of Nain.

One very impressive consideration on the subject of our Lord's authority over the laws of nature, as displayed in the resurrection of the dead, seems to have escaped the inquiries of commentators. He demonstrated the truth of his wonderful assertion—that he was the resurrection and the life—that the dead should hear the voice of the Son of God, and that he would raise them up at the last day, &c., by his manifesting his power over all the gradations of corruption. Whether the daughter of Jairus was really dead or not has been disputed; she was either on the point of death, or had just died. Her restoration in the first case would have been a proof that our Lord could arrest the departing spirit: in the second that he could restore that spirit to the body immediately. This was the first stage of death. His power was next shown in the raising to life the widow's son. In that instance the body had been dead for a longer period: though, as the interment in that country took place very soon after death, it is probable that corruption had not begun. In the third miracle which our Lord wrought to demonstrate his power over the grave, the resurrection of Lazarus, corruption had already begun—the body was returning to its elements—the earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust. When the time had come that the Great Sacrifice was completed, the graves opened—the bodies of many who had expected the coming of Christ rose again, and after his resurrection went into the holy city. We cannot tell whether, in the interval between his death and resurrection, the mouldering fragments of their decayed forms remained in their narrow prisons in the same condition as when the ground first opened, or whether during that interval the scene which Ezekiel saw in vision was renewed; we cannot tell whether the flesh and the nerves and the skin again covered the renovated bones; and the scattered atoms were slowly and gradually reunited in one living mass—they rose from their graves as all mankind shall rise on the morning of the judgment day. And when all these proofs of his power had been effected, the greatest was yet to come. Christ raised up his own body, endued with powers and properties more than human. Lord of death and of life, he manifested to his followers, and he has revealed to us, that there are modes of existence and laws of body which we cannot comprehend. Sufficient only is disclosed to us to make us fear God and thank him for the hope of eternal life, through his manifested Son, the Lord of life and death.

NOTE 51.—PART III.

IN one of the MS. letters of Lord Barrington to Dr. Lardner, I meet with an argument in favor of the cessation of consciousness between death and the resurrection, derived from this history of the raising to life the widow's son. Our Lord is represented as raising the youth to life from the deep compassion he felt at the sight of his funeral. Lord Barrington reasons,—that if the soul was conscious in an intermediate state, then the widow's son, and Lazarus, and the bodies of the saints which rose at the resurrection of Christ, and went into the holy city, were brought from a condition of great happiness to undergo a second time the miseries of an inferior state of being; and their resurrection would be rather a source of sorrow than of joy. I mention this circumstance, because the argument is frequently urged by the Psychopannychists. The reply, however, to the objection, may be derived from a consideration of the cause, for which these various restorations to mortal life took place. It was not for the benefit of the deceased that their resurrection was accomplished, but for the strengthening the faith of the spectators of the miracle, and of the survivors and companions of the witnesses. If an objection be further proposed, that we never hear of any discoveries respecting the world of spirits from those who were raised from the dead, and that if their consciousness had not ceased, it is probable some of its mysteries would be disclosed; we answer, that every animated being is provided by his Creator with those faculties only, which are adapted to the condition which that Creator has assigned to him. The faculties which develop themselves in the next stage of our existence may be so utterly different from those we at present possess, that if a human being were restored to life he might be unable to relate them, or convey an idea concerning them to others. We are unable, even from the hints in Revelation, to form any idea of the invisible world. We seem to require other faculties to comprehend that which is all spiritual, yet possible in space; which defies all language, calculation, and comprehension. There is a beautiful idea in some Brahminical record concerning the Deity:—"I am like nothing human, with which to compare myself." So there is nothing in this state of existence which can enable us to comprehend the invisible world: it could not be understood, and therefore, if the mortal faculties only were restored to those who were raised from the dead, the things which are unseen could not be clothed in human language; they could not be remembered, they could not be imparted.

MS. letter of Lord Barrington to Dr. Lardner, dated Dec. 18, 1728, communicated to me by his son, the late bishop of Durham.

NOTE 52.—PART III.

THIS message of the Baptist is placed here on the joint authority of all the five harmonizers, whose united labors form the basis of this Arrangement. The internal evidence, that it is rightly placed, is deduced from the transition in Luke vii. 18. and the reply of our Lord to the disciples of the Baptist, in allusion to the miracle of raising the widow's son—the dead are raised (Luke vii. 22.) The commentators are divided in their opinion, whether the Baptist sent to Christ for his own satisfaction, or for that of his disciples. The opinion of those who espouse the latter of these appears much more probable, when we remember the Baptist's solemn testimony to Christ—the sign from heaven, and the miraculous impulse, which made John acknowledge Jesus as the Messiahⁿ.

Witsius has some very curious remarks on the dancing of Herodias, the place where the Baptist was confined^o, &c.

ⁿ Vide Doddridge, vol. i. p. 301.

^o Vide Witsius, De Vita Johannis, Exerc. Sacre, vol. ii. p. 554.

The Jewish writers mention the Baptist in language of respect and veneration. In addition to the testimony of Josephus, who observes that John was a good and pious man, who excited the Jews to the love of virtue, piety, and justice—pointing out the necessity of repentance, and enforcing, by baptism, habitual purity of soul and body. He imputes this imprisonment to the fear of Herod, his death to the instigation of Herodias, and the calamities that befel the army of Herod as the result of the divine vengeance for the death of the Baptist^p.

Rabbi David Ganz, the author of the celebrated work on Chronology, which is generally received among the Jews, and which is merely an attempt so to falsify the ancient chronology, that discredit shall be thrown upon the system received among Christians, calls John the Baptist the high priest; an error which is exposed in the notes by his learned editor Vorstius; who supposes that the name by which the Baptist was known among his countrymen, and referred to by Josephus, was מטביל qui baptizabat, vel baptista erat^q.

NOTE 55.—PART III.

SCHOETGEN is of opinion that these words are to be understood in their usual sense. So many obstacles were thrown in the way of those who were invited to become disciples of Christ, that all who would receive his religion were required to resist with labor and persevering violence every difficulty that presented itself. Every human power and institution were opposed to the establishment of the Gospel. Authority, manners, opinion, prejudice, were alike leagued against it.

The Pharisees condemned the religion of Christ, as inconsistent with many of their interpretations of Scripture, as too spiritual, and as violating the laws and traditions of the elders. The Sanhedrin opposed it, as exciting tumults and dissensions among the people, and disturbing the public peace. The Roman soldiers and officers, both civil and military, were inclined to treat the apostles and their doctrine with contempt, and thus the whole power of the state was arrayed against them.

The kingdom of heaven was violently attacked on every side, and those humble disciples who were anxious to gain admittance into it, were obliged to contend against all these difficulties, and to take possession of it by violence, contrary to the opinions and the opposition of the Pharisees, and the whole Jewish Sanhedrin. Luke xvi. 16.

Among the passages from the talmudists, which Schoetgen quotes on this text, is Berachoth, fol. 34. 2. and which is quoted also by Dr. Gill, the learned commentator and great ornament of the Baptist dissenters. All the inspired writers and prophets who were before John speak of the Messiah as one who was to come: John spake of him as one who is come; and directed the people in plain terms to Jesus of Nazareth, as the Messiah, the Lamb of God. Since the time of John vision and prophecy have been utterly taken away; and this is acknowledged by the Jews themselves, who say כל הנביאים כולן לא נתנבאו אלא לימות המשיח “Omnes Prophetæ non nisi usque ad tempora Messiae prophetarunt, sed de vitâ æternâ oculus non vidit, præter te, Domine,” and from the day the temple was destroyed, נבואה מי הנביא בטילה T. Bava Bathra, fol. 12. 1. Since that time Abrabanel[†] confesses they have had no prophet. Schoetgen quotes also to the same effect.—Schabbatt, fol. 63. 1. and fol. 151. 2. Pesachim, fol. 68. 1. Sanhedrin, fol. 99. 1.

That John was a prophet may be gathered not only from the express declaration of St. Luke, that the word of God came to him in the wilderness; but from the nature of his ministry, and his declaration to the people.

John prophesied—

[†] In Dan. fol. 63. 4. ap. Gill.

2. His preëxistence and dignity, as the Eternal Son of God.

3. His atonement.

4. Rejection by the Jews, and adoption by the Gentiles.

5. Judgments on the Jews, and final separation of the good from the evil, at the end of the world.

NOTE 56.—PART III.

THIS section is placed here on the united authorities of Pilkington, Newcome, Lightfoot, Doddridge, &c. The Scripture authority is derived from the evident connexion of v. 20. with v. 19. in Matt. xi. Michaelis places it after the mission of the twelve, preserving the order of St. Matthew. But Lightfoot has justly observed, that St. Matthew seems to have placed the events in the order he has adopted, on account of the similarity between the two events—the mission of the disciples of John, and that of the disciples of Christ.

NOTE 57.—PART III.

PILKINGTON, Newcome, Doddridge, Lightfoot, Michaelis, and Whiston insert this section in its present place. The Scriptural authority is the order of St. Matthew, ch. xi.

NOTE 58.—PART III.

THESE two sections are inserted here on the joint authority of the five harmonizers. The reasons from Scripture are well given by Lightfoot, who observes, the invitation of the Pharisee seems to have had some reference to the words of Christ,—“The Son of man came eating and drinking;” and the words, “Come unto me ye that are weary and heavy laden,” might have induced the woman sinner to kneel and weep at his feet for mercy.

It is the opinion of Lightfoot, that the Mary, the female penitent who now addressed our Lord, was Mary Magdalene and the sister of Lazarus. Pilkington has come to an opposite conclusion. He discusses the subject at some length. The questions he considers are,

I. Where it was that Jesus dined with the Pharisee.

II. Who it was that anointed Jesus's feet at that time.

The answer of many commentators is, that it was at Bethany, at the house of Simon the leper, where Jesus now dined; and that it was Mary Magdalene, the sister of Lazarus, who anointed his feet. And Tatian connects this account with that given by St. Matthew and St. Mark.

1. According to the present order of St. Luke's Gospel, this dining with the Pharisee is laid down between Christ's leaving Capernaum and his return thither again; and if it was so, it cannot be the same as is mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark, which was only two days before Jesus was put to death.

2. Toinard supposes that it was at Nain that Jesus dined with this Simon the Pharisee: and indeed we have no account of his leaving that place, so that we may have reason to think that it was somewhere in that neighbourhood, and not at Bethany in the house of Simon the leper.

3. There is an account of a woman's anointing the feet of Jesus with ointment and wiping them with her hair given by St. John. But that also appears to be a different account from this; for that was in the house of Lazarus, as we may well collect from Martha's serving, &c., and this was in the house of Simon the Pharisee.

4. I can see no reason for supposing Mary Magdalene, and Mary the sister of Lazarus, and the woman here mentioned, to be one and the same person; or, indeed, for supposing that any two of them are the same: for (1.) Lazarus's sister, who lived at Bethany, could not, from any thing we can learn, properly be called Magdalene (the city whence that appellation is derived lying upon the sea of Galilee, and about ninety miles from Bethany).—(2.) It is nowhere said, that Mary Magdalene anointed either the head or the feet of Jesus with ointment.—(3.) Lazarus's sister neither appears to have been a notorious sinner, as this woman was; nor to have been ever possessed with devils, as is recorded of Mary Magdalene.—(4.) This woman appears, from this recital, to have been unknown to Christ, till she now came to him; if then this had been Mary Magdalene, we might well expect to have had an account of the casting out of the seven devils before that of her sins being forgiven; but here is only a report of this woman's being a sinner, not of her being possessed.

Upon the whole, therefore, I think it the most reasonable to conclude, that the matter here related was transacted at Nain, or some place thereabouts; and that the name of the woman who now anointed Jesus's feet is not recorded; this being neither the sister of Lazarus nor Mary Magdalene.

NOTE 59.—PART III.

THIS miracle is placed by St. Mark upon the return of Jesus to the house. It is inserted in its present position, in addition to this authority, upon the testimony of Lightfoot, Newcome, Pilkington, Doddridge, and Michaelis. Doddridge has observed, with great propriety, "it is one of the most important rules for settling the harmony of the Evangelists, that where any one of them has asserted expressly that he follows the order of time, we should in regard to him transpose others who do not assert equal exactness in that particular".

As the minute circumstances, with which the casting out of the demoniac is described by St. Luke, agree so entirely throughout, with the relation of the same event in the other two Evangelists, I have transposed the account of St. Luke; and am supported in this arrangement by Doddridge, Newcome, and Michaelis. Compare Matt. xii. 22–50. Mark iii. 20–35. Luke xi. 14–36. St. Luke, it will be observed, relates the event as an isolated fact—as a circumstance which had taken place—but he makes no allusion to its time or order; and it can be separated from his narrative without injuring the context. It appears to have occurred to him by association. In ch. xi. 43. he mentions the Holy Spirit, and this reminded him of the blasphemy of the Scribes and Pharisees.

NOTE 60.—PART III.

SCHOETGEN thus analyzes the address of our Lord to the Pharisees.

The occasion of our Lord's address was to reply to the words (Matt. xii. 24.) and to the thoughts of the Pharisees (v. 25.) He effects the first of these objects by thus reasoning:—

1. Satan could not fight against himself, v. 25, 26.

2. The Jews believed that devils could be cast out in the same way, v. 27.

3. This action of Christ declared that the Messiah was among them, v. 28.

4. It declared also that Christ was more powerful than Satan, the spirit of evil, v. 29.

5. And that Christ was the enemy of Satan, v. 30.

6. Because blasphemy against the divine conduct was unpardonable.

He refutes their thoughts, secondly, by showing, 1. Their mind was depraved, v. 33–35; and,

2. That their reasoning must be brought into judgment. Schoetgen. Horæ Hebr. vol. i. p. 123.

V. 36. This word, πᾶν ἡνίκα ἀγγὺν, seems to imply much more than the usual meaning. When it is considered with reference to the cause for which it was spoken, it must mean every reproachful or blasphemous expression which man uses, &c.

" Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 70. § 190.

" Doddridge, Fam. Expos. vol. i. p. 185.

NOTE 61.—PART III.

THE position of Mark iii. 19, 20, 21. has been a source of much discussion among the harmonizers. Michaelis cuts the knot, which he finds it difficult to untie, and omits the passage altogether. Doddridge places it before the account of the widow's son at Nain. But in this part of his Harmony, it appears that much embarrassment has been caused by his adopting the supposition that the sermon in Matt. v. 6, 7. is different from that in Luke vii. Newcome, Pilkington, and Lightfoot, have inserted it after the scene of the female penitent. I have followed their order, the scriptural authority for which is given by Pilkington, who observes, that St. Mark takes no notice of any occurrence from the time of the election of the twelve till he went with them into a house, εἰς οἶκον, meaning probably the house in Capernaum, where Jesus used to sojourn. The word is used in this sense by St. Mark in other places (Mark ii. vii. 17.), where one particular house seems to be referred to, though the article is omitted.

NOTE 62.—PART III.

THE order of St. Matthew and St. Mark is followed in the placing of this section, on the authority of the five harmonizers.

NOTE 63.—PART III.

THE disciples of Christ were beloved by him more than his natural kindred. The spiritual affection towards those who were the children of God was greater than the natural affection towards those who were related to him by the ties of blood.

NOTE 64.—PART III.

THE order seems to be so decisively settled by St. Matthew xiii. 1. Ἐν δὲ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐξελθὼν, &c. that Doddridge, Pilkington, Lightfoot, and Michaelis have placed it in its present position. Archbishop Newcome, however, has inserted before Matt. xiii. 1. various passages of St. Luke (xi. 37. fin. xii. and xiii. 1-9.) His arguments for so doing have not appeared to be satisfactory, and I have preferred therefore the concurrent testimony of the other harmonizers. Michaelis also places the parable of the sower after Luke viii. 1.; but so much of his arrangement is put together without adequate reasons, that his authority does not weigh so much with me as to induce me to reject, in this instance, the testimony of Lightfoot and others.

In the present order of St. Luke we find, that the account of Jesus's mother and his brethren desiring to speak with him is mentioned as what happened after he had spoken the parable of the sower, &c.; whereas St. Matthew and St. Mark place it before the parable. Now, though it is evident from this observation, that the exact chronological order of facts is not strictly adhered to by all the Evangelists, yet it may appear also that the variation here is very inconsiderable: for we find, from all the accounts, that it was on the same day that the parable was spoken, and his friends came to him: and even a diary could not be esteemed very incorrect on account of such a transposition as this; so far is an historian from being liable to be charged with impropriety, in taking a liberty which all writers have freely indulged themselves in.

I have here followed the order of St. Matthew and St. Mark, as the circumstances related seem to require us to do: for, (1.) The multitudes that hindered Jesus's mother and his brethren from coming at him seem to be those mentioned Mark iii. 19-22.; and the reason why he would not go out unto them was probably because he knew that they were come out to lay hold on him. (2.) When his mother and his brethren came, he was yet in the house; for they stood without desiring to speak with him; but we find, that, before he spake the parable, he went out of the house and sat by the sea-side; and when he went into a house again, in the latter end of that day, he had sent the multitudes away. So that, had his relations come after he had spoken the parable (as is said by St. Luke), they would have found no difficulty in getting access to him.—Pilkington, notes, p. 25.

NOTE 65.—PART III.

ST. LUKE relates, in a succession of chapters, several events not mentioned by the other Evangelists; and, with the exception of some few which are supposed, from internal evidence arising from minute coincidences, to be the same as those related by the others, much difficulty has been generally experienced as to the order in which these events are to be placed. Lightfoot begins at Luke xi. 23., and goes on to chap. xviii. 1-15. Pilkington from chap. x. 17. proceeds without one interruption, to chap. xiii. 1-23., when he inserts the events related by St. John, chap. x. 22, &c. ; he then proceeds to Luke xiii. 23., and thence through the intermediate chapters to Luke xvii. 1-10. Michaelis goes from Luke x. 37. to Luke xvii., without the incorporation of other passages. Doddridge begins with Luke x. 17-24., and proceeds without interruption to Luke xviii. 1-14., excepting that he transposes Luke ix. 51-56. to the last mentioned passage. Newcome has bestowed very great labor on these chapters; he begins Luke x. 17-24., and, omitting from chap. xi. 14., to chap. xiii. 22., proceeds without interruption to chap. xvii. 1-10. From this brief statement it will appear, that the larger proportion of these chapters ought to be continuously put together. The several alterations and transpositions proposed by these harmonizers will be considered in the various notes in which the arrangements which have appeared most advisable will be defended. Archbishop Newcome seems to have departed, in some instances, from the order proposed by Lightfoot without sufficient cause.

NOTE 66.—PART III.

It will be observed, that our Lord did not speak to the people in parables till the Scribes and Pharisees had accused him of working his miracles by the power of an evil spirit. The Messiah then, in mercy and compassion to these hearers, and to all who were captious, began to address them in parables. This is well expressed in the translation of Matt. xiii. 13, 14. in the version published in 1729, 2 vols. 8vo. anonymously dedicated to Lord King, the then lord chancellor; the name of the author has escaped my memory. "Therefore speak I to them in parables; because they overlook what they see, and are inattentive to what they hear, neither will they comprehend. And in them is fulfilled that prophecy of Esaias,—

'By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand;
And seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive.
For this people's heart is waxed gross,
And their ears are dull of hearing,—
And their eyes they have closed;
Lest at any time they should see,' &c.

and in ver. 16, "happy are you that your eyes have sight, and that your ears have their hearing." The common idea, that our Lord spoke in parables, that the people might not understand him, and their condemnation be still increased, is as unfounded as it is blasphemous. The parallel passage in Mark iv. 12. must be interpreted likewise according to the tenor of the context. It is a prophecy fulfilled at the very time that our Lord was speaking, that though the people saw with their eyes the outward proofs of his divine power, yet they should not perceive the evidence arising therefrom, that he was their Messiah.

Dr. Adam Clarke has inserted, from Glassius, a very good dissertation on the nature and use of parabolical writing, at the end of his notes on Matt. xiii. He finds the following ten significations in Scripture.

1. The word parable means a simple comparison, Matt. xxiv. 32-38.

2. An obscure similitude, Matt. xv. 13-15., where Pharisaism is represented as a plant, &c.

3. A simple allegory, as in Matt. xiii.

4. A maxim, or wise sentence, as the corresponding Hebrew word מִשְׁל is used in 1 Kings iv. 22.

5. A bye-word or proverb of reproach, 2 Chron. vii. 20. Psalm xlv. 14. and lxix. 11. Jerem. xxiv. 9.

6. A frivolous, uninteresting discourse, or a disregarded and despised address, Ezek. xx. 49.

7. A simple proverb, or adage, Luke iv. 23.

8. A type, illustration, or representation, Heb. ix. 9.; where the first tabernacle is said to have been a figure, a parable, to last only for a time.

9. A daring exploit, an unusual and severe trial, a case of imminent danger and jeopardy. It may be doubted whether this part of Dr. Clarke's criticism is managed with equal judgment. There appears to be no proper authority for the use of the word in this sense. The instance he adduces, Heb. xi. 19., where Abraham is said to have received his son from the dead, ἐν παραβολῇ, "he being in the most imminent danger of losing his life," does not seem satisfactory; the common translation being undoubtedly preferable.

10. The word parable signifies also a very ancient and obscure prophecy, Ps. xlix. 4. Prov. i. 6. Matt. xiii. 35.

NOTE 67.—PART III.

THESE sections to the end of the part are arranged in their present order upon the concurrent testimony of Lightfoot, Newcome, and Doddridge, and the regularity of the Scripture narrative. Pilkington has observed the same method, excepting that he has placed elsewhere the dining at the house of Matthew; an event which he inserts after the call of that apostle, and which has been already discussed. Michaelis varies too but little from this disposition. He seems doubtful where to place the treatment received by our Lord at Nazareth (section 41), and supposes that this event took place but once: he reasons from the similarity of the two circumstances. See note on section 4, of this part.

NOTE 68.—PART III.

ON THE PHRASE “THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.”

THIS phrase, “the kingdom of heaven,” is used in the New Testament to denote the various gradations of that dominion which the Messiah was about to establish. It sometimes alludes to its commencement (Matt. iii. 2.) by the preaching, influence, and death of Christ; sometimes it refers to its gradual progress, and the consequent setting up and establishment of the Christian Church, Matt. xiii. 47.; sometimes it is used to express the future perfection and consummation of the happiness of mankind and of the Church in a future state. The word βασιλευα, ought to be frequently translated “the reign,” instead of “the kingdom.”

“Isaiah, Daniel, Micah, and others of the prophets, had encouraged the people to expect a time when the Lord of Hosts should reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, when the people of God should be redeemed, and made joyful in Messiah their king.”—“This period was generally understood by the phrases βασιλευα τῷ Θεῷ and βασιλευα τῶν οὐρανῶν the first approach of which was preached by the Baptist, and afterwards by Christ.” When the word therefore refers to the time, it ought to be rendered the reign of God, the reign of heaven; when to place, it should be translated kingdom.”

We read also (Luke xvii. 21.) “the kingdom of God is within you.” There is a dominion over the passions and the inferior nature of man, which may be justly called the kingdom of heaven, or the reign of divine power within us. And it is of little consequence to us, personally and individually, what may be the nature, origin, progress, extent, and consummation of all the plans of Providence, which shall establish the kingdom of God in the world; unless obedience to God, and faith in God, and the peace of God, be so known to us, that our nature become changed before Him. We may even assist to build up the ark which shall save a drowning world; but, without repentance and faith, we, like the builders of the ark, may be destroyed by the deluge.

I am aware that the original, ἡ βασιλευα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐντὸς ὑμῶν ἐστίν, may be translated, the kingdom of God is among you, or, is now being established in the midst of you; and the ἐντὸς is so used by Xenoph. Cyrop. l. 1; and in the Anab. lib. 6. c. 5. § 5. we read ἐντὸς τῆς θαλάσσης, intra spatium, in quo exercitus erat. The word is used twice only in the New Testament; in Matt. xxiii. 26., where it evidently signifies the inside of the cup, &c.; and in this passage, Luke xvii. 21., where it is contrasted with the outward pomp and show with which the Jews expected the reign of their Messiah would commence. The kingdom of God cometh not μετὰ παραιτησέως. Heinsius paraphrases the word “non venit præstolando, aut expectando regnum Domini.” Schleusner quotes from Suidas ἐντὸς· οἱ λογισμοὶ καὶ ἐνθυμήσεις καὶ πάντα τὰ τῆς ψυχῆς κινήματα and the Alexandrian version translates the word קרב in the last clause of ver. 1, of Ps. ciii. by the word ἐντὸς, &c. וכל קרבי, where no other meaning can be assigned but that which is internal: that is, the thoughts and motives of the heart. The phrase also, מלכות השמים, was used among the Jews to denote the influence of religion within the heart^z.

The Jews had long spoken of, anticipated, and described the future reign of the Messiah by the phrase now in question. They had been taught by their ancient prophets to expect a Messiah who should restore the true religion, reform the Jewish people, atone for their sins, and release them from a foreign yoke. The apostles and our Lord used only the popular language when they adopted the term expressive of this dominion of the Messiah. That the expressions βασιλευα τοῦ Θεοῦ—βασιλευα τῶν οὐρανῶν—βασιλευα τῷ Ἰησοῦ, did not refer only to the kingdom or dominion of Christ in the future world, is evident from the proclamation of the Baptist, Matt. iii. 2. ἡγγικε γὰρ ἡ βασιλευα, &c. and from the nature of the addresses of our Lord, such as in Matt. vi. 33., ζητεῖτε δὲ πρῶτον τὴν βασιλευαν τῷ Θεῷ, and those in the Lord’s prayer, “thy will be done on earth,” &c.

As the treatise of Schoetgen is bound up with his larger work, and is rarely to be met with, I have made an extract from his observations on this phrase.

The expression מלכות השמים, the same as ἡ βασιλευα τῶν οὐρανῶν, frequently occurs in Jewish writers; in general it means the polity of the children of Israel under the old covenant, having God at its head. The kingdom of heaven is the same as the kingdom of God: in that kingdom the Jews were the subjects. Thus Josephus properly calls that government θεοκρατία, § 1 and 2.

To show that Jewish writers used the expression in this sense, several quotations are brought, sect. 3. One is from Rabbi Schemoth; “When they (the Israelites) came to Sinai, and received the kingdom of God,” &c. Our author supposes this “receiving the kingdom of God” to imply a confession of faith, that may be repeated for the greater confirmation therein. He quotes Sohar Genes.—“When a man goes to bed, he ought first of all to take upon himself the kingdom of heaven, and then repeat one or more prayers," § 4.

It appears that when a man used the prayer Krischna, it was necessary first, suscipere regnum celorum, § 5, in fine. This is the common meaning of the phrase, "kingdom of heaven," among Jewish writers. Still they have used it (but rarely) in the sense of the times of the Messiah and the New Dispensation. Targum, Micah iv. 17. "The kingdom of heaven shall be revealed unto them on Mount Zion, from this time to all eternity." But, independently of quotations from these writers, it may be shown, that the Jews used the expression in this sense; otherwise John the Baptist, the Pharisees, and the hearers, would neither have used the phrase, nor understood it. Thus a Pharisee (Luke xvii. 20.) asks, "When the kingdom of God should come," § 6.

The expression took its origin from that passage of Daniel, where it is said, "Unto him was given a kingdom, &c. and his kingdom shall not be destroyed," § 7.

In the New Testament, the expression ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ, means the Christian Church, or Dispensation. The Apostle (Rom. xiv. 17.) exhorts Christians not to condemn others about meats; "For," says he, "the kingdom of God is not meat and drink;" that is, the Christian Church under its King, the Messiah is not bound by the ceremonies enjoined under the Law, § 8.

There is sometimes an ellipsis of τοῦ Θεοῦ, or τῶν ἐσθαρῶν the word βασιλεία occurring alone. Thus Christ is said to have preached the Gospel of the kingdom, i. e. of the kingdom of the Messiah. The Jews are called υἱοὶ τοῦ βασιλείας, because the kingdom of Messiah was first sent to them, § 9.

It also denotes subjection to the kingdom of Messiah, Mark x. 15. "Whoever does not receive the kingdom of heaven," &c. § 10.

It is not denied that "the kingdom of heaven" is sometimes used to denote eternal life, § 11.

NOTE 69.—PART III.

In this section Christ calls himself, for the first time, "the Son of Man."

NOTE 70.—PART III.

THE best interpretation that I have met with of this wonderful history of the Gadarene demoniac, and the loss of the herd of swine, is that of the celebrated Hutchinsonian divine, Jones of Nayland, in his Sermon on the Gadarene demoniac. "In the moral application," he remarks, "of this miracle, the sense is very plain; for if sin is, in every man, what the devil is in a demoniac, then it is evident the same man may be under the dominion of a legion of vices and evil passions at once." The devil was permitted to go into the herd of swine to show the power of the Destroyer, and by a significant action make known to man the utter destruction of those who suffer themselves to be led captive by the Spirit of Evil. These unclean animals are a fit representation of the human race, in their fallen and degraded condition, and as such are often used in Scripture. See Matt. vii. 6. 2 Pet. ii. 22. Prov. xi. 22.

Archbishop Newcome justly observes, of the apparent discrepancy between St. Matthew, who mentions two demoniacs, and St. Mark and St. Luke, who mention one only, that the rule of Le Clerc must be applied:—Qui plura narrat, pauciora complectitur; qui pauciora memorat, plura non negat. One of the demoniacs was remarkable, says Dr. Farmer, for his superior fierceness. Or Mark and Luke mention only one, because one only returned to express his gratitude.

NOTE 71.—PART III.

ON AN OPINION OF MICHAELIS RESPECTING THE GOSPEL OF ST. MATTHEW.

ONE of the boldest, most unwarrantable, and mischievous opinions of the German commentator, Michaelis, is, that the present Gospel of St. Matthew is a translation, and an erroneous translation, of the Gospel which the Evangelist originally wrote in Hebrew. Michaelis renders into Hebrew a few passages of the Greek Gospel, and varying the expression of the Evangelist, so as to suit his own ingenious but imaginary conjectures, he endeavours to prove that St. Matthew used the Hebrew words into which Michaelis translates his Greek, and that St. Matthew's translator actually misunderstood the meaning of his original. The inspiration of St. Matthew is thus destroyed at once. The boldest conjectures of the most adventurous of our English critics sink into insignificance when compared with this effort. Bowyer and Markland would have been terrified. Even the editors of the New and Improved Version would have seen, without regret, their star-like lustre eclipsed by the superior splendour of this baneful meteor. Michaelis, however, has provided his reader with arguments against his own error. In the preceding section he reasons against the possibility of proving the existence of any mistakes of translation in the Greek Gospel of St. Matthew; and he there observes, "that no one can show any such mistakes;" and, "if the Greek Gospel is a translation, the original is lost; and therefore, a comparison between them, which alone can determine the question, cannot take place." I may observe here, that Michaelis, though a learned and useful authority in many instances, must be read with caution, and many of his conclusions rejected. Bishop Randolph wrote a tract on this subject, which did justice to the learned German, while it pointed out his errors^y.

The opinion of Michaelis on the evangelical narrative of the raising of Jairus's daughter is contained in that part of his work to which I am now referring. In Matt. ix. 18. he observes, that "Jairus says of his daughter, ἤδη ἐτελεύτησεν, 'she is already dead;' whereas according to St. Mark, v. 23., he says, ἐσχάτως ἔχει, 'she is at the point of death;' and receives the first intelligence of her death as he was returning home accompanied by Christ. Various artifices have been used by the harmonists to reconcile this contradiction, and with very little success; but as soon as we reflect on the words, which must have stood in the original, all difficulty vanishes on this head. For מָתָה כְּתָה may signify either, 'she is now dead,' or, 'she is now dying.' St. Matthew's translator rendered the word according to the former punctuation, whereas he ought rather to have adopted the latter, as appears from what is related by the two other Evangelists."

To this Archbishop Laurence, in his Sermon upon Philological Speculation, observes, that the ἡ θυγάτηρ μου ἤδη ἐτελεύτησεν, is sufficiently explained by commentators (in order to reconcile it with St. Mark's account) in the sense of "my daughter is (perhaps) by this time dead:"

^y See Bishop Marsh's Michaelis, vol. iii. part. i. p. 151-2, and Archbishop Laurence's notes to the Sermon on Philological Speculation, p. 34.

but, even taking it in the strongest point of view, it can only be considered as one of those minute variations which tend to prove that the Evangelists did not write in concert. But, as Bishop Marsh remarks, it is not St. Matthew alone who on this occasion uses the past tense; for St. Luke has the perfectly synonymous expression ἀπέθνησκεν. With the points, מָתָה 3 pers. sing. perf. fæm. signifies mortua est; and מָתָה, past fæm. signifies moriens^z. I have rejected the points of the various Hebrew words used in the several quotations in these notes; because the arguments which may satisfy us of their antiquity do not entirely prove their authority.

In the fifth volume, 4to. edit. p. 332-372, of Lardner's Works, is a long and admirable vindication of the three miracles of our Saviour—the raising the widow's son, the daughter of Jairus, and Lazarus; it is too long to abridge.

Among the Barrington papers I find an inquiry into the circumstances of this miracle. It is contained in a letter to Dr. Lardner, dated Dec. 30, 1729. Among the papers prefixed to the Life of Dr. Lardner, in the beginning of the first volume, is a reply throughout. As it is probable these papers of Lord Barrington may be eventually submitted to the approbation of the public, it is not worth while entering, at present, into any further discussion on this subject.

^z Vide Bishop Marsh's note, Michaelis, vol. iii. part. ii. p. 156, 2nd. edit.

PART IV.

NOTE 1.—PART IV.

THE various sections of this part are placed in the same order in which they are respectively inserted in the arrangements of the five harmonizers, by whom I am principally guided. Doddridge considers John vii. 1. as belonging to the same passages to which it is annexed by the others, though, for the sake of convenience, he joins it with the rest of the chapter^a. Michaelis also places the calling of the twelve apostles in the order of St. Matthew, and inserts John vii. 1. at the head of various passages, which he considers supplementary to the accounts of the other Evangelists.

^a Vide notes and paraphrase, Doddridge's Fam. Expositor, sect. 98, vol i. p. 503.

NOTE 2.—PART IV.

ON THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

OUR Lord had now continued his ministry till the whole population of Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee had heard of his miracles and preaching. Many had followed him from place to place, and from these he selected Twelve as the constant witnesses of his actions. The word ἐκλελυμένοι, which in our translation is interpreted "they fainted," is generally considered as an erroneous reading. It is rejected by Griesbach, and all the best MSS., versions, and fathers, who read ἐσχυμένοι, which may be rendered grieved, or melancholy; and this interpretation is supported by the harmony. For it does not appear that our Lord was followed by the multitudes to any very considerable distance from their respective cities (Matt. ix. 36. compared with 35, and Mark vi. 6.), but that our Saviour's compassion was excited for the people, whom he saw to be grieved for want of proper instruction, and scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd. To remove this spiritual dearth, he gave the first commission to his Apostles, to proceed to the house of Israel, and declare to them that their Messiah had come; and to preach to them the kingdom of God. Our Lord afterwards sent out the Seventy, to prepare the people for his reception; enjoining them to preach in those cities only which himself intended to visit (Luke x. 1.); whereas the Apostles were commanded to preach to all the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

The ordination of the Apostles to preach the kingdom of God leads us to consider the manner in which the Church, which Christ had come to establish, was to be perpetuated among mankind until his coming again. The question, therefore, What plan of Church Government was instituted by our Lord and his Apostles? cannot be esteemed unimportant.

The priesthood under the Mosaic economy was so publicly instituted, that its validity and divine origin were never disputed. The rebellion of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, proceeded only from envy at its exclusive nature; and though the kings in after ages innovated during the prevalence of idolatry, and made priests of the lowest, or, as it would be better rendered, of the common people; the line of the succession was considered sacred, and none were admitted into the order of the priesthood, or acknowledged as priests by the people, who could not trace their descent from the sacerdotal house of Aaron.

This regular succession of the priesthood, on the part of the Jews, has been sometimes supposed to form an objection to the Christian dispensation. "If the Christian religion be true," it has been argued, "its priesthood would have been divinely appointed, and its succession rigorously observed. The whole Christian world on the contrary, is divided on this point: it is to be presumed, therefore, that the claims of that religion are at least dubious, in which the origin of the priesthood is so uncertain, and its various pretensions and orders so jarring, that they are equally ridiculed and despised." In reply, however, to these objections, I do not hesitate to assert, from an impartial consideration of the testimony both of Scripture and antiquity, that the origin of the Christian priesthood is as evident as that of the Levitical; that its descent can be as distinctly traced; that its regular succession has been preserved; and that, consequently, as it was at the beginning appointed by divine authority, it is entitled to the highest veneration, and to the devoted attachment of Christians.

The essential and immutable difference between the arguments that are adduced for the support of the Christian religion, and those which are brought forward in defence of other systems, consists in this. The Christian religion is founded upon the evidence of actions, and undeniable facts, while every other system depends upon theory alone. The speculations of the philosophers of antiquity, the impositions of Mahomet, the reveries of the schoolmen, the inconsistencies of modern infidelity, the inventions and strange doctrines of various sects among Christians, are all distinguishable from the fundamental truths of Christianity. The conclusions of uninspired men, on subjects of a religious nature, are generally founded upon abstract reasoning; the truths of the Christian religion are so identified with some well-supported facts, that the belief of the fact compels at the same time the reception of the doctrine.

The five principal doctrines which may be said to constitute Christianity, and to comprise all its truths, and which are alike uniformly supported by facts, and the express words of Scripture rightly and literally interpreted, are, the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, the Resurrection from the Dead, and the Establishment of the Christian Church, as the means of perpetuating the truth of these propositions in the world. The doctrine of the Trinity is not only supported upon the general tenor of Scripture, as it may be collected from the fact that the inspired writers assign the attributes of the Deity to the three persons of the Godhead; but from the fact also that the voice came from heaven, that the Holy Spirit as a dove, hovered over the Messiah, and that the Son of God was distinct from either of those which bore witness to him. The Incarnation of Christ was declared in prophecy, and was proved by the facts which are recorded concerning his birth. The Atonement is proved by the concurrence of all the types and institutions of the Jewish law, and the fact of Christ's death fulfilling them all to the uttermost. The Resurrection of the body was verified not only by the fact of Christ's resurrection, but by the restoration of the widow's son and of Lazarus. The Establishment of a Church in the world was demonstrated by the fact of the peculiar care with which our Lord collected disciples, selected a certain number from among them, commissioned them to go forth and preach, added others to their number with different powers, and promised to be with them to the end (not, of the age, as many translate the word, but) of the world.

The first establishment of the Christian Church is necessarily brought before us, then, by the subject of this section. The commission given to the twelve Apostles may be called the foundation of the Christian Church. The conduct of the Apostles in their ecclesiastical government, considered as a model, ought to be adopted by all Christian nations, who desire that Christianity should be preserved among themselves, or diffused, and permanently continued, among others.

I have already attempted to prove that Jesus, the Messiah of the New Testament, was the Incarnated Jehovah of the Old Testament. He was the Lord and Guide of the Patriarchal and Jewish Churches. He has uniformly been the religious legislator of mankind. He it was who walked with our first parents in the garden of Eden, and instituted sacrifice. When the world apostatized after the deluge, it was He who selected the family of Abraham. When the remembrance of their ancient religion began to be effaced from the minds of the Israelites, it was the same Angel Jehovah who guided them through the Red Sea into the wilderness, and soon after promulgated the Law from Mount Sinai. It was He who ordained those minute laws, those rigid observances, those ordinances respecting the priesthood, and the whole framework of the ecclesiastical and civil polity, which distinguished the Jews from all other nations; and the very remnant of which, even to this day, unites them, notwithstanding their wide dispersion among the various nations of the world. Can we, then, for a moment, suppose that this same Almighty Being, this Manifested God of mankind, should not be equally attentive, and provide equally for a still more glorious Dispensation, of which the other was only a type and shadow? We have every reason to expect, that, in the Christian dispensation, some care would have been taken for the continual remembrance of the great truths and observances which the condition of man required.

The revealed religion of God was perpetuated under the Patriarchal and Levitical dispensations by human means. Though religion was of divine origin, mankind was appointed the guardians of its purity. The means which God ordained for the preservation of his religion in the Patriarchal dispensation, were the setting apart the firstborn of every family to minister in his service, and conferring on the heads of the tribes the spirit of prophecy. Adam, Seth, Enoch, Methuselah, and the other fathers of the Patriarchal Church were thus gifted. Noah and Shem, after the deluge, obtained the same preëminence. There was always a body of men set apart for the service of God. To enter into the proofs on this part of the subject, which might be variously collected from Scripture, ancient history, tradition, and the customs among the early pagan nations, whose idolatry was but a perversion of primeval truth, would lead us far beyond the limits of a note.

The same means of perpetuating religion, which prevailed among the patriarchal families, were continued by the Divine Legislator among the people of Israel, with this alteration only, that one whole tribe was set apart for the service of God, instead of the firstborn of every family. The office remained the same; the firstborn were redeemed, in remembrance of their original dedication to God; and it was solemnly enacted, that no stranger, not of the seed of Aaron, should offer incense in the public worship. Every individual, of every family, was required to present the sacrifice of praise and prayer to God, and to comply with all the institutions of the Law; while it was left to one selected tribe to perform all the public functions required in the temple worship.

Thus did the Divine Legislator first impart to fallen man a revelation, and appoint means for its preservation. The Incarnated Jehovah has now granted to his creatures the most perfect form of that same religion which began at the fall in Paradise; and human means also, under the blessing of the same God, must preserve among mankind the consolations of his holy Gospel.

Four forms of Church Government are, in this our age, prevalent among Christians. Episcopacy, Papacy, Presbyterianism, and Independency. From the time of the apostles till the present day, Episcopacy has been the most general church government; and till the fifteenth century its apostolic origin was never disputed. Till the beginning also of the seventh century the supremacy of the pope over all Christian bishops was quite unknown. Boniface III. received the first title of Universal Bishop from the Emperor Phocas, as a reward for his subserviency and flattery to this basest of tyrants. With the exception of the ambitious heretic, Acrius, who, as Bishop Hall observes, was hooted not out of the church only, but out of the cities, towns, and villages, for the opinions he maintained, and, with the exception of a few dubious expressions of Jerome which are inconsistent with other parts of his works, Episcopacy prevailed, with the usurpation of Papacy alone, without the least opposition, in every Christian Church throughout the world, till Presbyterianism began to show itself under the protection of the Reformer Calvin. When the corruptions produced by the supremacy of the church of Rome indicated the necessity of a change, or reformation, in church government, the Catholic bishop of Geneva, Peter Balma, refusing to comply with some proposed alteration, was expelled with his clergy from that town. After the expulsion of the bishop, the two popular preachers, Farrel and Viret, who had greatly contributed to this measure, assumed the ecclesiastical and civil power. In this state of things, Calvin, in his way from France to Strasburgh, stopped at Geneva, and remained there at the invitation of Farrel. He then, with his two colleagues, proposed a new form of discipline, which he had lately invented; but the people, being dissatisfied with the severity of his laws, expelled him, with his principal associates, from their town. At the expiration of three years he was recalled; and, being appointed to institute a form of ecclesiastical discipline, he proposed, and finally established a system of church government, never before either known or practised, which is now distinguished by the name of Presbyterianism. When he first introduced this system, he expressed his highest veneration for reformed Episcopacy, and defended his innovations upon the plea of necessity. Beza, and his other followers, gradually discontinued that mode of argument, and have sometimes asserted, in not very courteous language, that Presbyterianism is of divine right. It is now established in Scotland, where it was introduced by John Knox and his coadjutors, who were the friends of the Reformer of Geneva. Many of the exiles, who had fled to the continent in the reign of the persecuting Mary, adopted the same system, and endeavoured, on their return to England, to complete, as they supposed, the reformation in their own country, by recommending and enforcing the Presbyterian discipline. The labors of Cartwright and others, however, were rendered ineffectual, at least in England, by the exertions and vigilance of Whitgift, then archbishop of Canterbury, aided by the firmness of Elizabeth.

This great Reformer, and celebrated commentator, of Geneva, did not anticipate the possible evils of his deviation from the conclusions to which his brother reformers in England had arrived. He erred only in proceeding to an opposite extreme from that of the church of Rome. His error in doctrine proceeded from a systematizing spirit, attempting to comprehend those subjects which humble men will shrink from, till their faculties are enlarged by the knowledge of another state of being. His bitterness and intolerance were the vices of his age. In all other respects he was both a wise and a good man. In proposing his views to the world, he believed he was planting the tree of life. He would have wept to have known that he had substituted the upas of theological hatred, and controversy, and error, beneath whose poisonous influence so many fair Churches have withered away. If he could have foreseen this result, he would have united in the powerful sentiment of a father of the Church: "Nothing so grieves the Spirit of God, as the causing divisions in the Church; not even the blood of martyrdom can atone for this crime:"—οὐδὲν γὰρ οὕτω παροξύνει τὸν Θεόν, ὥς ἐκκλησίαν διαφθεῖναι—ἔδὲ μαρτύροις αἷμα ταύτην δόναται ἐξαλείφειν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν.—Chrys. Hom. XI. in Ephes. See the notes to Archbishop Laurence's Bampton Lectures, p. 340, 341, On the Character of Calvin.

After the original form of church government had been thus boldly infringed upon, the minds of men became gradually reconciled to the innovation; and the gradation to the next difference became in comparison easy. The Presbyterian polity had taught the world, that the presbyters of the Church were all equal in authority; the next generation introduced another innovation, and discovered that if presbyters were equal, they were also independent of each other. Mr. Robert Brown, of Northampton, in the reign of Elizabeth, was the first who invented this system of Independency, which is totally without the remotest support from either Scripture or antiquity. The opinions of the Independents obtained great popularity in the subsequent reigns of James and Charles; and were espoused by many of the more energetic spirits of that turbulent period, till they gradually superseded the newly-established Presbyterianism.

From the reception which was given by the community to these innovations on the Christian priesthood, the last stage of its degradation was easy and natural. The office of teacher, the administration of the sacraments, the interpretation of Scripture, were, and still are, assumed at pleasure, by men of all ages, ranks, characters, and classes, without adequate preparation, responsibility, obedience, or authority. The civil law affords equal protection to all; and the public repose of the community renders this necessary; but the privilege which is allowed by the civil power is mistaken for the liberty of the Gospel of God. Mutual candor is granted to mutual error, while every term of obloquy and reproach, which the proverbial bitterness of theological hatred can suggest, is unsparingly poured forth to stigmatize the supposed bigotry and illiberality of those who assert the ancient, uniform, universal belief of the primitive Church; that the Christian minister is subordinate to a higher order, to which alone was committed the government of the Church, and the power of ordaining and appointing ministers. The question is not one of human polity. It rests with us to inquire whether the Lawgiver of the Christian dispensation has, or has not, revealed to his creatures, a model of church government, to which it is the duty of every Christian society to conform.

Should such a government be laid down in Scripture, it becomes at once obligatory upon all Christians. Time cannot destroy it, fashion cannot change it, opinion cannot prevail against it, nor the apostacy of nations invalidate it. No speculation can remove the foundation of its truth. It will be as evidently discoverable as the Mosaic institutions. Its principle will be as clear, its facts as evident, its origin as undeniable. If there is, or was such a government, its whole progress will be matter of record; every innovation, every corruption, would be accurately registered, and so engrafted with the history of Christianity, that they could not be put asunder.

The various forms of church government which we have now considered may be distinctly traced to human invention. They have originated in the circumstances of the times in which they commenced. Episcopacy only is traced to the days of the Apostles, and of their and our Divine Master; and originated in his instructions, and their practice.

But, that we may arrive at some certain conclusions on the subject of church government, it will be necessary to refer to Scripture, and inquire into the facts which are there recorded. I shall here confine myself to a review of the manner in which the Church was established while our Lord was upon earth; and defer to other notes the consideration of the nature of that government, by means of which the doctrines of the Gospel were perpetuated, in the three periods after the ascension; when the Church consisted of Jewish converts only; when it was extended to the Proselytes of the Jewish religion; and when it embraced the converts from idolatry throughout the whole Gentile world.

The period from our Lord's birth to his baptism was marked by no recorded instances of divine power or sovereignty; nor by the assumption of his ministerial dignity. His ministry began by a public and solemn inauguration into his high office. "The heavens were opened, and the Spirit of God, as a dove, descended and lighted upon him; and, lo! a voice from heaven, this is my beloved Son: hear ye him!" To fulfil every type, he was anointed, like the ancient Jewish kings, priests, and prophets, not with the material unction of oil, but with the Holy Ghost, and with power, Eph. iv. 7. Immediately after his inauguration, guided by the same Spirit, he overcame the great Enemy of his spiritual kingdom. He then began the office to which he was anointed, by preaching the Gospel to the people of Galilee, in the synagogues of his own city, Nazareth, Luke iv. 14-18. His laws were delivered in his own name: "I say unto you." He enlarged and refined the Law of Moses, and enforced his precepts with the promise of higher rewards, and the threatenings of severer punishments. He confirmed the truth of his assertions, and demonstrated the certainty of his Messiahship by stupendous wonders and miracles. By these means, and by his example, and his precepts, he collected multitudes of disciples, whom he baptized, not as John had done, in the name of another, but in his own name, John iii. 5. After a certain time had elapsed, he selected Twelve from his followers, and imparted to them some of the same powers and privileges which himself had received from the Father. He gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure all manner of disease, Luke ix. 1. Mark vi. 7. Matt. x. 1-5.

Some time after the twelve Apostles had been thus chosen, our Lord appointed other Seventy also. In some respects, their commission was the same as that of the Twelve; in others there was a remarkable difference. The Twelve return to our Lord, and continue with him to the end; the Seventy return to give an account of their mission, and are again blended with the general mass of the brethren. The Seventy were more limited in their office. They were sent only to precede our Lord, in those towns whither he was himself going (Luke x. 1.); the Apostles had a more extensive and discretionary power, which extended to all the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The Apostles were ordained to be with our Lord (Mark iii. 14.) as his constant attendants; whereas the Seventy were only appointed to preach (Luke x. 1.) Before the inauguration of the Twelve, our Lord not only commanded his disciples to pray to God, to send laborers into his harvest, but he continued a whole night himself in prayer; and even after the mission of the Seventy, they were always distinguished by the name of Apostles. Our Lord particularly addressed the Twelve more than the other disciples, expounding to them his parables, and revealing to them apart the mysteries of his kingdom (Matt. xx. 17, &c.) In two instances their powers were enlarged. At the time of the institution of the eucharist, the Apostles were commanded to commemorate his death, until his second advent to judge the world. When our Saviour was on the point of leaving earth, on the day of his ascension, he invested them with still higher powers. At first, like their Divine Master, they had been sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. His death destroyed the distinction between the Jew and the Gentile. All power was now given unto him, in heaven and in earth, and his last parting command to them was, to preach the Gospel to all nations. A kingdom was given to them, as a kingdom had been given to our Lord; as he had ordained and appointed spiritual governors and rulers over the converts, to them also was committed the same delegated authority.

Such were the two classes to whom our Lord, while upon earth, confided a share of the ministerial office to which he had been commissioned from above. He was the prophet like unto Moses, in this, as well as in other respects, that he instituted a new priesthood, with new authority and powers. The Levitical priesthood was now to be abolished, by the same Divine Lawgiver who had at first ordained it; and another erected on its foundation, Christ himself being the chief corner stone.

The next stage of the church, and its ecclesiastical discipline, we shall consider, as I have observed, in future notes; remarking only here, that the people had no choice, nor part, either in the appointment or consecration of the Twelve or the Seventy. They exercised no power, they conferred no right. The discipline of the Church was established by its spiritual head, Christ himself, and after his ascension it was delegated to his twelve Apostles.

NOTE 3.—PART IV.

AFTER the return of the Jews from Babylon, when the Hebrew language was no longer spoken among the common people, the Jews adopted the custom to which our Lord here alludes. The Scripture was publicly read in the original, but the doctor of the law whispered the meaning in the ears of an interpreter, or targumista, who publicly proclaimed what was communicated to him to the people. Our Lord here intimated to his disciples, that those things which were now revealed to them, such as the calling of the Gentiles, the abolition of the Jewish Law, not yet to be openly declared, and other doctrines, should be hereafter publicly promulgated. The houses of the Jews had flat roofs, from whence they made proclamations to the people. Both Lightfoot and Schoetgen have treated copiously on this subject.

NOTE 4.—PART IV.

THE Jews were of opinion, that a superintending Providence protected the minutest objects. Ex Schabbath, fol. 107. 2. יושב הק"כ וזן כקני. Sedet Deus S. B. et nutrit inde a cornibus unicornum, usque ad ova pediculorum. Schoetgen quotes also Jalkut Rubeni, fol. 171. 2. "There is not the least herb on earth, over which there is not an appointed guardian in heaven;" and from R. Simeon's Chof Chof, part i. fol. 6. 2. "A man cannot hurt his finger upon earth, but it is cried out aloud in heaven."—Schoetgen. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 104, 105.

NOTE 5.—PART IV.

It was a common saying among the Jews, "He that receiveth a learned man, receiveth the Shechinah." Our Lord, therefore, in this, as in numerous other passages, which, from the general inattention to the opinions of the ancient Jews, are unnoticed, claims those honors which were assigned by the people to the Angel Jehovah, the God of their fathers.—See Schoetgen. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 106, 7.

NOTE 6.—PART IV.

THE death of John the Baptist is placed about this time by the most eminent chronologers. It cannot fail to strike the most unob-servant, that, at the moment in which the last prophet of the former Dispensation was doomed to perish, the Messiah, the common God of the two Dispensations, gave to the new description of teachers, whom he now appointed and sent forth for the first time, the authority and powers of the teachers of the Jewish Church. Christ is the golden chain that binds the one universal Church. The Baptist preaches till Christ was manifested. The Baptist was preserved in life till the kingdom of the Messiah was in some degree established. The time had now arrived when a new Dispensation, with a new priesthood, should commence; and the last instructor of the people, under the old Dispensation, was now permitted to suffer, in order that undivided attention might be given to the long-expected King of the house of David.

NOTE 7.—PART IV.

MANY of the circumstances in this miracle demonstrate the peculiar wisdom with which, as I have so often shown, our Lord uniformly acted, and are worthy of our attention.

Christ here first showed that his power was superior to that of Elisha, who fed a hundred men with bread of the first fruits, twenty small barley loaves, and some ears of corn in the husk thereof, 2 Kings iv. 42, 43. The rabbis make these loaves twenty-two; the loaf of the first fruits being one, and the ears of corn being equivalent to another loaf, and they suppose that two thousand two hundred men were fed by them; each hundred having their single loaf set before them, כל תר ורחן קמי באה איש. Our Lord therefore proved his power to be superior to that of Elisha; for he fed one thousand men with one loaf; and, that there might be no appearance of deception nor collusion, he made the whole number sit down in companies, (שורות שורות in ranks, or in divisions, as trees in a vineyard), by fifties, and by hundreds, that the whole number might be accurately and universally ascertained. The accounts of this miracle were published by St. Matthew and St. Mark, while the greater portion of the persons who had been partakers of the miracle were living. None contradicted, or denied, or explained away, the account.

It is scarcely possible to imagine a more wonderful proof of the creative power of Christ, than was displayed in this miracle. The loaves were of the small kind common in the country. The fishes were, in all probability, also of that sort which were called by the Jews כריגני, which is interpreted by the gloss small fishes^b.

^b T. Bab. Cctubot, fol. 60. 2. and Sanhedrin, fol 49, 1. ap. Gill in John vi. 9.

Nonnus^c calls them two fishes from the adjacent lake, broiled, or roasted, (or dried in the sun.)

—καὶ ἀγγιπύρου διδυμάονας ἰχθύας ἄλλης, ἰχθύας ὑπταλεὺς διδυμάονας, &c.

This small supply of provision was perceived to multiply and grow, either in the hands of the apostles as they were ministering them to the people, or in the hands of the people themselves, who, in all probability, saw the small fragments of bread or fish with which they had been presented visibly increase while they held them in their hands, till the hunger of each was fully satisfied; and sufficient was still left for others who might come after them. It was this immediate and actual proof of the presence of a Creator, which compelled the exclamation of the multitude, that their expected Messiah was come.

Witsius has a curious remark on the gradation of Christ's miracles. His first miracle provided for a family the customary provision for a festival, not indeed absolutely necessary, yet much to be desired, when the mode of prolonging and celebrating the marriage ceremonies among the Jews is taken into consideration. He then satisfied the hunger of thousands, by multiplying their bread and a few small fishes. He proceeded to the curing of the sick. He healed one who had been diseased twelve years, Mark v. 25.; another eighteen, Luke xiii. 11.; another thirty-eight years, John v. 5.; another from childhood, Matt. ix. 21.; another from his birth, John ix. 1. The progressive order which our Lord observed when he demonstrated his power of raising the dead, in their various stages of corruption and decay, I have considered in another part of these notes^d.

NOTE 8.—PART IV.

Two hundred pence was the sum fixed upon for a virgin's dowry; for the portion to be paid by a husband to a woman who was divorced; for the fine of the lesser modes of assault and of various offences. The expression therefore was used proverbially, to denote a large sum of money. See the references in Gill on Mark vi. in loc.

"Cum dedit ille locum, cophino fœnoque relicto, have made the word κοφίνους in this passage a subject of greater curiosity than would at first sight appear reasonable. The first and general opinion is, that the cophinus here alluded to was a small basket constantly carried about by the Jews, in remembrance of their slavery in Egypt, Psa. lxxxii. 6.

which is translated in our version,—

"I removed his shoulder from the burden :
And his hands were delivered from the pots ;"

is rendered by Jerome and Symmachus, αἱ χεῖρες αὐτοῦ κοφίνου ἀπηλλάγησαν. The Septuagint, instead of העברנה (transibunt, or transierunt, ap. Arias Montanus) read העברנה which is followed by the Vulgate—αἱ χεῖρες αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ κοφίνῳ ἐδόλυσαν, LXX. Manus ejus in cophino servierunt. Dr. Gill quotes Nicholas de Lyra on this verse, to prove that the Jews carried baskets with some hay, in commemoration of their Egyptian servitude, and Schoetgen quotes Sidonius Apollinaris, Epist. 7. 6. and Alcimus Avitus, lib. 5. v. 30. to the same effect.

Another interpretation of the word κοφίνος is that of Farnabius, who supposes that the Jews made that use of the hay and the cophinus, which Juvenal and Martial (lib. v. Ep. 17.) have alluded to, as an emblem of their poverty and sufferings during the last siege of Jerusalem, when they were reduced to the necessity of eating hay, in the terrible scarcity of provisions. But this explanation is evidently erroneous: the cophinus, as may be shown in numerous instances, being in general use before the siege of Jerusalem.

Brenius imagines that the Jews made use of the cophinus at Rome, and elsewhere, for the sale of various small articles of pedlery; and Buxtorf, that the basket, from the earliest period, was a part of their household stuff; whence the expression Deut. xxviii. 5. בָּרוּךְ כַּנָּךְ "blessed shall be thy basket and thy store." The basket was used, he supposes, to bring the first-fruits to the priest, and the hay was provided to prevent the various offerings from touching each other. Schoetgen replies to these suggestions, that it was not possible all the Jews could be employed in selling; neither would they have carried their baskets of first-fruits so uniformly to Rome, as to have excited the satire of Juvenal; neither were those who were now following Christ going up to Jerusalem to offer their first-fruits. He concludes, therefore, with adopting the opinion of Reland, which is followed also by Schleusner (in voc. κοφίνος) that the cophinus was used by the Jews for carrying about with them the articles of provision, &c. permitted by their Law, and that the hay served to spread under them, when they were compelled to sleep abroad in places inhabited by Gentiles.—See the whole Dissertation in Schoetgen. Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. i. p. 133.

NOTE 10.—PART IV.

It is a good remark of Dr. Gill, that those who desired a temporal Redeemer were unworthy of his presence. All who follow Christ for power, show, popularity, wealth, or honor, or for any other purpose than to receive a spiritual Messiah, are unworthy of him. Christ retired to a mountain, and declined all worldly honors. To have the power of praying, to be admitted as Christ was admitted into communion with God the Father, is higher and more inestimable than all earthly distinctions and treasures.

NOTE 11.—PART IV.

CHRIST here demonstrated his power as the Lord of nature. He walked upon the sea, and when he entered into the ship the waves and the wind acknowledged him, and the ship was instantly at the place of its destination. Nonnus has given a beautiful description of this miracle: Christ, he tells us, walked upon the water with unwetted feet; and when he came into the ship it moved as by a divine impulse, like a winged thought of the mind, without winds, without oars, self-moving to the distant haven.

NOTE 12.—PART IV.

MARKLAND (ap. Bowyer's Crit. Conjec. p. 95.) has justly remarked the difference between this confession (ἀληθὺς Θεὸς Υἱὸς εἶ) which is no higher acknowledgment than the heathen centurion and the soldiers made at the crucifixion; and that of St. Peter contained in Matt. xvi. 16. Σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστός, ὁ Υἱὸς ΤΟΥ Θεοῦ ΤΟΥ ζῶντος, thou art THE Christ, THE Son of THE One God, THE living God.

NOTE 13.—PART IV.

WE have here another instance in which Christ applied to himself an epithet given by the Jews to their expected Messiah. Midrash Koheleth, fol. 73. 3. "R. Berechia nomine R. Isaac dixit: quemadmodum Goël primus, sic quoque erit postremus. Goël primus הוריר את המן descendere fecit Manna, q. d. Exod. xvi. 4. Et pluere faciam vobis panem de cælo. Sic quoque Goël postremus descendere facit Manna, q. d. Ps. lxxii. 16. erit multitudo frumenti super terram." See Schoetgen. in loc.

It is probable that our Saviour alluded to this tradition, as well as to the ideas of the rabbis, discussed at great length by Whithy, on John vi. 31, 37, &c. The comparison of food which nourishes the body and wisdom which nourishes the soul is common in many parts of Scripture. Thus Isaiah—

"Ye that are thirsty, come buy wine, and milk without money, and without price.

Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread?" &c.

Lightfoot quotes also Chajigah, fol. 14. 1. and Gloss. in Succah, fol. 52. to prove that bread was frequently used among the Jewish doctors for doctrine—האכלהו לחם feed him with bread; that is, make him take pains in the warfare of the Law, as it is written.—Lightfoot, vol. ii. 553.

It may be observed here, that an acquaintance with the Jewish traditions would materially assist the theological student to form a more accurate notion of many subjects of controversy between the Church of Rome and the Protestants. This discourse of our Lord in John vi. has been much insisted upon by the Romanists, as defending and supporting the doctrine of transubstantiation. This notion originated in the sixth century, and is founded on the literal interpretation of passages which were commonly used by the Jews, to whom the Scriptures were addressed, and by the inspired writers who primarily wrote for their use, in a metaphorical sense. I do not observe that Fulke has noticed this point in his remarks on John vi. in his work on the Rhemish Translation of the New Testament. See that work, p. 275–280. folio edit. 1633. London.

NOTE 14.—PART IV.

To prove that the Evangelist has here spoken with the utmost correctness, Schoetgen has quoted from Jevachim, fol. 101. 1. ותכרים עשו חזוק מדבריהם יותר משל תורה: "Et sapientes fecerunt robur verbis suis, plus quam verbis Legis."

Lightfoot also has given many others to the same purpose: חכמים דברי כופרים תורה: חכמים דברי כופרים תורה:

"The words of the Scribes are more lovely than the words of the Law."—Hieros. Berac. fol. 3. 2.

The error of the Pharisees was the same as that of the Romanists. They substituted unauthorized tradition in the place of their Inspired Writings, and ritual observances in the place of spiritual worship. The ordinances of external religion are only valuable, as they are the emblems and the appointed means of spiritual blessings. While their proper value is set upon the records of history, the inquiries of the critical, the labors of the learned, the opinions of the judicious, the decisions of the early Church, and all the sources of accurate information, it ought never to be forgotten, neither is it forgotten by the Protestant Churches, that Scripture is the one unerring test of truth, to which every conclusion must be submitted. The Jews adopted many traditions, which were not only contrary to, but were very frequently hostile to Scripture. The Romanists have been guilty of the very same error. The Jews believed that a man might withhold assistance from his afflicted or poor parents, under the pretence that he had dedicated his substance (or corban) to God, with many other absurdities enumerated at length by Lightfoot, Schoetgen, Meuschen, Gill, and others, and alluded to in many places by the Evangelist. The Romanists have set aside the plain and express authority of Scripture, and follow gradual inventions, which they dignify by the name of traditions. They insist, for instance, on such points as these:—The mass without communicants—The denial of the cup to the laity—The prohibiting the reading of Scripture—The distinction between lutria and dulia, λατρεῖα and δουλεῖα, in the worshipping of angels, and saints, and God—The use of images—The praying in an unknown tongue—The mediatorial offices of the saints, and especially of the Virgin Mary—The assumption of the Virgin, an invention of a very late age—The seven sacraments—The doctrine of purgatory.

The Church that teaches these doctrines is as justly worthy of the condemnation of our Lord as the Pharisees, who were his contemporaries—"Ye make the word of God of none effect by your tradition." Much might be added on this and other topics connected with the discussions on the doctrines in controversy between the Protestants and Romanists; but to do so would extend these notes far beyond their limits. See a work entitled, A Learned Treatise on Traditions, translated from the French of Du Moulin, by G. C., London, 1632; particularly ch. 12 and 13, p. 165–223. NOTE 15.—PART IV.

BISHOP HORSLEY and Dr. Jortin have written sermons on the subject of the Syro-phœnician woman; in both of which there is a remarkable coincidence in plan and expression. Both have insisted, with great effect, on the nation of the woman; on the manner in which Christ performed his first miracle on one who was not a Jew: which was so ordained by the providence of God, that this woman "became one of the first pagan proselytes, and the mystery of the calling and the conversion of the Gentiles began in her to be gloriously unfolded;" on the humility of the suppliant, and her acknowledgment of the wisdom of God in selecting the Jews to be his own people, while she retained her hope of mercy as a creature of God; and on the absurdity of judging of the truth of past events by the test of the experience of the present age; both agreeing in the probability of the opinion expressed in a former note, that the power of evil spirits, in the time of our Lord, was permitted to be more visibly displayed than in our own age. For the more particular explanation, therefore, of this narrative, and especially for the view which Bishop Horsley has given of the peculiar propriety of our Lord's conduct in making the manner in which he complied with the request of the Greek idolatress, a type of the mode in which the Gentiles should be received, see Jortin's Works, 8vo. London, 1810, vol. ix. p. 239, &c.; and Horsley's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 134, and particularly p. 158, 9, and 164.

NOTE 16.—PART IV.

THE JEWS considered every nation but their own as dogs, and on that account refused to share in their hospitality, or to have any intercourse with them, except that which had reference to merchandise.

R. Pirke Eliezer gives an illustration of this passage. In his twenty-ninth chapter he discusses the eighth temptation of Abraham, Gen. xvii. 1. He endeavours to prove that Abraham circumcised his servants, and proceeds thus: "Unde autem (probas) quod circumciderit (ser-vos) illos? quia dicitur: omnes viros domus suæ, et natum domus circumcidit—cur autem circumcidit illos? propter purificationem, ne contaminarent dominum suum cibo, ac potu suo. Quicumque enim comedit cum præputiato, is veluti cum cane edit. Uti canis non est circumcisis, sic et præputiatus non est circumcisis. Quisquis accedit ad præputiatum, is veluti mortuum contrectat,” &c.—Vorstius’ Translation of R. Pirke Eliezer, p. 66. I ought to observe here, that Schoetgen, who refers in his notes on Apoc. xxii. 15., to this chapter of Pirke Eliezer, quotes a part of it differently from any which is to be found in the translation of Vorstius. As the Hebrew original is not in my possession, I cannot account for the variation; but my copy of the Latin translation by Vorstius is corrected in various places from the Hebrew original, by a learned rabbi, and can, I think, be depended upon.

NOTE 17.—PART IV.

ON THE OPINIONS OF THE JEWS RESPECTING THE CHARACTER OF THE MESSIAH.

THE various works which were done by our Lord, as related in the preceding sections of this part, convinced St. Peter that Jesus was the Messiah. It certainly appears to us very extraordinary that this open confession of the Messiahship of Jesus had not been repeatedly made before. The reasons seem to have been, that the various inconsistent traditions concerning the Messiah which were then prevalent, and the opposite expectations of the people had so biased the minds of his disciples, that it prevented them from forming a correct judgment as to the dignity of their Lord and Master. They saw, indeed, and acknowledged, that Jesus was more than human, and they daily anticipated the establishment of the kingdom of the Messiah; but before that event they expected the coming of Elias, various resurrections of the ancient prophets, the reëpearance of Moses and Elias, with other different signs and wonders, which have already been enumerated. Dr. Pye Smith observes, “that their notions of the Messiah were sublime, imperfectly understood, and inconsistent; they attributed to him a superior nature, a preëxistent state, and, to say the least, many of the characteristic properties of Deity.”

When Christ was upon earth, the opinions of the Jews concerning the nature and person of their ardently-expected Messiah were by no means uniform: some affirmed that he would be a mere man, endowed with peculiar powers and assistance from God—others that he would be a man, with whom a special power, emanating from God, would be immediately conjoined—others maintained that he would be superior to their fathers, to all mankind, and to the angels; that he existed before the creation of the world, and was employed by God as an instrument in the formation of the world, and peculiarly in the protection and religious institutions of the Israelitish nation.

Schoetgen, in his second volume, has most amply and most learnedly discussed the subject of the Messiah. His Horæ Hebraicæ are an invaluable treasure to the theological student who desires to understand the New Testament. It is to be regretted that the work is so scarce, and that there is neither an abridgment nor a translation of it in our own language.

The Jews seem to have entertained the same indefinite notions with regard to the Messiah, as the Christians of the present age entertain when they converse on the Millennium, or the second advent of our Lord; on the restoration of the Jews, whether it will be temporal or spiritual; or on the other sublime and elevating subjects of the prophecies of our own Scriptures, on which the primitive Church has come to no conclusion. The language of Scripture is so general, that it may be interpreted both literally and metaphorically; and every Christian, who at all reflects on these subjects, anticipates some magnificent events, which he believes will certainly take place; while no two will be found exactly to agree in their opinions and speculations. Lightfoot remarks on this subject:—

From the Messiah the Jews expected pomp and stateliness, a royal and victorious kingdom—they see Christ appear in a low condition and contemptible poverty.

From the Messiah they expected an advancing and heightening the rites of Moses—they saw that he began to remove them.

By the Messiah they expected to be redeemed and delivered from their subjection to the Roman yoke—he taught them to give Cæsar his due, and to submit to the government God had set over them.

By the Messiah they expected that the Gentiles should be subdued, trod under their feet, and destroyed—he taught that they should be called, converted, and become the Church’.

Bishop Blomfield, in his admirable dissertation^g, has given us, at still greater length, an abstract of the notions entertained by the Jews of the Messiah’s kingdom:—

1. They expected him to be of a nature far

^f Lightfoot’s Sermons, Works, fol. vol. ii. p. 1112.

^g On the Traditional Knowledge of a promised Redeemer, Camb. 1810, p. 106. fin. &c.

^e Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, vol. i. p. 464, and 466. Dr. Pye Smith has compressed into a very short compass the conclusions of Kuinoel (Comment in Libros N. T. Hist. p. 84–91.) on the same subject.

surpassing that of men and angels. One of the rabbis says, "The Messiah is higher than the ministering angels." To this notion the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews evidently alludes, i. 4.

2. They considered him to be "the Word of God," an emanation from the Supreme Being; the Author of all created things.

3. They believed that all the transactions, in which the Deity was related to have had a communication with mankind, were carried on through the medium of his Word, the Messiah; that He delivered the Israelites from Egypt, led them through the wilderness, supported and protected them.

4. They believed that the Spirit of the Lord was to be upon Him, and intimately united with Him; and that it would manifest itself in exertion of miraculous power. To this our Saviour alludes, Matt. xii. 28. "But if I, in the Spirit of God, cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come upon you."

5. They supposed that the Messiah would appear, not in a real human body, but in the semblance of one; ἐν δοκίμῃ. This notion found its way into the Christian Church, and was the distinguishing dogma of the Docetæ. It is combated by St. John in several parts of his writings; viz. "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us," (John i. 14.), not only seemed to wear a human form, but actually did so. Again, "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God," (1 John iv. 3.) And it is not an improbable supposition of Professor Bertholdt, that the Evangelist had the same heresy in view, when he made particular mention of the blood and water which flowed from the side of Jesus, John xix. 34.

6. They expected that the Messiah would not be subject to death, John xii. 34. The multitude answered him, "We have heard out of the Law, that Christ abideth for ever."

7. Yet they thought that he was to offer in his own person an expiatory sacrifice for their sins, John i. 29.

8. He was to restore the Jews to freedom. Compare Luke i. 68. xxiv. 21. 2 Esdr. xii. 34.

9. And to establish a pure and perfect form of worship, Luke i. 73. John iv. 25.

10. And to give remission of sins, Luke i. 76. Matt. i. 21.

11. And to work miracles, John vii. 31.

12. He was to descend into the receptacle of departed spirits, and to bring back to earth the souls of the Israelites, which were then to be reunited to their glorified bodies; and this was to be the first resurrection.

13. The devil and his angels were to be cast into hell for a thousand years.

14. Then was to begin the kingdom of heaven, or of God, or of the Christ, which was to last a thousand years.

15. At the end of that period of time, the devil was to be released from confinement, and to excite great troubles and commotions; but he was to be conquered, and again imprisoned for ever.

16. After that was to be the second and general resurrection of the dead, followed by the judgment.

17. The world was to be renewed; new heavens, a new earth, and a new Jerusalem were to appear.

18. At last the Messiah, having fulfilled his office, was to deliver up the kingdom to God, at whose right hand he was to sit for evermore.

NOTE 18.—PART IV.

ON THE CONFESSION OF ST. PETER.

OUR Lord had now, by his miracles, teaching, and conduct, so impressed on the minds of his Apostles the certainty that he was the Messiah, whom they had expected, that St. Peter makes the fullest confession of his faith, in the most energetic language. Our Lord immediately addresses him in that remarkable language, which has been said, by the Church of Rome, to be the immovable foundation of her undoubted supremacy and her exclusive privileges, as the depository of truth, and of her consequent infallibility, as the director and instructor of the world. The question therefore is, Whether the confession made by St. Peter was the rock on which the Church of Christ was to be founded, or whether the Apostle himself was that rock? The most eminent of the ancient Fathers have espoused the former opinion. Chrysostom^b interprets the passage τῇ πέτρᾳ—τούτῃ τῇ πίστει τῆς ὁμολογίας, "upon the rock, that is, upon the faith of his profession."

The most probable meaning of the passage appears to be that which shall comprise both of the controverted senses. St. Peter was always the most zealous of the apostles, and to him was reserved the honor of first preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles. The probable reason why our Lord addressed himself particularly to Peter was, that he happened to be the first who had acknowledged Him as the Christ the Son of the living God. St. Peter generally proved himself the chief speaker, and he continued to do so after our Lord's ascension, without, however, assuming the least degree of authority over the rest of the apostles. The occasion of our Lord's addressing Peter was the confession the Apostle had just made; and He may be considered as speaking prophetically, when He said, pointing to or resting his hand upon the Apostle, Thou art Peter, and on thee, as the first preacher to the Gentiles, and on this confession, which thou shalt preach to them, I will establish my Church.—Beza, Lightfoot, Bishop Burgess, in his treatise inserted in a collection of tracts lately published, and many others, among whom may be reckoned some of the popes themselves, have espoused this conclusion. Bishop Marsh, however, in his work on the Comparison between the Churches of England and Rome; Grotius, Michaelis, Whitby, with Père Simon, and the Romanists in general, have adopted the latter opinion.

Among other of the Protestant writers who have strenuously advocated the opinion that Christ and not St. Peter was the founder of the Christian Church, we meet with the venerable name of the late Granville Sharp. The assumption of supremacy over all the Churches of Christ by the Church of Rome, filled him with astonishment. He was induced, in consequence, to pay particular attention to the passage upon which this arrogant claim was supported, and the result of his examination is here annexed. The Greek word πετρος, he observes, does not mean a rock, though it has indeed a relative meaning to the word πετρα, a rock; for it signifies only a little piece of rock, or a stone, that has been dug out of a rock; whereby the dignity of the real foundation intended by our Lord, which he expressed by the prophetic figure of Petra (a rock), must necessarily be understood to bear a proportionable superiority of dignity and importance above the other preceding word petros; as petra, a real rock, is comparatively superior to a mere stone, or particle from the rock; because a rock is the regular figurative expression in Holy Scripture for a Divine Protector; יהוה סלעי Jehovah (is my rock), 2 Sam. xxii. 2. and Psal. xviii. 2. Again, אלהי צורי my God (is) my rock, 2 Sam. xxii. 2. and Psal. xviii. 2. and again, ומי צור מכליצי אלהינו and who (is) a rock, except our God? 2 Sam. xxii. 32.

That our Lord really referred to this declaration of Peter, relating to his own divine dignity, as being the true rock, on which he would build his Church, is established beyond contradiction by our Lord himself, in the clear distinction which he maintained between the stone (πετρος, petros,) and a rock, (πετρα, petra,) by the accurate grammatical terms in which both these words are expressly recorded. For whatsoever may have been the language in which they were really spoken, perhaps in Chaldee or Syriac, yet in this point the Greek record is our only authoritative instructor. The first word, πετρος, being a masculine noun, signifies merely a stone; and the second word, πετρα, though it is a feminine noun, cannot signify any thing of less magnitude and importance than a rock, or strong mountain of defence.

With respect to the first. The word πετρος, petros, in its highest figurative sense of a stone, when applied to Peter, can represent only one true believer, or faithful member of Christ's Church, that is, one out of the great multitude of true believers in Christ, who, as figurative stones, form altogether the glorious spiritual building of Christ's Church, and not the foundation on which that Church is built; because that figurative character cannot, consistently with truth, be applied to any other person than to God, or to Christ alone. And though even Christ himself is sometimes, in Holy Scripture, called a Stone (λιθος, but not πετρος), yet whenever this figurative expression is applied to him, it is always with such a clear distinction of superiority over all other figurative stones, as will not admit the least idea of any vicarial stone to be substituted in his place; as, for instance he is called, "the head Stone of the corner," Psal. cxviii. 22.—"in Zion a precious corner Stone," Psal. xxviii. 16. by whom alone the other living stones of the spiritual house are rendered "acceptable to God;" as St. Peter himself (previous to his citation of that text of Isaiah) has clearly declared, in his address to the Churches dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, wherein he manifestly explains that very text of Isaiah, as follows:—"Ye also," says the apostle, "as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, by (or through) Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. ii. 5. Thus plainly acknowledging the true foundation, on which the other living stones of the primitive Catholic Church were built, in order to render them "acceptable to God," as a "holy priesthood."

From this whole argument of St. Peter, it is manifest that there cannot be any other true head of the Church than Christ himself; so that the pretence for setting up a vicarial head on earth is not only contrary to St. Peter's instruction to the eastern Churches, long after Christ's ascent into heaven; but also (with respect to the inexpediency and impropriety of acknowledging such a vicar on earth as the Roman pretender) is equally contrary to our Lord's own instruction to his disciples (and, of course, also contrary to the faith of the true primitive Catholic Church throughout the whole world) when he promised them that, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name (said our Lord Jesus, the true Rock of the Church), there am I in the midst of them," Matt. xviii. 20.

So that the appointment of any vicar on earth to represent that Rock, or Eternal Head of the Church, whose continual presence, even with the smallest congregations on earth, is so expressly promised, would be not only superfluous and vain, but must also be deemed a most ungrateful affront to the Benevolent Promiser of his continual presence, such as must have been suggested by our spiritual enemies, to promote an apostacy from the only sure foundation, on which the faith, hope, and confidence of the true Catholic Church could be built and supported.

A due consideration also of the second noun, πέτρα, a rock, will demonstrate that the supreme title of the rock, which, in other texts of Holy Scripture, is applied to Jehovah, or God, alone, most certainly was not intended by our Lord to be understood as applicable to his disciple Peter; but only to that true testimony which St. Peter had just before declared, concerning the divine dignity of the Messiah—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

I have already remarked, that πέτρα, a rock, is a feminine noun; and a clear distinction is maintained between πέτρος, the masculine noun in this text, and the said feminine noun πέτρα, the rock, by the grammatical terms in which the latter, in its relatives and articles, is expressed, which are all regularly feminine throughout the whole sentence, and thereby they demonstrate that our Lord did not intend that the new appellation, or nominal distinction, which he had just before given to Simon (viz. πέτρος, the masculine noun, in the beginning of the sentence) should be construed as the character of which he spoke in the next part of the sentence; for, if he had really intended that construction, the same masculine noun, πέτρος, must necessarily have been repeated in the next part of the sentence with a masculine pronoun, viz. ἐπὶ τούτῳ τῷ πετρῷ, instead of ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ, the present text; wherein, on the contrary, not only the gender is changed from the masculine to the feminine, but also the figurative character itself, which is as much superior in dignity to the apostle Simon, and also to his new appellative πέτρος, as a rock is superior to a mere stone. For the word πέτρος cannot signify any thing more than a stone; so that the popish application to Peter (or πέτρος) as the foundation of Christ's Church, is not only inconsistent with the real meaning of the appellative, which Christ at that very time conferred upon him, and with the necessary grammatical construction of it, but also with the figurative importance of the other word, πέτρα, the rock; ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ, "upon this rock," he declared the foundation of the Church, a title of dignity, which, as I have already shown by several texts of Scripture, is applicable only to God or to Christ.

And observe further, that the application of this supreme title (the rock) to Peter, is inconsistent, above all, with the plain reference to the preceding context, made by our Lord in the beginning of this very verse—"And I also say unto thee," which manifestly points out, both by the copulative "and," and the connective adverb "also," the inseparable connection of this verse with the previous declaration of Peter, concerning our Lord's divine dignity in the preceding sentence, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God;" and thereby demonstrates that our Lord's immediate reply, ("And I also say unto thee," &c., did necessarily include this declaration of Peter, as being the principal object of the sentence—the true foundation or rock, on which alone the Catholic Church can be properly built, because our faith in Christ (that he is truly "the Son of the living God") is unquestionably the only security, or rock, of our salvation.

And Christ was also the rock, even of the primitive Church of Israel; for St. Paul testifies, that "they (i. e. the hosts of Israel) did all drink of that spiritual drink, for they drank of that Spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ," 1 Cor. x. 4. And the Apostle, in a preceding chapter (1 Cor. iii. 11.) says, "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

It would exceed all due limits to attempt to discuss at full length the controversies which have divided Christians, when the peculiar passages of Scripture upon which each controversy principally depends, passes under consideration. The observations of Granville Sharp, which I have now extracted, appear to be deserving of attention. The various points which separate the Catholic and Protestant Churches will soon perhaps compel the more serious attention of the Protestant world, by the general revival and increase of popery, and the reaction in its favor in a neighbouring country. And it may be considered the bounden duty of every theological student to make himself acquainted with the controversy existing between the Churches of England and Romeⁱ.

The political discussions respecting the extent of the privileges which the state may conveniently assign to the members of the Church of Rome, have of late years so entirely absorbed public attention, that they have almost superseded the religious argument, which is by far the most important part of the controversy; inasmuch as mistaken religious principle is the root of that system of action, which originally excited the vigilance of the legislature, and still requires a watchful superintendence.

NOTE 19.—PART V.

ON THE MEANING OF MATTHEW XVI. 19.

LIGHTFOOT has given us abundant proofs of the manner in which this expression was understood ⁱ See on this subject the Tracts of the Bishop of St. David's—the Tracts against Popery. The ninth volume of Bishop Hall's Works. Bishop Bull's Reply to the Bishop of Meaux. Barrow's Pope's Supremacy, and many others.

among the Jews, and the manner in which it consequently ought to be understood among Christians. The phrase לִאְכּוֹר וּלְהַתִּיר “to bind and to loose,” in the common language of the Jews, signified to prohibit, and to permit, or to teach what is prohibited or permitted, what is lawful or unlawful. Lightfoot then produces many instances, and goes on to observe:—by this sense of the phrase the intention of Christ is easily ascertained, namely, he first confers on the Apostles the ministerial power to teach what is to be done, and the contrary; he confers this power on them as ministers, and on all their successors, to the end of the world. Their power was more extensive than that of others, because they received authority to prohibit or to allow those things that were ordained in the Law of Moses¹.

In his Hebrew and Talmudical Exercitations on St. Matthew^k, Lightfoot produces many more instances where the words “to loose and to bind” are applied in this sense; and he shows that these words were first used in doctrine and in judgments, concerning things allowed or not allowed in the Law. Secondly, that to bind, is the same with to forbid, or to declare forbidden. To think that Christ, he continues, when he used the common phrase, was not understood by his hearers, in the common and vulgar sense, shall I call it a matter of laughter, or of madness?

To this, therefore, do these words amount: when the time was come wherein the Mosaic Law, as to some part of it, was to be continued and to last for ever, he granted Peter here, and to the rest of the apostles (chap. xviii. 18.), a power to abolish or confirm what they thought good; being taught this, and led by the Holy Spirit, as if he should say, whatsoever ye shall bind in the Law of Moses, that is, forbid, it shall be forbidden, the divine authority confirming it; and whatsoever ye shall loose, that is, permit, or shall teach that it is permitted and lawful, shall be lawful and permitted. Hence they bound, that is, forbad, circumcision to the believers; eating of things offered to idols, of things strangled, and of blood for a time, to the Gentiles; and that which they bound on earth was confirmed in heaven. They loosed, that is, allowed, purification to Paul, and to four other brethren, for the shunning of scandal, Acts xxi. 24.: and, in a word, by these words of Christ it was committed to them, the Holy Spirit directing, that they should make decrees concerning religion, as to the use and rejection of Mosaic rites and judgments, and that either for a time or for ever.

Let the words be applied, by way of paraphrase, to the matter that was transacted at present with Peter. “I am about to build a Gentile Church,” saith Christ, “and to thee, O Peter, do I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven, that thou mayest first open the door of faith to them: but if thou askest by what rule that Church is to be governed when the Mosaic rule may seem so improper for it, thou shalt be so guided by the Holy Spirit, that whatsoever of the Law of Moses thou shalt forbid them, shall be forbidden; whatsoever thou grantest them, shall be granted, and that under a sanction made in heaven.” Hence in that instant, when he should use his keys, that is, when he was now ready to open the gate of the Gospel to the Gentiles (Acts x.), he was taught from heaven that the consorting of the Jew with the Gentile, which before had been bound, was now loosed; and the eating of any creature convenient for food, was now loosed, which before had been bound; and he in like manner looses both these.

Those words of our Saviour (John xx. 23.), “Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted to them,” for the most part are forced to the same sense with these before us, when they carry quite another sense. Here the business is of doctrine only, not of persons; there of persons, not of doctrine. Here of things lawful or unlawful in religion, to be determined by the Apostles; there of persons obstinate, or not obstinate, to be punished by them, or not to be punished.

As to doctrine, the Apostles were doubly instructed. 1. So long sitting at the feet of their Master, they had imbibed the evangelical doctrine.

2. The Holy Spirit directing them, they were to determine concerning the legal doctrine and practice, being completely instructed and enabled in both, by the Holy Spirit descending upon them. As to the persons, they were endowed with a peculiar gift, so that, the same Spirit directing them if they would retain, and punish the sins of any, a power was delivered into their hands of delivering to Satan, of punishing with diseases, plagues, yea, death itself: which Peter did to Ananias and Sapphira; Paul to Elymas, Hymeneus, and Philetus, &c.

Schoetgen¹ adds many instances to those collected by Lightfoot, that to loose and to bind signified to pronounce what was lawful and unlawful; clean and unclean; condemned or permitted in the Mosaic Dispensation. From all which he infers, that among the Jews this power of binding and loosing was given to rabbis, or teachers, who were skilled in the Law, and appointed to instruct the people, and that our Lord not only claimed to himself the same power which had hitherto been possessed by the Jewish teachers, but bestowed it upon his own disciples, and invested them in his new Dispensation with the same authority as that which had been hitherto exerted only by the Jewish teachers.

¹ Our Lord only asserts in very general terms, that the Apostles had power to decide what was approved or disapproved of God; but the Jews taught (Jalkut Simeoni, part i. fol. 225. 1.) whoever is excommunicated one day on earth (although he be then absolved) is not pardoned in heaven until after seven days: he who is thus condemned on earth for seven days, is absolved in heaven at the end of thirty. Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 145-6.

The power of binding or loosing, of declaring what is lawful and what is unlawful, is evidently the highest power of governing; and of imposing laws for the guidance and direction of the spiritual society of the Church. It was the belief of the primitive Church, that this power was confided to the Apostles; and, as far as the circumstances of the various Churches may require, was continued to their episcopal successors. The power of binding and loosing is generally called the power of the keys; and consists of authority to admit into the Church, and to exclude from it; and it implies, as the words of our Lord decidedly assert, the power to condemn for sin, and to absolve from sin^m.

NOTE 20.—PART IV.

ON OUR LORD'S EXPLICIT DECLARATION OF THE NATURE OF HIS KINGDOM.

HAVING now, by the force of his miracles, elicited from his disciples the declaration that He was the Messiah; and having confirmed the truth of that declaration by the authority which he committed to the Apostles, our Lord proceeded immediately to reveal more explicitly the real and spiritual nature of his kingdom. At this moment every erroneous opinion that the Apostles, with all the Jewish nation, entertained respecting the nature of the Messiah's kingdom must have received the fullest confirmation, and have given birth to the highest expectations. Peter was promised the keys of the kingdom of heaven, with authority to bind and to loose, to give laws, to pronounce what was clean and unclean. The temporal power and majesty of their Master, they supposed, were now to be developed, and with it their own honor and aggrandizement. They had seen his miracles; they had confessed their faith; they believed in Him as the long-expected Messiah; they anticipated the establishment of his kingdom, and their own immediate elevation to wealth and dignity. (Seet. 15.)

It was under these circumstances (compare Matt. xvi. 20., with v. 21.) that our Lord began to check the rising hopes of his followers, by disclosing to them the object of his incarnation; that He, the Son of Man, who had so abundantly demonstrated his divine power, must go to Jerusalem, there suffer many things, to be rejected by the Chief Priests and Scribes, and, finally, be killed, and raised again the third day. Peter, who on all occasions was the principal speaker, and the most zealous of all the Apostles, could neither reconcile this assertion with all that he had so lately seen and heard, nor could repress his surprise and indignation at even the suggestion of such conduct. Our Lord, who knew the thoughts of his heart, and who read there the lurking desire of ambition and power, reproved him before the Twelve for his erroneous notions, and for his shrinking from the anticipation of humiliation and misfortune. He then, in allusion to his own sufferings, addressed the Apostles and the multitude, in the words of the latter part of the section. He assures his disciples of the absolute necessity of their taking up the cross, and of sacrificing even their lives for his sake and the Gospel's. He blends with these exhortations the assurance that He was the predicted Son of Man; and that though he called upon them now to suffer with him, He would come again in the glory of his Father, the glory of the Shechinah, with his holy angels, as Daniel had foretold; and in his spiritual kingdom he would reward them for their courage and devotion. It is not improbable that our Lord perceived some expression of surprise, or incredulity, upon the countenances of his disciples; for He immediately cautions them against unbelief. He repeats his declaration, that He will again come in his own glory, and in the glory of his Father, and that even the present generation should witness it; for there were some who were present, who should not die till they had seen the Son of Man come in his kingdom. By the term "glory," in these passages, δοξα, the Jews understood the bright flame, and cloud, the glory of the Shechinah, in which the Angel Jehovah was accustomed to appear to the ancient fathersⁿ.

There is a beautiful passage in Habakkuk, in which the prophet describes the appearance of the Shechinah which led the Israelites out of Egypt, into the wilderness of Paran:—

"God came from Teman,
And the Holy One from Mount Paran.
His glory covered the heavens,
His brightness was as the light."

In these expressions the prophet seems to ⁿ See on the identity of the glory in which our Lord appeared, with the glory of the Shechinah; Schoetgen, Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. i. p. 324; and particularly p. 542, on Rom. ix. 4, on the words καὶ ἡ δόξα—"Hæc voce intelligitur Shechina sive majestas divina quæ alias a Græcis δόξα vocabatur." See also Dan. Heinsius, Exercitationes Sacre, p. 220; and particularly p. 138, in Johan. where this is proved at great length. Witsius, De Glorificatione in Monte, Melet. Leidens. sect. 39.

anticipate the description of the Evangelists. Bishop Horsley remarks, that the description of Habakkuk in this passage is that of the Shechinah; and he supposes that the expression, (Habak. iii. 11.)

“At the light of thine arrows they went,
And at the shining of thy glittering spear,” refers to the darting forth of the rays of light from the body of the flame of the Shechinah, which might resemble that of the streamings of the Aurora Borealis. Whether the Shechinah in which the Angel Jehovah, the Lord Jesus, shall come to judgment, shall be of this description, or whether it shall be as the self-revolving flame which was stationed at the gate of Paradise, or the bright cloud which on the day of the transfiguration overshadowed the disciples and their Lord, we cannot now decide. But of this we may be assured, that we shall all behold this Great and Wonderful and Divine Personage. Like his disciples, we must become his associates, or we shall be banished from that Presence as unworthy of his sublime contemplation.

NOTE 21.—PART IV.

BISHOP PORTEUS remarks, that this passage is commonly supposed to refer to the signal manifestation of Christ's power in the destruction of Jerusalem. But, he continues, we know of no one of Christ's disciples that survived this event but St. John; and our Saviour speaks of more than one. In the 27th verse we read, the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, to reward every man according to his works, which undoubtedly relates to Christ's final advent. When, therefore, it immediately follows in the next verse, “there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom;” is it not most natural, is it not almost necessary, to understand these similar expressions as relating to the same great event? Now as Christ could not here mean to say, that some of his disciples should live till the day of judgment, he only meant to intimate that a few of them, before his death, should be favored with a representation of the glorious appearance of Christ and his saints, as they should be seen in the air on that awful day. And this promise was fulfilled a few days after, when he was transfigured before them on the mountain.

The whole transaction is described in the same terms, as St. John in the Revelation applies to the Son of Man in his state of glory in heaven (Rev. i. 13-16.) St. Luke calls his appearance, after being transfigured, “his glory.” St. John uses the same expression, “We beheld his glory, as of the Only-begotten of the Father:”

and St. Peter, the other witness, refers to it in a similar manner, 2 Pet. i. 16-18. Bishop Porteus's Lectures, p. 56.

Whitby reasons at some length against this interpretation of the account of the transfiguration. He would refer it rather to the day of judgment. On considering, however, the parallel passages, as they are placed together in this arrangement, I cannot think his conclusions correct. The manner in which our Lord appeared at his transfiguration, undoubtedly appears to have been the same as that in which he will again descend from heaven. In this sense, his being glorified at the transfiguration may be considered the type of his future glory; and Christ may be said to have come at that time in the glory of his future kingdom.

NOTE 22.—PART IV.

ON THE TRANSFIGURATION.

HAVING now prepared the minds of his disciples for his approaching sufferings and death, our Lord, for the greater confirmation of their faith in all the predicted trials that awaited them, determines to manifest himself to them in his glorified state: in that state, we may believe, in which He was before the world began, in which He is at present, in which also He will appear to an assembled world. He sets before them, as his custom was, by a significant action, a demonstration of the truth of what He had told them, that some of them should see their King in his glory. The transfiguration of Christ, like his resurrection and ascension, appears as it were to draw back for a moment the veil from the invisible world. The impenetrable barrier is passed; a light seems to dart from heaven to disperse the thick clouds that hang over the valley of the shadow of death, and we are admitted into the presence of the Judge of the world; and see, with the eye of faith, the spirits of the just made perfect, before we are called upon to resign this corruptible body to the shroud and to the tomb. Where the spirits of the departed exist, what their condition, or what their laws of consciousness, or means of happiness, man must die before he can ascertain. But it is not improbable that the invisible world is so mysteriously connected with this visible, diurnal sphere, that the cessation of our consciousness, as to present things, is but the commencement of our consciousness of all those unknown realities of the other world. Who can say, that we are not at this moment surrounded—that we are not at every period of our lives encompassed—with a crowd of angelic spirits, the anxious witnesses of our thoughts and actions?

“ Millions of spiritual beings walk the earth

Unseen, both when we wake, and when we sleep : ” and it is only the fragile veil of this body that prevents us from distinguishing them ; as soon as that is dissolved we shall become spirits among spirits.

Bishop Porteus, in his beautiful and elegant discourse on this portion of Scripture, observes, that the evident tendency of the whole passage is to prepare the minds of his disciples for the cruel treatment which both He and they were to undergo, and at the same time to raise their drooping spirits, by setting before their eyes his own exaltation, and their glorious rewards in another life. The very mentioning of Christ's death, by such men as Moses and Elias, without any marks of surprise or dissatisfaction, was of itself sufficient to cause a great change in the sentiments of the disciples respecting those sufferings ; and to soften those prejudices against them, the removal of which seems to have been one of the more immediate objects of the transfiguration. He continues by remarking, that the circumstance of Christ's assumption of this splendid and glorious appearance at the very time Moses and Elias were conversing with him on his sufferings, was a visible and striking proof to his disciples, that those sufferings were neither a discredit nor disgrace to him, but were perfectly consistent with the dignity of his character, and the highest state of glory to which he could be exalted. The transfiguration of Christ may be considered as a visible and figurative representation of Christ's coming in glory to judge the world, of a general resurrection, and of a day of retribution. For although the resurrection is not expressly mentioned in this transaction, it is evidently and distinctly implied ; because Jesus is there represented in his glorified state, consequently the resurrection must be supposed to have taken place. In the preceding section we read that when Christ should come again in glory, he would reward every man according to his works (v. 27.), and in confirmation of the truths of a resurrection, and a day of retribution, Moses and Elias, two just and righteous men, who had for many centuries before departed out of this world, were brought back to it again in the possession of a state of glory. Elias, having been carried up into heaven without seeing death, most aptly represents those children of light who should be found alive at the last day ; and Moses shadows forth the glorious perfection of those blessed spirits who have died in the Lord, and who in the day of judgment, their body and soul being united and glorified, will receive the reward of their works. The glory of Christ, therefore, on the mountain was a symbol of his exaltation to be the Judge of the earth, and the glory of Moses and Elias was an earnest of a resurrection, and of the rewards and happiness prepared for the righteous in heaven. The other great purpose of the action on the mount was, to give a figurative signification of the abrogation of the Mosaical Law, and the commencement of the Christian Dispensation, upon which it was to be established. Moses and Elias, as the representatives of the Law and the Prophets, who had successively testified of the promised Messiah, it appears to me, were now, in their glorified state, permitted to behold on earth the magnificent completion of all their predictions ; and by their farewell testimony to the truth of his Divinity afford to man the most powerful evidence that human reason could either receive or require. By their testimony they acknowledged the accomplishment of all their prophecies, and that the commencement of the Messiah's kingdom was established on the Law and the Prophets ; and when the disciples, in an ecstasy of happiness, desired to erect three tabernacles, God himself proclaimed, “ This is my beloved Son, hear—HEAR YE HIM ! ” Moses and Elias instantly disappear, overshadowed by the bright cloud, and Christ alone remains the undivided object of all their worship. To Him alone are they to build their altars ; to Him alone are they to look for happiness and glory ; and He shall come again with his holy angels, and ten thousand times ten thousand shall stand before him. The great day which God has appointed for the duration of this earth is rapidly rolling round, with all its successive generations ; and He who created man in the morning of that day, shall descend again from heaven in judgment, when its hour of evening closes. His glory then will fill the skies, and these stupendous but inferior manifestations of his Godhead are but as the morning stars, which shall be lost in the glory of that magnificent sun which shall then beam upon the gathered universe. Inspiration itself seems to labor under the description of that day. Language fails before the glories and overwhelming splendors of the invisible world. “ Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what God hath prepared for them that love him.”

The best treatise on the important event we are now considering, is that by Witsius, in the Meltemata Leidensia. It is too long to translate ; but as the book itself is not often to be met with, I shall subjoin an abstract of the reasoning of the learned author.

The matter of his treatise is arranged under four general heads.

1. The circumstances.
2. The glorifying.
3. The adjuncts.
4. The sequel.

These again are subdivided, as follows :—

The circumstances.—Time, place, persons.

The glorifying.—Person and apparel ; converse with Moses and Elias; attestation from God the Father.

Adjuncts.—Weakness of the Apostles; indulgence shown them by Jesus; interruption by St. Peter.

Sequel.—Fear of the beholders on his descent; comfort imparted by Christ; secrecy enjoined, and observed by the Apostles.

The circumstances of the peculiar prophecy of the time in which our Lord was transfigured have been already noticed. The place is uncertain, but is generally supposed to have been Mount Tabor.

The witnesses were few in number; but they were the same as were required by the Law to testify the truth of any fact. Peter, James, and John were selected as the most eminent among the disciples.

The transfiguration took place while Christ was in the act of prayer.

The nature of the change produced in the person, face, and garments of Christ cannot be comprehended in this state of our existence.

The transfiguration took place on our Lord's account as well as on our own. The weakness of his human nature might require such support. But it was principally for our sakes, that we might believe that Christ was the true Messiah.

The reasons why Moses and Elias appeared were, that Moses was the founder of the Jewish polity, and Elias was the reformer of the Jewish Church, and the most zealous of its prophets. Their presence implied, that the ministry of Christ was attested by the Law and the Prophets.

Witsius then inquires, Were these persons really visible, or merely phantoms in their shape? There is no difficulty about Elias, who having been translated in body, may easily be conceived to have come down from heaven to Christ on the mountain. But how did Moses appear, who died and was buried? From the dispute between Michael and the Devil about the body of Moses, some imagine that his body was preserved from corruption, for the express purpose of being restored to him on this occasion. But however this be, his body certainly might have been restored to him; and it seems most probable that such was the case. Whether he returned with Elias to heaven, or tarried upon the earth to accompany Christ in his ascent, is a question of curiosity, sect. 15.

But how could the Apostles tell who Moses and Elias were? Most probably either by divine revelation, or by some emblematical tokens, or by the conversation which passed between them and Christ, sect. 16.

They appeared in glory, partly to do honor to their Lord, partly to give the Apostles an idea of glorified bodies, which they themselves should afterwards possess in heaven, sect. 17.

They talked to our Saviour about his impending death, not to point out to him what he had to suffer, but that they might assert the momentous truth, that the salvation of the human race depended entirely on the death of Christ, sect. 19.

Adjuncts.—Drowsiness of the Apostles.—This might have happened because it was night, or because they were fatigued with ascending the mountain, or from the length of Christ's prayers, sect. 20.

The proposal of Peter was inconsiderate, but proceeded from a love of his master and zeal for his service. It must be delightful, he thought, to continue for some time longer in the enjoyment of such celestial society; and with a view of discovering the will of the Lord, he said, "It is good that we should remain here," sect. 23 and 24.

The bright cloud was a symbol of the Divine Presence, while it served to shroud God's glory. Its brightness was contrasted with the darkness and terror that accompanied the descent of Jehovah on former occasions, pointing out the mild character of the New Dispensation. It also served to prevent the Apostles from looking into mysteries, by observing what became of the glorified bodies of Moses and Elias, sect. 30.

The words that were heard to proceed from the cloud, are extremely emphatical and important—"This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." These words contain a declaration of the glorious nature of Christ, joined with an injunction to obey him—"Hear ye Him:" i. e. Hear Him alone; where there is a tacit contrast with Moses and Elias. Christ indeed came to confirm the Law and the Prophets; but he came in a character so transcendently elevated, that the twinkling sparks of the Old Covenant were absorbed in the blaze of his Gospel, sect. 33.

The sum and substance of the Gospel is contained in this concise declaration from above. We are herein told who and what He is, whom the Father appointed for the Saviour of the human race; His Only Son; the object of his love; dear beyond all created beings, sect. 34.

A most consoling truth; since the only Son of God, for our sakes, was consigned to such cruel tortures and so dreadful a death, sect. 35.

Sequel.—Fear of the Apostles.—This might arise from the awful sound of the Voice which they heard; but it was chiefly occasioned by visible symbols of the presence of the Divine Majesty, sect. 39.

They saw no one but Jesus only. It was not fit that Moses and Elias should remain on the earth any longer, as their ministry was not to be confounded and mixed with that of Christ and with the apostolic functions, sect. 42.

The Apostles were commanded by Christ not to divulge what they had seen till after his resurrection. The following reasons are assigned:—Christ was at that time in his state of humiliation, and he ever conducted himself with a modesty agreeable to that state: He therefore avoided every kind of display. The Apostles were not yet qualified to publish these things, by power given them from above. If they had done so, they would not have been believed by the Jews, until after a more public demonstration of his glory, in his resurrection and ascension, sect. 43.

The fidelity of the Apostles on this occasion is praiseworthy: although they disputed with each other what the resurrection from the dead might mean, yet they scrupulously observed the injunction of secrecy, sect. 45.

Such is the brief outline of Witsius' learned Treatise on the Transfiguration. He has omitted, however, to notice the peculiar circumstance related Mark ix. 15., that the people who beheld our Saviour coming from the mountain were amazed at his appearance. Doddridge agrees with the conjecture of Whitby, that it is probable our Lord's face shone with rays of glory, as the face of Moses did when he came down from the mount. Pilkington likewise proposes the same idea, as if it was entirely his own. "I hope to be excused," he says, "in offering a conjecture to illustrate an expression in this section, which hath generally been passed over by the commentators without any remark. It is here said, that the people were greatly amazed when they beheld Jesus coming unto them: and no satisfactory account hath been given of their surprise or astonishment: which, I am induced to think, proceeded from some rays of the heavenly glory, which yet rested on our Saviour, and were visible unto them. We cannot now well read of the people being greatly amazed at the sight of him, without recollecting what happened to Moses, when he had been more immediately in the Divine Presence: that, at his return to the people, the skin of his face shone so, that Aaron and the children of Israel were afraid to come nigh him. Exod. xxxiv. 35. And the reader may likewise observe, that the word ἐκστασις, which is here translated, 'to be greatly amazed,' is used by St. Mark in another place, to signify, particularly, the being astonished and terrified at a glorious and supernatural appearance," chap. xvi. 5, 6.

In addition to these remarks, it must be observed, that there were traditions among the Jews, that Moses and Elias should return to earth during the reign of the Messiah.—Schreger, to prove this, quotes Debarim Rabbæ, sect. 3, fol. 235. 2. and Tanachum, fol. 42. 1. Hagah Hileliah, vol. 1. p. 145.

It may be remarked here, that one Evangelist, in relating the transfiguration, states, that Jesus went up into the mountain six days after the previous conversation; and the preceding section, and by another that it was eight days. This discrepancy is easily reconciled. St. Matthew marks the interval of six complete days: whereas St. Luke takes into calculation the day on which the conversation was held, and that likewise on which the transfiguration took place; making thereby eight days.

The sleep of Peter and the Apostles does not appear to be generally understood. Some suppose, that as St. Luke has mentioned this circumstance in the midst of his narrative, the disciples were asleep during the time of the transfiguration, and while Moses and Elias were conversing with our Lord. The passage in St. Luke must be considered as in a parenthesis: and seems to imply that the Apostles had fallen asleep most probably from fatigue, the difficult ascent, or, as others suppose, from the length of time in which our Lord continued in prayer. Whatever might have been the cause, they were certainly awake from their lethargy by the celestial glory that surrounded them.

Bishop Hall, in his Contemplations, has also many admirable remarks on the subject of the transfiguration. He arranges his matter under the four heads:—of Time, Place, Attendants, and Company. His devotional thoughts on the various particulars are eminently beautiful.

NOTE 23.—PART IV.

THE transfiguration of Christ was intended to reconcile the minds of the Apostles to the sufferings and death of Christ, and to remove the inveterate prejudices that prevailed among them, and the Jewish converts in general: 1st. With regard to his sufferings, which they conceived to be inconsistent with his dignity. And 2dly, with regard to the ceremonial Law, which they were persuaded was not done away with by the Gospel, but that they were to exist together in full force, and to be equally obeyed. This prejudice continued for many years after our Lord's resurrection. St. Paul tells us, Acts xxi. 21., "several thousand Jews believed, and yet were all zealous of the Law." And it was the suspicion that St. Paul had forsaken, and taught others to forsake Moses, which brought his life in most imminent danger, and actually occasioned his imprisonment, Acts xxi. 28–30. No wonder, then, that our Lord should impose silence on his Apostles at this period of his ministry, in the subject of the abolition of the Law of Moses.—Bishop Porteus's Lecture, p. 65.

NOTE 24.—PART IV.

THE three Apostles had now beheld their God, companion, and friend, the Messiah, in his glorified state: in that form and manner in which he had appeared to the patriarchs and prophets of the ancient time, and in which he will again appear when he shall come to judge the living and the dead. After this sublime disclosure of his celestial dignity, he continually reminded his disciples, and by that means prepared their minds for the approach of his degrading, cruel, and painful death. The saying was hid from them—it was incomprehensible—they understood it not. For the doctrine of the statement, although prefigured by the types, and taught in the instructions of the Law, and still more clearly revealed by the Prophets, was not thoroughly understood till life and immortality were brought to light by the Gospel. This doctrine was to the Apostles, as well as to their countrymen, a stumbling-block. It was, and it will ever be, foolishness to the Greek, and to all who assimilate to the same speculative, presumptuous, and philosophizing character. Human reason must here be submitted to the Gospel. There must be a prostration of the pride of human intellect at the foot of the cross, before men with proper humility can believe in the salvation purchased for them through the statement of a Divine Being for the sins of man. He who rejects this doctrine counts the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, and violently separates the bond of love which unites a fallen man to the mercy of his Creator.

NOTE 25.—PART IV.

It is uncertain whether the tribute demanded of our Lord was the half-shekel for the service of the temple, or the common taxes required by the rulers of the country. Both Lightfoot² and Whist³ have adopted the former opinion, which seems to be more consistent with our Lord's reasoning, that he was the son of that King for whose use the tribute was demanded. The conduct of our Lord in this instance affords a striking example to all mankind, quietly to submit to all the laws and customs of their country, which are not hostile to Christianity.

Jones⁴ considers this as another significant action, and remarks on it—I have a notion of my own, for which I can produce no authority of any commentator, that the three orders of animals, the fowls of the air, the beasts of the earth, and the fishes of the sea, represent three states of being: the fowls of the air, the angelic or spiritual nature, both bad and good: the land animals, the present state of man's life: the fish of the sea, the state of the dead, who are silent and invisible. This may appear strange and visionary to those who have not considered it: but if the distinction is founded on the Scripture, then the fish that first cometh up, is he that first cometh up from the dead, as Christ did, the first fruits of them that slept: and as he rose for our justification, he brought with him our ransom, to be paid for those who have no tribute money of their own to give. With this sense the case was worthy of the divine interposition." I insert this as a curious specimen of Jones's interpretation of Scripture: it is fanciful, but ingenious.

Dr. Owen, apud Bowyer, p. 103, has justly observed, that the omission of our translators to mark the difference between the didrachma ver. 24 and the stater ver. 27, has obscured and perverted the whole account. The stater was equal in value to the didrachma, which was equivalent to the half-shekel demanded⁵. Exod. xxx. 11-16, and Levit. 25-26, for the service of the temple.

NOTE 26.—PART IV.

THE ambitious dispute of the disciples, concerning their precedence in the kingdom of heaven, proves that not even the repeated predictions of our Saviour's sufferings and death could banish from the minds of his followers their preconceived ideas respecting the Messiah's kingdom. To correct this prevailing error, our Saviour now resorts to a different mode of undeceiving them. He places a little child before them, assuring them, that unless they were converted, that is, unless they became as unambitious and as humble, as mild, as meek, and as regardless of all temporal power and distinctions as a little child, they could not even be admitted into the kingdom of heaven. Humility is the characteristic virtue of Christianity: and the highest rewards of heaven are promised to the most humble and meek: "for he that is least among you all, the same shall be great."

The reason Michaelis observes on this conversation, why apparent contradictions are unavoidable in the deposition of several eye-witnesses to the same transaction is easy to be assigned. They do not all observe every minute circumstance of the transaction, but some pay particular attention to one circumstance, others to another: this occasions a variation in their accounts, which it is sometimes difficult to reconcile. This happened likewise to the Evangelists, as I will illustrate by the following instance:—St. Matthew, ch. xviii. 1–14., and St. Mark, ch. ix. 33–50., relate the same transaction, but in different points of view, and for that reason appear, at first sight, to contradict each other.

St. Matthew says, “At the same time came the disciples unto Jesus, and said, ‘Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?’” St. Mark, on the contrary, “He came to Capernaum, and being in the house, he asked them, ‘What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?’ But they held their peace: for by the way they had disputed among themselves, who should be the greatest.” According to St. Matthew, the disciples themselves lay the subject of their dispute before Jesus for his decision: but, according to St. Mark, they even refuse to relate the subject of their dispute, though Jesus requested it, because they were conscious to themselves that it would occasion a reproof. The question is, how these accounts are to be reconciled.

Without entering into the various solutions which have been given by the commentators, I shall only observe, that, as this transaction relates to a matter of dispute among the disciples, it has of course two different sides, and is therefore capable of two different representations. Some of the disciples laid claim to the title of the greatest in the kingdom of heaven, among whom we may probably reckon Peter, with the two sons of Zebedee, James and John. These could hardly expect to escape a reproof, and were undoubtedly ashamed, when questioned as to the subject of their dispute. Other disciples, on the contrary, may be considered as the party attacked, who, without claiming the first rank for themselves, might yet think it unjust to be treated as inferiors, since they all appeared to be equal. The latter had less reason to fear a reproof, since the pure morality of Christ, which teaches that every action must be estimated by the motives which gave it birth, was not then fully understood by his disciples. In their outward behaviour, at least, there was nothing unreasonable; and, without being guilty of a breach of propriety, they might lay their complaints before their Master, and request his decision. It is probable that St. Matthew was of this party, since a man, who was by profession a tax-gatherer, and never particularly distinguished himself among the apostles, would have hardly supposed that he should become the first in the kingdom of God. He relates the transaction, therefore, as one of that party to which he belonged. St. Mark, on the contrary, who derived information from St. Peter, considers the matter from an opposite point of view. Let us suppose the full state of the case to be as follows.

Some of the disciples, who were of the different party, and laid no claim to the first rank, bring the matter before Christ, with the same kind of indignation as was displayed by ten of the apostles on another occasion, Matt. xx. 24. Christ reserves the decision of the dispute till they were entered into the house, where they were accustomed to meet; he then calls his disciples together, and inquires into the subject of their dispute, to which Peter, James, John, and those in general who had claim to pre-eminence make no answer. If the transaction was literally as here described, it is by no means impossible that Matthew and Mark might consider it from different points of view, and write what we find in their Gospels without the least violation of truth. The one relates one part and the other another part of the transaction; but neither of them relates the whole. If we read a few verses further in St. Mark’s Gospel, we find a circumstance recorded of St. John, which St. Matthew passes over in silence, and from which it appears that St. John was more concerned in this dispute than most of the other disciples. He even ventured, when Christ, with a view of introducing a perfect equality among his disciples, said, “Whosoever shall receive one of these children in my name, receiveth me,” to doubt of the universality of this position, alleging, that persons of unexceptionable character might appeal to the name of Jesus, and giving an instance of one who had cast out devils in his name, whom the apostles had rebuked, Mark ix. 37–38. This again occasioned replies from Christ; which, though they are mentioned by St. Matthew, have in his Gospel a different appearance, and are attended with less perspicuity than they are in St. Mark’s Gospel, because St. Matthew has not related the causes which gave them birth.—Marsh’s Michaelis, vol. iii. part 1. p. 6–9.

NOTE 27.—PART IV.

THIS is one of the most difficult passages in the New Testament. Beza and Mr. Gilpin suppose it to mean, “Every Christian is purified by the difficult or fiery trials of life, in the same manner as (zad for ὅς, as in John xiv. 20. and Mark x. 12.) every sacrifice is salted with salt.”

Macknight would read, “Every Christian is salted and prepared (πυρί) for the fire,” (in the dative, as 2 Pet. iii. 7.) i. e. by the apostles for the fire of the altar, i. e. as a holy sacrifice to God.

Whitby would render in this manner, “Every wicked man shall be so seasoned by the fire itself, as to become unconsumable; and shall endure for ever to be tormented.”

Grotius, “Every wicked man shall be consumed, like the whole burnt sacrifice, yet with unquenchable fire.”

Lightfoot and Doddridge, “He that is a true sacrifice to God shall be seasoned with the salt of grace, to the incorruption of glory; and every victim to divine justice shall be salted with fire, to endure for ever."

Clarke, in his Paraphrase, thus interprets this verse, "For as every burnt offering under the Law was first salted with salt, and then consumed by fire; so every one who has been instructed in the doctrine of the Gospel, if when he is tried, he shall be found deficient, or not seasoned, he shall be destroyed by the eternal fire of the divine wrath." And he then observes in a note from Le Clerc, that the emphasis of the comparison lies in the ambiguity of the word יָמֶלֶח, which signifies both, shall be salted, and shall be destroyed. As every sacrifice is salted, יָמֶלֶח, with salt, so every apostate shall be destroyed, יָמֶלֶח (in the other signification of the word) with fire.

Schoetgen supposes that an allusion is made to the salt, or bitumen, with which the sacrifices were sprinkled, that they might burn more easily. He also interprets the passage, "that as every sacrifice must be prepared for the altar, by the salt which was set apart for that purpose, so ought Christians to be imbued with the heavenly virtues, to become a living sacrifice to God." He renders the word sal by quemadmodum, on the authority of Noldius.

Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 249. Elsley, and Clarke's Paraphrase in loc.

NOTE 23.—PART IV.

In this passage also our Lord reasserts his Divinity. The Jews were accustomed to say, that the Shechinah was present where ten were assembled to study the Law. The Shechinah was considered as the emblem and the residence of God. It was used also in some instances as the name of God. Our Lord here assumes to himself the powers and honors which the Jews attributed to the Shechinah.—Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 153. and Gill in loc.

PART V.

NOTE 1.—PART V.

THERE is very little difference of opinion between the harmonizers as to the place of this section. Michaelis, indeed, does not attempt to insert it in its probable order, but connects it arbitrarily with the mission of the Twelve, as a parallel event. Lightfoot endeavours to prove that our Lord commissioned the Seventy, on his way to Jerusalem, to keep the feast of Tabernacles. He supposes, too, that they returned to our Lord within a very short time, even before Christ left Jerusalem. His principal arguments are derived from the expression μετὰ ταῦτα, Luke x. 1., and that in John vii. 10., that he went not up to the feast openly: from whence he concludes that the Seventy had been previously dismissed. Pilkington places this event about the same time, partly on account of the latter argument. Doddridge and Newcome would refer it also to this period; but at a longer interval, before the feast: and Doddridge observes, that the space between the feast of Tabernacles and the feast of Dedication affords but little time for his proposed circuit round Galilee after the mission of the Seventy. Lightfoot's last argument has considerable weight with all.

NOTE 2.—PART V.

MOSES, in the Levitical dispensation, directed that six should be returned from each of the twelve tribes (whether as a permanent or temporary council is disputed) to assist him in the government of the people; and these seventy-two are generally called the Seventy. Lightfoot, Selden, and Whitby assert that the Sanhedrin were rightly called the Seventy, Moses himself being the president, and making the seventy-first.

The same difference of opinion prevails respecting the number sent forth by our Lord. Origen and Epiphanius make them seventy-two; Tertullian and Jerome seventy, as do also Clemens Alexandrinus and Irenæus.

NOTE 3.—PART V.

THIS section is placed here upon the united authorities of Newcome, Pilkington, and Doddridge. Lightfoot inserts John vii. 2. to 10. in his fifty-sixth section, before the mission of the Seventy; and ver. 10. in a separate section with Luke ix. 51. to the end. He has done this on the supposition that the Seventy were sent forth on the road to Jerusalem, but not in Galilee. The difference between Lightfoot and the other harmonizers, however, is so slight, that it seemed to require but little notice. I have placed Matt. xix. 1. and Mark x. 1. at the end of this section, in their most probable natural order, and on the authority of Pilkington.

NOTE 4.—PART V.

THE brethren of our Lord had long seen his miracles, and were satisfied, either that he was the Messiah, or a great prophet; and they were desirous that his claims and miraculous powers should be manifested to the world. They could not reconcile the unostentatious and humble life of their Master with his extraordinary display of divine attributes. And, perhaps for a better confirmation of their faith under these doubts, they use every argument to persuade our Saviour to go to Judæa, that his wonderful works might be generally known and witnessed. But they understood not that his hour was not yet come; and, to avoid giving offence, or attracting attention, he followed his brethren to the feast in the most private manner. This I consider the probable meaning of the passage. Diodati, Clarke in his Paraphrase, and Lightfoot, vary in their interpretation. Diodati supposes his brethren did not believe with sufficient firmness to enable them to undergo danger: Clarke, that his brethren imagined that he wished to become the leader of a party: Lightfoot, the same in effect as that which is here adopted.

This section gives a lively picture of the divisions among the Jews respecting Christ. They saw his miracles—they heard his teaching—they were generally acquainted with his history. Yet they could not reconcile what they saw with their preconceived notions of the Messiah. They rejected his claims, and could not comprehend the spiritual meaning of our Lord's language. The Christian's peculiar happiness and privilege is to see fulfilled, in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, all the various predictions of the ancient prophets, which appear at first sight so inconsistent and so irreconcilable.

NOTE 5.—PART V.

THESE sections are inserted here on the concurrent testimony of Lightfoot, Newcome, Doddridge, and Pilkington. They are inserted by Michaelis in an appendix, as belonging to the period which begins with the miracle of the feeding the five thousand, and ends with the request of the mother of Zebedee's children.

NOTE 6.—PART V.

THE Jews, both from their traditions and their prophecies, expected that their Messiah should be born in Bethlehem. As our Lord's mother remained so short a time at Bethlehem after our Saviour's birth, it is not surprising that they should have forgotten this circumstance, after more than thirty years had elapsed.

NOTE 7.—PART V.

How beautiful is the contrast between the humility of our Lord, and the half-literary, half-spiritual pride of the Jews. Christ, whose knowledge of all things, both in heaven and earth, was superior to that of men and angels, and of which the human intellect cannot form an idea, even when it shall be elevated and enlarged in the next stage of our existence, condescended to the lowest of the people, and called all who were meek and lowly, "his friends." The Pharisees, on the contrary, mistook knowledge for religion, and believed in the future happiness of the learned, and the condemnation of the ignorant. Those who had not devoted themselves to the study of the Law were called עַם הָאָרֶץ, the people of the earth; and these were contrasted with the עַם קֹדֶשׁ, the holy people: they considered the people of the earth as cursed^a.

All mankind, like the Pharisees of old, seem to be intent upon despising each other. The learned contemn the ignorant; the gay, the sorrowful; the rich, the poor; and fashion violently breaks asunder the nearest and dearest ties of relationship, where the deficiency of wealth is felt. In this world, pride, rank, and affluence, claim the preëminence; in the other, the highest rewards of heaven are promised to the most humble and the most meek, whether they be rich or poor.

God prefers the heart to the head; piety, to parts and capacity; and is much better pleased with the right use of the will, than the advantage of the understanding^b.

NOTE 8.—PART V.

THE genuineness of this passage has been much controverted. The arguments on each side of the question may be seen at great length in Kuinoel^c, who has decided in favor of its authenticity. Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, Grotius, Le Clerc, Wetstein, Semler, Schulze, Morus, Haenlein, Wegscheider, Paulus, Schmidt, and Titman have impugned its authenticity; and, on the opposite side of the question, may be ranked Mill, Whitby, Heuman, Michaelis, Storr, Langius, Detmersius, and others, with Lightfoot, Dr. A. Clarke, Mr. Nolan, and Mr. Horne.

^a They had a saying, which is preserved in Pirke Aboth, c. ii. 5. עַם הָאָרֶץ חֲסִיר plebeius non est pius.—Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 363.

Dr. Doddridge^d has justly observed, that the Pharisees who brought the woman to Christ wished to render him obnoxious either to the people or to the Romans. If he condemned the woman to death, it would be considered as intruding upon the judicial authority of the Romans: if he acquitted her altogether, it would be considered as sanctioning a violation of the Jewish Law.

On the propriety of our Lord's conduct, in the circumstances here recorded, Bishop Law observes^e, when the woman said to be apprehended in adultery is brought before our Lord, merely with a malicious view of drawing him into a difficulty, whatever determination he should give (ver. 6.), we find him stooping down, and writing on the ground. Where it is observable, that all that he does was in as exact conformity as the place would admit to the trial of the adulterous wife prescribed by God in Numb. v. 11, &c., where the priest was to stoop down and take some of the dust from the floor of the tabernacle (ver. 17.); and likewise write out of the curses denounced upon that occasion (ver. 25.) By that act, therefore, Christ declares himself willing to take cognizance of this affair, if they were willing to abide the consequence, viz. according to their own traditions, to be involved in the same curse if they proved equally guilty: on which account this way of trial was abolished by the Sanhedrin about that very time; since that sin, say the Jews, grew then so very common. It is likewise probable that Christ might, by his countenance and gesture, show those hypocrites how well he was aware both of their ill design in thus demanding judgment from him, and of their own obnoxiousness to the same punishment which Moses' Law appointed for that crime, and which, through a pretended zeal, they took upon themselves the power of executing, though they were no less guilty of the very same sin, as is most probably implied in his words to them.

The Israelites said to God, "Holy, blessed, Lord of the whole world, אלה הוא נר של עולם. 'Thou art the light of the world.'" If our Lord applied the word in this sense, he made himself equal with God. But the expression was sometimes used also as a title of honor to Moses; whom the Jews called אור העולם, "the light of the world:" if our Lord referred to this custom, he made himself equal to Moses, as the founder of a new dispensation.—Schoetgen, vol. i. p. 366. and Tzerot Hammor, fol. 114. 3. ap. Gill. vol. iii. p. 474.

NOTE 10.—PART V.

HAD our Lord been younger than the age at which the priests assumed their office, the Jews would have charged him with presumption, ignorance, or vanity. His exalted love, his generous compassion, his fervent piety would have been attributed to inexperience, to the sallies of imagination, or to the youthful ardor of the passions. His virtues would have been associated in their minds with extravagance or romance, with enthusiasm or superstition. His pity and forbearance would have been considered as the effect of mere feeling, or weakness; his austerity as unnatural, presumptuous, and morose.

Had our Lord, on the other hand, been an old man, it would have been said, He had lost all interest or concern in those objects and pursuits which kindle the most active and extensive desires; that he saw things with different views from human beings in general; that he had outlived the remembrance of the peculiar trials and temptations of early life, and made not proper allowances for the infirmities of others. Some might have reminded him, that the wisdom and experience of age were incompatible with the sprightliness and gayety of youth; others might have deemed his opposition to the vices and corruption of the times, as proceeding from the love of singularity, or desire of distinction. His patience and forbearance might have been attributed to a deficiency of energy and spirit; and even his resignation in the hour of death, to the want of the power of enjoyment among the living; and, if he had delayed the work of his ministry to a later period, the question would have been asked, why he had deferred so long the reformation of a sinful and degenerate people.—See on this subject, a Sermon by Mr. Hewlett, On the Duties of Middle Life, vol. iii. p. 278.

NOTE 11.—PART V.

As the end of our Lord's ministry approaches, He proclaims, in still plainer language, that He possessed the attributes and characters of the Messiah. John, in the commencement of his Gospel, had asserted the preëxistence of Christ; and our Lord in this passage declares the same truth.

It appears to me, that our Lord here alludes to his eternity, as well as to his preëxistence. The passage may mean, "I not only exist at this moment; but before Abraham was, I exist." I am the self-existent; the same Being which in your Scriptures of the Old Testament is known as the "I AM," of your fathers. The schoolmen rightly represent the eternity of God as a punctum stans; or, as Cowley expresses the idea, in his description of heaven—

"Nothing is there to come, and nothing past,
But an eternal Now does always last."

And Dr. Watts—

"God fills his own eternal Now,
And sees our ages waste."

And Archbishop King has well described the Deity, as having neither remembrance of the past, nor foreknowledge of the future, but as being ever existing in all places, and ever enduring throughout all time. Therefore whatever has, or is, or can, or will be, form but One present. Sir Isaac Newton, in his Scholium Generale, has expressed his notion of a Deity much in the same manner, but in the most sublime and expressive language. Alike conscious of the past, the present, and the future, our Lord asserts that such is his mode of existence, and claims the attributes of Deity to the same extent as they appertained to his heavenly Father.

The general body of Christians have understood this passage as a plain declaration on the part of our Lord, that He did not begin to exist at the time when he assumed a human body in the form of an infant, but that he existed before the time of Abraham.

It is the belief of the Christian Church, and it was the faith also of the ancient Jews, that the Word of God, their Messiah, existed before his permanent incarnation. He existed before the creation of the world, when he was One with the Father; He existed also after the creation of the world, as the Angel Jehovah.

It will not be possible, in these notes, to discuss the various misinterpretations to which the Socinian writers have resorted to explain away the grammatical sense of this and other passages of Scripture, which assert the Divinity of Christ. The expression, however, "Before Abraham was, I AM," or before Abraham existed, I exist, is so satisfactory and so decisive that it might have been supposed to have set the question at rest for ever. But the supporters of the Socinian heresy have, at various times, employed all their ingenuity and learning to give another interpretation to these words—and have presented the world with such a selection of absurd and contradictory illustrations, as to draw upon them the undivided censure of their mildest opponent. Dr. Pye Smith, who seems to write every sentence of his reply to Mr. Belsham with a smile, an apology, or a bow, condemns the interpretation of this passage as trifling, and absolute folly. Archbishop Magee, in the higher tone of dignified rebuke, which becomes a champion of the truth, chastises the ignorance or blasphemy, of the Socinian heresy, with more unsparing severity.

Πρὶν Ἀβραάμ γενέσθαι, ἐγὼ εἰμι, are the words in the original. This is translated by Socinus: "Before Abraham can be Abraham, the Father of many nations, I must be, that is, the Messiah, or Saviour of the world." Faustus Socinus, the nephew of the heresiarch, tells us, that his uncle obtained this meaning by divine inspiration—non sine multis precibus ipsius, Jesu nomine invocato, impetravit ipse. This interpretation, however, is relinquished by Socinians of a later age, who consider, with Grotius, that Christ meant only to assert that he was before Abraham in the decree of God.

NOTE 12.—PART V.

THESE sections, from seven to eighteen inclusive, with the exception of some few passages, which on various authorities are placed elsewhere, are inserted here, on the united testimony of the five harmonizers, by whom I am principally guided. They contain an account of the actions of our Lord from the feast of Tabernacles to that of the Dedication. Several chapters of St. Luke relate events which are not recorded by the other Evangelists, and these are generally referred to the period which elapsed between the mission of the Seventy and Christ's apprehension. This period included both the feast of Tabernacles and the Dedication, and it is very difficult, perhaps impossible, to ascertain precisely the exact order of the events here mentioned, and to decide at which of these feasts they took place. The difficulty is further increased by the question, whether St. John's Gospel is to be read with these chapters of St. Luke, continuously from chap. vii. 11. to the conclusion of chap. x., or the eighth be divided from the ninth and tenth: that is, whether the healing of the man who was born blind, was effected by our Lord at the feast of Tabernacles, or at the feast of Dedication. I have principally observed the order proposed by Lightfoot, excepting that some passages are arbitrarily inserted elsewhere, on the authority of Newcome and others.

Archbishop Newcome places John ix. 10. before these chapters of St. Luke. He then proceeds with the interruptions before alluded to, from Luke x. 17. to Luke xviii. 14.

Doddridge inserts the cure of the blind man, John ix. 10., at the feast of the Dedication, as Lightfoot has done, but continues the chapters of St. Luke to chap. xviii. 14., not perceiving sufficient reason to change the order.

Pilkington differs from Lightfoot, and arranges John vii. 11. to x. 22. before Luke x. 17., and continuing as far as chap. xiii. 23., he again proceeds to John x. 22. By this means he affixes the cure of the blind man to the feast of Tabernacles.

Michaelis seems to have laid aside, in this part of his Harmony, every attempt to reconcile difficulties. He inserts these chapters of St. John in one supplement, and those of St. Luke in another.

NOTE 13.—PART V.

THE Seventy receive their commission in Galilee, some time before the feast of Tabernacles. The exact period of their going out, and of their return, is uncertain; it is most probable, however, as the Jews were accustomed to go up to the feast, that they were proceeding to Jerusalem, and met our Lord returning from the feast, in consequence of the opposition of the Jewish rulers to his person and teaching.

NOTE 14.—PART V.

Ἐν τῷ νόμῳ τί γέγραπται; πῶς ἀναγινώσκεις; there seems to be some abruptness in this question. Our Saviour, in his reply to the lawyer, is supposed by Heinsius^g, to refer him to the texts Deut. vi. 5. and Levit. xix. 18., which were joined together by the Jews, as a compendium of the whole Law, and repeated twice every day in the synagogue; Kuinoel^h, that the word πῶς must be rendered as τί, what? as, "What readest thou in the Law?" and that he pointed at the same time with his finger to the lawyer's phylactery, on which the words of his answer were written.

Whenever an opportunity presented itself, our Lord replied to every question proposed to him by the Jews, by an allusion to their established laws and customs.

NOTE 15.—PART V.

IN attempting to discover the sense of a parable, we are required to take into consideration the purpose for which it was delivered, and the circumstances that occasioned it. We find here that the lawyer, wishing to justify himself, and considering that he had observed this Law, as far as it related to the Jews, whom only he acknowledges as his neighbours, inquires, "Who is my neighbour?" Our Lord answers the question by a parable, in which the duties we owe to our neighbour are forcibly defined, and the extent of those duties pointedly demonstrated. We are taught that not only our acquaintance, our friends and countrymen, are included under this term, but that our very enemies, when in distress, are entitled to our sympathy, our mercy, and our best exertions for their relief. The Jews held the Samaritans in utter abhorrence; in order therefore to impress the mind of the inquirer more fully, our Saviour obliges the lawyer to reply to his own question; for he was compelled to acknowledge that he who showed mercy on him was his neighbour. Our Lord, having represented to him the extent of the Law, commands him to follow the example of the good Samaritan, and to go and do likewise. The circumstances mentioned in this parable are, by many, considered as real; the road from Jerusalem to Jericho lay through a desert infested by robbers, and which was principally frequented by priests and Levites, in their journeyings from the latter to the former place. The parable itself has been variously interpreted, and by some commentators it is supposed to relate only to the compassionate love of Christ (who was called by the Jews a Samaritan) to mankind. In whatever way we consider it, the duty it inculcates is most evident, and the parable must be regarded as a beautiful exemplification of the Law "loving our neighbour as ourselves," without any distinction of person, country, or party.

Jones, with other commentators, has given a fanciful illustration of this parable; and several of the primitive fathers have adopted similar accommodations. They suppose the certain man to signify Adam—went down from Jerusalem, his fall—thieves, sin and Satan—half-dead, dead in the spirit, his better part—the priest, the moral—the Levite, the ceremonial Law, which could not afford relief—a certain Samaritan, Christ—the inn, the Church—the two-pence, the Law and the Gospel; or (as others conjecture, the two Sacraments), the Host, the Ministers of the Gospel, with this promise, that whatever they shall spend more in health, or life, or exertion, shall be amply repaid, when Christ, the good Samaritan, shall come again in glory.

Lightfoot has given the same interpretation. It is necessary here to remark, by way of caution, in the words of Glassius, in his fifth rule for the interpretation of parables, "non est opus nimia cura in singulis verbis anxium esse, neque in singulis partibus adaptatio, et accommodatio ad rem spirituales nimis ἀκριβῶς quaerenda est."—Philolog. Sacra. lib. ii. part i. tr. 2. sect. 5. p. 336, &c. See also, on the interpretation of Scripture, Van Mildert's Bampton Lectures, with the valuable notes.—Marsh's Lectures, part iii. NOTE 16.—PART V.

THIS section is placed by Archbishop Newcome before the account of the resurrection of Lazarus. As his arguments for so doing do not appear satisfactory, I have followed the authority of Lightfoot, Pilkington, Doddridge, and Michaelis, and have preserved the order of St. Luke's Gospel.

NOTE 17.—PART V.

THE excellence of our Lord's manner of teaching, and the wisdom of his lessons are so evident, in the present and the following sections, that there can be no necessity for entering into any discussion on this portion of the Arrangement. The tenth section affords us a complete picture of the admirable manner in which our Lord deduced the most impressive lessons from the most common occurrences. In the eleventh, he gives to his disciples the same perfect and beautiful form of prayer which he had previously made known to assembled crowds. And it is probable he was requested to do so at this time by a new convert. In the twelfth, we hear his severe and just reproof to the Pharisees, who regarded only the externals of religion, and were pleased with the homage of the multitude, and their own outward sanctity. He also encourages his disciples to acknowledge Him, to fear God rather than man, who has no power over the soul; and he warns them, that if they deny him against the witness of their conscience before men, they shall be denied before the angels of God—and that to blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, which was to impute the actions of Christ to an evil spirit, was an unpardonable offence, never to be forgiven. That he might not excite the indignation of the Pharisees, by the exercise of temporal authority, he refuses (sect. 14.) to decide a controversy, when applied to for that purpose; but takes advantage of the opportunity to reprove covetousness, and by a most beautiful and appropriate parable, proves the vanity and helpless insufficiency of earthly possessions, and the uncertainty of this life, in which alone we can enjoy them. In the fifteenth section, he especially charges his disciples not to be of uncertain, anxious, wandering, unsettled, distracted mind (Luke xii. 29. μὴ μετεωρίζεσθε, vide Kuinoel in h. v.), but to place their faith and confidence in Him who provides even for the birds of the air and lilies of the field. The sixteenth section is a continuation of the same address, exhorting to the punctual performance of every duty, as we know not when the Son of Man cometh. In the seventeenth he again reproves the fastidious and absurd manner of keeping the Sabbath, when an act of mercy was considered a violation of the Law.

NOTE 18.—PART V.

THERE seems to be some allusion in this parable to the circumstances in which our Lord was now placed. He was proceeding to Jerusalem, where he intended, as his hour was approaching, to address himself to the rulers of the Jews, with as much boldness as he had hitherto spoken to the people. He foresaw the result of this conduct; that it would lead to his painful death, and the accomplishment of the promises of God. The future was ever present to him. As the seed was committed to the ground, and became a great tree, so in the same manner would his kingdom begin from his death, and gradually increase and extend itself over the world.

NOTE 19.—PART V.

THIS section contains an account of the cure of the blind man at Jerusalem. In favor of the opinion that this miracle was effected at the feast of Tabernacles, we find Pilkington, Newcome, Macknight, Cradock, Bishop Richardson, Le Clerc, &c. That it was wrought at the feast of the Dedication, the principal authorities are Lightfoot and Doddridge, whose opinion is here preferred.

Archbishop Newcome's principal reason is, that the word παράγων, in John ix. 1. seems to refer to the word παρῆγεν, used in chap. viii. 59.

To this it may be replied, that there are most powerful reasons for believing with Wetstein and Griesbach, that the last seven words of this chapter (viii.) of St. John, and the word παρῆγεν among the number, were not originally part of the Sacred Text. Lampe, however, is very indignant at this supposition. But the authorities of the two former critics, united to that of Erasmus, Grotius, Mill, Semler, and Kuinoel, are sufficient to justify our replying to Archbishop Newcome's argument in this manner. But waving this supposition, that the last clause of John viii. 59. is spurious, it may be replied in the words of Doddridge, "it seems much more probable that παράγων might be used without reference to παρῆγεν, than to suppose that when Christ was fleeing out of the temple in the hasty manner described, his disciples as he passed should stop him, for the purpose of putting so nice a question as that mentioned in John ix. 2.; or that he should stand still at such a moment to discourse with them, or to perform such a cure, in a manner so leisurely, as it is plain this was done."—Fam. Exp. vol. ii. p. 71, sect. 130.

The correspondence between παράγων and παρῆγεν might be mere coincidence; if it was intended by the inspired writer, it would be a most unaccountable deviation from the beautiful simplicity of his usual language.

The great attention excited by this miracle, and its effects, both on the Sanhedrin and on the people, appear to be the preludes to that more universal notice which our Lord obtained, when he went up to Jerusalem for the last time. On this supposition, the feast of the Dedication would be its more probable period. In Critical Remarks on detached Passages of the New Testament, by the late French Lawrence, LL.D., M.P., &c., we meet with another argument in favor of the arrangement now adopted. "In John x. 22, several MSS. of good authority read τοτε, instead of δε. It was then at Jerusalem," &c. instead of "and it was. This favors the idea of those harmonists who suppose the meeting with the blind man to have taken place at the feast of the Dedication. After having been obliged to hide himself, that he might escape stoning, it is not likely that Christ should appear again at Jerusalem till he went thither to attend the next public festival." Such is the remark of a most impartial critic. Even if the reading δε, however, remain, the 22d verse of chap. x. may still refer to the event related in the preceding as well as in the subsequent passages.

Michaelis refers the contents of these sections to the general period in which all the harmonizers place them; but he does not enter into any details.

The propriety and wisdom of our Lord's conduct in the various instances recorded in these sections, the excellence of his lessons, and the manner in which he gradually developed his character and claims, seem to be so plainly narrated, that it is not necessary to enlarge upon each incident. For reflections on the character of our Lord as a teacher, perhaps the best work extant is that of Archbishop Newcome, entitled, Observations on our Lord's Conduct; the best on the elevation and dignity of our Lord's character is Craig's Life of Christ. Besides these, however, there are very many that may be read to the greatest advantage, Bishop Law, Taylor, Stackhouse, &c.

NOTE 20.—PART V.

THE Jews believed in the doctrine of the transmigration of souls—גלגול נפשות. Josephusⁱ tells us that every soul was incorruptible and immortal, and that the souls of the good passed into another body, while those of the unrighteous were eternally punished. Some suppose that it was in allusion to this opinion that our Lord was imagined to have been either Elias, or Jeremiah, or some one of the prophets. The cabalists tell us, that the soul of the first man occupied the body of David, and was afterwards preserved to inhabit the body of the Messiah: they deduce this important truth from the certain evidence afforded them in the letters which compose the name of the Protoplast אדם. These admirable logicians inform us, that the first letter א signifies Adam, the second ד David, the third מ the Messiah; and therefore the point is proved.^j

For an account of the singular opinions of the Jews, alluded to in this verse, see Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 568–9.

NOTE 21.—PART V.

JONES gives a curious interpretation of this miracle. "That the miracle (he observes) might be more instructive, a very peculiar form was given to it. Christ moulded the dust of the ground into clay, and having spread it upon the eyes of the man, he commanded him to go, and wash off this dirt in the pool of Siloam. Here the reason of the thing speaks for itself. What is this mire and clay upon the eyes, but the power this world has over us in shutting out the truth? Who are the people unto whom the glorious light of the Gospel of Christ cannot shine, but they whose minds the god of this world hath blinded? So long as this world retains its influence, the Gospel is hidden from the eyes of men; they are in a lost condition, and nothing can clear them of this defilement, but the water of the Divine Spirit sent from above to wash it away. This seems to be the moral sense of the miracle, and a miracle thus understood becomes a sermon, than which none in the world can be more edifying. Our Saviour himself gives the spiritual signification of it in words which cannot be applied to a bodily cure—'As long as I am in the world, I am the Light of the world.' The whole world, like this man, is born blind. I am come to give it light, in proof of which I give this man his sight."—Jones On the Figurative Language of Scripture, Works, vol. iii. p. 153. NOTE 22.—PART V.

SECT. xxiii.—xxix. These sections are referred to the same place by all the harmonizers, excepting that Archbishop Newcome has made various transpositions of some passages, and Doddridge places them all before the feast of Dedication, and prior to his arranging John ix. 19., that he may not disturb the order of St. Luke.

NOTE 23.—PART V.

THE arguments which induced Pilkington to place this section in its present position appear to me sufficiently weighty to induce me to reject the authority of the other four, who would insert it elsewhere. Lightfoot places the conversation respecting divorce after Luke xviii. 30., as he will not break in upon the supplementary chapters of St. Luke. Newcome, upon very insufficient grounds, has placed this conversation after the account of the resurrection of Lazarus; separating the passages Matt. xix. 3–12. and Mark x. 2–12. from Luke xvi. 18. Newcome's note. His argument from Matthew xix. 1. and Mark x. 1. proves nothing, as these passages are the connecting links between the former and the latter parts of Christ's life. Doddridge and Michaelis also consider the passages as distinct.

I have adopted Pilkington's arrangement, because the order of the other Evangelists is not thereby disturbed; and a reason is given for the conversation itself; which would otherwise, if confined to the account in Luke xvi. 18., appear to be strangely abrupt. "In the present order," says Pilkington, "the reason is evident why the Pharisees came and tempted Christ with this question. He had just before declared that it was easier for heaven and earth to pass away than for one tittle of the Law to fail. Upon which they put the case of divorces to him; concluding that he would resolve it contrary to the then existing Law; or more properly, as Doddridge observes (note to sect. 135, Family Expositor), contrary to the received interpretation of the Law by the school of Hillel, who had taught the people that divorcees might be permitted for comparatively trivial causes."

NOTE 24.—PART V.

PILKINGTON is anxious, on all occasions, to preserve the order of St. Luke, and he has not therefore followed a rule of harmonizing, which in the great majority of instances is a safe guide. The concurrent order of two Evangelists is preferable to the arrangement adopted by one only. Both St. Matthew and

St. Mark place this section after their account of the decision of our Lord respecting divorcees. I follow their authority, therefore, in observing the present order. Lightfoot, Newcome, Doddridge, and Michaelis, have arranged the sections on the same plan.

NOTE 25.—PART V.

SECT. xxxii., xxxiii. These sections continue the order of the supplementary chapters in St. Luke's Gospel, which had been interrupted by the insertion of the corresponding passages from St. Matthew and St. Mark, in the last two sections. The five harmonizers are unanimous in placing them in their present position.

NOTE 26.—PART V.

THERE is much difference of opinion among the harmonizers concerning the particular journey in which the conversation related in this section took place. Lightfoot supposes that the journey of Christ to Jerusalem, here mentioned by St. Luke, is the same with that in John vii. 10. Archbishop Newcome places it after the feast of the Dedication, subsequent to Christ's completion of his last progress round Galilee, and before his triumphant entry into Jerusalem. Newcome's arrangement of this section is here adopted, therefore, in preference to that of Lightfoot. Doddridge has referred this conversation also to the same period. Michaelis does not decide the point; and Pilkington, in his anxiety to preserve the order of St. Luke's Gospel, has not changed its position, but refers it to the same journey. If the word ἀναλήψης, Luke ix. 51., as Schleusner, Doddridge, the ancient versions, and by far the greater majority of critics assert, signifies the ascension into heaven, it would fix the period of the circumstance in question to this last journey of our Lord to Jerusalem.

NOTE 27.—PART V.

SECT. xxxv.—xxxviii. These sections, which follow the order of St. Luke's narrative, are placed in their present position on the united authorities of the five harmonizers, whose labors have principally assisted me in this Arrangement.

NOTE 28.—PART V.

THIS section resumes the order of St. Matthew and St. Mark, as well as continues that of St. Luke. The event related in it is placed here by Lightfoot, who follows the order of St. Luke; and by Newcome also, who makes the conversation on divorce, and the blessing the children, immediately to precede it. Doddridge, Pilkington, and Michaelis, give it also its present place.

NOTE 29.—PART V.

“IN the New Dispensation which I have now begun to establish—Ye which have now followed me in my despised and afflicted state shall be exalted to glory in the triumphant reign of the Messiah, which shall be eventually established in the world.”—See Bishop Blomfield on a Knowledge of Jewish Tradition essential, &c., notes; the discussion of Whitby on this point; and the passage in Lightfoot, to which he refers.

NOTE 30.—PART V.

THE expression here used is supposed to refer to the manner in which the Romans selected men for recruiting their armies. The honor of being chosen to serve their country in a military capacity was esteemed the reward of superiority. The consuls summoned to the capitol, or the Campus Martius, all citizens capable of bearing arms, from the age of seventeen to forty-five. They drew up by tribes, and lots were drawn to determine in what order every tribe should present its soldiers. That which was the first order chose the four citizens who were judged the most proper to serve in the war; and the six tribunes who commanded the first legion selected one of these four, whom they liked best. The tribunes of the second and third legions likewise made their choice one after another; and he that remained entered into the fourth legion. A new tribe presented other four soldiers, and the second legion chose first. The third and fourth legions had the same advantage in their turns. In this manner, each tribe successively appointed four soldiers, till the legions were complete. They next proceeded to the creation of subaltern officers, whom the tribunes chose from among the soldiers of the greatest reputation. When the legions were thus completed, the citizens who had been called, but not chosen, returned to their respective employments, and served their country in other capacities.—See Clarke’s Comment. in loc.

NOTE 31.—PART V.

THE resurrection of Lazarus is placed by Archbishop Newcome after John x., and after the supplementary chapters of St. Luke. Tatian, Gerson, and some others agree in the same arrangement.

After the feast of the Dedication, our Lord went to Bethabara, beyond Jordan, the place where John baptized (John x. 40). Archbishop Newcome supposes, that, as he remained there, and as St. John proceeds immediately to the resurrection of Lazarus, Mary and Martha sent to him while he was now at Bethabara. But this gives us no proof that many circumstances did not take place during our Lord’s abode at Bethabara, and likewise, as probable, from the 13th to the 18th chapters of St. Luke, that he made another circuit through some parts of the country before he went to Bethany to raise Lazarus from the dead. It appears, from Matt. xix. 1. and Mark x. 1., that after our Saviour had performed many miracles, and given those evidences of his Divinity which were to precede his last journey to Jerusalem, he went beyond Jordan, and, we may reasonably conclude, to Bethabara; at which place, according to Lightfoot, he received the message from the sisters of Lazarus.

Lightfoot further observes, that he remained in the place where he was when he heard of Lazarus’ sickness, that he might die before he came to him, that God might be the more glorified by his raising (ver. 15.), so did he make sure to stay long enough after he was dead before he came, that the glory might be the more. Compare ver. 39, with these sayings of the Jews, Maym. in Gerushin. per ult. “If one look upon a dead man within three days after his death, he may know him; but after three days, his visage is changed.” Again, Lerus. in Moed Katon, fol. 82, col. 2. “Three days the soul flies about the body, as if thinking to return to it; but after it sees the visage of the countenance changed, it leaves it, and gets it gone for ever.”

Lightfoot’s arrangement of the resurrection is the same as that of Bishop Richardson, and it is sanctioned by the learned Archbishop Usher, Lamy, Toinard, and others.

NOTE 32.—PART V.

DURING our Lord’s final journey to Jerusalem, he forewarns his disciples of his approaching sufferings and death in the fullest manner. He explicitly unfolds to the twelve disciples the spiritual nature of his kingdom; but their understandings were so blinded by their own preconceived ideas of Messiah’s power, that they knew not the things that were spoken. He was now about to perform one of the most convincing and stupendous of his miracles; and he embraces the opportunity to predict all that awaited him to his disciples. He declares that he was going up to Jerusalem, not to assume the pomp and robes of royalty, as they but too fondly expected, but to be betrayed, to be insulted, to be scourged, and to be put to death. His disciples at this very moment, as is evident from the conduct of the sons of Zebedee in the next section, were ambitiously anticipating their temporal honors.

NOTE 33.—PART V.

PILKINGTON remarks on this passage :—Three Evangelists make mention of Jesus' giving sight to a blind man near Jericho; but there are such different expressions, in their several accounts of this matter, as have induced several harmonists to conclude that different cures are related by them.

1. St. Matthew saith, "As they departed from Jericho, two blind men cried out," &c.

2. St. Mark, "As he went out of Jericho, blind Bartimæus began to cry out," &c.

3. St. Luke, "As he was come nigh unto Jericho, a certain blind man cried out," &c.

The most general conclusion from hence is, that the miracle recorded by St. Luke was different from and previous to that mentioned by the other two Evangelists^k.

Another opinion is, that each Evangelist relates a different fact^l. And a third, that St. Mark and St. Luke relate the former miracle, and St. Matthew the latter^m.

The accounts of the several Evangelists relating to this matter have been connected by the most ancient harmonists, and by some of the modernsⁿ: but they have not given their reasons for so doing. Perhaps they may have been the same as have induced me to think that they have properly connected them, viz.

1. The series of the several circumstances mentioned by all the Evangelists. (1.) The blind man sat by the way-side, near Jericho. (2.) He called Jesus the Son of David. (3.) The multitude rebuked him. (4.) Jesus stopped and called. (5.) The question which Jesus asked, and the answer he received are the same in all the accounts. And (6.), they all agree that the blind man followed Jesus.

2. If Jesus had wrought a cure of this sort just before he entered Jericho, for which all the people gave praise unto God, it is not easy to imagine that the multitude would, immediately after, rebuke another who called upon him in the very same manner. And though the accounts vary in some particulars, yet no where, I think, so much as to make it necessary to suppose that they are relations of different facts. For,

3. Though there were two blind men who received sight, as St. Matthew expresses it, and though St. Mark and St. Luke mention one only, yet the accounts cannot be said to be contradictory, allowing them to allude to the same fact. For the miracle is the same, in the cure of one as in the cure of many. Bartimæus might be the more remarkable person; and therefore the mention of the other be purposely omitted by the two Evangelists^o.

St. Matthew and St. Mark say, that this was done at Jesus' departure from Jericho; and St. Luke, that it was ἐν τῷ ἐγγίξειν αὐτὸν εἰς Ἱεριχὼ, "As he was come nigh unto Jericho," (according to our translation), which seems to imply, that he was not yet arrived there: and this sense hath been affixed to the words, as far as I can learn, by translators in all times, and all languages; from whence hath arisen the seeming difficulty of reconciling the several accounts. But if the words may be translated at large, "When he was nigh unto Jericho," then St. Luke's account is very consistent with the others, because it determines not whether it was before he came to Jericho, or at his departure from that place, that he wrought this miracle. And that the words will bear this construction, we may be easily convinced, by observing another expression of St. Luke, of the very same sort, xix. 29. καὶ ἐγένετο ὥς ἤγγισεν εἰς Βεθφαγὴ καὶ Βεθανιαν, translated again, "When he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany:" but it evidently appears that Jesus was gone from Bethany towards Jerusalem, when he sent out the disciples, &c. And all commentators are agreed, that though Jesus was then nigh unto Bethany, yet he was going from it. And understanding the words here in the same sense, St. Luke saith, that Jesus was now nigh unto Jericho, but going from it; agreeably to the account which both St. Matthew and St. Mark give of this matter.

Lightfoot observes, "He healeth one blind man as he entereth into Jericho, of which St. Luke speaketh, and another as he goeth out, of which the other two Evangelists speak. Matthew speaks of two healed as he came out of Jericho, comprehending, it may be, the story of him who was healed on the other side of the town. Mark only mentions one, because he rather aimed at showing the manner, or kind of the miracle, than the number."—Vol. i. p. 250.

Doddridge very justly observes, that "this is improbable; for the people would not reprove blind Bartimæus for supplicating our Lord to heal him, if a cure so remarkable had been wrought but a short time before at the entrance into the town.

"I have endeavoured so to harmonize the accounts of the Evangelists, that the scene may be most vividly presented to the reader. 1 have adopted the opinion that two were healed—at the same time—but one was more known to the people, the more remarkable of the two, and more earnest in the expression of his faith in Jesus, and in the miraculous cure that had been wrought upon him.” Doddridge, Fam. Exp. vol. ii. p. 138.

Newcome agrees with Doddridge in this opinion.

In passing through Jericho, Christ heals the blind men, and when he leaves that city is met by Zacchæus, Luke xix. 2., which evidently places this event before the resurrection of Lazarus. Then follows the resurrection of Lazarus—Christ’s retirement at Ephraim—the anointing at Bethany, and the entrance into Jerusalem. This is the order I have observed, in preference to that of Newcome, or Pilkington. The principal argument of Newcome is derived from John x. 40. compared with John xi. 54–56.; but this is answered by the supposition above mentioned, that Matt. xix. 1. and Mark x. 1. represent Christ as being in the same place as he is said to have been in John x. 40.; and if the Evangelist’s narrative is made our guide, it gives us greater space for the various circumstances recorded in St. Luke.

NOTE 34.—PART V.

THE noble truth, the resurrection of the body, is so important to man, that it has been confirmed by the most convincing evidence, and the most undeniable facts. Our Lord gave life to the human body from the grave in all its various stages of corruption and decay. The body of the widow’s son was restored within one or two days after his decease: for he was recalled to life as they were carrying him to the grave. The resurrection of Lazarus was the third instance, and it was attended with some striking peculiarities. The body had lain four days in the grave. In those warm climates, the terrible process of corruption and decay was always rapid. The flesh would have begun to mingle with its kindred elements. The relations and friends of the departed were so sensible of this, that they attempted to dissuade our Lord from going to the sepulchre. Although they knew that He had raised one man from the dead, they did not believe it possible that He could restore life to him, who for so many days had “said to corruption,—Thou art my father, and to the worm,—Thou art my sister and brother.” Our Lord, however, proceeded to demonstrate his almighty power, and the great truths he had come down to teach, by the resistless evidence of a public and undeniable fact. No sooner were the words uttered, “Lazarus, come forth,” then he that was dead came forth. Unable to walk, for he was swathed, and bound both hand and foot in his grave-clothes, according to the Jewish custom, he glided forth from the grave, and appeared among the astonished multitude. His body was unchanged—he was again to dwell with his family and friends, the same person as he had ever been. Like the daughter of Jairus, and the widow’s son, he was again to resume his place in society, to fulfil the ordinary duties of life, and his body resumed the same functions and properties as it had ever possessed. And we are informed, by the history of the early Church, that Lazarus lived for many years, an unexceptionable witness of the truth of God, and the Divinity of Christ.

The next great fact which demonstrated the resurrection of the body took place at the death of Christ. When He bowed his head and gave up the ghost, the vail of the temple was rent—the ground trembled—the graves were laid open—and, after his resurrection, the bodies of many holy persons arose and went into the city of Jerusalem, and appeared unto many. This attendant miracle is so briefly related, that we cannot safely deduce many conclusions. But that interpretation seems the most satisfactory, which represents the graves as opening at the resurrection of Christ, who is the first-fruits of them that sleep; and that while his body continued in the grave, the same process which is described in the vision of Ezekiel, 37th chapter, took place on the bodies of those holy persons who went into Jerusalem after that Christ rose from the dead. The bones came together—the sinews were restored—the flesh revived—the skin covered it again—and the spirit returned—they breathed—they lived—they moved—and they appeared to many.

From this miracle the disciples might have received the comfortable assurance that Death and Corruption had no power to resist the voice of their Lord and Master; it ought to have taught them, that though scourged, persecuted, and crucified, He had power to lay down his life and to take it up again—and the same voice which called the spirit of Lazarus from the invisible world, and bade it reanimate the corrupting body, shall again command the dust to live, and the dead to rise. The Scripture has given us a moral demonstration of the divine power of our Lord which shall effect this mighty work; whenever the morning of the resurrection shall dawn, all who have been committed to the ground will be included among those whose bodies have entirely decayed, mouldered into dust, or are in various stages of corruption, from the first stiffening of the limbs, to their mingling with their kindred elements. As the earth is covered with the dew of the morning, so, says the Scripture, shall it cast forth her dead. The sea shall give up her dead. The elements around us shall restore their borrowed atoms. Over the surface of the whole earth, the dust shall quicken into life; and man from the opening graves shall ascend into the air, and be summoned in his body before the tribunal of the Most High, to be judged every man according to his works.

The other Evangelists have omitted the resurrection of Lazarus, because (it is supposed) that he was still alive when they wrote, and would have been rendered, by notice, more liable to persecution. The question is discussed by Kuinoel, in loc., who comes to the same conclusion. We have hitherto been fortunate enough in this country to have escaped from the contamination of the German theological speculators on the miracles of Christ, &c. Should any student, however, have become in any degree entangled by them, he will find a most admirable antidote in the writings of Kuinoel.—See particularly on the Resurrection of Lazarus.

The resurrection of Lazarus was the last and most solemn appeal of a miraculous nature which he made to the Jewish nation before his apprehension. St. John is the only Evangelist who has related the miracle, and he proceeds to mention the consequences both to Christ himself and to the Jewish nation. Immediately after the bystanders had reported the miracle to the Sanhedrin, they decided upon putting Jesus to death. He therefore retired to Ephraim, about twenty miles from Jerusalem, that he might escape the persecution of the Jews, who were anxiously bent on his destruction, John xi. 54., and remained there with his disciples until six days before the Passover, when he went to Bethany, to sup with Lazarus, and was anointed by Mary. The internal evidence, arising from the conversation which the three Evangelists have recorded, seems to be decisive of the propriety of this arrangement. Our Saviour is represented as going up towards Jerusalem, conversing with his disciples, and predicting his sufferings and death. The resurrection of Lazarus was the immediate cause of those sufferings; for the public report of this miracle induced the Sanhedrin to take their most decisive measures against him. The opportunity therefore seemed to be most fit for our Lord to demonstrate to his disciples that he knew beforehand the consequences of his actions, and that the time had come when he was to make a free-will offering of himself for the sins of the whole world.

NOTE 35.—PART V.

THERE is much difficulty in the reasoning of the Sanhedrin on this occasion. Why should they fear the Romans, even if they had acknowledged our Lord to be the Messiah? They believed that their Messiah was to be a powerful and mighty king, who would overthrow the dominion of the Romans, and restore the kingdom to Israel.

The cause of their apprehension seems to have been the meek and unostentatious pretensions of our Lord, and his severe reproofs of the pride and hypocrisy of the Pharisees and rulers. They demanded a Messiah who should appear with the insignia, as well as the reality of power, and who should not only continue, but even enhance to the utmost, the temporal dominion of the Jews. As our Lord did not possess the external proofs of royalty, they would not believe that He would be able to oppose the Roman power, whose vengeance they would certainly bring upon themselves, if they should acknowledge any other political sovereign; but as the resurrection of Lazarus was the cause of this assembling by the Sanhedrin, it is evident that the miraculous powers of our Lord must have been known to that body; and the supposition of Lightfoot, therefore, that they knew him, is not irrational: they probably knew him as a Prophet, but not as the Messiah.

NOTE 36.—PART V.

COMMENTATORS are divided respecting the meaning of these words. In the former ages of the Jewish Church, the spirit of prophecy rested with the high priest. As this was the great year in which the object of the Jewish Dispensation was obtained, and the spirit of prophecy, according to the prediction of Joel, quoted by St. Peter, was abundantly poured forth; it is supposed that the high priest was now inspired to utter certain words, with the full meaning of which he was unacquainted, as was frequently, and, in the opinion of the Jews, uniformly, the case among the ancient prophets. Others interpret the words according to the literal sense in which they were spoken by Caiaphas, and suppose that St. John gave them another signification. Hausenius, in his learned dissertation on this subject⁷, endeavours to prove that the words of St. John must likewise be interpreted literally, and that Caiaphas did actually prophesy; and as high priest foretell the necessity of Christ's death. The question is admirably summed up by Hausenius, in his seventeenth section.

“Hoc modo et Saulus, cum suis inter prophetas relatus, majori violentia spiritus actus est. E quibus constat, modum, quo profano Caiaphæ vaticinium inditum est, omnibus fere, qui impiis obtigerunt, tenuiorem, lenioremque fuisse.”

He then proceeds in his last section to show that though this expression of Caiaphas must be considered as a real prophecy, yet the high priest himself was unworthy of the honorable name of Prophet. To this purpose he quotes the accurate conclusions of Origen; and thus sums up his remarks—"Quamobrem bene horum, de quibus loquimur, congruens in unam sententiam divinationis descripta a Basilio est, catena, a Dan. Heinsio e MS. edita—πῶς δὲ καὶ Βαλαάμ προφητεύει καὶ Καϊάφας; οὗ κακῆτοι τοὺς πειθομένους εἶχον, ὁ μὲν ὡς ἀρχιερεὺς, ὁ δὲ ὡς μάντις· οὐ γὰρ ψυχῆς καθαρότης, οὐδὲ διαύγεια τοῦ ἐνοσθόντος εἰς θεόν καὶ τῇ ἐκείθεν δυνάμει σπῶντος· ἀλλ' οἰκονομικὸς ἐν αὐτοῖς ὁ λόγος, οὐ κατὰ τὴν ἀξίαν, ἀλλὰ πρὸς τὸν καιρόν. Idem de Bileamo iudicium est R. Isaaci Abarbanelis ad Jos. xiii. 27, כִּי הָיָה כֹה שְׁנוּכָר מִנְּבוֹאָתוֹ דְּבַר שְׂכָחָא לִי לְצֹרֶךְ שְׁעָה לְכַבֹּד יִשְׂרָאֵל וְכַרְי לְבִרְכָּם."

Grotius² quotes several curious opinions of the ancients respecting the communion of their chiefs and superiors with an invisible world. Homer tells us that a dream was only to be depended upon when it occurred to Agamemnon. The Spartans esteemed those dreams only as prophetic which were presented to the Ephori. Oracular responses were given both to Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, to Lamech and Balaam. And in the former dispensation it belonged to the kings, or to the chief magistrate, to consult by Urim and Thummin³.

Dr. Lardner observes on these words, "By prophesying—I understand foretelling the event; which it was, in a peculiar manner, the office of the priest to do, when he was inquired of, or when God was inquired of by him, concerning any important matters under deliberation." See 1 Sam. xxii. 11–13. xxiii. 9–11. and 2 Sam. v. 22–25. He thus paraphrases the whole passage—

"Caiaphas, who was the high priest at that time, when it came to his turn to deliver his opinion, said, 'You have hitherto talked very weakly and ignorantly; you may proceed in the case before you without hesitation. The taking away the life of this man will be so far from being ruinous to the whole nation in this country, and in other parts, as some of you fear, that it will be much for the advantage of the people of God, every where.' This, however, he said, not merely of himself, but being then high priest, he foretold the issue and event of their counsels, and of the death of Jesus; and that it would come to pass that Jesus would die for that nation, and not for that nation only; but that through his death he would gather together in one the children of God, which were scattered abroad⁴."

The advice of Caiaphas is such, indeed, as might have been expected from an unprincipled and worldly politician. He recommends them to save the state, by sacrificing the supposed author of their apprehended danger. One man must die for the people—that is, the life of this Jesus, although he has performed mighty works, is of no value when compared with the possibility of danger. The Evangelist certainly refers to this speech of Caiaphas, as if it had been spoken under a divine impulse, of which he was totally unconscious.

Diodati, in his Annotations, writes—"God guided the tongue of the high priest; so that thinking to utter a speech according to his own wicked meaning, he pronounced an oracle according to God's meaning; as the high priest had oftentimes inspirations from God." Exod. xxviii. 30. Numb. xxvii. 21.

NOTE 37.—PART V.

ON THE TIME OF THE ANOINTING OF OUR LORD AT BETHANY.

HARMONISTS have been much divided on the proper place of the anointing our Lord at Bethany. Some have supposed that this unction was performed twice, others but once. Lightfoot and Pilkington have embraced the hypothesis of a twofold unction. Archbishop Newcome supposes that there was one only, which he places two days before the Passover. Doddridge and Michaelis have concluded that our Lord was anointed once only, and refer the event to the sixth day before the Passover.

After an attentive perusal of the several reasons adduced by each harmonist, I have adopted the opinion of Michaelis and Doddridge. The German harmonist, in his chapter on the Rules to be observed in making a Harmony of the Gospels, has selected this event as the example by which to illustrate the position "that two or more relations may be very similar, and yet not the same; and these must be carefully distinguished from each other."—"The following instance," he observes, "may serve to show the manner in which I apply the rules in question. The Evangelists, St. Matthew (chap. xxvi. 6–13.) and St. Mark (chap. xiv. 3–9.) have related that Christ was anointed in the week preceding his death, and all the commentators are agreed that both of them mean the same unction. St. John likewise (chap. xii. 1. 8.) relates that Christ was anointed in the same week; and the unction which he describes, is, in my opinion, the very same with that which

⁴ Lardner's Works, vol. i. 4to. edit. p. 211.

St. Matthew and St. Mark have recorded ; but, according to others, it was totally different, and happened four days earlier. Now that two different unctions happened twice in the same week is more than I am able to believe. The two unctions above mentioned, if we consider as two, what I believe to be one, agree in the following circumstances :—

“1. Both happened at Bethany.

“2. In both cases Jesus was anointed, not by his host, but by a woman. However, as Christ was frequently at Bethany, these circumstances are not so very remarkable.

“3. Both unctions took place, as I shall prove in the sequel, not in the house of Lazarus, the friend of Jesus, where we might soonest expect him, but at another house.

“4. Both happened in the last week before the suffering of Christ.

“5. In both cases the ointment was so expensive, that the unction had the appearance of profusion.

“6. In both cases we meet with the remarkable circumstance, that the ointment was not purchased for the purpose to which it was applied, but that it had been preserved for some time by the person who used it ; for the disciples were offended that the ointment was not sold and given to the poor ; and in the account which is given by St. John (chap. xii. 7.) it is expressly said by Jesus, ‘against the day of my burying hath she kept this.’ One might almost conjecture that it was the remainder of the ointment which Mary and Martha had purchased for the funeral of Lazarus : the thought presents itself at least, on reading St. John’s description, as not improbable¹.

“7. In both cases the unction is censured by the disciples.

“8. In both cases the ground of censure is the same.

“9. In both cases the unction is defended by Jesus, and the same answer given to the disciples.

“10. The expression, ῥόδος πιστή, which is not only very unusual, and therefore obscure, but occurs in not a single instance either in the Septuagint, or in the New Testament, except on this occasion, is used both by St. Mark and by St. John ; the ointment therefore used in both cases was strictly the same.

“These circumstances are too numerous and too particular, to have happened twice : not to mention the improbability that the disciples, after having been rebuked by Jesus six days before Easter, for having censured the unction, should presume to repeat their censure on a similar occasion, on the second day before Easter. For it contained a manifest disregard to Jesus himself, which they must have very sensibly felt, when he answered them, ‘The poor always ye have with you, but me ye have not always,’ John xii. 8. ; and of which, therefore, they would hardly have been guilty only four days afterwards.

“In the two accounts, which are given by St. Matthew and St. John, I perceive not the least variation, except that in some points the one is more copious than the other ; but their descriptions are so far from being inconsistent, that they have all the appearance of proceeding from two different eyewitnesses to the same fact.

“1. According to St. Matthew and St. Mark, a woman anoints Jesus ; according to St. John, he is anointed by Mary, and, if we may judge from what he says in the second verse, by Mary, the sister of Lazarus. This however is no contradiction, when one historian omits the name of the woman, the other mentions it. Nay, even from the very silence of St. Matthew and St. Mark, with respect to the name, may be deduced an argument in support of the opinion, that the unction described by St. Matthew and St. John is the same. St. Matthew and St. Mark must have had particular reasons for concealing the name of the woman, since, according to their own relation, Jesus declared that what she had done should be preached in the whole world for a memorial of her. Now this cannot have happened unless she was the Mary mentioned by St. John : and it would follow, from the supposition of two different unctions, that the declaration of Jesus had remained unfulfilled. Perhaps the real state of the case is as follows :—the two first Evangelists, who have made no mention of the raising of Lazarus from the dead, that they might not expose him to the persecution of the Jewish Sanhedrin, have probably, from the same reason, concealed the name of his sister Mary, who anointed Jesus with the ointment which remained after the interment of Lazarus. St. John, on the contrary, expressly mentions it, because he wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem, and could therefore have no reason for concealing the name either of Lazarus or Mary.

“2. According to St. Matthew, the entertainment was given at the house of Simon the leper ; according to St. John, Lazarus was one of them who sat at the table with him (εἰς τῶν ἀνακειμένων), and his sister Martha served. Some commentators have considered this as a variation in the account, and have concluded, from St. John’s description, that the entertainment was given at the house of Lazarus. But this is certainly not true, since no one in speaking of the master of the house would say, ‘he was one of those who sat at the table.’ On the contrary, this very expression proves that he was only a guest, and that the entertainment was given at the house of a friend, in which his sister, who was a diligent housewife (see Luke x. 40.), prepared the table.

"3. According to St. Matthew, the woman poured the box of ointment on the head of Jesus; according to St. John, she anointed his feet. But even this circumstance is not sufficient to prove two distinct unctions, though among all the variations it is the most considerable. That Mary did not leave the head of Jesus unanointed, we may take for granted, from the general practice of the East; but this is not related by St. John, who mentions only the more extraordinary circumstance, omitted by St. Matthew and St. Mark, that the woman anointed his feet. It is agreeable to John's peculiar manner to relate circumstances omitted by his predecessors.

"4. According to St. Matthew, the disciples in general, according to St. Mark, only some of them, had indignation, and censured the woman. This cannot be considered as a contradiction: for when St. Matthew says, in general terms, 'the disciples,' it does not necessarily follow that he meant all of them, without exception; nor is it probable that all of them expressed their opinion. But St. John mentions Judas Iscariot, as the person who censured the action. Still, however, we cannot conclude that the Evangelists have described two different unctions. One of the disciples must have made a beginning, to whom others acceded, though probably not in the same words. This person is particularly named by St. John, who likewise adds the motive which induced him to cast the censure. Perhaps St. Matthew and St. Peter acceded to the opinion of Judas, but not St. John; and hence St. Matthew and St. Mark speak openly in the plural number, that they might not conceal the part which St. Matthew and St. Peter had taken in this unjust censure.

"It is further objected, that the clear and certain marks by which the time is determined by the different Evangelists, prove two distinct transactions; that St. John mentions expressly the sixth day before Easter (John xii. 1.), and St. Matthew as expressly the second day before Easter (Matt. xxvi. 2.), as the day on which the unction happened: but the assertion appears to have no foundation. That St. John has determined the date to be the sixth day before the Passover is not to be disputed. But St. Matthew is silent as to the day on which the unction happened; and it is owing only to the modern division of Matthew's text into chapters, that we suppose he has determined the time. The Evangelist has not written, 'On the second day before the Passover Jesus was at an entertainment at Bethany;' but after having related a discourse which Jesus had made to his disciples, he adds, 'And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all those sayings, he said unto his disciples, Ye know that after two days is the feast of the Passover, and the Son of Man is betrayed to be crucified.' Immediately afterwards the Evangelist relates the plot which was formed against the life of Jesus in the following manner: 'Then (τότε) assembled together the Chief Priests and the Scribes, and the elders of the people, unto the palace of the high priest, who was called Caiaphas, and consulted that they might take Jesus by subtlety, and kill him. But they said, not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar among the people.' Now the word τότε, which is capable of a very extensive signification, no more determines this consultation to have happened on the same day on which Jesus delivered his discourse to the apostles, than that it happened in the same hour.

"But even if we admit that both of them happened on the same day, it will by no means follow, that the entertainment likewise at Bethany took place on that day; at least the words with which St. Matthew begins his narration of it, 'Now when Jesus was in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper,' contain no determination of time, and may as easily refer to a preceding as a present period.

"Still, however, it might be objected, that though St. Matthew and St. Mark have not expressly mentioned the day on which the unction took place at Bethany, they have at least assigned to it a place in that part of their narrative where they were advanced, namely, to within two days of the Passover. Now this objection presupposes that the Evangelists always wrote according to the order of time, which they certainly did not; and if we only make a different division of the chapters, and reckon to the twenty-fifth chapter the two first verses of the twenty-sixth, the unction at Bethany, which is related in the following verses, will have less reference to the time specified in those two verses."

"The Jewish Sanhedrin had formed the resolution to put Jesus to death, but not on the feast day; and it was the unction at Bethany which afforded them the means of getting him into their power, though on the day which they had endeavoured to avoid. This may be gathered from St. Matthew's own relation, who, after having described the consultation of the Sanhedrin, immediately relates the unction at Bethany, and then adds, 'That one of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot, went unto the Chief Priests, and said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you?' (Matt. xxvi. 14, 15.) The account given by St. Matthew is in some measure obscure, because we do not perceive in what manner the circumstance of the unction excited in Judas the resolution to betray his master. But this, we clearly learn, from the relation of St. John, from which it appears that Judas was properly the person who censured the unction, under the pretence that the ointment ought to be sold for the benefit of the poor; and that this specious pretext likewise met with the approbation of other apostles. The true reason, as St. John expressly declares, was the hope of having a further opportunity of defrauding the money-bag, which was entrusted to his care. The answer therefore of Jesus affected Judas in particular, whose guilty conscience augmented the severity of the rebuke. Under these circumstances, it is by no means extraordinary that Judas resolved to take revenge, especially when we consider that he was already an apostate (John vi. 67–71.), and thought, perhaps, that, if contrary to his belief, Jesus was really the Messiah, the measures concerted against him would be of no avail; but that, on the other hand, if Jesus was an impostor, he would meet with the fate he deserved. It appears, then, that the unction at Bethany, which gave rise to the offer of Judas to the Sanhedrin, to betray Christ, is more properly arranged immediately before the relation of the effect which it produced, than it would have been, if placed at the beginning of the twenty-first chapter, to which it properly belongs, according to the merits of time^u.”

It will be observed, that Michaelis, in these observations, has replied to the principal objections which have been proposed by Lightfoot, Whiston, Whitby, Macknight, and others. Archbishop Newcome has reviewed these arguments in a long note on the subject.

Bishop Marsh is not satisfied with these arguments of Michaelis. He observes that Matt. xxvi. 2. and Mark xiv. 1. bring their narrative down to the third day, and that the assembly of the chief priests was certainly held three days before the Passover, when Judas betrayed Christ; but it does not therefore follow, as Bishop Marsh supposes, that the unction was on the same day. St. Matthew connects the two events, in order to point out the cause and the effect, without distinguishing the precise time. St. Mark follows St. Matthew's plan, and for the same reason.

The first day of unleavened bread is mentioned in its order, after the parenthetical narration of the causes of the betraying, and has no reference to the unction. Bishop Marsh justly objects to Archbishop Newcome's order, but proposes the opinion, that the unction took place on the Wednesday before the Passover. This learned theologian, however, does not rest this opinion upon the arguments generally made use of, but upon a supposed corruption of the original text of St. John. As the testimony however, of all existing MSS. is against this opinion, Bishop Marsh conjectures that the corruption in question was made at so very early a period, that no manuscript extant has the original reading. It is at all times painful to be compelled to differ from an authority so eminent as Bishop Marsh; but it is impossible to approve of any emendation of the text of the New Testament, which increases instead of lessening difficulties; and is unsupported by the authority of one quotation, version, or MS. extant. The Scriptures must be treated with greater veneration.

Bishop Marsh, in his note (No. 9.) to this section of Michaelis, also endeavours to prove that the day on which Christ was betrayed was the day of the unction. His arguments do not appear satisfactory. The question principally rests upon the precise meaning of the word τότε, which Michaelis would render “very soon after,” and his annotator “immediately after.”

The authority of Dr. Dick, in his Essay on the Inspiration of the Scriptures, confirms me yet further in the conviction that the unction at Bethany took place six days before the Passover.—See Dick's Essay, p. 300, 301.

NOTE 38.—PART V.

IT is not exactly known of what this (νάρδος πιστική) consisted which was poured upon the head of our Lord. The words occur but twice, Mark xiv. 3. “There came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious,” ἦλθε γυνὴ ἔχουσα ἀλάβαστρον μύρου, νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτελοῦς; and John xii. 3. “Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly,” &c. Ἡ οὖν Μαρία λαβοῦσα λίτραν μύρου νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτιμου. Schleusner derives the word πιστική from πίνω, bibo; and supposes that the ointment could be poured out as a liquid.—He quotes, among other authorities, the same passage from Æschylus^v as Heinsius does, to confirm his opinion. Others derive the word from πλῆσις, and suppose that it merely signifies that the ointment was pure and unadulterated. With this opinion Heinsius agrees, and defends the interpretation from the Hellenistic interpretation of a verse in Isaiah xxxiii. 16. εἴ τις εἰς νόσον πέσοι οὐκ ἔν ἀλέξιμ^v οὐδὲν, οὐδὲ βρώσιμον οὐ χρησιόν, οὐδὲ πιστόν^w. Others, rejecting both these opinions, suppose the word is not Greek, but Latin, and that νάρδος πιστική is the same as nardus spicata, hoc est, ex spicis expressa, from πιέζω, premo, unde πιεστή, by metathesis πιστική, as φελόνη, for Penula. Scaliger reads the word πιστική, from πλίσσω, contundo. Nonnus keeps the word as it is in St. John, and gives no explanation. Lightfoot supposes the word to be derived from the Syriac ܢܪܕܘܣܢܐ and interprets the whole phrase to signify an aromatic confection of nard, mastic, or myrobalane. Hartung^x is of opinion that the ointment in question was brought from Opis, a town near Babylon, whence spices and unguents were exported, and that the true reading, therefore, ought to be πιστικῆς. Lampe^y and Cloppenburg, however, reject this interpretation, for the best of all reasons when the language of the New Testament is under consideration, because the word is not to be found in any manuscript or version extant; and the latter derives the word from the name of Pista, a Persian city, mentioned by Æschylus, Τάδε μὲν Περσῶν τῶν οἰχομένων Ἑλλάδ' ἐς αὐτὴν ἱστοῖα καλεῖται,—Persæ, line 1, 2. on which the Scholiast observes, ἀγροῦσι δ' οἱ πόλεις ἐστὶ Περσῶν ἔσωθεν ἱστοῖα καλουμένη, ἣν συνζόφιας ὁ ποιητὴς ἱστοῖα ἔφη—the only objection to this opinion is, that nard does not grow in Persia. It might, however, be imported from India, and manufactured there for the use of the merchants. Abulfeda is quoted both by Lampe and Pfeiffer, to prove that Pista was the metropolis of Caramania, a large and flourishing city on the river Indus.

Pfeiffer, after reviewing these various opinions, comes to the same conclusion as Luther and Kuinoel (Com. in Hist. lib. N. T. in Mark xiv. 3.) that it signifies unadulterated, or pure, and is derived from πιστις. He quotes Casaubon's observation, that πιστικὸς signifies that which can be depended upon, or which deserves confidence. Eusebius (Demons. Evang. lib. viii.) calls the wine of the Eucharist, καὶ αὖτις πιστικὸν τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης.

NOTE 39.—PART V.

ON ZECHARIAH IX. 9.

THIS prediction of Zechariah, four hundred years before the event, announced to the people of Israel, that the King of Jerusalem, contrary to the universal custom of his own and of every other nation, should enter into his royal city, without any outward pomp and splendor; that he should ride upon the humblest of animals; himself the meekest and lowliest of men, yet the Saviour of his people, and, as such, be received by them with the loudest rejoicings and acclamations. We are assured, by the Prophet Malachi also, that the Messiah should certainly visit the second temple at Jerusalem. Let me now, then, appeal to the Jew who receives the Old Testament, and entreat him to search the records of the history of his fathers, and there find if any prophet, priest, or king, or ruler of Israel, before the destruction of the second temple, ever entered into Jerusalem, as Jesus of Nazareth is here represented to have done; and which of all these rulers of Israel united so many of their ancient prophecies in his own person. Of all the long train of Persian, Grecian, Roman, or Jewish rulers, to whom can we apply the prophecy of Zechariah, and assert that he rode into Jerusalem humble, royal, and a Saviour, visiting and appearing in their temple? Ezra was in their city when the prophecy was delivered^z. The successor of the Persian conqueror was reposing in his palace. Nehemiah went up to Jerusalem attended by the captains and cavalry of the king of Persia, (Nehem. ii. 9.) When he arose privately in the night, he was accompanied by few only of his train, and though he rode, it was not in the manner described by the prophet^a; and of this his second entrance nothing is recorded^b.

Did the governors of Syria, under the Persian sovereigns of Judæa, visit Jerusalem in such lowly state? Was the prophecy fulfilled in Bagoses, when he espoused the cause of the usurper of the high priesthood, and imposed a fine upon the priests for every offering that was brought to the temple? Did any Persian emperor ever enter Jerusalem; or can it be supposed that the prophet alluded to any officer who bore an inferior title^c? If it be imagined that Zechariah predicted the conquest of the Grecian conqueror, when, meeting the high priest Jaddua, he venerated, amidst the astonishment of his attendants, the name of Jehovah, glittering on his tiara^d; let it be remembered that Alexander was at the head of his army, neither meek, nor poor, nor humble^e. Do the pages of history unfold any similar event, which occurred in the lives of either of the Ptolemies? whether of Lagus, who entered the city on the Sabbath, as an enemy and a conqueror, and took away many thousands of the people as his prisoners? or of Philadelphus, who reversed the decree, and restored them to their own country? or of Ptolemy Philopater, who marked the wretched Jews with the ivy-leaf, in honor of Bacchus, and sacrilegiously attempted to enter the sanctuary? can we trace a similitude between these men and the King of Israel, at whose coming the daughter of Zion was invited to rejoice greatly?

Let us turn our attention to another dynasty, and search among them also for this meek and humble Saviour, and King of Israel. Did Antiochus the Great protect the people? It is true that they welcomed, with acclamations, his army and their elephants; but where do we read that this king entered Jerusalem on a colt, the foal of an ass? Did Seleucus Philopater fulfil the prediction, when he sent Heliodorus to plunder the temple: or was his brother, the cruel oppressor, the savage murderer, and the foulest idolator of all the enemies of Israel, more meek and humble, when he profaned the temple, and slaughtered the people on the Sabbath? If we look to the history of the Maccabean family, we may still proceed in vain to find one among them whose characteristics, as a leader of Israel, correspond with this prediction of the prophet. Mattathias excited the people to resistance in defence of their religion. Judas entered Jerusalem in triumph, purified the temple, and dedicated it again to the worship of Jehovah; as a religious and devout man, he, perhaps, might be called meek and humble; but where is it recorded that he entered into Jerusalem sitting upon a colt, the foal of an ass? Shall we apply the prediction to the idolatrous Bacchides, who captured the holy city, and murdered the zealous Maccabee? or to any of the sons of the Asmonæan family; whether it be the pious Simon, his warlike son, or to the weak and profligate Aristobulus, who first assumed the diadem, and surnamed himself the King of the Jews; or to his fierce and cruel brother, Alexander Jannæus? If it is possible not to turn in disgust from the unnatural contests of this man's sons, we might inquire if either of these were the meek and holy King of Israel, before or after the Romans entered Jerusalem on the Sabbath, and assisted the royal Jew to slaughter his countrymen on that holy day? Pompey, who spared the gold of the temple, and Crassus who followed him, and despoiled it: Gabinius, and Cæsar, and Antipater, with all the mingled tribe of Parthian, Roman, and Jewish contenders, who next crowd the scene, may be considered as alike falling short of the description of the prophet. We are now brought to the days of Herod the king, the contemporary of Jesus of Nazareth, the tributary dependant on Rome, the fierce, implacable, and haughty murderer of his wife, his people, and his children? Is this the portrait of the expected king of Israel? Was the destroyer of Mariamne, the flatterer of Augustus, the slaughterer of the innocents at Bethlehem, was he the meek and humble Saviour, who was to ride into the city among the acclamations of the people? Was Herod the king, who died amidst the deep and indignant curses of a suffering people? was he who was smitten of God, hateful to his own family, and abhorred by his subjects, was this the king for whom Zion was to rejoice, and the daughter of Jerusalem to be glad? Surely neither this man, nor his tyrannical son, nor his family of tetrarchs, nor the corrupt and sanguinary governors from imperial Rome, can appear as candidates for the title of the true King of Israel, Jesus of Nazareth. None but the Prophet of Galilee, who worked miracles, who fulfilled every prophecy, who was so poor, that he had not where to lay his head; so humble, that he washed the feet of his disciples, whom the people more than once endeavoured to make their king; and who was now received among them with acclamations and hosannas, none but He accomplished this prediction of Zechariah, and entered into Jerusalem,—

“Just—and having salvation;
Lowly—and riding upon an ass,
And upon a colt, the foal of an ass.”

Brethren of Israel, you acknowledge the miracles of Christ, although you impute them to magic^f. Your fathers bore witness to his blameless life, and to the union in his person of many of the characteristics of your expected Messiah. Whenever your promised Shiloh shall appear, he must manifest himself in the same manner as Jesus of Nazareth has already done; he must appear in the second temple, and accomplish in his own person all the predictions of your ancient prophets. That this prophecy of Zechariah related to the King Messiah, you are presented with proofs, not from the writings of the Evangelists (whom we indeed believe, like your ancient prophets, to be inspired), but from the writings of your own talmudists^g. For of none other can it be said,

As the word נוֹשֵׁעַ is a passive participle, Grotius would render it salvatus, and expresses his surprise that this should have escaped the attention of the commentators. Drusius, his contemporary, who was a much more learned man, has anticipated this remark, and replied to it. He also observes, that the word נוֹשֵׁעַ is used as an epithet; but his rule of interpretation, as applied to this form of speaking, is, that where a passive participle is thus taken, it implies action^h.

Sebastian Schmidt renders the words, justus, et servatus ille; and in the margin of our authorized translation, “saving himself.”

With respect to the reading of the Aldine MS.ⁱ σῳζων αὐτοὺς, it is not supported by the original, which reads וְהוֹשֵׁעַ הוּא; had the reading of the first word been וְנוֹשֵׁעַ, as Grotius and Houbigant propose, and the word הוּא omitted, and the pronominal affix inserted in its place, וְנוֹשֵׁעֵם, the αὐτοὺς might be admitted. In the absence of all authority from manuscripts, however, no conjectural emendation can be admitted^j.

Grotius has committed a singular error in supposing that this prophecy can refer to the entrance of Zerobabel into Jerusalem; as Zerobabel had long been in the city after the return from the captivity, before the prophecy was written^k.

NOTE 1.—PART VI.

THE several circumstances mentioned in the sections of this chapter, which relate our Lord’s conversations, when for the last time he visited Jerusalem, as well as the nature of the questions proposed, present us with a most lively portrait of the manners and opinions of the Jews at this period. Schoetgen, and the other writers, who have proposed to explain the New Testament from the talmudical writings, have bestowed much labor on the illustration of some of the phrases, &c. adopted by the Evangelists; but, in general, the discourses and conversations of our Lord are so plain, that none can misunderstand them—so short, none can forget them—so perfect, none can add to the force of their instruction, or the eloquence of their language. To add many notes would be “to throw a perfume on the violet.”

The differences between the harmonizers of the Gospels, with respect to the contents of this and the following parts of this arrangement, are of little importance. In general they are agreed. The principal differences in this part refer to the number of times in which the buyers and sellers were driven from the temple—the question whether our Lord ate the Passover the same day as the Jews—and the precise time in which the discourses in St. John were delivered.

NOTE 2.—PART V.

RIDE on because of the word of truth, of righteousness, and of judgment. Enter into thine holy city, thou King of Glory. So amidst the acclamations of angels didst thou return to thy Father. So shall the spirits of the just attend thee, when thou shalt again at the end of the world go up, from the dissolution of nature, to thy Father and our Father, to thy God and our God. The hour was approaching when the mysterious sacrifice, reconciling the heaven and the earth, was to be offered; and Jesus, knowing that all things were to be accomplished, went on to the scene of his sufferings amidst the homage of the people, and appealing to the rulers of Israel, by his fulfilment of the most peculiar of their prophecies, which they had applied to their expected Messiah.

He entered into Jerusalem to fulfil the prophecies—to resign himself to the will of his Father—to become the victim for the sins of man—and no one action, after he entered the city, was inconsistent with the humble yet sublime character which he had assumed, as the powerful deliverer, and the passive sacrifice. That there might be no possibility of a renewal of the former scenes, when the people anxiously desired, by force, to make Him a king, He discontinued the miracles by which He had hitherto demonstrated his authority and power. Every evening He withdrew from the city to solitude, to prayer, or to converse with his disciples on the Mount of Olives. He thus obviated the very possibility of suspicion^a that he was actuated by the desire of temporal aggrandizement.

^a That is, among the Jews of his own time. But see the German critics quoted, and we may trust, refuted by Kuinoel, Comment. in lib. Hist. N. T. in Matt. xxi. and by Rosenmüller, in his Scholia on the same chapter.

NOTE 3.—PART V.

It was a law among the Jews, that if any person, even of the most inferior rank, addressed another in any well-known passage from their liturgical services, the person thus accosted was bound to reply. They were particularly accustomed to apply the 118th Psalm to this purpose; the 25th verse of which was used at the feast of Tabernacles. The 24th verse is an introduction to the expressions of joy, the hosannas which the people sung—and it is not improbable, therefore, that the words of both these verses were sung on the occasion of our Lord's entrance into Jerusalem. The people dividing themselves, and, according to the custom which had prevailed among them from the very earliest ages, which was continued by the primitive Churches, and is still preserved in the services of the Episcopal Church, repeating alternately the clauses of the passages they quoted. It is well known that the Evangelists have not been careful to relate minutely every incident which occurred when they record a fact; and we cannot therefore argue from their silence that no other passage was sung than the hosanna of the 25th verse. It seems more probable that the introductory verse would have been likewise added, in which case we may conclude that the rhythmical divisions would be preserved, and the burthen, or chorus, or song of triumph, with which our Lord was welcomed, might be thus arranged—

וזהיום עשה יהוה
נגילה ונשמחה בו
אנא יהוה הושיעה נא
אנא יהוה הצליחה נא

This is the day which the Lord hath made,
We will be glad and rejoice in it.

Saying—

We pray thee, O Jehovah, save us, we pray;
We pray thee, O Jehovah, prosper us, we pray.

A rhyming ending of this kind was likely to dwell on the memory of the devout Jews. The ending of the last line but one, however, is the term from which the word is actually derived, הושיעה נא, “Save now, we beseech thee.” This passage seems to have been the principal acclamation with which our Saviour was saluted; while many of the multitude added the expressions mentioned by St. Luke.

The conduct of the Pharisees, in reproving the people for thus crying out their hosannas, instead of uniting with them according to their own institutions, must be imputed to their hardness of heart, and a determination to oppose to the utmost the claims and pretensions of the Prophet of Nazareth and of Galilee, for—Judaeorum, et Phariseorum fuit, his pueris respondere; idque ex instituto majorum suorum. Verum οχιληγοσααδ'α ipsorum hoc noluit permitttere.—Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 170.

NOTE 4.—PART VI.

MANN, in his work, On the true Time of Christ's Life, is of opinion that the buyers and sellers were driven once only from the temple. Some harmonizers conclude that they were now, the second time, driven out, on the day of his triumphant entry, others on the day after. I have preferred the arrangement proposed by Pilkington and adopted by Doddridge; both because the literal interpretation of the narrative appears to support the opinion; and it is probable that the repeated opposition of our Lord to the traffic which so much benefited the priests, by whose permission the merchants sat in the court of the temple, contributed to his apprehension. It is not likely that one repulse from the temple would have been sufficient to banish them entirely from so lucrative an employment.

The general opinion is, that the buyers and sellers were three times expelled from the temple. Once at the first Passover, and twice at this time.

St. Matthew's account runs thus:—on the day of the triumphant entry, Jesus went into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought, &c.

St. Mark mentions that Jesus, at his triumphal entry, went into the temple, and when he had looked round about upon all things, he went out of the city. Dr. Lightfoot observes (Horæ Heb. in loc.), that the word περιβλεψάμενος, Mark xi. 11. signifies not,—“a bare beholding, or, looking upon,” but,—“a looking upon with indignation, reproof, and correction.” And he supposes the word, so understood, to allude to the casting the buyers and sellers out of the temple, at the time spoken of by St. Matthew. At his return the next morning, he cursed the barren fig tree, and he again cast the buyers and sellers out of the temple.

It is not improbable, that the traders and money-changers should be returned to the temple again, though they were cast out the day before; and it may well be expected that, if Jesus found them there, he would drive them out again: so far the supposition of there being two facts related is very probable. And, besides, we may observe, that St. Mark mentions a restraint, that either was not laid upon the people the day before, or, at least, is not mentioned by St. Matthew, viz. that he would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple: an additional circumstance, which makes it appear still more probable that Jesus cast them out twice, at the several times mentioned by the two Evangelists.—Pilkington, notes to the Evangelical History, p. 47, 48.

NOTE 5.—PART VI.

WHERE, or on what day, these Greeks came to see Jesus is not particularly recorded. But, as in St. John's present order, this account immediately follows that of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, we have some reason to conclude that it was on that day and in that place; and therefore I have thought it necessary to arrange this, and the three following sections, amongst the transactions of that day, and before Jesus departed out of the city, as mentioned Matt. xxi. 17, 18, and Mark xi. 11, 12.

It may farther be observed, that there are some notations in these sections, which seem to point out the time of their coming, and the place where Jesus was. It is probable He was new in the temple, whither the Greeks, if they were devout strangers, or Proselytes of the Gate only, could not be permitted to come; they being allowed to go no farther than the court of the Gentiles. They therefore applied to him, to desire him to vouchsafe to come out of the temple to show himself unto them. But, instead of complying with this request, a greater evidence was vouchsafed them; a voice came from heaven, in their hearing, which said, “I have both glorified my Name, and I will glorify it again,” referring to the name of God being glorified just before Jesus went into the temple, in the hosannahs of the people. The observation of Dr. Lightfoot is worthy our remark; Christ was thrice attested from heaven, according to his threefold office, King, Priest, and Prophet. At his baptism, when he was anointed and entered into his ministry, as the great High Priest—at his transfiguration, for the great Prophet—to whom all must hearken—and now for the great King, when he had newly fulfilled this prophecy,— Lardner, Vossius, and Salmasius are of opinion that the Greeks here spoken of were idolatrous Gentiles; Whitby, that they were Proselytes of the Gate; and Doddridge, Proselytes of Righteousness. Heuman and Semler suppose that they were Jews, whose constant residence was among the Gentiles. It seems most probable, as they were now at Jerusalem, that they had come up to be present at the feast of the Passover, and therefore that they were of that class of persons who are elsewhere called σεβόμενοι. The word here used is Ἕλληνες—“et quanquam,” says Kuinoel, “h. l. non additum legitur σεβόμενοι, ex usu tamen loquendi N. T. quandoque, ut Hieronym. in Matt. xxvi. scribit: mutatâ re pristinum nomen manet; v. Glassius, Phil. Sac. p. 7. "Ελληνες."—Kuinoel, Comment. in lib. Histor. N. T. vol. iii. p. 525.

NOTE 6.—PART VI.

ON THE "BATH COL," OR VOICE FROM HEAVEN.

ONE of the most ancient tokens of the more immediate or more manifested presence of God, was the utterance of an audible voice from heaven, in the manner here described; this voice was called by the Jews the Bath Col, or the Daughter of the voice. It was generally attended, as in this instance, with thunder. The Jews, who were accustomed to read and to hear that it was in this manner their fathers were accustomed to hold communion with God, said, an angel spoke; the Greeks, who were not so well instructed, thought that it thundered.

Vitringa^b, who has written a treatise expressly on this subject, has endeavoured to prove that the Bath Col was delivered in four various forms. The קול רממה, gentle, low, and as in a whisper. In this manner Job was addressed, when the תמונה לנגד עיני רממה וקול אשמע: "an image glided rapidly before mine eyes, I perceived silence, and a voice." That is, a low and still voice whispered from the silence.

The second kind of Bath Col was an articulate but subdued tone: as Moses heard the voice as of a man speaking to him from the mercy-seat. This also was in a gentle tone, but not so low as in the former instance. Maimonides describes it from the traditions of the Jews, as a low tone of voice, such as that which a man uses when he prays aloud, and is alone.

The third was, the usual tone of a man speaking, as when the Bath Col called to Samuel. He thought that Eli had called to him; and, in the same way, God conversed with Moses, "as a man converses with his friend."

The fourth, and principal, and most frequent, was that form of the Bath Col, which was a deep and loud sound, קול צון and קול רב, attended with thunder, and which is described in various passages of Scripture, as well as in the verse now under consideration.

Vitringa produces a number of curious illustrations of this mode of revelation from the ancients; among whom were preserved the wrecks and remnants of the original patriarchism, once the true religion of the assembled sons of Noah, before the corruptions of idolatry had again established vice and error among mankind.

Spencer^c has given the same account. The Bath Col was a voice which proceeded from heaven, by the ministry of an angel: it was so called, because the voice was generally attended with thunder, which demonstrated its supernatural origin; and from which it proceeded as from the womb of its mother. Ex tonitru, tanquam ex utero matris suæ, prodierit, are the words of Danzius, in his treatise De Inauguratione Christi, &c. Danzius^d and Harenburgh^e both quote Tosaphoth Cod. Sanhedr. (scil. f. 11. a.) to prove that many suppose that they did not hear a voice coming from heaven, but that one voice seemed to proceed from, or be the echo of another. It sometimes happens that a man heard a voice as from a distance, which appeared as an echo.

Maimonides^f is of opinion, that the Bath Col was merely an imaginary voice, which the individual seemed to hear, in consequence of some notion suddenly and vividly impressed upon, or occurring to his imagination. This opinion is common among many of the Jews at present; at least, if I may be allowed to say so, from having heard it strenuously defended in a conversation on the subject with one of the most learned Jews in this country. It is an opinion, however, which is not only contrary to the whole testimony of Scripture, which relates, as facts, the sudden voice to Adam, Moses, Elijah, Samuel, and others; but it is at variance with all the general interpretations of the talmudical writers; and is vehemently objected to by the learned Abrabanel, who asserts the ancient belief, that the Bath Col was of supernatural origin; and he adduces, among other instances, the voice to Samuel, and the Law on Sinai, which must be considered as miracles, worked upon the air itself, so as to produce an audible and distinct sound, as of a voice, which cannot possibly be resolved into a deception of the imagination. Abrabanel likewise challenges the Christians to produce in their favor this proof of the truth of their religion.

The μεταβαλόμεν ἐν τρεῦσιν, "let us depart hence," of Josephus, (in Hebrew, נפוק מתמן,) when he describes so eloquently the prodigies at the siege of Jerusalem, appears to me to be the last sound of the Bath Col in the Jewish dispensation; the last sigh of the Spirit of prophecy in the Mosaic Church.

religion of the Jews had now become merely external, it flourished only in appearance: it possessed the leaves, but not the fruits of holiness. The fig-tree, therefore, became the most apt representation of the state of the Jews at that time, and of their consequent destruction, or withering away. Had it been the season of figs, and the fruit already gathered, the tree would not have been so appropriately the object of a curse, or so expressively a type of the Jewish nation. In this, as in many other instances, our Saviour predicted the future by a significant action, or sign, before he judged it expedient to declare it publicly. The parable of the fruitless fig-tree (Luke xiii. 7.) bears the same signification.

Another illustration is given of this parable, in reference to the first establishment of the Levitical priesthood. When an opposition was made to the divine ordination of Aaron, the Levitical priesthood was ratified and confirmed by the miracle of a dry rod, which in one night budded, blossomed, and brought forth fruits. Now, when it was about to be removed, because it had ceased to flourish, or to yield its appointed produce, its fate was prefigured by a contrary miracle, by an apparently flourishing tree reduced as it were, in one night, to a dry rod, for ever barren.

The choice of this tree, as an emblem, corresponds with other parts of Scripture, Jer. xxiv. 2. Luke xiii. 6. Micah vii. 1. Cant. ii. 11-13.

NOTE 8.—PART VI.

THE words καιρός σύκων ("the time of figs,") signify the time of gathering, i. e. the fig harvest. Wetstein's observations are worthy of notice: he says, that if Christ, when approaching a fig-tree at the season when figs are ripe, had found nothing but leaves, this would not have afforded a decisive proof that the tree was barren, and deserving of a curse: for had it been ever so fruitful, all the figs might have been previously plucked off. But since before the fig harvest it had abundance of leaves, it might be justly expected to have figs also. Lightfoot remarks, that this cursing injured no one, since, as we learn from St. Matthew, the tree grew by the way side.

NOTE 9.—PART VI.

DR. HALES having taken for granted that the temple was cleansed on the Tuesday, and not on the Monday, has preferred the order of St. Mark, and made some minor alterations in the position of these events. The foundation of his reasoning is removed by the arguments of Pilkington, which are inserted in the note to section 3, (Note 4, p. 141-2.)

In Matt. xxi. 13. when our Saviour drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple, he said to them, "It is written, 'my house shall be called a house (not the house) of prayer,' but ye have made it a den of thieves;" or, if it be read with an interrogation, "And have ye made it a den of thieves?" Ἐπεὶ δὲ αὐτὸν ἐποιήσατε ΣΗΛΑΙΟΝ Αἱστῶν; then the indignation will be increased, from the opposition between "God" and "ye." The same is related by Mark xi. 17. with the same two words, σπήλαιον ληστῶν, and so by Luke xix. 46. It may be asked, why the temple should be said by our Saviour to be made σπήλαιον ληστῶν, a cave of robbers; was it because there were some who bought and sold in it? or because the money-changers, or those who sold doves, sat there? None of those persons could be called λησταί, latrones, or public robbers: nor did their business lie in σπήλαια, speluncæ, dens or caves, so as to cause the temple, in which they were, to be called σπήλαιον. St. John, however, in his account of this matter, mentions a circumstance, without the knowledge of which, the reason of this expression, σπήλαιον ληστῶν, in the other three Evangelists, and in Jer. vii. 11. whence it is taken, could not have been understood, and very probably that is the reason why it is mentioned by him, chap. ii. 14, 15. "and (Jesus) found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep, (ΒΟΑΣ καὶ ΠΡΟΒΑΤΑ), and doves, and when he had made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep, and the oxen." Now it is well known to those who are moderately versed in antiquity, that the λησταί were wont to bring into their σπήλαια, or caves in the rocks, the oxen and sheep which they had stolen. Such an one was Cacus in Virgil, Æneid. viii. 193. who stole Hercules' oxen, who is called by Propertius, iv. 10. "metuendo Raptor ab antro," i. e. ληστής ἀπὸ σπηλαίου. Hence σπήλαιον ληστῶν in Heliodorus Æthiopic, v. 2. See Plutarch in Sertor. p. 576; and Josephus often in Bello Judaico, and in Antiq. xiv. xv. p. 651. ed. Huds. where he makes mention of ληστῶν τινῶν ἐν σπηλαιοῖς κατοικοῦντων. So that our Saviour had just reason to resent their profanation of his Father's house; as if he had said,—God hath declared in the Scriptures, my temple shall be a place of prayer, have ye (supposing it to be read with an interrogation) the boldness to convert it to the use which robbers make of their caves, and to turn it into a receptacle and stall for oxen and sheep? But nobody, I imagine, could have known the meaning and propriety of the words σπήλαιον and ληστῶν, if St. John had not informed us that oxen and sheep were brought into the temple to be sold; whereby the prophecy of Jer. vii. 11. Μὴ σπύλαιον λησιῶν ὁ οἶκος μὲ (to which our Saviour alludes) was fulfilled; for the temple could not have been called σπύλαιον λησιῶν, had not oxen and sheep been brought into it. See Bowyer.

"Hic spelunca fuit vasto submota recessu," &c.

NOTE 10.—PART VI.

הרא עוקר הרים was the epithet attached by the Jews to any of their learned or eminent men, who excelled in explaining the difficulties of Scripture^g.

Peter was told, if he had faith he should be able to remove mountains, &c. It is difficult to perceive the immediate connexion between the surprise of Peter and the exhortation of our Lord. It may possibly refer to the power which was afterwards given to the apostles to interpret the Scriptures in their spiritual sense, and to change the religion of the world. Such is the supposition of Witsius, that St. Peter understood that Christ, by the withering away of the fig tree, intended to signify the destruction of the Jewish Church; and that Christ alluded, in Mark xi. 23. to that apostle becoming the means of throwing the mountain (the temple) into the sea (the world): that is, that St. Peter should be chosen to open the doors of the Church to the Gentile world^h.

NOTE 12.—PART VI.

BISHOP WARBURTON endeavoured to show that the doctrine of the resurrection could not be proved from the Law of Moses; he omitted, in this paradoxical attempt, to confute the argument which may be derived from the traditional interpretation of their Scriptures, by the Jews. The Sadducees, like sects in all Churches, became a party, by rejecting the common faith of their countrymen, and by affecting a singularity of opinion. The Jews were accustomed to censure all who denied that the resurrection could be proved from the Law: "Hi sunt qui partem non habent in seculo futuro; qui dicunt, Legem non esse de cælo, תחית אין et resurrectionem non probari posse ex legeⁱ".

The Sadducees asked the question that follows, for the purpose of ridiculing the doctrine of the resurrection. In our Lord's answer, he not only rectified their opinions, but so explained the doctrine, as to overthrow the erroneous decision of the Pharisees on the same point, who had decided that if two brothers married one woman, she should be restored at the resurrection to the elder, or to him to whom she had been first married^j.

NOTE 13.—PART VI.

THAT the expected Messiah should be the son of David was a thing well known among the Jews, and universally acknowledged, see John vii. 42.; and is a most powerful proof against them that the Messiah is come. Their families are now so perfectly confounded, that they cannot trace back their genealogies with any degree of certainty: nor have they been capable of ascertaining the different families of their tribes, for more than sixteen hundred years. Why then should the Spirit of prophecy assert so often, and in such express terms, that Jesus was to come from the family of David, if he were to make his appearance when the public registers were all demolished? Is it not evident that God designed that the Messiah should come at a time when the public genealogies might be inspected, to prove that it was He who was prophesied of, and that no other was to be expected? The Evangelists, Matthew and Luke, were so fully convinced of the conclusiveness of this proof, that they appealed to the public registers; and thus proved to the Jews, from their own records, that Jesus was born of the family mentioned by the prophets. Nor do we find that a Scribe, Pharisee, or any other, ever attempted to invalidate this proof, though it would have essentially served their cause, could they have done it. But, as this has not been done, we may fairly conclude it was impossible to do it. Clarke in loc.

point of offering Himself a willing victim, reproached the Pharisees in the strongest terms, in the presence of all the people, for their shameful pride and hypocrisy, and for their wilful misapprehension of the spirit and intent of the Law of Moses. In this passage he seems particularly to allude to the custom prevalent among the more ostentatious of them, but condemned by others, of covering their head and eyes, lest they should look even upon the wickedness of the world, upon wicked men, or upon any thing which might incite them to evil. In consequence of this practice, they would sometimes strike against a wall, and cover themselves with blood. The talmudist who describes it, "ולא לשם שמים אלא לרמות בני אדם: eos hoc non fecisse ad gloriam Dei, sed ut homines deciperent. Vides (Schoetgen adds) ergo Judæos ἀποστατάζοντας, et veritatem verborum servatoris etiam inimicorum ipsius testimonio comprobata^k." It must, however, be remembered, that the Pharisees did but disguise the traditional truth received from their ancestors. Bishop Blomfield has admirably discussed this subject with great skill and learning. His conclusions may be expressed in that of Schoetgen.

"Quamvis vero Christus Phariseos tantopere refutat, non tamen existimandum est, ipsum omnes Judæorum doctrinas absolute rejecisse. Credibile quippe est, in antiquiore Judæorum Ecclesia circa et post Esræ tempora multa viguisse veritatis antiquæ ac nondum depravatæ vestigia. Veritatis, inquam, illiusque tum quod ad dogmata, tum quod ad mores spectat, consideratæ. Quæcunque ergo cum æconomia novâ et perfectione, quam a nobis Christus requirit, conveniebant, illa omnia retinuit. Unde non mirum, multa a Lightfoot et nobis ex Pandectis Judæorum adferri potuisse, quæ cum doctrinâ Salvatoris omnino conveniunt. NOTE 15.—PART VI.

WHEN a Gentile was converted to Judaism, he was said to have come החת כנפי השכינה, "under the wings of the Shechinah." In using this expression, therefore, our Lord again asserted his Divinity, and reminded the Jews of the doctrine he had before taught Nicodemus, that the people of Israel themselves were required to enter into his kingdom as new creatures, as proselytes to a New Dispensation.—See many instances in Schoetgen. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 208.

appears to me to be too refined and hypercritical, and censures unjustly the translation in the authorized version. He observes, "the word in the original is ὄρνις, which is generic; and surely more applicable to that noblest of birds, the eagle and his brood, than to the 'hen and chickens' of the English Bible." And he supposes that our Lord, "as the tutelar God of Israel, alludes to his former comparison, in the divine ode of the parent eagle, training his young brood, after he had brought them on eagles' wings to himself, to Mount Sinai^l." This learned writer, however, has not taken into consideration, that the comparison of the hen and chickens was known from the earliest times to the Jews, and was frequent and familiar among them; and that this humble metaphor was much more suited to the genius and nature of the Christian religion. When the tribes of Israel, under the guidance of the God of their fathers, departed from the wilderness, with the fierceness and fearlessness of youthful and impetuous warriors; when they seized upon their divinely-conquered provinces, and triumphed in the spoil of their enemies, they were as justly, as they were sublimely, compared to the young eagles soaring from their inaccessible heights at the call of their parent, and darting like lightning upon their ignoble prey. The comparison of our Lord is consistent with the nature and design of his more perfect Dispensation of reconciliation and love. His disciples, like their Master, were to be meek and lowly in spirit, and they were to be sheltered and nourished under the saving wings of their kind and merciful Protector.

THE ancient Jews were accustomed to call the temple הבית "the House," to show its great superiority to any other building. They called it likewise "Domus Sanctuarii," בית המקדש, and בית עולמים, "Domus æterna^m." And this house, or temple, which has now, for near eighteen centuries, continued desolate, in fulfilment of the prophecy in the next verse, shall be again rebuilt, and on the mountains of Israel the tribes shall again plant the olive and the vine, and offer up their praises and thanksgiving in a more glorious temple than that of Solomon. Glorious things shall be spoken of thee, thou city of God!

NOTE 18.—PART VI.

ON THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

IN the ancient times of the world, when all mankind began to apostatize from the faith of their fathers, it pleased the true God to select the illustrious ancestor of the now scattered sons of Israel, to maintain and perpetuate the true religion. Thus, for a long series of ages, the God of Nature demonstrated to the whole world that He was the God of the Church also, by the most stupendous miracles in favor of the chosen family of Abraham. For them the sea was divided, the tides of rivers were stopped, and the waters rose up in heaps. Fountains broke forth in the desert; decay approached not their garments, nor fatigue their limbs. The god of the idolaters stood still in the temple of heaven, and the moon paused in her course at the voice of a mortal. For them the fire descended from heaven. God himself reigned over them, enthroned in a pillar of fire at night, and a cloud by day. He was their King, He was their Deliverer. Whatever were their wanderings or deviations from his institutions; continued miracles and the Spirit of prophecy demonstrated the perpetual superintendence of a presiding Providence. The records, handed down from their fathers, have been faithfully preserved; and we are there assured that the same power which ordained these wonders for the family of Abraham in the olden times will never leave them nor forsake them:

“Can a woman forget her sucking child?”—

“Yea, they may forget,
Yet will I not forget thee!”

Is God unchangeable?

“Is he a man, that he should lie;
Or the son of man, that he should repent?”

To what condition are his people reduced? Nearly two thousand years have elapsed since their holy city was burnt with fire, and their nation scattered among their insulting Gentile brethren. To the intolerable sufferings of the sons of Israel during this long period, it is not necessary to make further allusion: they are stamped on every page of history. The Jews are still dispersed over every part of the known world. “Among us, but not of us,” they wander over the earth, banished from their holy city, from that city which was the joy of the whole earth, the residence of their prophets, the seat of the greatness of their kings, the home, and the capital, as they fondly believed, of their expected Messiah. From the contemplation of the former splendor and present depression of the house of Israel, I would request the modern Jew, who believes in the truth of those Sacred Books which have been transmitted to him from his illustrious ancestors, to propose to himself this question, Whether it is probable that the God of their fathers should thus consign the peculiarly favored family of Abraham to exile and misery the most intolerable, for so long a space of time; without some adequate cause? Is it probable that Jerusalem, the holy city, the city of the Great King, should be burnt with fire, and be trodden under foot of the Gentiles, and no warning voice be given, either by miracle, or by prophecy? When the Chaldeans polluted the sacred territory, and destroyed the carved work of the first temple, Ezekiel denounced the coming vengeance; and Jeremiah wept night and day for the transgression of the daughter of his people. When a greater and more lasting punishment was about to be inflicted, was it not to be expected that a prophet should arise among the people of God, to appeal to them, with the stern dignity of Ezekiel, or the tender yet majestic eloquence of Jeremiah? The books of the Christian Scriptures alone solve this difficulty, and assure them that this expectation was not unreasonable. They tell them that the Greatest of all prophets appealed to them; the Son of David addressed them, but they would none of his reproof; He foretold, in his very last prediction, with sympathizing energy, the fearful destruction that awaited their beloved city, and its unbelieving inhabitants; offering at the same time the means of salvation to the faithful few.

At this time the Jews, through all ranks and classes, were zealous for the Law of their fathers; so that they were willing to persecute every one, even of their own nation, who spoke but with indifference of its sanctions. Must not, then, some unacknowledged and proportionate crime have been committed, which could thus call down the just judgment of the God of their fathers? The Christian Scriptures alone can solve the mystery, and vindicate the unchangeableness of the God of Israel. Here is related the hitherto unrepented and proportionate crime. They rejected their long-promised Messiah; they crucified the Lord of life; they nailed him to the cross; they clamored for his blood. For this their holy city is left unto them desolate; for this they have been for so many centuries the scorn and outcasts of mankind. The fall of Jerusalem, the miseries of its inhabitants, and the evils that have so long pursued the sons of Israel, have been uniformly regarded as monuments of the truth of Christianity, and the most undeniable and solemn appeal to the Jewish nation. And as this prediction of our Lord is the most remarkable in the New Testament; so also are the destruction it predicts and the present condition of the Jews, without any exception whatever, the most calamitous, and the most striking, and, on all known principles of action, the most unlooked-for, unaccountable events in history.

Let us now consider the occasion on which the predictions were spoken. When our Saviour pronounced his pathetic lamentation over Jerusalem, he was in the temple, surrounded by the multitude and his own disciples; when he left it, "his disciples came to him for to show him the buildings of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts." They seemed, by this action, to infer that such a magnificent edifice could not be destroyed. But, as our Saviour had prophesied its total ruin and desolation, they were anxious to know more of these things, and, as soon as he had disengaged himself from the multitude, they came unto him privately, as he was sitting on the Mount of Olives; and entreated Him to tell them, when will these things be, and what the sign of his coming and (τῆς συντελείας τοῦ αἰῶνος) of the end of the world? From this question, it appears evident that the disciples viewed the coming of Christ and the end of the world or age, as events nearly related, and which would indisputably take place together: they had no idea of the dissolution of the Jewish polity, with its attendant miseries, as really signified by, or included in, either of these events. They imagined, perhaps, a great and awful change in the physical constitution of the universe, which they probably expected would occur within the term of their own lives; but they could have no conception of what was really meant by the expression which they employed, the coming of Christ. "From their very childhood," says a judicious and penetrating commentator, "they imagined that the temple would stand to the end of time: and this notion was so deeply fixed in their minds, that they regarded it as impossible for the temple to be overthrown, while the structure of the universe remained. As soon, therefore, as Christ told them that the temple would be destroyed, their thoughts instantly ran to the consummation of all things. Thus they connect with the destruction of the temple, as things inseparable, the coming of Christ and the end of the world." Rosenmüller observes on this passage, "it is certain that the phrase, ἡ συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, is understood in the New Testament (Matt. xiii. 39, 40. 49. xxviii. 20.) of the end of the world. The disciples spoke according to the opinions of their countrymen, and believed that the end of this world, and the beginning of a new one, would follow immediately upon the destruction of the temple."

The coming of Christ, and the end of the world, being therefore only different expressions to denote the same period as the destruction of Jerusalem, the purport of the disciples' question plainly is, When shall the destruction of Jerusalem be—and what shall be the signs of it? The latter part of the question is the first answered, and our Saviour foretells, in the clearest manner, the signs of his coming, and the destruction of Jerusalem. He then passes on to the other part of the question, concerning the time of his coming. History is the only certain interpreter of prophecy: and by a comparison of the two, we shall see with what stupendous accuracy the latter has been accomplished. Our blessed Saviour foretells, as the first sign of his coming, that there should be false prophets (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5.), adding (Luke xxi. 8.), "the time draweth near;" and we find, in a very short time, this prophecy began to be realized. Very soon after our Lord's decease, Simon Magus appeared, and bewitched the people of Samaria, &c. Acts viii. 9, 10. See also Acts xxi. 38.

Of the same stamp and character was also Dositheus, the Samaritan, who pretended that he was the Christ foretold by Moses.

About twelve years after the death of our Lord, when Cuspius Fadus was procurator of Judæa, arose an impostor of the name of Theudas, who said he was a prophet, and persuaded a great multitude to follow him with their best effects to the river Jordan, which he promised to divide for their passage; "and, saying these things," says Josephus, "he deceived many:" almost the very words of our Lord.

A few years afterwards, under the reign of Nero, while Felix was procurator of Judæa, impostors of this stamp were so frequent, that some were taken and killed almost every day. Jos. Ant. b. xx. c. 4. and 7. It was a just judgment for God to deliver up that people into the hands of false Christs, who had so wilfully rejected the true one.

The next signs given by our Lord are, "Wars and rumors of wars," &c. These may be seen in Josephus (b. xviii. c. 9. Wars, b. xi. c. 10.), especially as the rumors of wars, when Caligula ordered his statue to be set up in the temple of God, which the Jews having refused, had every reason to expect a war with the Romans; and were in such consternation on the occasion, that they even neglected to till the ground: but their fears were soon dissipated by the timely death of that emperor.

"Nation shall rise up against nation." This portended greater disturbances than those which took place under Caligula, in the latter times of Claudius, and in the reign of Nero. It foretold the dissension, insurrections, and mutual slaughter of the Jews, and those of other nations, who dwelt in the same cities together; as particularly at Cæsarea, where the Jews and Syrians contended about the right of the city, which ended in the total expulsion of the Jews, above 20,000 of whom were slain. The whole Jewish nation, being exasperated at this, flew to arms, and burnt and plundered the neighbouring cities and villages of the Syrians, making an immense slaughter of the people. The Syrians, in return, destroyed not a less number of the Jews. At Scythopolis they murdered upwards of 13,000; at Ascalon they killed 2500; at Ptolemais they slew 2000, and made many prisoners. The Tyrians also put many Jews to death, and imprisoned more: the people of Gadara did likewise; and all the other cities of Syria, in proportion as they hated or feared the Jews. At Alexandria the Jews and heathens fought, and 50,000 of the former were slain. The people of Damascus conspired against the Jews of that city, and assaulting them unarmed, killed 10,000 of them.

"Kingdom against kingdom." This portended the open wars of different tetrarchies and provinces against each other. That of Jews and Galileans against the Samaritans, for the murder of some Galileans going up to the feast of Jerusalem, while Cumanus was procurator. That of the whole nation of Jews against the Romans and Agrippa, and other allies of the Roman empire; which began when Gessius Florus was procurator; and that of the civil war in Italy, when Otho and Vitellius were contending for the empire. It is worthy of remark, that the Jews themselves say, "In the time of the Messiah, wars shall be stirred up in the world; nation shall rise against nation, and city against city."—Sohar Kadash. Again, Rab. Eleasar, the son of Abina, said, "When ye see kingdom rising against kingdom, then expect the immediate appearance of the Messiah."—Berashith Rabba, sect. 42.

"There shall be famines and pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places." And we find a famine foretold by Agabus (Acts xi. 28.), which is mentioned by Suetonius, Tacitus, and Eusebius, which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar; and was so severe at Jerusalem, that Josephus says (Ant. b. xx. c. 2.), many died for lack of food. Pestilences are the usual attendants of famines; as the scarcity and badness of provisions generally produce epidemic disorders. There were several earthquakes likewise in those times to which our Lord refers; particularly one at Crete, in the reign of Claudius; one at Smyrna, Miletus, Chios, and Samos; one at Rome, mentioned by Tacitus; and one at Laodicea, in the reign of Nero, in which the city was overthrown, as were likewise Hierapolis and Colosse; one at Campania, mentioned by Seneca; and one at Rome, in the reign of Galba, mentioned by Suetonius, in the life of that emperor. Add to all these a dreadful one in Judæa, mentioned by Josephus (Wars, b. iv. c. 4.), accompanied by a dreadful tempest, violent winds, vehement showers, and continual lightnings and thunders: which led many to believe that these things portended some uncommon calamity.

"That there shall be fearful sights and great signs from heaven" (Luke xxi. 11). Josephus, in his preface to the Jewish War, mentions, that a star hung over the city like a sword; and a comet continued a whole year. The people being assembled at the feast of Unleavened Bread, at the ninth hour of the night, a great light shone about the altar and the temple, and this continued for half an hour. The eastern gate of the temple, which was of solid brass, and could hardly be shut by twenty men, and was fastened by strong bars and bolts, was seen at the sixth hour of the night to open of its own accord! Before sunset there were seen, over all the country, chariots and armies fighting in the clouds, and besieging cities. At the feast of Pentecost, when the priests were going into the inner temple by night, to attend their service, they heard first a motion and noise, and then a voice as of a multitude, saying, "Let us depart hence." What Josephus reckons one of the most terrible signs of all was, that one Jesus, a country fellow, four years before the war began, and when the city was in peace and plenty, came to the feast of Tabernacles, and ran crying up and down the streets, day and night: "A voice from the East, a voice from the West! a voice from the four winds! a voice against Jerusalem and the temple! a voice against the bridegroom and the bride! and a voice against all the people!" Though the magistrates endeavoured, by stripes and tortures, to interrogate him, they could obtain no answer but the mournful cry of, "Woe, woe to Jerusalem!" and this he continued to do for several years together, going about the walls, and crying with a loud voice, "Woe, woe to the city, and to the people, and to the temple!" and, as he added, "Woe, woe to myself," a stone from some sling or engine struck him dead on the spot!

These were indeed fearful signs and wonders; and there is not a more credible historian than the one who relates them, who appeals to the testimony of those who saw and heard them. But an additional evidence is given to his relation by the Roman historian, Tacitus, who presents us with a summary account of the same occurrences; and as "the testimonies of Josephus and Tacitus confirm the predictions of Christ, so the predictions of Christ confirm the wonders recorded by these historians^o." But these were only the beginnings of sorrows (Matt. xxiv. 8.), and from the calamities of the nation in general, Christ passes to those of the Christians in particular (Matt. xxiv. 9. Mark xiii. 9.-11. Luke xxi. 13-15.) We need look no further than the Acts of the Apostles for a melancholy proof of the truth of their predictions. But although the followers of Christ's religion were persecuted beyond measure, it is a remarkable fact, and a signal act of Divine Providence, that none of the Christians perished in the destruction of Jerusalem. So literally was that assertion fulfilled, "There shall not a hair of your head perish." And, notwithstanding the persecutions and calamities of the Christians, it was prophesied, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." And accordingly we find from the writers of the history of the Church, that before the destruction of Jerusalem the Gospel was not only preached in the Lesser Asia, and Greece, and Italy, but as far northward as Scythia, as far southward as Ethiopia, as far eastward as Parthia and India, and as far westward as Spain and Britain. Agreeably to this, Eusebius^p informs us that the apostles preached the Gospel in all the world, and some of them (probably either St. Simon or St. Paul) passed beyond the ocean to the Britannic isles. Theodoret likewise affirms, that the apostles had induced every nation and kind of men to embrace the Gospel, among whom he reckons particularly the Britons; and St. Paul himself declares, the Gospel "is come into all the world, and preached to every creature under heaven;" and (in Rom. x. 18.) he elegantly applies to the lights of the Church these words of the Psalmist,—

"Their sound went into all the earth,
And their words unto the ends of the world."

And all this was fulfilled to convince every nation of the crying sin of the Jews, in crucifying the Lord of glory, and of the justice of God's judgment upon them. And then came the end, the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish polity, when the abomination of desolation stood in the holy place. The verses (15 and 16 of Matt. xxiv.) are explained by the parallel passage in Luke xxi. 20, 21. The Roman army is the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, chap. ix. and xi., and it is so called, from its ensigns and images, which were abominations to the Jews; and Josephus informs^q us, that after the city was taken, the Romans brought these ensigns into the temple, placed them over against the eastern gate, and there sacrificed to them.

"Then let them which be in Judæa flee into the mountains." This counsel was remembered, and wisely followed by the Christians afterwards. And we find it accordingly most providentially ordered, that Jerusalem should be encompassed with armies, and yet that the Christians should have favorable opportunities of making their escape. Josephus (sect. iv. p. 1102. edit. Hudson) tells us that Cestius Gallus, in the 12th year of Nero, if "he had been inclined to break through the walls of the city by force, would instantly have taken it, and put an end to the war;" but, contrary to the expectation of all, and without any just cause, he departed. Vespasian was deputed in his place, as governor of Syria, and to carry on the wars against the Jews; and when he had subdued all the country, and was preparing to besiege Jerusalem, the death of Nero, and soon afterwards that of Galba, compelled him, from the disturbances and civil wars that ensued in his own country, to defer for some time his plan of operations against Jerusalem. These apparently incidental delays enabled the Christians to provide for their safety; and Eusebius and Epiphanius inform us, that all who believed in Christ left Jerusalem, and fled to Perea, and other places beyond the river Jordan. Josephus also remarks, after the retreat of Cestius Gallus, "Many of the illustrious Jews departed from the city, as from a sinking ship." After this period, when Vespasian was confirmed in the empire, Titus surrounded the city with a wall, thirty-nine furlongs in dimensions, strengthened with thirteen forts, so that, Josephus says, "with all means of escaping, all hope of safety was cut off from the remaining Jews." So marvellously did our blessed Saviour insure, by his prophecy, deliverance to those who believed on him, and had faith in his promises: and so always "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations," 2 Pet. ii. 9. Our Saviour makes use of the expressions in Mark xiii. 15. and Matt. xxiv. 18. to signify that the departure of the Christians must be as sudden and hasty as Lot's from the destruction of Sodom.

^q Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 6. sect. 3. ed. Hudson.

“For then shall be great tribulation.” No history can furnish us with a parallel to the calamities and miseries of the Jews: rapine, murder, famine, and pestilence within; fire and sword, and all the horrors of war without. Our Lord wept at the foresight of these calamities; and it is almost impossible for any humane person to read the relation of them in Josephus without weeping also. St. Luke, chap. xxi. 22., calls these the days of vengeance, that all things which were written might be fulfilled. These were the days in which all the calamities predicted by Moses, Joel, Daniel, and other prophets, as well as those foretold by our Saviour, met in one common centre, and were fulfilled in the most terrible manner on that generation. These were the days of vengeance in another sense, as if God’s judgments had certain periods and revolutions; for it is remarkable, that the temple was burnt by the Romans in the same month, and on the same day of the month, on which it had been burned by the Babylonians. See Josephus, War, b. vi. c. 4. Josephus computes the number of those who perished in the siege at eleven hundred thousand, besides those who were slain in other places, War, b. vi. c. 9; and if the Romans had gone on destroying in this manner, the whole nation of the Jews would in a short time have been utterly extirpated; but, for the sake of the elect (the Jews), that they might not be entirely destroyed, and, for the sake of the Christians particularly, the days were shortened.

Josephus relates, that the Jews themselves first set fire to the porticos of the temple, and then the Romans; when one of the soldiers, neither waiting for the word of command, nor fearing to perpetrate such an action, but hurried on by a divine impulse, threw a burning brand in at the golden window, and thereby set fire to the buildings of the temple itself. Yet Titus was still for preserving the holy place, but the anger and hatred of his soldiers against the Jews overcame their reverence for their general; a soldier in the dark set fire to the doors, and thus, as Josephus says, “the temple was burnt, contrary to the will of Cæsar.” The Romans burnt the most extreme parts of the city, and dug up the foundations of the walls, reserving only three towers, and a part of the wall, as a memorial of their own valor, and for the better encampment of the soldiers. Afterwards, we read in the Jewish Talmud, and in Maimonides, that Terentius Rufus, who was left to command the army, did with a ploughshare tear up the foundation of the temple; thereby signally fulfilling the prophecy of Micah, iii. 12. Eusebius too affirms, that it was ploughed up by the Romans, and that he saw it lying in ruins. So literally were our Saviour’s words accomplished, in the ruin and desolation of the city and of the temple. Josephus further asserts, that there was no part of Judæa which did not partake of the calamities of the capital city. The Romans pursued, and took, and slew the Jews every where, fulfilling again that prediction, “Where-soever the carcass is (the Jewish nation, morally and judicially dead), there will the eagles (the Romans, whose ensign was an eagle) be gathered together.”

Jerusalem also, according to the prediction of our Lord, was to be trodden down by the Gentiles. Accordingly it has never since been in the possession of the Jews. It was first in subjection to the Romans, afterwards to the Saracens, then to the Franks, next to the Mamelukes, and now to the Turks. Thus has the prophecy of Christ been most literally and terribly fulfilled, on a people who are still preserved, as continued monuments of the truth of our Lord’s prediction, and of the truth of the Christian religion^r.

We have hitherto considered this passage as relating to the destruction of Jerusalem only, which was its primary application; but, like every other prophecy, it had its literal and typical signification. Our Saviour loses sight, as it were, of his former subject, in the contemplation of the end of the world, and the general judgment. “It appears,” says Bishop Newton, “next to impossible, that any man should duly consider these prophecies, and their exact completion, and, if he is a believer, not be confirmed in his faith, or if he is an infidel, not be converted.” As soon as the Gospel is preached to every creature now under heaven, and the fulness of the Gentiles be accomplished, then shall the Son of Man come in the clouds of heaven, to take vengeance on his enemies; and with great power and glory bring deliverance, as in the days of the destruction of Jerusalem to those who believe in Him, and trust in his promises for salvation and mercy^s.

EVEN upon the Unitarian hypothesis, our Lord was the Greatest of prophets; and as Daniel had been able to fix the time of the first advent, it must naturally excite surprise, that the Messiah did not know the time of his own second advent. The best mode of resolving the difficulty appears to me to be that which makes οἷδεν equivalent to the causative of יָרַע; in which case the verse may be thus rendered: "But the hour of the second advent, neither man, nor angels, nor I the Messiah, have made known to the world: my Father only shall reveal it, by the suddenness of that day of judgment, in which He has appointed the Son to manifest himself in the glory of the Father."

NOTE 20.—PART VI.

IN this and the two following parables, our Saviour insists upon his unexpected and sudden judgment. It is here described as a thief ready to steal into the house, if not constantly watched. This comparison is frequent; Luke xii. 39. 2 Pet. iii. 10. Rev. iii. 3. and xvi. 15. As these parables were at the time exclusively addressed to the disciples, they must be supposed to refer primarily to their ministry. They are, however, equally applicable to all Christians—"What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch!" Mark xiii. 37. Luke xii. 41.

NOTE 21.—PART VI.

THIS is one of the passages on which many excellent men have endeavoured to establish the doctrine of a personal election to eternal life: whereas the expression is a mere Hebraism. The Jews believed that there was a temple in heaven prepared for their nation before the foundation of the world; and in allusion to this received opinion, this expression is here used, ἡτοιμασμένην, "Heb. מְתוּקָן—Tanehuma, fol. 61. 4. Templum superius, sc. cæleste, :העולם שהוא מְתוּקָן עַד שֶׁלֹא הָיוּ עוֹלָם quod præparatum erat, antequam mundus crearetur." The whole parable abounds with Hebraisms.—Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 219.

NOTE 22.—PART VI.

THE priests in this instance feared the people, and therefore delivered our Lord to the Roman governor, whose power and authority would prevent the possibility of a rescue. Such is the opinion of Schoetgen, who quotes Sanhedrin, fol. 89. 1. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 224.

NOTE 23.—PART VI.

THE question concerning the anointing at Bethany has been already discussed. I have placed the account of Judas going to the chief priests to betray Christ in this section, on the authority of Michaelis and Doddridge, who suppose that several days elapsed between the anointing at Bethany, and Judas' betrayal. Bishop Marsh, on the contrary, supposes that the assembling of the chief priests, the anointing at Bethany, and the betrayal by Judas, were simultaneous, or, more properly, continuous actions.

"That the rebuke," he observes, "which Judas Iscariot received from Christ at the anointing in Bethany, determined him in his resolution to betray his Master; that Christ's rebuke, therefore, and Judas's revenge were cause and effect, and that the account of the one is very properly joined by St. Matthew (and also by St. Mark) to the account of the other, I readily admit with Michaelis, in opposition to Dr. Priestley, who says, in his Observations on the Harmony of the Evangelists, p. 100, that the verses of Matt. xxvi. 6-13, which contains an account of the anointing, 'stand very awkwardly in their present situation.' But I cannot agree with him in the opinion, that several days elapsed between the anointing at Bethany, and Judas going to the assembly of the chief priests with an offer to betray Christ; and consequently that the account of the anointing at Bethany belongs to Matt. xxi. according to the order of time. For whoever reads in connection Matt. xxvi. 1-11. must perceive that these three facts, 1st, Assembling the chief priests and elders at the house of Caiaphas; 2dly, The anointing of Christ at Bethany; and 3dly, Judas's departure from Bethany, to go to the assembly of the chief priests, are represented by the Evangelists as facts immediately connected one with another; and not as facts which were separated from each other by the intervention of all those transactions, which had been recorded in several preceding chapters. St. Matthew having mentioned, in ver. 2, that 'after two days was the Passover,' immediately adds, in ver. 3, τότε συνήχθησαν οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς, &c. &c. And St. Mark says (xiv. 1.), Ἦν δὲ τὸ πάσχα καὶ τὰ ἄζυμα μετὰ δύο ἡμέρας· καὶ ἐξήτουν οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς, &c. &c. Both St. Matthew and St. Mark, therefore, represent the assembly of the chief priests as held on the third day before the Passover; and though Michaelis will not allow any determinate meaning to τότε in St. Matthew's account, we cannot explain away what is said by St. Mark. St. Matthew then proceeds, in ver. 6, Τοῦ δὲ Ἰησοῦ γενομένου ἐν Βηθανίᾳ, ἐν οὖλῳ Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ, &c. &c. And St. Mark, ver. 3, Καὶ ὄντος αὐτοῦ ἐν Βηθανίᾳ, ἐν τῇ οὖλῳ Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ, &c. &c. They then relate the anointing, with Christ's conversation on it, which being ended, St. Matthew continues, in ver. 14, Τότε πορεύθει· εἰς τὴν δόδεκα, ὁ λεγόμενος Ἰούδας Ἰσχαριώτης, πρὸς τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς, εἶπε· κ. τ. λ. And in St. Mark, in ver. 10. Καὶ ὁ Ἰούδας ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης, εἷς τῶν δώδεκα, ἀπῆλθε πρὸς τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς, κ. τ. λ. Then again it is evident that both St. Matthew and St. Mark represent Judas as going immediately from the anointing at Bethany (a village not more than two miles from Jerusalem) to the assembly of the chief priests and elders, which was held during the anointing, and which did not break up before the arrival of Judas."—Michaelis, vol. iii. part iv. p. 24.

In reply to this argument, I would suggest the total absence of proof from the words of St. Matthew, that the Evangelist intended, as the bishop supposes, to represent these events as continuous. Three circumstances are recorded; the meeting of the priests, the anointing, and the betrayal; and the point in dispute must be decided by the meaning of the words which are thought to connect them as three several events which took place at the same time. The two first verses of Matt. xxvi. ought to have concluded the preceding chapter. The expression which ends ver. 2, is the sentence which completed our Saviour's predictions concerning Jerusalem, and the illustrative parables which followed them. From narrating the discourse of our Lord, the Evangelist proceeds to his actions, using the word τότε, a word of very indefinite signification, which may not improperly be translated, "about that time." He relates the fact, that about the time when our Lord finished his predictions, the chief priests, συνήχθησαν, "were assembled together." He then, somewhat abruptly, proceeds to give an account of the cause of our Saviour's betrayal by Judas to this assembly of the priests, which he imputes to our Lord's reproof of his apostle's disguised covetousness. In ver. 14, the Evangelist introduces the effect of this reproof by the same word τότε, and it seems intended to imply, not that Judas went that moment to the priests, but that he went about that time, or as soon as possible, to the council of the chief priests; and by introducing the consequence of our Lord's reproof thus abruptly, St. Matthew seems to hint that the assembly of priests, to whom Judas applied, was now sitting at the very time when our Lord had finished his predictions. Bishop Barrington, apud Bowyer, would insert Matt. xxvi. 6–13. as a parenthesis.

But Bishop Marsh observes, with reference to the argument from the word τότε, that even if this be insufficient to prove that Michaelis is mistaken, yet we cannot explain away what is said by St. Mark—ἦν δὲ τὸ πάσχα καὶ τὰ ἄρτια μετὰ δύο ἡμέρας, &c. who, as well as St. Matthew, represents the assembly of priests as meeting three days before the Passover. In reply to which it may be answered, that it is acknowledged a meeting of the priests was then held; but the question is whether the anointing took place at that time: and here we are again brought to the word τότε, Matt. xxvi. 14., and to an expression in St. Mark, xiv. 10., which does not even allude to the exact period at which the betrayal took place. Ἰούδας—ἀπῆλθε πρὸς τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς, &c. The Evangelist appears to relate the reproof at Bethany as the cause of the treason of Judas, without referring to the time that this offence should be committed.

Τότε—non proprie videtur adverbium esse, sed accusativas neutrius generis, elliptice positus, ut plene dicatur περὶ τότε τὸ μέρος χρόνου, id quod colligi potest ex loco Lysiae, Orat. vi. cap. 2. οὐ θαυμαστόν, εἰ τότε τὰς μοῖρας ἐξέκοπτον, ἐν ᾧ οὐδὲ τὰ ἡμέτερα αὐτῶν φυλάττειν ἐδυνάμεθα. It is true it is generally used in the New Testament adverbially, but as frequently in its general, as it is in its more definite signification. The word occurs one hundred and fifty-six times in the New Testament; and if we refer to any passages taken in their consecutive order, we shall find that this preceding remark is correct. Thus we meet it in Matt. ii. 7, 16, 17, and iii. 5. In the two first and last of these it is used in the more general sense, and many would interpret the third passage in the same way; and so it must be interpreted in the great majority of the passages in which it occurs. If we refer to the Septuagint, which is generally supposed to use the Greek words, in precisely the same sense as the New Testament, we shall find that the remark of Michaelis is amply justified. Thus the Septuagint render the Hebrew בעת ההיא, Isaiah xx. 2. by the word τότε.

NOTE 24.—PART VI.

ON THE QUESTION, WHETHER OUR LORD ATE THE PASSOVER IMMEDIATELY BEFORE THE INSTITUTION OF THE EUCHARIST?

BEFORE we enter upon the discussion of the difficult question, Whether our Lord ate the last Passover with his disciples, before the institution of the holy Eucharist, it will be useful to consider the manner in which the Jews were accustomed to commemorate their deliverance from Egypt, by the celebration of the Passover. Lightfoot has collected a variety of passages from Maimonides and the Jewish writers, describing the manner in which this feast was observed. In reference to the reclining attitude in which the Evangelists represent our Lord at the last supper, he has collected, among others, the following illustrative passages:—אפילו עני שבִּישְׂרָאֵל לֹא יֹאכֵל אפילו עני Pesach, cap. x. hal. 1. And again, R. Levi saith, "It is the manner of slaves to eat standing; but now let them eat lying along, that it may be known that they are gone out of bondage to liberty.”—“We are obliged,” says Maimonides, “to lie down when we eat, that we may eat after the manner of kings and nobles.”

Lightfoot then proceeds to give an account of the manner in which the paschal supper was conducted. It began, 1st, With presenting a cup of wine mingled with water to each assembled guest, over which the master of the family, or some one deputed for that purpose, pronounces a benediction:—“Blessed be He that created the fruit of the vine;” and then he repeats the consecration of the day; that is, they give thanks, and drink up the wine. 2dly, They washed their hands, after which the table was crowned with two cakes of unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and the paschal lamb roasted whole; which three things were appointed by the Law. To these were added the remains of the Chagigah, or peace offerings of the preceding day, and other meats, with the sour sauce, called חרוסת or charoseth, which was thick, and intended to represent the bricks their ancestors made in Egypt. Then the person presiding takes a small piece of lettuce, which he eats, and those with him, blessing God for the fruits of the earth; and afterwards a piece of unleavened bread, dipped in the bitter herbs. 3dly, All the dishes were removed from the table, and the children were instructed in the nature and intention of the feast, the signification of the bitter herbs, unleavened bread, &c. generally from Exod. xii. 26, &c. and Deut. xxvi. 5–11.; and this explanation was called the Hagannah, 1 Cor. xi. 36. 4thly, After this preparation the supper was again set before them, when each person lifted up in his hands, first the bitter herbs, and then the unleavened bread, and joined in declaring that they ate them in commemoration of the bondage, and great deliverance of their fathers in Egypt; and ended by calling on all to sing praises to God, in the 113th to the 114th Psalm, and having blessed the Lord, they drank off the second cup. 5thly, The hands are again washed, and the master of the house, or the officiating person, takes the two unleavened cakes, breaks one, and places that which is broken on the other. He then blesses it; and putting some bread and bitter herbs together, they dip them in the same sauce, and again bless God. After the same manner they first give thanks over the flesh of the Chagigah of the fourteenth day, and partake of it; and then over the lamb, and eat of it: after which they may lengthen out the supper, and partake of what they please, taking care only to conclude with a small piece of the paschal lamb; as much, at least, as an olive: after which they were not allowed to take any more food that night. 6thly, They again wash their hands, and the master of the family says the blessing of the meat, over the third cup of wine, which they then drank; and this cup was commonly called the cup of blessing, אכסא דברכה, to which allusion is made 1 Cor. x. 16. A fourth cup of wine is mingled, over which they continue the Hallel (or hymn of five Psalms), beginning where they left off, at the 115th to the 118th Psalm; and finish with a prayer. After the destruction of Jerusalem, a small piece of unleavened bread was substituted as the Aphicomen, or last morsel, instead of the paschal lamb; for which purpose a piece of the broken cake was reserved under a napkin; probably because there was no temple in which the appointed victim could be sacrificed. It is impossible for us now to ascertain, whether our Saviour made use of this fourth cup or not; we are only informed, by the Evangelists, that our Lord and his disciples sang a hymn (Matt. xxvi. 30. Mark xiv. 26.) before they went to the Mount of Olives.

We are now brought to the consideration of that most difficult and perplexing question, “Whether our Lord ate of this Passover with his disciples on the evening preceding his crucifixion.” The Evangelists, in relating this part of our Saviour’s life, use some expressions which at first sight appear contradictory to each other. St. John, for instance, seems to differ from the other three, as to the time that the Jews partook of the Passover, and supposes that they did not eat it on the same evening as our Saviour and his disciples; while they all agree that the night of the day in which Christ ate the Passover (or what is called the Passover) was Thursday. Our Lord is further said to command his disciples to prepare for eating the Passover, and that he had earnestly desired to eat this Passover with them. Yet we read, that on the day after that on which our Lord and his disciples had thus celebrated the Passover, the Jews refused to go into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover. Now it was appointed by the Law, that all the people should eat of the Passover on the same day. There appears therefore to be some contradiction or difficulty which requires explanation; and the particular attention of the harmonizers and commentators has been consequently directed to this point.

The latest theologians who have devoted the greatest attention to this subject are Dr. Clarke, in his Treatise on the Eucharist, and Mr. Benson, in his work On the Chronology of the Life of our Lord. They have so thoroughly investigated the subject, that little more will be necessary than to take advantage of their labors.

Four opinions have been advanced by various theologians, the last of which seems to be most consistent with the accounts of the Evangelists, and to reconcile all the difficulties and apparent contradictions.

The first is, that Christ did not eat the Passover on the last year of his ministry.

The second, that he did eat it that year, and at the same time with the Jews.

The third, that he did eat a passover; but one of his own institution, very different from that eaten by the Jews.

The fourth, that he did eat the Passover that year, but not at the same time with the Jews.

The arguments in support of these four different opinions, are clearly and briefly summed up by Dr. A. Clarke, in his Introduction to his Discourse on the Eucharist. In favor of the first opinion, That Christ did not eat the Passover, it is observed, "The Jews ate their Passover on the next day."

St. John does not call the supper which Christ ate with his disciples a Passover supper, but, on the contrary, says it was before the feast of the Passover—πρὸ τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα, by which Dr. Wall thinks he means the day before the Passover, or, as we should say, the Passover eve.

"Now this was the same night and same supper," says Dr. Wall, "which the three do call 'the Passover,' and 'Christ's eating the Passover;' I mean, it was the night on which Christ was (a few hours after supper) apprehended, as is plain by the last verse of that thirteenth chapter. But the next day (Friday on which Christ was crucified) St. John makes to be the Passover day. He says (chap. xviii. 28.), the Jews would not go into the judgment-hall on Friday morning, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover, viz. that evening. And chap. xix. 14., speaking of Friday noon, he says, it was the preparation of the Passover. Upon the whole, John speaks not of eating the Passover at all; nor indeed do the three speak of his eating any lamb. Among all the expressions which they use, of 'making ready the Passover;' 'prepare for Me to eat the Passover;' 'with desire have I desired to eat this Passover with you,' &c. there is no mention of any lamb carried to the temple to be slain by the Levites, and then brought to the house and roasted; there is no mention of any food at the supper besides bread and wine; perhaps there might be some bitter herbs. So that this seems to have been a commemorative supper, used by our Saviour instead of the proper paschal supper, the eating of a lamb, which should have been the next night; but that He himself was to be sacrificed before that time would come. And the difference between St. John and the others is only a difference in words and in the names of things. They call that the Passover which Christ used instead of it. If you say, why then does Mark, xiv. 12., call Thursday the first day of unleavened bread, when the Passover must be killed? we must note their day (or ρῆχθήμερον) was from evening to evening. This Thursday evening was the beginning of that natural day of twenty-four hours, towards the end of which the lamb was to be killed; so it is proper, in the Jews' way of calling days, to call it that day."

The second opinion is, That he did eat the Passover that year, and at the same time with the Jews.

The late Dr. Newcome, archbishop of Armagh, is of a very different opinion from Dr. Wall; and, from a careful collation of the passages in the Evangelists, concludes, "that our Lord did not anticipate this feast, but partook of it with the Jews on the usual and national day."

"It appears," says he, "from the Gospel history (see Mark xv. 42., and xvi. 9.), that our Lord was crucified on Friday. But the night before his crucifixion, on which he was betrayed (1 Cor. xi. 23.), he kept the Passover, and that he kept it at the legal time is thus determined. In Matt. xxvi. 2., and in Mark xiv. 1., it is said that the Passover, καὶ τὰ ἄζυμα, were after two days; or on the day following that on which Jesus foretold his sufferings and resurrection to his disciples, Matt. xvi. 21, &c. Mark viii. 31, &c. and Luke ix. 22, &c.

"The Evangelists, proceeding regularly in their history (Matt. xxvi. 17.), and in the parallel places (Mark xiv. 12, &c. Luke xxii. 7, &c.), mention is made of this day, and it is called the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the Passover, i. e. by general custom: and St. Luke says, that the day came, which, ver. 1, was approaching, when the Passover must be killed; i. e. by the Law of Moses. The 14th of Nisan is therefore meant; which is called πρωτὴ ἄζυμων, the first of unleavened bread.

"During the week, therefore, of our Lord's passion, the Law of Moses required that the Passover should be slain on Thursday afternoon; but our Lord partook of it on the night immediately succeeding; Matt. xxvi. 19, 20.; and the parallel places, Luke xxii. 14, 15.; and therefore he partook of it at the legal time.

"Mark xiv. 12. Luke xxii. 7. equally prove that the Jews kept the Passover at the same time with Jesus."

To the objection (John xviii. 22.), That the Jews avoided defilement that they might eat the Passover, the bishop answers, "That they meant the paschal sacrifices offered for seven days; and they spoke particularly in reference to the 15th of Nisan, which was a day of holy convocation."

To the objection taken from John xix. 14., That the day on which our Lord was crucified, is called παρασκευὴ τοῦ Πάσχα, the preparation of the Passover, he replies, "That in Mark

xv. 42, παράσχευή, preparation, is the same as προσάββαιον, the day before the Sabbath; and so in Luke xxiii. 54.; therefore by παράσχευή τοῦ Πάσχα, we may understand the preparation before that Sabbath which happened during the paschal festival." This is the substance of Archbishop Newcome's reasoning, in his Harmony and Notes. See the latter, p. 42-45.

To this it is answered, That the opinion which states that our Lord ate the Passover the same day and hour with the Jews seems scarcely supportable. If he ate it the same hour in which the Jews ate theirs, he certainly could not have died that day, as they ate the Passover on Friday, about six o'clock in the evening; if he did not, he must have been crucified on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, and could not have risen again on the first day of the week, as all the Evangelists testify, but on the second, or Monday, which I suppose few will attempt to support. On this, and other considerations, I think this point should be given up. But others argue thus:—

"That Christ intended to eat a Passover with his disciples on this occasion, and that he intensely desired it too, we have the fullest proof from the three first Evangelists. See Matt. xxvi. 1-3. 17-20. Mark xiv. 12-16. Luke xxii. 7-18. And that he actually did eat one with them must appear most evidently to those who shall carefully collate the preceding Scriptures, and especially what St. Luke says, chap. xxii. 7-18.; for when Peter and John had received their Lord's command to go and prepare the Passover, it is said, ver. 13., 'they went and found as he had said unto them; and they made ready the Passover,' i. e. got a lamb, and prepared it for the purpose, according to the Law. Ver. 14. 'And when the hour was come (to eat it) he sat down, ἀνέπεσε, and the twelve apostles with him.' Ver. 15. 'And he said unto them, With desire have I desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer;' where it is to be noted, that they had now sat down to eat that Passover which had been before prepared, and that every word which is spoken is peculiarly proper to the occasion. 'With desire (says our Lord) have I desired, τοῦτο τὸ Πάσχα φαγεῖν, to eat this very Passover;' not ἐσθίειν τὸ Πάσχα, to eat the Passover, or something commemorative of it, but τοῦτο τὸ Πάσχα, 'this very Passover:' and it is no mean proof that they were then in the act of eating the flesh of the paschal lamb, from the use of the verb φαγεῖν, which is most proper to the eating of flesh; as ἐσθίειν signifies 'eating in general,' or 'eating bread, pulse,' &c. The same word, in reference to the same act of eating the Passover, not to the bread and wine of the holy supper, is used, ver. 16. 'For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, οὐ μὴ φάγω ἔξ αὐτοῦ, I will not eat of him or it,' viz. the paschal lamb, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God; i. e.

this shall be the last Passover I shall celebrate on earth, as I am now about to suffer, and the kingdom of God, the plenitude of the Gospel Dispensation, shall immediately take place.' And then, according to this Evangelist, having finished the eating of the paschal lamb, he instituted the bread of the Holy Supper, ver. 19., and afterwards the cup, ver. 20., though he and they had partaken of the cup of blessing (usual on such occasions) with the paschal lamb immediately before; see verse 17. Whoever carefully considers the whole of this account, must be convinced that, whatever may come of the question concerning the time of eating the Passover, that our Lord did actually eat one with his disciples before he suffered."

The third opinion which we have to examine is this—Our Lord did eat a Passover of his own instituting, but widely differing from that eaten by the Jews.

Mr. Toinard, in his Greek Harmony of the Gospels, strongly contends that our Lord did not eat what is commonly called the Passover this year, but another of a mystical kind. His chief arguments are the following:—

It is indubitably evident, from the text of St. John, that the night on the beginning of which our Lord supped with his disciples, and instituted the holy sacrament, was not that on which the Jews celebrated the Passover; but the preceding evening, on which the Passover could not be legally offered. The conclusion is evident from the following passages. John xiii. 1. "Now before the feast of the Passover, when Jesus knew," &c. Ver. 2. "And supper (not the paschal, but an ordinary supper) being ended," &c. Ver. 27. "That thou doest, do quickly." Ver. 28. "Now no one at the table knew for what intent He spake this." Ver. 29. "For some thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy what we have need of against the feast," &c. Chap. xviii. 28. "Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas unto the hall of judgment: and it was early; and they themselves went not into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the Passover." Chap. xix. 14. "And it was the preparation of the Passover, and about the sixth hour." Now, as it appears, that at this time the disciples thought our Lord had ordered Judas to go and bring what was necessary for the Passover, and they were then supping together, it is evident that it was not the paschal lamb on which they were supping; and it is as evident, from the unwillingness of the Jews to go into the hall of judgment, that they had not as yet eaten the Passover. These words are plain, and can be taken in no other sense, without offering them the greatest violence.

Mr. Toinard having found that our Lord was crucified on the sixth day of the week (Friday), during the paschal solemnity, in the thirty-third year of the vulgar æra, and that the paschal moon of that year was not in conjunction with the sun till the afternoon of Thursday, the 19th of March, and that the new moon could not be seen in Judæa until the following day (Friday), concluded that the intelligence of the φάσις, or appearance of the new moon, could not be made by the witnesses to the Beth Din, or Senate, sooner than Saturday morning, the 21st of March.

Mr. Toinard therefore supposes, that our Lord substituted a Passover, for the Passover; and instituted the holy Eucharist, in place of the paschal lamb; and thus it will appear, he ate a Passover with his disciples the evening before his death, the mystical Passover or sacrament of his body and blood; and that this was the Passover mentioned by St. Luke, which he so ardently longed to eat with his disciples before he suffered. On this hypothesis, the preparation of the Passover must be considered as implying no more than, 1st, providing a convenient room; 2ndly, bringing water for the baking on the following day, which would not have been then lawful; 3rdly, making diligent search for the leaven, that none might remain in the house, according to the strict Law of God, Exod. xii. 15–20. xxiii. 15. and xxiv. 15. These, it is probable, were the acts of preparation the disciples were commanded to perform, Matt. xxvi. 18. Mark xiv. 13, 14. Luke xxii. 8–11., and which, on their arrival at the city, they punctually executed, Matt. xxvi. 19. Mark xiv. 16. Luke xxii. 13. Thus every thing was prepared, and our Saviour was offered up—the sacrifice of the real paschal lamb was attended in every respect with the very same ceremonies as had been appointed in the old covenant to precede the sacrifice of the typical victim, thereby fulfilling every tittle of the Law, and bringing in a new and more perfect dispensation, wherein should be no more shedding of blood. Lightfoot agrees with Toinard in his hypothesis; his words are, speaking of the third cup, or the cup of blessing—“And now was the time when Christ, taking bread, instituted the Eucharist; but whether was it after eating those farewell morsels, as I may call them, of the lamb, or instead of them? It seems to be in their stead, because it is said by St. Matthew and St. Mark, ἐσθιόντων αὐτῶν, &c. ‘As they were eating, Jesus took bread.’ Now, without doubt, they speak according to the known and common custom of that supper, that they might be understood by their own people. For all Jews know well enough, that after the eating of those morsels of the lamb it cannot be said, as they were eating, for the eating ended with those morsels. It seems therefore more likely, that Christ, when they were now ready to take those morsels, changed the custom, and gave about morsels of bread in their stead, and instituted the Sacrament.”

The fourth opinion is, That our Lord did eat the Passover this year, but not at the same time with the Jews. This opinion appears to be that which is most consistent with Scripture. I can only say, with Mr. Benson, “I have with great care examined the arguments produced on both sides in this controversy, and my ultimate conviction is, that whilst the words of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke necessarily compel us to believe that the majority of the Jews sacrificed the paschal lamb on the same day with our Saviour, the expressions of St. John lead us irresistibly to the conclusion, that many of the Scribes and Pharisees, and other leading characters amongst them, did not sacrifice it until the evening of the following day—until after our Saviour himself had been crucified. Two passages produced from this Evangelist may, and perhaps ought, to be otherwise interpreted; but a third is, I think, quite conclusive. I allow that the phrase πρὸ τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ Πάσχα, in chap. xiii. 1., means that it was the preparation of the paschal Sabbath, or that Sabbath which occurred in the paschal week. But no critical distortion appears to me capable of giving to chap. xviii. 28. καὶ αὐτοὶ οὐκ εἰσῆλθον εἰς τὸ πραιτώριον, ἵνα μὴ μιανθῶσιν, ἀλλ’ ἵνα φάγωσι τὸ Πάσχα—any other meaning or translation than this, ‘And they themselves went not into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the paschal offering,’ the sacrifice of the Passover. The word Πάσχα, when alone, is not always used exclusively for the paschal lamb, but often in a more enlarged and extended sense, for the whole feast of unleavened bread; but the phrase φαγεῖν τὸ Πάσχα, though used by each of the first three Evangelists, and more than once, is never applied except to the eating of the paschal offering itself, at the time appointed in remembrance of the Lord’s Passover in Egypt. The inference, therefore, from the words of St. John above quoted is, that the Priests and Pharisees did not eat this Passover at the same time with the rest of the Jews; and this difference may be accounted for on the supposition that our Lord was crucified Julian Period 4742.”

The Passover was commanded to be celebrated in the first month, Nisan, or Abib, which corresponds to the months of March and April in the Christian year. It was to be killed “in the fourteenth day of the first month; at even is the Lord’s Passover,” Levit. xxiii. 5. “the whole congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening.” If our Saviour then ate of the paschal lamb with his disciples, he would eat it on the day when the Passover ought to be killed, on the evening after the fourteenth.

It will be admitted, that if our Lord had determined upon observing the Passover, and if there is in truth any difference between the Jews and our Saviour on the day on which it was to be eaten, the error would be not on the part of Jesus himself, but of the Jews who differed from him. Neither his character, conduct, nor sentiments, will for a moment permit us to believe that he disobeyed, in the slightest degree, the ordinances of the Mosaic Law, in deference to any traditions which existed among the Scribes and Pharisees. If He refused to follow, upon this occasion, the practice of the high priests, and others among the Jews, his refusal must be referred to some deviation in their practice from that which had been formerly prescribed to their forefathers. Our Lord was right, and they were wrong. Whatever rules might have guided them, He at least would have eaten the Passover on the day, "when the Passover ought to be killed," ἐν ᾗ ἔδει θύεσθαι τὸ Πάσχα, (Luke xxii. 7.)

It is well known that the months of the Jews were lunar months, but in what manner they were measured and dated, whether from the phasis or appearance of an illuminated portion of the moon's disk, or from tables in which her mean motion was calculated, and adapted to the purpose; or by some faulty and inaccurate cycle of their own, or by some other method altogether different from these, is a point upon which the most learned have disputed in every age; and which, I apprehend, can never be settled with any degree of satisfaction, from the remaining scanty and inadequate hints which form the only materials for our judgment.

Mr. Mann, De Ann. Christ. cap. xx. 23., argues very strongly for the antiquity of the astronomical method of computation at present in use amongst the Jews, and contends that it was the method adopted so early as the times of our Saviour.

Epiphanius, Hær. 51. cum animadv. Petavii, on the other hand, broadly asserts that the Jews, in our Saviour's time, followed the calculations of a faulty and inaccurate lunar cycle, by means of which they anticipated, in the year of his crucifixion, the proper period for the celebration of the Passover by two days. Petavius defends this opinion; and he and Kepler have both, with much labor, endeavoured to draw out a set of tables upon the principles which Epiphanius has laid down; but there is so much obscurity, and even contradiction, in the passage in which that father treats upon the subject, that it would be quite impossible to say whether they are right or wrong in their conclusions.

The rabbinical doctors (and Maimonides in particular) have referred to a third method, and stated that the ancient Jews reckoned the beginning of their months from the phasis of the moon, and that their present mode of calculation was not introduced until after the final dispersion of the nation. Before that period, they assert, that there were in Judæa several συνέδρια, or committees (as we should term them), under the general superintendence, and, as it were, branches of a central committee fixed at Jerusalem. The members of this committee were in possession of certain tables, containing calculations of the motions of the moon, which being inspected, it was thence determined when the new moon ought and would most probably appear. They sent out some approved and steady persons to observe whether the moon did appear at the time at which they expected her appearance, or not. If these persons beheld the phasis on the night after the twenty-ninth of the current month, they immediately proclaimed the new moon: thus determining what would otherwise have been the thirtieth day of the current month, to be the first of the succeeding one. If the watchers did not return with intelligence of the observation of the phasis before the night after the thirtieth day of the current month, they fixed the commencement of the succeeding month on the following day, making the current month consist of thirty days. In other words, they determined the current month to consist of twenty-nine or thirty days, according as their watchers did, or did not return with intelligence of having seen the new moon before the conclusion of the thirtieth day.

After the central committee had thus fixed the day of the new moon, messengers were sent to the several cities within the distance of a ten days' journey from the metropolis, to announce the fact. The council at Jerusalem, however, did not settle for themselves, and their own practice, whether the intercalary month should consist of twenty-nine or thirty days, until the conclusion of that month and the appearance of the new moon of the succeeding month Nisan, had pointed out which number of days it ought to consist of. Hence it is evident that there might, and would sometimes be, a difference between the members of the Jerusalem council and the rest of the Jews, in their mode of reckoning the first day of the month Nisan. If the council announced to the nation at large an intercalary month of twenty-nine days only, and afterwards found out that they were wrong in their calculations, and that it ought to have consisted of thirty days, it is evident that in that year the persons composing and adhering to the practice of the council would differ from the rest of the Jews in counting the first, and therefore the fifteenth day of Nisan. What was the fifteenth of Nisan to the one, would be the sixteenth to the other; and perhaps some circumstance of this nature, at present unknown to us, may have occasioned the difference, if there really was any difference, amongst the Jews, as to the day of the celebration of the Passover in the year of our Lord's crucifixion. Perhaps from this very cause we may explain why, as is supposed by many, our Saviour and his disciples, and the generality of the Jews, sacrificed the paschal lamb on the evening of the Thursday, and the Scribes and Pharisees, and others, not until that of the Friday in passion week; in other words, why our Lord considered the Friday, and others the Saturday, as the fifteenth day of Nisan; but, without insisting further upon this, it is plain that the proclamation of the time of the new moon's appearance did not always determine the Jews in fixing the first day of the month, and more especially that it did not always do so with regard to Nisan. This is sufficient to show, that we are still in such a degree of ignorance with regard to the method of calculating the Jewish months and years, as to prevent our deciding with absolute certainty upon the day on which the Passover took place in the year of our blessed Saviour's crucifixion.

The learned Cudworth, in his admirable Treatise on the Jewish Passover, has proved, from the Talmud, Mishna, and some of the most reputable of the Jewish rabbins, that the ancient Jews, about our Saviour's time, often solemnized as well the Passovers as the other feasts, upon the ferias next before and after the Sabbaths. And that the Jews in ancient times reckoned the new moons not according to astronomical exactness, but according to the φάσις, or moon's appearance; and, as this appearance might happen a day later than the real time, consequently there might be a whole day of difference in the time of celebrating one of these feasts, which depended on a particular day of the month; the days of the month being counted from the φάσις, or appearance of the new moon. As he describes the manner of doing this, both from the Babylonish Talmud, and from Maimonides, I shall give an extract from this part of his work, that my readers may have the whole argument before them.

"In the great, or outer court, there was a house called Beth Yazeck, where the senate sat all the 30th day of every month, to receive the witnesses of the moon's appearance, and to examine them. If there came approved witnesses on the 30th day, who could state they had seen the new moon, the chief man of the senate stood up, and cried מקדש, mekuddash, 'It is sanctified;' and the people, standing by, caught the word from him, and cried Mekuddash! mekuddash! But if, when the consistory had sat all the day, and there came no approved witnesses of the phasis, or appearance of the new moon, then they made an intercalation of one day in the former month, and decreed the following one and thirtieth day to be the calends. But, if after the fourth or fifth day, or even before the end of the month, respectable witnesses came from far, and testified they had seen the new moon, in its due time, the senate were bound to alter the beginning of the month, and reckon it a day sooner, viz. from the thirtieth day.

"As the senate were very unwilling to be at the trouble of a second consecration, when they had even fixed on a wrong day, and therefore received very reluctantly the testimony of such witnesses as those last mentioned, they afterwards made a statute to this effect—That whatsoever time the senate should conclude on for the calends of the month, though it were certain they were in the wrong, yet all were bound to order their feasts according to it." This, Dr. Cudworth supposes, actually took place in the time of our Lord, and "as it is not likely that our Lord would submit to this perversion of the original custom, and that following the true φάσις, or appearance of the new moon, confirmed by sufficient witnesses, he and his disciples ate the Passover on that day; but the Jews, following the pertinacious decree of the Sanhedrin, did not eat it till the day following." Dr. Cudworth further shows from Epiphanius, that there was contention, ῥόγυβος, a tumult, among the Jews about the Passover, that very year. Hence, it is likely that the real paschal day observed by our Lord, his disciples, and many other pious Jews, who adopted the true φάσις, phasis, was only the preparation or antecedent evening to others, who acted on the decree of the Sanhedrin. Besides, it is worthy of notice, that not only the Karaïtes, who do not acknowledge the authority of the Sanhedrin, but also the rabbins themselves grant, that where the case is doubtful, the Passover should be celebrated with the same ceremonies, two days together; and it was always doubtful when the appearance of the new moon could not be fully ascertained."

In corroboration of this opinion, Bishop Pearce supposes, that it was lawful for the Jews to eat the paschal lamb at any time, between the evening of Thursday, and that of Friday; and that this permission was necessary, because of the immense number of lambs which were to be killed for that purpose, as in one year there were not fewer than 256,500 lambs offered. See Josephus, War, b. vii. c. ix. sect. 3. In Matt. xxvi. 17. it is said, "Now the first day of the feast of Unleavened Bread (Τῇ δὲ πρώτῃ τῶν ἁζύμων), the disciples came to Jesus, saying unto him, 'Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the Passover?'" As the feast of Unleavened Bread did not begin till the day after the Passover, the fifteenth day of the month (Lev. xxiii. 5, 6. Num. xxviii. 16, 17.) this could not have been properly the first day of that feast; but as the Jews began to eat unleavened bread on the fourteenth day (Exod. xii. 18.), this day was often termed the First of Unleavened Bread. Now it appears that the Evangelists use it in this sense, and call even the paschal day by this name. See Mark xiv. 12. Luke xxii. 7.

Mr. Benson's profound and sagacious reasoning on the time of our Lord's crucifixion, can only be appreciated by those who are acquainted with the difficulties of this subject, and have followed his argument through all its ramifications. It is to be regretted, that the learned men who have endeavoured to decide this point, have not sufficiently examined the data, which enabled Mr. Benson to come to his very satisfactory conclusions. That the reader may perceive the discrepancies to which I allude, I here subjoin from Bowyer the various decisions of former chronologers.

“It has been computed,” he observes, “that from the twentieth to the fortieth year of Christ, the only Passover full moon which fell on a Friday, was April 3, A. D. 33, in the year of the Julian Period 4746. And yet Mr. Mann, in support of his hypothesis, computes it to have been so likewise March 22, A. D. 26, Julian Period 4739. Differences there will be, while some calculate by astronomical full moons, others by cycles; and while we know not whether the Jews kept the true or the mean full moons; or what cycle they followed. That which prevailed in the time of Epiphanius, Dodwell observes, De Cyclis, p. 429, was different from the Calippic, the Hippolytan, and from what the Jews now follow; from which last, however, Scaliger and Mr. Mann compute. And even, if we knew the cycle, what certainty could we expect when Maimonides and other writers tell us, that in a backward season they occasionally intercalated a month, that the harvest might be ripe enough to have the first fruits of it offered on the second day of the passover¹?

“Sir Isaac Newton, in his Observations on the Prophecies, p. 163, mentions another Jewish rule for calculating the time of the Passover. To avoid the inconveniences of two Sabbaths together, which prevented burying their dead, and making ready fresh meat, &c. they postponed their month a day, as often as the third of the month Nisan was Sunday, Wednesday, or Friday; and this rule they called, אָדוּ, Adu, by the letters א, ד, ו, signifying the 1st, 4th, and 6th days of the week, which days we call Sunday, Wednesday, and Friday.

“Postponing therefore (a day in) the Passover months above, the 14th day of the month Nisan, (which, A. D. 31, fell on Tuesday, March 27,) will fall on Wednesday, March 28

“In A.D. 32, (which fell on Sunday, April 13,) will fall on Monday, April 14.

“In A.D. 33, (which fell on Friday, April 3,) will fall on Friday, April 3, likewise.

“In A.D. 34, (which fell on Wednesday, March 24, or rather, for the avoiding the equinox, which fell on the same day, and for having a fitter time for the harvest, on Thursday, April 22,) will fall on Friday, April 23.

“In A.D. 36, (which fell on Tuesday, April 12,) will fall on Wednesday April 13.

“In A.D. 36, (which fell on Saturday, March 31,) will fall likewise on the same day.”

Here the 33rd and 34th are both years on which the Passover fell on a Friday; and Sir Isaac Newton determines for the 34th, two years after 32, when the Passover fell very late.

NOTE 25.—PART VI.

It is not certain where this section ought to be inserted. Michaelis and Newcome place the washing of the disciples' feet after the preparation of the Passover, and the promise of Judas to betray Christ; Pilkington and Lightfoot before those events. Michaelis represents the washing as taking place before the feast of the Passover. The rest of the harmonizers principally arrange it at the supper at Bethany.

and had not time then to listen to or correct their erroneous inferences, ἰσχυρόν ἐστι, absurdum est, quod profertis, desinite tam anilia profari.—ἰσχυρόν ἐστι, eadem est cum יָחִי, sufficit tibi, quæ a Judæis adhibetur, quoties ab altero absurdum quid profertur, qui tacere debebat, &c.—See Lightfoot and Schoetgen, vol. i. p. 313.

NOTE 26.—PART VI.

This is also a Hebrew phrase. Among the instances collected by Schoetgen is a sentiment which ought to be deeply engraven on the memory and the conscience of all who can appreciate the privilege of possessing and studying the Scriptures. "Quicumque scit Legem, et non facit illam מִיֵּשֶׁב לוֹ שְׁלָא יֵצֵא לְעוֹלָם, melius ipsi esset, si non venisset in mundum." "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." Schemoth Rabba, sect. 40. fol. 135. 1, 2. apud Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 225.

This was the most solemn manner of expressing an affirmative. "Berachoth Hier. citante Wagensiel Ad Sota, p. 1001. Zipporenses quærebant, numquid R. Judas mortuus esset? Filius Kaphræ respondit, אַתּוֹן אִמְרִיתוֹן, vos dixistis." Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 225.

NOTE 28.—PART VI.

"WHEN thou art converted;" when thou hast recovered from that fall which I foresee.

NOTE 29.—PART VI.

This part of Christ's address to his disciples has been much misunderstood. From ver. 35, our Lord's intention may be supposed to be, to remind them that all their wants had been hitherto supplied. But now, as he was about to be removed, he forewarns them that it would be hereafter necessary for them to act for themselves, and to provide against danger and difficulty. The disciples interpreted this literally, as appears from ver. 38, when our Lord slightly censures their misapprehension, by "it is enough," and so closes the conversation. He was about to enter the scene at Gethsemane,

A FEW hours only before his death, our blessed Saviour instituted the holy Eucharist. He knew that the long and progressive series of prophecies, visions, types, and figures, which had predicted his incarnation and sufferings, were now on the point of being accomplished. He knew that the Mosaic Dispensation was on the point of being completed, with all its typical ceremonies and observances. A new and spiritual kingdom was to be engrafted on it, with other rites and other sacraments. The holy of holies was soon to be thrown open; and man, sinful man, through the atoning blood of a Redeemer, was to be permitted to hold there the highest communion with his Maker, in commemoration of the exceeding great love and all-sufficient sacrifice of his only Son. That we may endeavour to arrive at a clearer comprehension of this great mystery, and those holy memorials, which our Lord instituted "for the continual remembrance of his death," it will be advisable to refer to the Jewish feasts in the Levitical Law, which evidently prefigure the great sacrifice of Christ, which was to be offered as an atonement for the sins of man. In pursuance of this plan, we will consider the nature of the Jewish feasts, and the analogy which the Christian feast of the Lord's Supper, in which we eat and drink the body and blood of Christ, bears to the ancient rite among the Jews of feasting upon things sacrificed, and eating of those things that were offered up to God. The Jewish sacrifices are generally divided in the following manner.

First, Such as were wholly offered up to God, and burnt upon the altar; these were the holocausts, or burnt offerings. Secondly, Such as were not only offered up to God upon the altar, but of which the priests also had a part to eat; and which were again subdivided in the sin offerings, and the trespass offerings. Thirdly, Such as were not only offered up to God, and a portion bestowed on the priests also, but of which the owners themselves had a share likewise: these were called שְׁלָמִים, or peace offerings, which contained in them, as the Jewish doctors speak, חֶלֶק לַשֵּׁם וְחֶלֶק רִבְּהוֹן יְהוָה, "a portion for God, and the priests, and the owners also."

The first of these, perhaps, to signify some especial mystery concerning Christ, were wholly offered up to God, and burnt upon the altar; yet when they were not קרבנות ציבור, offerings for the whole congregation, but for any particular person, there were always peace offerings regularly annexed to them, that the owners, at the same time when they offered a sacrifice to God, might feast upon that sacrifice.

The second of these were not eaten by the owners, but by the priests; to show that the owners, being for the present in a state of guilt, for which they now made atonement, being not worthy, the priests, acting as their mediators to God, and as their proxies, did eat of the sacrifice for them.

Thirdly, In the peace offerings; because such as brought them had no uncleanness upon them (Levit. vii. 20.), and so were perfectly reconciled to God, and in covenant with him; therefore they were in their own persons to eat of those sacrifices, which they had offered unto God as a federal rite between God and them. These sacrifices were considered to bring peace to the altar, to the priests, and to the owners; as they each separately partook of them. Throughout Scripture we find that the eating of the sacrifice was a due and proper appendix unto all sacrifices; and that it is mentioned continually as a rite belonging to sacrifice in general; see Exod. xxxiv. 15. Numb. xxv. 2. Psalm cvi. 28. Exod. xxxii. 6. 1 Sam. ix. 13. and xvi. 2-11., with many others. Profane writers likewise frequently mention this custom, as being always observed by the heathen in their sacrifices. Homer alludes to it. Plato, in his second book De Legibus, calls these feasts ἑορταὶ μετὰ θεῶν, feasts after divine worship offered up to the gods. Plutarch also reports of Catiline and his conspirators, ὅτε καταθύσαντες ἄρθρον, ἐγέσσαντο τῶν σαρκῶν, that sacrificing a man, they did all eat somewhat of the flesh; using this religious rite as a bond to confirm them together in their treachery. From the universal prevalence of this rite, then, we have every reason to consider it as having been, from the very earliest period, divinely appointed and originally a part of the primeval religion; typifying the atoning sacrifice of the future Messiah, who expressly declares, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," John vi. 51-56. "Christ, our Passover, is sacrificed for us; therefore let us keep the feast (that is, the paschal feast, upon this sacrificed Christ) with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth,"—1 Cor. v. 7, 8. Wherefore I conclude that the LORD'S SUPPER is a feast upon a sacrifice, or Epulum ex Oblatis, in the same manner as the Jewish feasts upon sacrifices under the Law, and the feasts upon Εἰδωλοθύτα (things offered to idols), among the heathens. And this I think will be proved by a reference to the tenth chapter of 1 Cor. from the 13th to the 22d verses, where St. Paul supposes these three are parallels, and that a perfect analogy exists between them, or else the whole strength of his argument fails.

Again, Under the Law, the eating of the feasts upon God's sacrifices was considered as a federal rite between God and those that offered them, in the same way as the ancient Hebrews and other eastern nations ratified and sealed every covenant by eating and drinking together; and, among them, it was accounted a most heinous offence to be guilty of the breach of a covenant thus confirmed. Salt, as the natural appendix of all feasts, was always put upon every sacrifice, and was regarded as a symbol of friendship and kindness; from whence the ancients called it Amicitiae Symbolum. And from this custom the proverbial expression among the Greeks originated—Ἁλὺς καὶ τράπεζα, "salt and the table;" and among whom the violation of a covenant of salt was considered as the violation of the most sacred league of friendship. Several passages of Scripture are illustrated by the application of this custom, Lev. ii. 13. Num. xviii. 19. 2 Chron. xiii. 5. Further, when God delivered the Israelites from the bondage of Egypt, he manifested himself in a peculiar manner among them; and while they sojourned in tents in the wilderness, He commanded a tent, or tabernacle, to be built, that he might sojourn with them also. But when the Jews took possession of their land, and built them houses, God would have a fixed dwelling place; and his moveable tabernacle was turned into a standing temple. And, to make the analogy more complete, it was furnished with things suitable to a dwelling place—a table, with a candlestick: the former always furnished with bread, having dishes, spoons, bowls, and covers, belonging to it; and the candlestick having its lamps continually burning. There was also a continual fire kept in the house of God upon the altar. And, to carry the resemblance still further, meat and drink were brought into the house of God; for besides the flesh of the beasts offered up in sacrifice, which were partly consumed on the altar, and partly eaten by the priests, as a portion of God's family, and so to be maintained by him, there was a minchah, or meat offering, and a libamen, or drink offering, which were always joined to the daily sacrifice.

The sacrifices, then, being God's feasts, they that did partake of them must be considered as his convivæ (guests), and in a manner to eat and to drink with Him. That sacrifices were thus regarded as a federal rite in Scripture is proved in Levit. ii. 13. in Num. xviii. 19. and 2 Chron. xiii. 5. where it is called "the salt of the covenant," and "a covenant of salt," to signify that as men ratified their covenants by eating and drinking, to which salt was a necessary appendix, so in the same way God, by these sacrifices and feasts upon them, did ratify and confirm his covenant with those that were partakers of them; who, as it were, might be considered as eating and drinking with Him—God's portion of the covenant being visibly consumed by his holy fire on the altar, which was always kept burning there.—See Levit. ix. 24. 2 Chron. vii. 1. Fire likewise, the symbol of the Lord's presence, fell frequently on the victims offered to the Lord, as a visible demonstration of his acceptance of his portion, and of his entering into covenant with the offerers.—See Gen. iv. 4. xv. 17. Judges xiii. 20, &c.

As we have now shown that the sacrifices of the Levitical Law, with the feasts upon those sacrifices, were regarded as federal rites between God and men, in like manner the Lord's Supper, under the Gospel dispensation, which we have already proved to be Epulum Sacrificiale (a feast upon a sacrifice), must also be considered as Epulum Federale, a federal feast of reconciliation and amity between God and men, by which we are taken into a sacred covenant, and an inviolable league of friendship with Him. In comparing this account of the ancient mode of celebrating the Jewish feasts with the institution of the Holy Sacrament given by the inspired writers, it is to be remarked, that when Christ instituted the eucharistical feast, he said, "This is my blood of the New Testament"—"This cup is the New Testament in my blood;" that is, not only the seal of the old covenant, but the sanction of the new covenant. The confirmation of the old covenant was by the blood of bulls and of goats (Exod. xxiv. 5. and Heb. ix. 19.), because blood was still to be shed. The confirmation of the new covenant was by a cup of wine; because under the New Testament there is no further shedding of blood, Heb. ix. 26. x. 18. Again, our Lord says of the cup, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood; in the same way as the cup of blood in the Levitical Law (Exod. xxiv. 6.) was the Old Testament in my blood. There all the articles of that covenant being read over, Moses took half of the blood and put it in basins, and sprinkled all the people with it, and said, "This is the blood of the covenant which God hath made with you;" and thus that old covenant or testimony was established. In like manner Christ, being now about to bring in another and more perfect dispensation, having published all the articles of the new covenant, confirms it by the breaking of bread, saying, "This is my body in the New Testament, or Covenant, in the same sense as the paschal lamb has been hitherto my body in the old dispensation, Eat ye all of it." He then takes the cup, saying, "This is my cup in the New Covenant, in the same sense as the blood of bulls and goats have been my cup in the old covenant, Drink ye all of it; having your hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience," Heb. x. 22.

The legal sacrifices were but types and shadows of the true Christian sacrifice; and were, therefore, with their feasts, constantly renewed and repeated: but now that Christ, as a lamb without blemish, and without spot, foreordained before the foundation of the world (1 Pet. i. 20.), has been sacrificed for us, there remain no more typical sacrifices, but only the feasts upon the One Great Sacrifice, which are still, and ever will be, symbolically continued in the Lord's Supper. "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." John vi. 56.

There are still many other resembling circumstances between the Jewish Passover and the Christian Eucharist. The Passover was of divine appointment, and so is the Eucharist. The Passover was a sacrament, and so is the Eucharist. The Passover prefigured the death of Christ before it was accomplished—the Eucharist represents, or figures out, the death now past. As he who in the Jewish Law did not keep the Passover bore his own sin, and was to be cut off from Israel, Exod. xii. 15. Num. ix. 13., so he also who neglects the Holy Eucharist in the Christian dispensation, renounces all interest and benefit in the atonement and sacrifice of Christ, and shall also bear his own sin. As the Passover was to continue as long as the Jewish Law was in force, so the Eucharist is to continue till Christ shall come to judge the world. The same forms and expressions were likewise observed in both institutions.

In the paschal supper the master of the house took bread, and gave thanks to God; so did Christ. It was customary for him afterwards to break it, either before or after the benediction, and to distribute it to his family, as it does not appear they were permitted to take it themselves. That these forms were observed by our Lord is evident. In the same manner, at the paschal feast, the master was accustomed to take a cup of wine, pronouncing a blessing over it; so likewise did Christ. In both cases the blood was a token or sign of the covenant entered into between God and man, which was at once ratified by pouring out the blood of the lamb, and by feeding on the flesh of the sacrifice. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

It is far beyond the limits of a note to enter into the various interpretations of Scripture given by the Socinian and Papist, in defence of their peculiar errors. As the doctrine of transubstantiation, however, the principal error of the latter, is founded on the words, "This is my body," I would wish to direct the attention of my readers to the true scriptural signification of this passage, which the Romanist interprets literally, and the Protestant figuratively.

To find out the meaning of any passage in Scripture, our only safe plan is, to make the Scripture its own interpreter, that is, to examine in what sense similar modes of expression, with that under discussion, are used in the Sacred Writings. In the present instance we must recollect our Lord spoke a dialect of the same language in which the Old Testament was written. If we discover therefore parallel expressions in the Old Testament to that which is now used by our Lord, we are warranted, by all the rules of criticism, to interpret the latter in the same manner as we interpret the former. Both are to be literally, or both figuratively interpreted.

The Hebrew, Syro-Chaldaic, and Aramaic dialects, have, generally speaking, no word which expresses, "to denote," "to signify," "to represent." The inspired writers of the New Testament, following the idiom of the Hebrew language, although they wrote in Greek, abounded with expressions derived from the language of their country. Even in our own language, although we have terms enough to fill up the ellipsis, the same form, or idiom of speech, is common. Suppose a man, on entering into a museum enriched with the remains of ancient Greek sculpture, has his eyes attracted by a number of curious busts, and on inquiring what they are, he learns, that this is Socrates, that Plato, a third Homer; others Hesiod, Horace, Virgil, Demosthenes, Cicero, Herodotus, Livy, Cæsar, Nero, Vespasian, &c. Is he deceived by this information? Not at all: he knows well that the busts he sees are not the identical persons of those ancient philosophers, poets, orators, historians, and emperors, but only representations of their persons in sculpture; between which and the originals there is as essential a difference as between a human body, instinct with all the principles of rational vitality, and a block of marble. Innumerable instances are found in Scripture where this manner of speaking is observed. In Gen. xli. 26. it is said, "The seven kine are (i. e. represent) seven years." "This is (i. e. represents) the bread of affliction." "The ten horns are (i. e. signify) ten kings," Dan. vii. 24. "They drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was (i. e. represented) Christ," 1 Cor. x. 4. In Rev. i. 20. "The seven stars are (i. e. represented) the angels of the seven churches: and the seven candlesticks are (i. e. represent) the churches." In Matt. xiii. 38, 39. "The field is (i. e. represents) the world: the good seed are (i. e. represent or signify) the children of the kingdom: the tares are (i. e. signify) the children of the wicked one," &c. In John vii. 36. we find Τίς ἔστιν οὗτος ὁ λόγος; "What is this saying?" (i. e. its signification.) In John x. 6. "They understood not what things they were," τίνα ἤνουν, (i. e. their signification). Acts x. 17. Τί ἂν εἶη τὸ ὄραμα, "What this vision might be;" properly rendered by our translators, "What this vision should mean." Gal. iv. 24. "For these are the two covenants," Ἀὐταὶ γάρ εἰσι δύο διαθήκαι, i. e. these signify the two covenants. Luke xv. 26. "He asked, τί εἶη ταῦτα; what these things meant?" And very many others might be quoted to the same purpose. These passages appear to be so evidently parallel with that before us, that we conclude they are to be interpreted in the same manner, and that our Lord therefore intended, when he took the bread, to say, "this bread represents, or signifies, my body;" and consequently that the conclusion of the Romanist, who supposes that the bread is changed into the real body, and the wine into the real blood of Christ, is founded on error. To give an idea of the many dogmas that necessarily attend the doctrine of transubstantiation, I transcribe the eighth lesson of the Catechism for the use of all the Churches in the French Empire, published in 1806, with the bull of the pope, and the mandamus of the archbishop of Paris; which is exactly a counterpart to all that have been published from time immemorial in the popish churches:—

"Q. What is the sacrament of the Eucharist?"

"A. The Eucharist is a sacrament which contains really and substantially the body, blood, soul, and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, under the forms and appearance of bread and wine.

"Q. What is at first on the altar, and in the chalice? Is it not bread and wine?"

"A. Yes: and it continues to be bread and wine till the priest pronounces the words of consecration.

"Q. What influence have these words?"

"A. The bread is changed into the body, and the wine is changed into the blood of our Lord.

"Q. Does nothing of the bread and wine remain?"

"A. Nothing of them remains, except the forms.

"Q. What do you call the forms of the bread and wine?"

"A. That which appears to our senses, as color, figure, and taste.

"Q. Is there nothing under the form of bread except the body of our Lord?"

"A. Besides his body, there is his blood, his soul, and his divinity; because all these are inseparable.

"Q. And under the form of wine?"

"A. Jesus Christ is there as entire as under the form of the bread.

"Q. When the forms of the bread and wine are divided, is Jesus Christ divided?"

"A. No: Jesus Christ remains entire under each part of the form divided.

"Q. Say, in a word, what Jesus Christ gives us under each form.

"A. All that he is, that is, Perfect God and Perfect Man.

“Q. Does Jesus Christ leave heaven to come into the Eucharist?

“A. No: he always continues at the right hand of God, his Father, till he shall come at the end of the world, with great glory, to judge the living and the dead.

“Q. Then how can he be present at the altar?

“A. By the almighty power of God.

“Q. Then it is not man that works this miracle?

“A. No: it is Jesus Christ, whose word is employed in the sacrament.

“Q. Then it is Jesus Christ who consecrates?

“A. It is Jesus Christ who consecrates; the priest is only his minister.

“Q. Must we worship the body and blood of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist?

“A. Yes, undoubtedly; for this body and this blood are inseparably united to his divinity.

“The priest, in giving the consecrated wafer to the communicant, says, ‘Behold the Lamb of God! Behold Him who taketh away the sin of the world!’ Then he and the communicant repeat thrice, ‘Lord, I am not worthy thou shouldst enter my roof; speak, therefore, but the word, and my soul shall be healed,’ the communicant striking his breast in token of his unworthiness. Then (says the Directory) having the towel raised above your breast, your eyes modestly closed, your head likewise raised up, and your mouth conveniently open, receive the holy sacrament on your tongue, resting on your under lip; then close your mouth, and say in your heart, ‘Amen, I believe it to be the body of Christ, and I pray it may preserve my soul to eternal life.’”—Ordinary of the Mass, p. 33.

May God grant that such absurd superstitions may never again become a part of the religion of England!

NOTE 31.—PART VI.

VARIOUS interpretations are given to this passage: some commentators suppose it was accomplished when Christ ate and drank with his disciples after his resurrection, Acts i. 4. x. 41. John xxi. 13. Luke xxiv. 30, 43.; others that the word kingdom here signifies the Gospel-state. The most probable signification seems to be, that he will no longer commemorate this, or any other deliverance, till he celebrates together with his apostles the great day of redemption in the future world. The expression drinking wine indicates feasting, under which the future happiness is often represented in Scripture—Isa. xxii. 13. and lvi. 12. Matt. viii. 11. and xxii. 4.

The wine is called new, figuratively expressing those unknown heavenly festivals ‘prepared for man in his state of immortality. The kingdom of the Father here seems particularly to refer to the future state after the final judgment: for then, and not till then, is the kingdom delivered up to the Father, 1 Cor. xv. 24–28.; and in no part of the New Testament is Christ’s kingdom between his resurrection and ascension called the kingdom of his Father.

‘Απ’ ἄρτι, or better, ἀπαρτι, omnino, I will not at all drink of the fruit of the vine, &c. Aristophan. Plut. act. ii. scene 2.

——— τοὺς δεξιὸν, καὶ σώφρονας,

NOTE 32.—PART VI.

FROM the expression, “Arise, let us go hence,” it may be inferred that our Saviour now left the room, and went to the Mount of Olives, when the conversation and exhortations related in the following sections were continued.

NOTE 33.—PART VI.

THE scene of the first temptation was in the garden of Eden; there Adam fell, and brought sin into the world. To complete the parallel, the second Adam, in the garden of Gethsemane, submitted to his last and fearful temptations, when all the powers of darkness were let loose against him (Luke xxii. 53.); and, by a perfect obedience, revoked our sentence of condemnation. In the temptation in the wilderness, we read that the Devil departed from him only for a season. In this hour of agony he renews his assault with better hopes of success; and our Saviour, as soon as he enters the garden, appears conscious of his power, although not visible to mortal eye: He said to the disciples, “Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder; pray ye also not to enter into temptation.” After the temptation in the wilderness, we read that an Angel ministered to him; and now, in this hour of despondency and suffering, there appeared an Angel, strengthening him.

NOTE 34.—PART VI.

“If we consider,” says an eminent divine, “the circumstances of Christ’s agony in the garden, it is evident it was the effect of some more powerful cause than merely a natural fear of his ensuing agonies and death; for he bore his death far better than his agony. He had no sooner entered on the scene of his trial, but ‘he began to be sorrowful,’ to ‘be sore amazed,’ to ‘be very heavy,’ which words, according to their original signification, declare him to have been suddenly oppressed with a mighty dejection of spirits, which, arising from some fearful spectacle, or imagination, overwhelmed his soul with an unknown and inexpressible anguish. They intimate, that at this dark hour, he was assaulted by devils, who exercised all their power and malice, to tempt him to renounce his merciful design. If we consider the warning our Saviour gave his disciples, when they entered the garden with him (Luke xxii. 40.), of the extraordinary danger they were in of falling into temptation, it seems very probable that he expected, and found there an extraordinary concurrence of tempters, or evil spirits; for he repeats the same admonition when he finds his disciples asleep, saying, ‘Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation,’ (Matt. xxvi. 41.) And since his sufferings in his agony are described with more painful circumstances than his sufferings on the cross, we have just reasons to conclude they were inflicted on him by more malignant and more powerful executioners; and, consequently, that he endured the torments of men only on the cross, but of devils in the garden. His body was crucified on the cross; his mind in the garden. As Adam had offended in both, so Christ suffered in both.

“The unaccountable drowsiness, which seized the disciples at this period, may also have been produced by the agency of infernal spirits, for the purpose of having our Saviour alone during their conflict with him, thereby hoping to gain a greater advantage over him. St. Luke imputes this drowsiness to sorrow; but it is not probable that mere sorrow alone should necessitate three men to fall asleep together, under the most awakening circumstances. Why did it not as well force them to fall asleep afterwards, when their Lord was apprehended, condemned, and crucified? at which time they were doubtless more sorrowful than they were at Gethsemane. May it not then be possible that some secret influence was added to the causes assigned by the Evangelist, and that our Saviour, experiencing in himself the power and malice of Satan and his emissaries, admonished his disciples, who were much less capable of resisting, to be upon their guard, lest they in their turn should be tempted also.” Christ, as we have already shown (note 51, p. *47), began his incarnate life as the second Adam, in the very spot to which the disobedience of the first Adam had driven him. In a typical point of view, we may now consider the second Adam as having redeemed, by his perfect innocence and obedience, the possession of that garden from which the first Adam had been expelled; and here again the Devil (for he had only departed from him for a season) assailed him with all his powers of darkness, torturing his suffering and afflicted spirit with the most dreadful phantoms and apprehensions; and endeavouring, by every art of malice and invention, to divert him from his glorious purpose of laying down his life for the world. The expression, “My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death,” περὶλυπὸς ἐστὶν ἡ ψυχὴ μου, may infer, “his soul had been struggling under some mortal pang, and the pains of hell had got hold upon it.” God permitted him to be assailed with the utmost force of temptation to which his assumed nature could be exposed. “For in that He himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.” Some consider that the infernal spirit suggested the most agonizing and wicked delusions, such as it is not lawful for man to utter; nor possible, without Satanic agency, for man to conceive. Calvin believes that the wrath of God was so poured out upon him, that the atonement could only be completed by his undergoing that agony; which, in the future world, is prepared for the impenitent.

In my own opinion, the parallel between the first and second Adam, which, we find from the Holy Scriptures, has been so minutely and remarkably observed, here closes. The second Adam, from the wilderness into which the first Adam fell, traced back step by step, by a most divine life, the condemnation of the first Adam, till he arrived again at the scene of his disobedience, where, as the substituted victim, He submitted to that spiritual suffering and death, which had been pronounced against the first man. He submitted the offending nature to the tree of the cross, reconciled justice with mercy, and restored to the human race, through the influence of his spirit, the capability of regaining that spiritual state of blessedness and glory in which the first Adam had been originally created.

By Christ’s death, He hath destroyed him that hath the power of death, that is, the Devil, (Heb. ii. 14.) And hence the Apostle tells us, that unsubdued by infernal attacks and temptations, “He swallowed up death in victory.”

^a Scott’s Christian Life, pp. 449, 450.

He despoiled principalities and powers, and made an open show of them, triumphing over them. Satan, as lightning, falls from heaven; his kingdom is taken away from him; and man, believing man, is ransomed from his malignant power, and by the intercession of the Mediator, and the influence of the Holy Spirit, is restored again to the favor of his God.

NOTE 35.—PART VI.

THE whole of this transaction shows that our Lord had perfect power over his enemies, if he had chosen to exert it, (Matt. xxvi. 53.) By a look, the guards, who attempted to seize him, were smitten to the ground. When Peter afterwards struck the servant of the high priest, and smote off his ear, the Roman soldiers, who were never resisted with impunity, would doubtless have revenged themselves on the disciples, if they had not been supernaturally protected—He had power to lay down his life, and to take it again: but he completed the mysterious sacrifice, and man was saved, and the Scripture fulfilled.

PART VII.

NOTE 1.—PART VII.

THE Annas here mentioned is called by Josephus, Ananus. He had been deposed from the pontifical office by the Roman power; but his influence on that account had been rather increased than lessened among his countrymen. Under these circumstances, however, he could not with prudence openly interfere; but, from the passage before us, we may infer the great authority he still possessed; and it is more than probable that he privately suggested every measure that had been already devised against our Lord; and that on the present occasion he still continued to direct by his counsel and advice.—See John xviii. 24. Although Annas was deprived of the office of high priest, the Jews still acknowledged him as such, as we find from Acts iv. 6, where he is so called. His influence was so great, that he saw five of his own sons successively in possession of the high priesthood; and several also of his sons-in-law, among whom was Caiaphas.

NOTE 2.—PART VII.

THIS passage of Daniel, to which our Lord refers, was always considered by the Jews as a description of the Messiah. Our Saviour, therefore, now in his lowest state of humiliation and depression, asserted his claims as the Messiah, who should appear again in the clouds of heaven, as the judge of the world.—Sohar Genes. fol. 85. col. 338, &c. NOTE 3.—PART VII.

THIS was only done by the high priest in cases of blasphemy.

NOTE 4.—PART VII.

CHRIST was first arraigned before the high priest, then before the whole Sanhedrin (Mark xv. 1.), before both of whom he was accused of blasphemy, and on this charge was by both condemned, Matt. xxvi. 65, 66. He was next taken before the Roman governor, as guilty of sedition, and acquitted, John xviii. 38. xix. 4, &c. When the Jews therefore saw this, they were compelled to acknowledge the real grounds of their prosecution: “We have a Law, and by our Law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God.” But, finding that this charge also was disregarded by Pilate, who was still inclined to acquit him, (for blasphemy against the God of the Jews was not considered by the Romans to be a crime,) they, in despair, make a personal attack upon Pilate himself, and threaten, if he does not comply with their demands that he be crucified, to accuse him to Tiberius (whose suspicious and jealous nature was generally known) of remissness in duty, and negligence in the suppression of sedition and rebellion. Intimidated and overcome by this menace, he yields to their importunate solicitations, and condemns a man, whom he publicly acknowledges to be innocent, to the ignominious death of a common malefactor, that he may screen himself from the malice of his accusers.

Some objectors to Christianity have argued, that the Jews could not have believed in the reality of the miracles of our Saviour, or they would not have delivered him up to the Roman governor. They deem it scarcely possible that a whole nation would cry out for the scourging and crucifixion of a man, who gave sight to the blind, healed the sick, and raised the dead to life. It is implied in this objection, that the contemporaries of Christ discredited his miracles, because he was rejected and crucified; whereas the Jews of every age have contended, that miracles afford no proof of the divine mission of a prophet who teaches false doctrines, such as they suppose Jesus to have taught; and consequently, according to their notions, he might have been persecuted and crucified by their ancestors, while the reality of his miracles was fully admitted. They even go so far as to assert, that in their Law against false prophets, Deut. xiii.^a the clause in ver. 6, was framed for the individual case of Jesus Christ, and that it points to him in particular. "This is Jesus," say they, "who denied his father, saying, that he had a mother, but not a father; that he was the Son of God, and that He himself was also God." Maimonides may be supposed to give the general opinion of the Jews, when he affirms that the miracles of a prophet, who recommends the worship of other gods, are no criteria of the truth of his pretensions, "Because the testimony of the understanding, which proves the falsity of his professions, is of more weight than that of the eyes which see his miracles^b."

The Jews saw and acknowledged the miracles of Christ, but imputed them to the agency of evil spirits (Matt. xii. 24. Luke xi. 15.) permitted by God to try the firmness of their faith, and the constancy of their obedience to the Mosaic Law, Deut. xiii. 3.: on the other hand, they heard him assert his own divine nature—the latter they considered as blasphemous; and the supposed impiety and impossibility of this claim, in their opinion, overturned the weaker evidence of undisputed miracles wrought in its support: they weighed what to them appeared opposite evidences, and the preponderance of that side on which their prejudiced opinions had placed the greater weight, accounts for the persevering conduct of the Sanhedrin, and the persecuting infidelity of the people^c.

Bishop Blomfield has justly observed, that the sum of the offence given by our Lord to the Chief Priests was, his laying claim to the title of the Messiah: a title to which they did not imagine that any mere human being, as Jesus seemed to be, could have any right. Could he but have convinced the leading Jews of the justice of these pretensions, they would not have objected to his assumption of divine attributes. The fact is, that for any man to profess himself to be the Messiah was considered as an offence against their Law, inasmuch as by so doing he made himself the Son of God. "We have a Law, and by our Law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God." This remark fully answers that objection to the Divinity of Christ proposed by Dr. Priestley, who maintains the position that the Jews did not expect their Messiah to be a divine personage; which point is inconsiderately allowed by Mr. Wilson, in his answer to this great advocate of Unitarianism^d.

NOTE 6.—PART VII.

ST. MATTHEW, in recording the accounts of the sufferings of our Lord, has omitted to mention that the soldiers and servants blindfolded him; yet he relates the indignity which immediately followed that insult, "Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, Who is he that smote thee?" These words, according to Markland, have an immediate reference to the preceding action. When Christ was blindfolded, they ask him in derision, and according to the custom of a well-known game, if he can now tell by his prophetic spirit who it was that struck him. There is a burlesque sarcasm in the word προφήτευσον, which signifies "to prophesy," or "to guess," or "to tell."—Another sarcasm is implied in the word Χριστὲ, both being intended as sneers at Jesus being accounted a prophet, which could not have been so strongly expressed if the word λέξον had been used instead of προφήτευσον, as if they had said, "O thou Messiah, thou great prophet, tell us by thy prophetic spirit who it is that struck thee?"—Vide Prelim. Observ. to Bowyer's Conjectures, p. 36.

prehension of our Lord; Pilkington, after he had been beaten and insulted by the servants and soldiers. Not only do the arguments of the latter writer appear to me to be most satisfactory, but there seems to be internal evidence that Pilkington is more correct. The courage, that made Peter recover first from the general consternation that had seized upon all the disciples, would not forsake him without a cause, merely because he had entered into the palace. He probably expected a different result to the examination, and imagined that our Lord would have miraculously delivered himself from the power of his enemies; and he therefore willingly waited among the servants "to see the end." But when he saw, equally to his surprise and horror, for the first time, that our Lord was thus grievously treated, his confidence began to waver and his faith to fail. At this moment the servant who kept the door, and had left her charge to approach to the fire, knew him by the blaze of the fire (as Dr. Townson ingeniously translated the word ᾠς, Luke xxii. 56.), and challenged him as the disciple of the despised Nazarene.

I cannot account for Archbishop Newcome's silence, in his notes to the Harmony, respecting Pilkington's order of the denial of Peter. He frequently refers to Pilkington.

NOTE 8.—PART VII.

THE Jewish doctors distinguished the cock crowing into the first, second, and third. The first was called, קריאת הנבר—the second בשישנה—when he repeats it. The third בשישלוש—when he does it the third time, as in Mark xiii. 35. Luke xii. 38. This custom was observed also by heathen nations. According to St. John, xiii. 38., St. Luke, xxii. 34., and St. Matthew, xxvi. 35., our Saviour predicts "the cock shall not crow," that is, shall not have finished his crowing, "before thou deny me thrice." Lightfoot^e reconciles the words of these three Evangelists with those of St. Mark, by suggesting, that as the hour approached when the event was to take place, our Saviour specifies more particularly the time, and says, Mark xiv. 30. "Verily I say unto thee, that this day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice." Pilkington supposes, that the words, "the cock shall not crow before thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me," should be taken literally, signifying that the cock should not crow at all before thou shalt thrice deny me; and he concludes, there is a double signification attached to these separate predictions, and a double accomplishment of them. He argues, according to St.

John's Gospel, that these words were primarily fulfilled by St. Peter, when he was admitted into the palace. The first denial was made to the damsel who kept the door, and had permitted him to enter. It is very natural to imagine that a clamor would be raised against Peter upon her accusation; as the people would conclude that the damsel who kept the door, and let him in, must have good reason for her suspicion; and accordingly St. John tells us, that the servants who were warming themselves at the fire with Peter, again questioned him about this matter, and that he denied being a disciple of Christ the second time. Immediately upon, or soon after this, Malchus's kinsman recollected seeing Peter in the garden with Jesus, and charged him therewith; but Peter denied it a third time. And St. John observes, that upon this immediately the cock crew. And thus it appears how those words of our Saviour were verified, "Before the cock crow (at all), thou shalt deny me thrice."

St. John, having thus shown the accomplishment of these words of our Lord, takes no notice of any other of Peter's denials, but of these three only, which were made at the fire, whereas the other Evangelists take notice of denials made after these; and so show us the propriety of that other expression, "Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice." They consider the several particular denials at the fire made at the same time, and in the same place, only as one general denial: and so St. Mark tells us, that, after Peter had denied at the fire, and was gone out into the porch, the cock crew the first time; and this appears to be the same crowing which St. John speaks of, as immediately succeeding Peter's three several denials of his Master there.

The second general denial was made in the porch. This evidently appears from the accounts both of St. Matthew and St. Mark. And, from what is related, we must conclude, that the denial there was not single, but that many then charged him together (as they had done before, and as we may easily imagine they would do, in such a riotous assembly), and that he again there denied to them all. For St. Luke tells us, that a man charged him, and said, "Thou art one of them;" and he replied, and said, "Man, I am not." St. Mark, that he denied what a maid was insinuating, "that he was one of them:" and St. Matthew, that "he denied with an oath, I do not know the man," upon a maid's affirming that he was with Jesus of Nazareth.

The place of the third general denial is not specified, any farther than that it was in the same room or court where Jesus was, who "turned and looked upon Peter." The time of it is said by St. Mark, to have been a little after the second, (μετὰ μυχρόν.) St. Matthew makes use of the same expression; and St.

Luke particularly mentions, that it was “about the space of one hour after.” This also appears to have been a general accusation, and so must have been a general denial; for though St. Luke only mentions one man’s charging Peter at this time, yet St. Matthew and St. Mark tell us, that they that stood by charged him with being a Galilean, and a disciple of Christ, and that in such a pressing manner, that “he began to curse and to swear he did not know the man.” And upon this St. Mark tells us, that “the cock crew a second time:” before which Peter had denied “Christ at three several times, and in three several places;” and so had remarkably fulfilled the second signification of the prediction, “Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice.”

If it shall appear that there is nothing forced or misrepresented in the relation of this matter, then it must be allowed that the evangelical accounts are so far from being contradictory or inconsistent, that they greatly illustrate each other, and show the true meaning, and the full accomplishment of what our Saviour foretold with respect to this event^f.

NOTE 9.—PART VII.

PFEIFFER, in the last treatise of his Dubia Vcrata, endeavours to prove that the common dialect, both of Galilee and Judæa, was not Hebrew, but Syro-Chaldaic, or Aramaic, mixed with Greek, and that they differed only in accent and pronunciation. The learned men, of both countries, understood and conversed in pure Hebrew. The Galilean dialect consisted in a corrupt and confused pronunciation of the common Syro-Chaldaic, and this dialect was the vernacular language of the apostle.

Schoetgen^g, among others, mentions, Brescith Rabba, sect. xxvi. fol. 26. 3. בגלילא סוּחִין לַחֲוִיָּא אִינִי in Galilæa serpentem, qui alias חֲוִיָּא dicitur, vocant אִינִי ut pro ח usurpent α.

Horne and Pfeiffer, as well as the two last-mentioned authorities, have collected similar instances.

NOTE 10.—PART VII.

I AM induced to place this section here, because it does not appear that the Sanhedrin returned to their council chamber in the temple after our Lord had been condemned by Pilate, and we must therefore refer the repentance of Judas to his condemnation by the Sanhedrin in the temple.

NOTE 11.—PART VII.

THE account of the death of Judas is attended with some difficulty. The manner in which Weston reconciles St. Matthew and St. Luke seems to be the most preferable. St. Matthew says ἀπὶ γέλατο, “he hanged himself,” and St. Luke that he πρηνὴς γερόμενος, “falling headlong,” as we have translated it (Acts i. 18.), “burst asunder in the midst, and his bowels gushed out.” Some suppose Judas to have fallen on his face after hanging, by the breaking of the rope. Others, that he was choked with grief, and burst asunder. Weston renders the passage, Matt. xxvii. 5., “he strangled himself, and the rope failing, he fell headlong, and his bowels gushed out.” This solution appears to be more satisfactory than any other. See Weston apud Bowyer’s Critical Conjectures, p. 128, 129. See also the references in Archbishop Newcome’s note, and the commentators.

NOTE 12.—PART VII.

THE words quoted here are not in the prophet Jeremiah, but in Zechariah xi. 13. But St. Jerome says, that a Hebrew, of the sect of the Nazarenes, showed him this prophecy in a Hebrew apocryphal copy of Jeremiah; but probably they were inserted there, only to countenance the quotation here. One of Colbert’s, a MS. of the eleventh century, has Ζαχαρίαν, Zechariah; so has the later Syriac in the margin, and a copy of the Arabic, quoted by Bengel. In a very elegant and correct MS. of the Vulgate, in the possession of Dr. A. Clarke, written in the fourteenth century, Zachariam is in the margin, and Jerimiam is in the text; but the former is written by a later hand. Jeremiah is wanting in two MSS., the Syriac, later Persic, two of the Itala, and in some other Latin copies. It is very likely that the original reading was διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, and the name of no prophet mentioned. This is the more likely, as Matthew often omits the name of the prophet in his quotations. See chap. i. 22. ii. 5, 15. xiii. 35. and xxi. 4. Bengel, Dr. A. Clarke, and Horne approve of the omission.

“It was an ancient custom among the Jews,” says Lightfoot, “to divide the Old Testament into three parts; the first, beginning with the Law, is called The Law; the second, beginning with the Psalms, was called The Psalms; the third, beginning with the prophet in question, was called Jeremiah; thus, then, the writings of Zechariah and the other prophets being included in that division that began with Jeremiah, all quotations from it would go under the name of this prophet.” If this be admitted, it solves the difficulty at once. Lightfoot quotes Bava Bathra, and Rabbi David Kimchi's preface, to the Prophet Jereniah, as his authorities; and insists that the word Jeremiah is perfectly correct, as standing at the head of that division from which the Evangelist quoted, and which gave its denomination to all the rest^b.

ON THE QUESTION, "WHETHER THE JEWS, AT THE TIME OF CHRIST, HAD THE POWER OF INFLICTING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT?"

MUCH discussion has taken place on the question, Whether the Jews, in the time of our Lord, retained the power of life and death? Lightfoot, Dr. Lardner, Doddridge, and others, have strenuously defended the negative; Biscoe is the principal author, of late date, who has adopted the affirmative.

Two kinds of arguments have been used to prove that the Jews were deprived of the power of inflicting capital punishments: one taken from the Roman laws, or the nature of the Roman government; the other from certain passages in the New Testament.

The judge, according to the Roman laws, exerted in criminal affairs the Imperium merum; in civil causes, Imperium mixtum. Proconsuls and presidents of provinces, as Pilate was, possessed both these powers. They were the representatives of, and next to, the emperor, in their respective provinces.

The arguments by which the position is defended, that the Jews had not the power of life and death at this time, are thus proposed and answered by Biscoeⁱ.

1. There was a Roman law, which states, that the municipal magistrate cannot do those things which have more of imperium than of jurisdiction; the municipal magistrates not having it in their power to enforce their orders.

Ans. It cannot be proved that this law existed at the time in question: and even if it had, there is sufficient grounds for concluding it was confined to the municipes, who were Roman citizens, and therefore to be tried and punished by magistrates of the first rank; and that it did not extend to the provincials, who were less regarded, and left more under the power of their own magistrates.

2. The power of inflicting capital punishments could not be exercised by any magistrate, unless it were given him by some special law or constitution; therefore this power could not be transferable to magistrates who held a delegated jurisdiction.

Ans. Nothing is more certain than that many cities, and some whole countries, had obtained from the people and emperors of Rome, the privilege of being governed by their own laws, and by their own magistrates, in a greater or less degree. The Carthaginians, after the second Punic war, had the power of executing their own laws, even in capital punishments; and many other instances might be enumerated. Why may we not, then, suppose that the people of Judæa were equally favored? It may indeed be shown, from many things recorded in history, that the Romans were more peculiarly disposed to be favorable to the Jews.

3. According to the civil law of Rome, the presidents alone possessed the Merum Imperium, or the power of sitting in judgment on, and executing criminals, in those provinces over which they were placed.

Ans. This is taking for granted the thing that is questioned. It is acknowledged that the Jewish magistrates had the power of inflicting lesser punishments; but how could this be, if the cognizance of all criminal causes was solely in the president, and not the least part of this power could be delegated? The Jewish magistrates must have received their power to execute these minor punishments either by some special law, or, which is more probable, (as there is no record of such law in their favor,) they, like other nations, were allowed the privilege of their own laws.

We now proceed to the arguments from the New Testament.

1. The most plausible of all is, that saying of the Jews to Pilate, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death" (John xviii. 31.), which is represented as an ample acknowledgment from the Jews themselves, that they had not at that time the power of inflicting capital punishments.

Ans. The context proves that these words do not imply that the Romans had deprived them of the liberty of judging men by their own Law, but show, on the contrary, that they had the option of trying Jesus themselves, or of giving him up to the Roman governor. For Pilate had only a moment before said, "Take ye him, and judge him according to your Law." Their answer is evidently a refusal of the governor's offer; and if we interpret the words in any other way, we are naturally brought to the conclusion, that Pilate, when he said, "Judge him according to your Law," spoke in mere mockery, and intended to remind them of their subjection, which is not probable, as he was then called upon to act in his official capacity. Something more therefore must be understood than what is expressed; and nothing I think can be so reasonably supplied to make the sense complete, as that which regards the time in which the conversation took place, namely, the first day of the Passover week, and the preparation for the Sabbath—"It is not lawful for us to put any man to death during this holy festival." In the same manner it was not lawful for them to go into the judgment hall (John xviii. 28.) Pilate, who had been long governor, must have been well acquainted with their customs, and must have perfectly comprehended their meaning. St. Augustine, Cyril, and several other ancient fathers, put the same construction on these words, which agrees exactly with the rule laid down in the Talmud. The Mishna says expressly that capital causes, in which the criminal was condemned, were always to be finished after the trial began, for which reason these trials were never to begin the day before the Sabbath, or the day before a festival; neither is it probable that the Jews, who were forbidden to do any servile work on the Sabbath, would put a criminal to death at this holy season, in honor of which a prisoner was wont to be released to them. If, in answer to this, it be affirmed, that some prisoners were reserved to the time of their great feasts, that the exemption might be the more public, it is true that three or four instances of this kind are recorded; but it does not seem probable that even these executions took place on their principal festivals, which were as strictly observed as their Sabbaths; but on their Moed Katon, or lesser holidays; between the first and last days of their great feasts, which, by divine appointment, were kept with the greatest solemnity.

The day on which our Lord was put to death was the first day of the Passover week, and the 15th day of the month. It was unlawful for them to try him on the 14th, or to put him to death on the 15th (Levit. xxiii. 5, 7.), and the next day was the Sabbath: therefore the Jews must have reserved him in custody for some days, before they could have executed him according to their own laws. But such delay would have been dangerous in the extreme, as they feared the people might attempt a rescue, (Luke xxii. 2. Matt. xxvi. 5.) They therefore used every argument, even to threatening, with Pilate, to procure his condemnation. An additional evidence in favor of this side of the question is given us in the words of St. John (xviii. 31.), who, when the Jews reject the offer of Pilate, saying, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death," adds, "that the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying the death he should die." If we do not consider the subject in this point of view, the prediction of our Lord (John xii. 32, 33.), which foretells the manner of his death, ceases to be a prophecy, for if the Jews no longer retained the power of inflicting capital punishments, there could not be much difficulty in specifying the particular death of a criminal according to the Roman laws.

2. Pilate says to our Lord, "Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and power to release thee?" which words are said expressly to declare, that Pilate was the supreme and only judge who was invested with the power of pronouncing sentence of absolution or condemnation.

Ans. It is granted, that Pilate was judge and governor of Syria, in this and every other case, within the province of Judæa; but this does not prove that he was the only judge; nor does it from hence follow that the Jews had not the privilege of trying and executing their own criminals.

3. Again, the Jews say to Christ, "Moses in the Law commanded that such should be stoned: but how sayest thou?" It is added, "This they said, tempting him, that they might have to accuse him;" which is interpreted thus:—"If he had determined, the woman taken in adultery should be stoned, according to the Mosaic Law, they designed to accuse him to the Roman governor; because, if the Jews were prohibited from the use of their own laws, this act might have been considered as seditious: If, on the contrary, he had decided that she ought not be stoned, they would have accused him of derogating from the Law of Moses, and have thereby lessened his influence among the people."

Ans. This is taking for granted the point to be proved, without one word being said in its confirmation. It is probable the only snare here laid was to obtain from our Saviour something in derogation of the Law of Moses. He had so often preached the doctrine of forgiveness to the greatest extent (Mark iii. 28.), that the Pharisees might have hoped he would have committed himself, by deciding against the execution of the Mosaic penalties in this instance; and thereby have furnished them with matter of accusation against him, both before the Jewish magistrates and the people; and, if necessary, before Pilate also.

Many more arguments are adduced by Biscoe in support of his opinion. "It cannot be denied," he says, "that in the Acts of the Apostles there is one very plain instance in the case of the protomartyr Stephen, of the council's sitting and hearing witnesses (Acts vi. 12, to the end), and that his execution was performed according to the Law of Moses. Compare Deut. xvii. 5, 6, 7. with Acts vii. 58, 59. He is cast out of the city, and the witnesses throw the first stone. Some, even here, bring in the objection, that there is no relation of any sentence pronounced; but surely an historian seldom enters into detail of a trial; he confines himself to the most remarkable circumstances. Common ceremonies are omitted, as being too generally known to be mentioned. And these particulars of St. Stephen's trial would never have been recorded, had it not been for his noble speech, and to show us the frame of mind of the Apostle Paul at that time. If indeed the Jews did not possess the power of putting Stephen to death, if he should be found guilty, for what purpose did they meet together? If they did, the thing contended for is granted; and it is of little import whether the sentence was actually passed or not."

Again, it is related that Peter and the other apostles were brought before the council (Acts v. 27.), who, it is expressly said, "took counsel to slay them" (Acts v. 33.), and would doubtless have put their design into execution, had they not been dissuaded from it by Gamaliel. Is it probable that St. Luke, who mentions all these proceedings should not have once intimated that they exceeded their power in so doing, if the Romans had prohibited them from exercising their own punishments? But, on the contrary, we find the high priest and the elders asserting their authority in open court, in the presence of the Roman governor himself, who was seated as a judge, without any reproof on his part. Tertullus declares to Felix, in the case of St. Paul, whom "we took and would have judged according to our Law," (Acts xxiv. 6.) If the exercise of their Law had been taken from them, what possible construction could have been put upon such a declaration, but open rebellion against the Roman states? and could any magistrate have suffered it to pass unnoticed? St. Paul himself acknowledges the power of the Jewish council (Acts xxiii. 3.), and it is evident from the accusation that his was a capital cause. It may be further observed, in support of this opinion, that the four Evangelists are unanimous that the Jews attempted to prosecute our Saviour for the capital crime of Sabbath-breaking, that they might put him to death, Matt. xii. 10. Luke vi. 7. John v. 9, 10, 16.; and Mark, chap. iii. 2., says, "They watched him, whether he would heal him on the Sabbath day; that they might accuse him;" but evidently not before the Roman governor, for it would have been difficult to have convinced him that the performance of a wonderful and beneficent action on the Sabbath day was worthy of death. Who then can doubt that our Saviour was to be prosecuted before the Jewish council, who took counsel how they might destroy him? (Matt. xii. 14.) and he only avoided the impending danger by removing from thence to the sea of Galilee. (Mark iii. 7. and John vi. 1.) "After these things Jesus walked in Galilee: for he would not walk in Jewry, because the Jews sought to kill him," John vii. 1.

If the Jews had not sought to take away the life of Christ by judicial proceedings, why should he avoid Judæa, and all places subject to their jurisdiction? Had they meditated his destruction by a private hand, or by making interest with the Roman governor to execute him, he might have been as secure from these dangers by withdrawing into some of the remoter parts of Judæa, as by removing into Galilee. But it was well known to the people of Jerusalem that the Sanhedrin were lying in wait for him; and that he was under prosecution for capital crimes. When he appeared at the feast of Tabernacles, they said, "Is not this he, whom they seek to kill?"—"Do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ?" John vii. 25-27. And afterwards we find several bystanders wished to apprehend him, but did not, because his hour was not yet come, (John vii. 30.) They seem to have been restrained by some supernatural influence. From the obvious construction of these passages, we have reason to infer that the Jewish magistrates executed their own laws in capital cases.

After the resurrection of Lazarus, we read, the chief priests and Pharisees gathered a council, and determined to put our Saviour to death, (John xi. 47, 53.) And a short time afterwards we are told, the chief priests consulted how they might put Lazarus also to death, (John xii. 10.) But what gives additional weight to this argument is the fear of the people, so frequently expressed. Matthew (xxi. 46.) says, "when the chief priests and Pharisees sought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude;" also (Matt. xxvi. 4, 5.) Mark, xi. 18., also relates, that the Scribes and chief priests sought how they might destroy him; "for they feared him, because all the people were astonished at his doctrine;" and again, "they sought to lay hold on him, but feared the people." (Mark xii. 12.) See also Luke xix. 47, 48. and xx. 19. and xxii. 2. If the Jews had meditated the destruction of our Saviour by any private hand, or in any extrajudicial manner, or if they had intended to use their influence with the governor, to prevail upon him to pronounce a sentence of condemnation,—if sufficient evidence was wanting to establish his crime, why had the chief priests and Pharisees so much reason to fear the people? The instigators and actors in these cases might perhaps have had some reason to fear; but to suppose that the whole body of Jewish magistrates should be so affected, when the discovery was so improbable, seems wholly incredible. Who could force the assassin to acknowledge his guilt, when the magistrates of course would not? It must, therefore, be an act of the great council of the Jewish nation, and not any secret means of destruction, which is referred to, in those places of the Gospels, where this general fear is expressed; for we read, the chief priests, the Scribes, and the elders were afraid of the people. They were afraid to put Jesus to death, in the same manner, and for the same reason, that Herod was afraid to put John the Baptist to death, "they feared the multitude," (Matt. xiv. 5.) And this fear, finally, induced them to lay snares for him in his discourses, that they might draw from him something contrary to the Roman state, and make him obnoxious to the Roman governor, (Luke xx. 19, 20.) And when our Saviour was at last unexpectedly delivered into their hands, their precipitate and unusual conduct showed the greatness of their alarm. Our Lord was seized, examined, and convicted, by the high priest and Sanhedrin in one night.

They would have executed him by their own Laws, had it not been the day of the Passover, when "it was not lawful for them to put any man to death:" and they feared a tumult among the people too much, to detain him in prison till they could exercise this power. They therefore lost no time in delivering him up to Pilate, well knowing, that, by this step, all responsibility was taken from them: and, in case of any disturbance, the assistance of all the military force of the province would be called out. They accuse him to Pilate, not only of blasphemy, but sedition; and he at last is so intimidated, that, contrary to his conscience, he is compelled, as Cæsar's representative and friend, to take cognizance of the offence, and put Christ to death, after the Roman custom; and thus our Lord's prediction was fulfilled.

The talmudists mention many instances proving that the power of inflicting capital punishments was retained by the Jews: the Gemara expressly asserts that the four capital punishments inflicted by the Jewish council or magistracy were in use during the forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem; though, according to the talmudists, they were much interrupted. But even this was owing, as Josephus has shown, to the corruption and maladministration of the Roman governors; who were induced by bribes, or the share of plunder, to use their influence to protect criminals from those punishments denounced against them by the Jewish laws. Even Felix himself employed robbers to murder Jonathan, the high priest, for having reproved him for injustice; and after this time murders were not only frequent, but committed with impunity. The corruption of this governor is hinted at, Acts xxiv. 26. Josephus also asserts that Albinus dismissed all malefactors for money; and that Gessius Florus was sharer with such in their unlawful gains.

Josephus never alludes to the supposed loss of their power by the Jews; on the contrary, he observes, that the Sadducees are cruel above all the Jews in matters of judicature¹, and at that time they had been fifty years under the Roman power.

Josephus asserts also, that in cases of dispute concerning the Mosaic Laws and institutions, the power of inflicting capital punishment was left to the high priest².

In speaking of the Essenes, Josephus expressly affirms, "that if any one speaks evil of any of their legislators, he is punished with death³."

Such is a brief abstract of the reasoning of Mr. Biscoe on this subject, which appears satisfactorily to refute the principal arguments of Lardner on the other side of the question.

Lightfoot, in his Talmudical Exercitations, after a long discussion on the question, Whether the Jews at this time retained the power of life and death? remarks, that it is the received opinion, that the Romans divested the council of their authority, and took away from them the power of inflicting capital punishments. And this argument is defended from that tradition of the talmudists, which says, that the Great Council removed from the room Gazith, where alone they could pass a sentence of death, forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem; from which it is inferred, that the power of judging in cases of life and death could not proceed, because the lesser councils were not permitted to sit on capital judgments, unless the Great Council was in its proper place and capable of receiving appeals; the room Gazith being near the Divine Presence, half of it within, and half without the holy place. In answer to this assertion it is observed, "But if this indeed be true, 1st, What do then those words of our Saviour mean, 'They will deliver you up to the councils'? 2d, How did they put Stephen to death? 3d, Why was Paul so much afraid to commit himself to the council, that he chose rather to appeal to Cæsar?"

"The talmudists excellently well clear the matter, and the reason was this, כִּי־נִרְחַצוּ דַּנְפִּישִׁי בֵּין רִחוּן וְרִצְחֵן וְלֹא יָכְלוּ לְחַיֵּד לָהֶם רִצְחֵן וְלֹא יָכְלוּ לְחַיֵּד לָהֶם רִחוּן because they saw murderers so much increase, that they could not judge them: they said, therefore, 'It is fit that we should remove from place to place, that so we may avoid the guilt of not judging righteously in the room Gazith,' which engaged them to do so. The number and boldness of thieves and murderers were so great, and the authority of the council so weak, that they neither could nor dared put them to death."

And again it is said, in another talmudical tradition, "Since the time that homicides multiplied, the beheading the heifer ceased, Sotah, fol. 47. 1; so in the case of adultery: and since the time that adultery so openly advanced under the second temple, they left off trying the adulteress by the bitter water, &c. Maimon. in Sotah. chap. iii. So that we see the liberty of judging in capital matters was no more taken from the Jews by the Romans, than the beheading of the heifer, or the trial of the suspected wife by the bitter waters was taken away from them, which no one will affirm."

"The slothfulness of the council destroyed its own authority; the Law slept while wickedness was in the height of its revels; and primitive justice was so out of countenance, that as to uncertain murders they made no search, and against certain ones they framed no judgment. The Sanhedrin, from mere inactivity, or a foolish tenderness towards an Israelite, as a seed of Abraham, so far neglected to punish bloodshed, and other crimes, that wickedness grew so untractable, that the authority of the council trembled for fear of it, and dared not kill the killers. In this sense that saying must be understood, 'It is not lawful for us to put any man to death;' for it is evident, when they make this assertion they do not deal fairly with Pilate; for their authority of judging had not been taken from them by the Romans, but lost by themselves, and despised by the people. Under these circumstances it was only exercised when there was no danger to be apprehended. They were happy enough to use it when they had the opportunity of judging, persecuting, and torturing poor men and Christians; and they would certainly have condemned our Saviour to death, had they not feared the people, and if Providence had not otherwise determined it."

Lightfoot mentions many other circumstances which took place after Judæa had long been subject to the Roman yoke, which clearly affirm the opinion, that the authority of the council in capital matters was not taken away by the Romans; and he agrees with Biscoe in supposing that it was gradually, from various causes, relinquished by the Jews themselves, and that it imperceptibly lapsed into the hands of the Romans^m.

The Romans were always the ruling power wherever their conquests extended. They varied in the privileges they granted, but uniformly retained in their own hands the influence of the sword. The consequence would naturally be, that on all important occasions nothing could be done without their sanction or connivance. The Municipia and some provinces were certainly allowed nominally to be governed by their own laws and customs: but this very permission seems to have introduced such irregularities into the government, that they petitioned to have the anomalous privilege removed, and to become at once subject to the Roman laws. The reason evidently was, that the power of the sword, the influence of the Roman name, and their unavoidable interference in the government of their native magistrates, had greatly interrupted, and oftentimes suspended, the practice of their national laws; and such, as it appears to me, was the situation of Judæa, at the time of our Lord's condemnation. The power of life and death had not been formally abrogated by the Romans; but the grant which secured to the Jews their own rights and privileges had been gradually set aside by the influence of the Roman authority, which had in some measure superseded the Jewish magistracy".

NOTE 14.—PART VII.

SOME time before this reconciliation, Pilate had dedicated some shields of gold to Tiberius, and placed them in the palace of Herodium. The Jews, under the sanction of Herod, petitioned Pilate for their removal, but in vain. They determined therefore to appeal to Tiberius, and for this purpose sent a deputation to the emperor, at the head of which were the four sons of Herod. This act seems to have been the cause of their difference, as it was regarded by the Jews and by Herod as a violation of their religion; and Herod was not reconciled to Pilate till the Roman governor, desirous not to assist the Jews in the condemnation of our Lord, acknowledged the power of Herod, by sending to his tribunal at Jerusalem the holy Jesus.

Dr. Townson justly observes, that it is probable both Pilate and Herod occupied different parts of the palace called Herodium, which

^m See Bowyer's Critical Conj. p. 318; Doddridge, Rosenmüller, the discussion of Lardner, in his Credibility, &c. Lightfoot, in his Talmudical Exercitations upon the Acts, observes, on the occasion of the Sanhedrin granting letters to Paul to go to Damascus, that the power of life and death was not yet taken from the Sanhedrin. Selden is of opinion, that the power of the Sanhedrin to punish capitally was only much interrupted and disused at the time of the crucifixion. Krebsius, quoted by Rosenmüller, is of opinion that the power of inflicting capital punishments, in cases of offences against religion, was left to the Jews; but in civil offences it was taken away—"in criminibus autem aliis, e. g. seditionis, tumultus, perduellionis, et ad læsam majestatem Cæsaris pertinentibus, illud jus iis non fuisse concessum." Kuinoel has adopted also this conclusion of Biscoe—"Mihi perplacet Augustini et Chrysostomi ratio, etiam Semler probata, qua Judæorum verba v. 31. ad diem referuntur hoc sensu; 'nobis non licet quenquam supplicio afficere ob religionem diei festi;' erat enim παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα, xix. 14-42. quam eandem ob causam, neque prætorium ingressi erant coll. v. 28."—Kuinoel in Johan. xix. 31.

some time before had been built by Herod the Great. It consisted of two distinct spacious buildings, one of which was named Cæsareum, and the other Agrippæum: it stood near the temple^o.

NOTE 15.—PART VII.

HOTTINGER has written a treatise on this passage, De ritu dimittendi reum in festo Paschatis; which is bound up in the thirteenth volume of the Critici Sacri. He opposes the opinion of Whitby, that a prisoner was released only at the feast of the Passover. He considers the custom (quoting Grotius and Ger. Vossius) as contrary to the stern inflexibility of the Mosaic institutions; “Erat siquidem divina per Mosen lata lex χωρὶς ὁλντιγῶν, sine omni misericordia, Heb. x. 28. Nec cuiquam homini data ignoscendi potestas, non Regi, non Synedrio, non populo,” sect. x. and xx.

This deviation from their established Law is a proof how much the Levitical institutions had been relaxed from their appointed rigor and severity. The origin of this emancipation is unknown.

NOTE 16.—PART VII.

It is very probable that the chief priests and elders who “persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus” (Matt. xxvii. 20.), had placed their own creatures and dependents as near as they might legally approach (John xviii. 28.) the door of the judgment hall, that they might obtain the release of Barabbas, and secure the destruction of Jesus; for immediately after, they clamorously demanded the crucifixion of Christ; so anxious were the chief priests for the immediate condemnation of our Lord, and so fearful lest his innocence should protect him from their malice.

NOTE 17.—PART VII.

THE guilt of condemning our Lord must almost entirely rest upon the unhappy nation whom he had designed to save, (John xix. 11.) Pilate made five successive efforts to deliver Jesus from their inveterate hatred, and was induced, at last, unwillingly to yield him up, from the apprehension of his own personal safety. He was afraid, that, if he did not comply with the violent and clamorous importuni-ties of the Jewish rulers, there would be a commotion among the people, who were seditiously inclined, and were assembled at this time in great numbers, from all parts of Judæa, for the celebration of the Passover. In all probability Pilate was not provided with sufficient force to ensure perfect tranquillity on these great festivals: their very solemnity would be considered as the best guarantee for the observance of propriety and good conduct.

NOTE 18.—PART VII.

ON MARK XV. 25. AND JOHN XIX. 14-16.

THIS is one of those passages in which the Evangelists are supposed to be inconsistent. St. Mark says, chap. xv. 25. “It was the third hour, and they crucified him:” St. John tells us, “It was about the sixth hour; and Pilate delivered him to be crucified,” John xix. 14-16. Various modes have been adopted to reconcile these apparent differences. One, and that the most usual, and at all times the most objectionable, is the supposition of a false reading. It is urged, that in ancient times, all numbers were written in manuscripts, not at length, but with numeral letters, it was easy for γ, three, to be taken for ς, six. Of this opinion are Griesbach, in his elaborate edition of the New Testament, Semler, Rosenmüller, Doddridge, Whitby, Bengel, Cocceius, Beza, Erasmus, and by far the greater part of the most eminent critics. Besides the Codex Bezae, and the Codex Stephani (of the eighth century), there are four other manuscripts, which read τρίτη, the third, in John xix. 14. as well as the Alexandrian Chronicle, which professes to cite accurate manuscripts—even the autography of St. John himself. Such also is the opinion of Severus Antiochenus, Ammonius, and some others, cited by Theophylact on the passage; to whom must be added Nonnus, a Greek poet of Panopolis, in Egypt, who flourished in the fifth century, and wrote a poetical paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John, and who also found τρίτη in the manuscript used by him^p.

Others have supposed, that the Evangelists have adopted different methods of calculation. Notwithstanding the authorities above adduced, they observe that none of the ancient translators read “the third hour” in John: they therefore solve the difficulty (imperfectly it must be confessed) by considering the day as divided into four parts, answering to the four watches of the night. These coincided with the hours of three, six, nine, or twelve; or, in our way of reckoning, nine, twelve, three, and six, which also suited the solemn times of sacrifice and prayer in the temple. In cases, they argue, in which the Jews did not think it of consequence to ascertain the time with great accuracy, they did not regard the intermediate hours, but only those more noted divisions which happened to come nearest the time of the event spoken of. Adopting this method of reconciliation, Dr. Campbell remarks, that Mark says, "it was the third hour," from which we have reason to conclude that the third hour was past. John says, "It was about the sixth hour," from which he thinks it probable that the sixth hour was not yet come. On this supposition, though the Evangelists may, by a fastidious reader, be accused of want of precision in regard to dates, they will not, by any judicious and candid critic, be charged with falsehood or misrepresentation. Who would accuse two modern historians of contradicting each other, because, in relating an event which had happened between ten and eleven in the forenoon, one had said it was past nine o'clock; the other that it was drawing towards noon?

There is, however, in fact, no real difference between the Evangelists; and this is fully shown by the admirable reasoning both of Dr. Townson and Pilkington. If we review the whole of the transaction which took place at the crucifixion, and endeavour to assign their respective periods to each, it will be found that St. John calculated his time by the Roman or Asiatic method, from mid-night to mid-day, and from mid-day to mid-night. If we allow the sixth hour, mentioned by St. John, to mean the sixth hour in the morning, it will suit the place in which it stands admirably well, which the third hour would not.

The night was divided into twelve hours, or four equal watches. Of the latter division we have several traces in the Gospel. St. Mark thus enumerates them: ὁπὲ ἢ μεσονυκτιου, ἢ ἀλεκτοροφωνίας ἢ πρωῆς, Mark xiii. 35.; the cock crowing was from twelve to three, and the last from three to six.

The six o'clock of St. John was the end of the πρωῆς. Let us examine the division of time from the beginning of the ἀλεκτοροφωνία, cock-crowing, to the end of the πρωῆς, last watch. The apprehension in the garden appears to have been made about ten o'clock on Thursday night, and Jesus was then led away to Annas. About eleven he was sent to Caiaphas. About midnight Peter denied him the first time, at the first cock-crowing. Soon after midnight he was condemned by the high priest, &c.; after that he was abused by the officers and servants, and Peter denied him a second time. About three in the morning, i. e. at the second cock-crowing, Peter denied him the third time. About four, "as soon as it was day," the Sanhedrin met; and in a little time they again condemned him. About five, "when it was early," they led him away to Pilate; and, "about the sixth (Roman) hour," i. e. between six and nine o'clock in the morning (for when mention is made of a Roman watch hour, viz. the third, sixth, ninth, or twelfth, it often includes the whole space of time contained in that watch), Pilate gave the final sentence against Jesus; and, in consequence thereof, they led Jesus away, and crucified him "at the third (Jewish) hour," i. e. about nine o'clock in the morning, or between that time and the commencement of the next watch.

The events that happened between his being first taken before Pilate, and his final condemnation by the Roman governor, would occupy about two hours and a half; many things favored, and many demanded expedition.

If Caiaphas did not send to Herod and Pilate when our Lord was first brought prisoner to his house, he would probably despatch messengers to them as soon as he was condemned in the Council. To the former, to request he would watch over his Galilean subjects, lest they should make a disturbance in favor of Jesus; and to Pilate (who gave the soldiers to assist in the apprehension of Christ), to acquaint him with their intention of bringing the prisoner before him. As this was the time of the Passover, when a great concourse of a mutinous nation was assembled at Jerusalem and its adjoining villages, it was the duty of Pilate and Herod to exert the utmost vigilance, even without the occurrence of any unusual event. The rulers of Judæa might, perhaps, at this time have been alarmed at the intelligence of the acclamations of the people, some days before. It cannot therefore excite surprise, that on such an occasion as this, Pilate, and quickly after him Herod, was early up, and ready to receive the Jewish rulers as soon as they appeared. The first time they continued but a little while with Pilate; for when he was told that Jesus belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, he forthwith sent our Saviour to him. Herod and Pilate came but seldom to Jerusalem, and on these occasions they were, in all probability, accommodated in the Herodian palace, which was very extensive, and consisted of two spacious and distinct buildings. Josephus in consequence calls it not a palace, but palaces. This superb edifice, as well as the tower Antonia, which was a palace and tower together, stood near the temple, and communicated with it. Little time therefore being lost in removing from place to place, (the high priest being also lodged near the temple,) the first examination before Pilate, and the interview with Herod, might come within such compass, as that our Lord might be remanded to Pilate by five in the morning, at which time it was broad day-light.

There was a great eagerness for a speedy determination on one side, and a necessity for it on the other. The Jewish rulers, jealous of delay, and of a variable multitude, pressed on while circumstances favored. Pilate well knew the seditious spirit of the nation, restless under a foreign yoke, and rendered confident by their great increase of numbers in consequence of the Passover. He twice interrogated Jesus in the prætorium, with the sound of their outcry, as it were, in his ears; and found it requisite to determine speedily whether he would appease them by compliance, or repel them by force, which on the present occasion would not have been expedient. This brings us, then, either to the sixth hour in the morning, or to the sixth hour of mid-day. But the latter construction corresponds neither with the other Evangelists, nor upon the whole with St. John himself, John xviii. 28., the detail of whose narrative conveys no idea of so much time.

We come to the same conclusion by a calculation of the time mentioned by the other Evangelists. The hour of crucifixion is given by St. Mark, chap. xv. 25., whose testimony is confirmed by those of St. Matthew and St. Luke. It was the third hour, or nine in the morning. Let us consider, first, from this given hour, by a retrograde calculation, what time the procession from the prætorium to Mount Calvary, and the act of crucifying our Lord probably occupied; secondly, before this procession began, what time he was detained in the prætorium after Pilate had delivered him to be crucified; and, thirdly, how long the sentence of death was delayed after Pilate sat down on the tribunal.

1. Although Mount Calvary was near to the city, the procession must have been slow. Christ was weakened by his agony in the garden, and by the pain and loss of blood he sustained from the cruel scourging, and from the insulting mockery of the soldiers. It was usual for the people to ill treat the criminals who went to crucifixion. He himself carried his cross to the gate of the city, and although it was there laid on Simon the Cyrenian, he had still farther to go, and an eminence to ascend. To this procession, and the necessary preparations for the crucifixion, we cannot allot less than an hour, and this brings us to eight in the morning.

2. Before he was led forth, the two robbers were to be condemned; for in cases where no appeal lay to the emperor, or Roman senate, the examination for atrocious offences was little more than nominal; and the speedy sentence of the judge was followed by the immediate punishment of the criminal.

Probably, while our Saviour's trial was pending, these malefactors were brought from the prison to the hall, where the soldiers kept guard that they might be in readiness. In this place, perhaps, the penitent thief might have witnessed the deportment of Jesus, while he was scourged and insulted by the Roman soldiers; and might have conceived that sense of his meekness, holiness, and majesty, which prepared him for the grace of a perfect confession of faith, upon the cross. To the time employed in the trying, condemning, and scourging of these men (according to the Roman law), may we not reckon another full hour? In the meanwhile Christ was guarded by the soldiers; into whose hands therefore he was delivered at seven, or rather earlier.

3. When Pilate had taken his seat on the tribunal, to pronounce sentence of death on Christ, he was interrupted by the message of his wife; still hesitating—he again expostulated with the Jews, and declared the innocence of Jesus; and, when he could prevail nothing, he washed his hands before the multitude, and then decreed his condemnation. These various particulars might altogether occupy about another hour, and they bring us again to the same point—within half an hour of six. Here then the computations meet, whether we reckon from the proi, or back from the third hour: by either account, Pilate “sat down in the judgment-seat” between six and seven in the morning.

The conjecture of Grotius, adopted by Dr. Randolph and other learned men, is very ingenious, but is unsupported by authorities. The Jews, he observes, divided the day into four quarters, as they did the night; each consisting of three hours; and, whatever was done within the space of one of these quarters, might be reckoned to the hour at which the quarter began, or at which it ended. The second quarter began at the third hour, about which time it was supposed our Lord was condemned, and it ended at twelve; about which time he was crucified. St. John mentions the time of his condemnation, St. Mark of his crucifixion. St. John distinguishes the beginning of the second quarter of the day by its latest term, the sixth hour; and St. Mark the conclusion of it, by its earliest term, the third hour. But this hypothesis appears much too forced to be tenable.

NOTE 19.—PART VII.

THERE is no greater difference between the meaning of the words ροζαλινον and ροζαυροον, than there is if one English reader should say a red robe, and another a reddish robe; or than if one French author should use the word rouge, and another rougeatre.—Pilkington, notes to sect. 442.

NOTE 20.—PART VII.

THORNS were the first produce of the earth after the fall of man, and they were worn by our Lord, as a part of his punishment. They were the first fruits of the curse, and were appropriately placed on the head of the Sacred Victim.

Bishop Pearce and Michaelis are of opinion that the crown of thorns was not intended to be an instrument of punishment or torture to his head, but rather to render our Lord an object of ridicule; for which cause they also put a reed in his hand, by way of sceptre, and bowed their knees, pretending to do him homage; and that the crown was not probably of thorns in our sense of the word. Mark xv. 17. and John xix. 5. term it ἀκανθινὸν στέφανον, which might be translated an “acanthine crown,” or wreath formed out of the branches of the herb acanthus, or bear’s-foot. This is a prickly plant, though not like thorny ones, in the common meaning of that word.

Some are of opinion that the plant was similar to that which we call holly: they say that it was selected on account of its resemblance to laurel, with which conquerors were crowned; and they think that the opinion has given rise to the name; holly, quasi holy, in reference to the use made of it on this occasion.

NOTE 21.—PART VII.

OUR Lord would not reveal his dignity to Pilate, because he would not have believed him, and because, as a judge, Pilate was only concerned with his innocence: neither had the time come for an appeal to the Gentiles.

NOTE 22.—PART VII.

By comparing these two passages we obtain one of those innumerable minor yet important proofs of the authenticity of the Scriptures, which demonstrate the impossibility of their being forgeries. St. Luke, who wrote for the Gentiles of Asia, merely mentions the name and country of Simon, who was probably known to the early Christians by character. St. Mark, however, who addressed himself at the dictation of St. Peter (by whose name therefore this Gospel might more properly be called) to the converts at Rome, adds, that Simon was the father of Alexander and Rufus, the latter of whom being a well-known member of the Roman Church, inquiries might be made by the people, of Rufus himself, respecting the circumstances of the crucifixion, which he in all probability would have received from his father. Rufus is saluted by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans (ch. xvi. 13.) which was written many years after the Gospel of St. Mark.

NOTE 23.—PART VII.

ON MATTHEW XXVII. 34. AND MARK XV. 23.

THE Jews always gave wine with incense in it, to stupify and intoxicate the criminal. The custom originated in the precept (Prov. xxxi. 6.), “Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish,” i. e. “to him who is condemned to death.” It would appear from the preceding narrative, that three potions were certainly offered to our Lord, two when he arrived at Golgotha (Matt. xxvii. 34. and Mark xv. 23.), and the third after he had been for some time on the cross. The first draught, vinegar mingled with gall, was most probably offered to him in malice, and derision of his sufferings; our Lord refusing to drink of it, the intoxicating draught, which was usual on such occasions, was then presented; but he declined tasting of either, and drank only of the third, the vinegar, or posca, the common drink of the Roman soldiers; and which was placed in a vessel near the cross for their accommodation.

He was faint and exhausted in body; and though his powers of mind were the same, he required that his humanity should receive the refreshment proffered to him by the bystander.

Although, as we have seen, there appears no difficulty or discrepancy in the accounts of St. Matthew and St. Mark, Michaelis does not hesitate to assert, that there exists a manifest contradiction. He has consequently endeavoured, by conjecture, to reconcile the supposed difference, and has had the singular misfortune to be refuted by himself; by his editor, Bishop Marsh, who has substituted an equally untenable conjecture; and, lastly, by the critic of both, Archbishop Laurence. After comparing the two accounts of St. Matthew and St. Mark, Michaelis decides that St. Mark has given the correct history, and that St. Matthew’s Gospel, which was originally written in Hebrew, was inaccurately translated into Greek. He supposes that the words used in the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew, were such as agreed with the account given by St. Mark, and at the same time were capable of the construction which was put on them by St. Matthew’s Greek translator. Suppose St. Matthew wrote חֶלֶץ בְּמֵרִירָא, which signifies “sweet wine with bitters,” or “sweet wine and myrrh,” as we find it in Mark; and Matthew’s translator overlooked the yod י in חֶלֶץ; he took it for חֶלֶץ, which signifies “vinegar;” and “bitter,” he translated by χολή, as it is often rendered in the Septuagint. Nay, St. Matthew, he proceeds, may have written חֶלֶב, and have still meant to express “sweet wine;” if so, the difference only consisted in the points; for the same word, which, when pronounced “halé,” signifies “sweet,” denotes as soon as it is pronounced “hala,” “vinegar.” The translator of St. Matthew’s Gospel misunderstood the words of the original, but St. Mark has given the true account.

In this criticism, Michaelis may be considered as having refuted himself; for he tells us (p. 151.), that as the Hebrew original of St. Matthew is lost, a comparison can never be instituted between that and the Greek version; and this comparison ALONE can decide the question, if there is any variation between them. It must be observed in answer, it is not possible to ascertain certainly whether St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew or not.

Bishop Marsh has remarked, that the proposed Chaldee reading of Michaelis cannot possibly have given rise to the expression in St. Mark’s text: neither is the construction of חֶלֶב correct. Having pointed out the weakness of the other parts of Michaelis’s criticism, the learned Bishop has proposed a similar elucidation upon the same principle of conjecture. He supposes that the original Chaldee text was חֶלֶב בְּכֹרָא; and that חֶלֶב, which means wine, was confused with חֶמְצָא, vinegar; and likewise כֹּרָא, myrrh, with כֶּרָא, gall. In refutation of these hypotheses, Archbishop Laurence observes: “This strange confusion of words, whether attributable to a transcriber or translator, is greater than seems likely to have happened.” Aware of the objection, Bishop Marsh afterwards proposes another illustration, and presumes that the Chaldee text ran thus, חֶמְצָא בְּכֹרָא which may be rendered, vinum conditum myrrhâ. Yet he adds, that as חֶמְצָא, when a participle, has the signification of turbidum fieri, as well as that of vinum, when a substantive: and as בְּכֹרָא, when a substantive, means acetum, as well as conditum, when a participle, upon this construction the words may be translated, acetum turbatum felle; still supposing, as in the preceding instance, חֶמְצָא to be mistaken for כֶּרָא. “With respect however to this suggestion,” says Archbishop Laurence, “may it not be fairly questioned whether בְּכֹרָא in ancient Chaldee really signifies “vinegar.” No such meaning is affixed to it in Buxtorf’s Lexicon Chaldaic. et Syriac., nor in the Syrochald. Diction. annexed to the Antwerp Bible. In the elder Buxtorf’s Lexicon Chaldaic. et Rabbinic., this sense is indeed given to it; nevertheless, not as the ancient Chaldee sense, but as one of a more recent date, as one to be found only in the Rabboth and the Jerusalem Talmud. The time of the compilation of the Rabboth has been fixed by the Jews to about the year 300 after Christ; but some Christians place it at a later period. Wolf observes, “Patendum hoc est, pro antiquitate rei alicujus demonstrandâ non satis tuto ad Rabboth provocari posse, cum nullo argumento constet, quo tempore hæc vel illa narratio aut expositio subnata sit”.

The Jerusalem Talmud is said by Buxtorf to have been composed about the year 230, or, according to others, about the year 270 (Wolfii Bib. Hebræa, vol. ii. p. 683); but Lightfoot, in his Horæ Heb. in Evang. Matthæi, contends, that it was not written until the fourth century².

Schoetgen also, among the apparent contradictions of the New Testament, enumerates this between St. Matthew and St. Mark, with respect to the potion offered to our Lord upon the cross. St. Matthew, he observes, tells us, they gave him vinegar, mingled with gall, ὄξος μετὰ χολῆς μεμιγμένον (Matt. xxvii. 34.) St. Mark, that they gave him — ξύμμιχρον οἶνον (Mark xv. 24.) Schoetgen would reconcile the two passages by saying, ut myrrha una cum felle dicatur admixta potui, atque vinum fuisse acidum, quod indistincte vinum, et acetum appellari solet. He then goes on to show, that the sour wine was indiscriminately named wine or vinegar; and the wine offered to our Lord might in like manner be called either wine or vinegar.

I cannot but conclude, after an attentive perusal of these and some other criticisms, that the simplest mode of interpreting the passages in question is the best, as being equally consistent and satisfactory. The first potion was probably given to our Lord in derision; the second, the stupifying draught usually administered to criminals; and the third called for from the sufferings of the moment. The hyssop mentioned by St. John in the next verse, may perhaps be considered as possibly to allude to one of the types, which were permitted to point out Christ as the typical paschal lamb. The Jews always commenced this feast by the eating of bitter herbs dipped in vinegar, which was considered as emblematical of purity: see Psalm li. 7.

It must be observed, that in Matt. xxvii. 34., instead of ὄξος, many MSS. read οἶνον. The posca, or common drink of the Roman soldiers, was known by each name: they both convey the same sense³.

ON THE SUPERScription ON THE CROSS.

THE Christian world is deeply indebted to the accurate and learned Dr. Townson for his ingenious criticism on the title placed by Pilate on the cross. The apparent discrepancy between the accounts of this title given by the Evangelists, had been urged as an objection against the inspiration and veracity of the sacred writers. The superscription on the cross was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin; and as the Evangelists all mention the title differently, Dr. Townson conjectured that it was possible it might have slightly varied in each language. As St. Luke wrote for the Gentiles in Achaia, it is probable that he would prefer mentioning the Greek inscription. As St. Matthew addressed the Jews, it is likely therefore that he should use the Hebrew. And as St. Mark principally wrote to the Romans, he would naturally give the Latin inscription. I have observed in my arrangement the order proposed by Dr. Townson. He remarks, the Evangelists all mention this superscription, but every one with some difference, except in the last words, The King of the Jews.

We may reasonably suppose St. Matthew to have recited the Hebrew:—

THIS IS

JESUS, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

And St. John the Greek:—

JESUS THE NAZARENE, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

If it should be asked, why “the Nazarene” was omitted in the Hebrew, and we must assign a reason for Pilate’s humor, perhaps we may thus account for it: He might be informed that Jesus in Hebrew denoted a Saviour (John xi. 49–51.), and as it carried more appearance of such an appellative, or general term, by standing alone, he might choose, by dropping the epithet, The Nazarene, to leave the sense so ambiguous, that it might be thus understood:—

THIS IS

A SAVIOUR, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

Pilate, as little satisfied with the Jews as with himself, on that day, meant the inscription, which was his own, as a dishonor to the nation; and thus set a momentous verity before them, with as much design of declaring it, as Caiaphas had of prophesying, that Jesus should die for the people (John xi. 49–51.) The ambiguity not holding in Greek, the Nazarene might be there inserted in scorn again of the Jews, by denominating their King from a city which they held in the utmost contempt, (John i. 46.)

Let us now view the Latin. It is not assuming much to suppose, that Pilate would not concern himself with Hebrew names, nor risk an impropriety in speaking or writing them. It was thought essential to the dignity of a Roman magistrate, in the times of the republic, not to speak but in Latin on public occasions (Valerius Maximus, b. ii. c. ii. § 2.), of which spirit Tiberius the emperor retained so much, that in an oration to the senate, he apologized for using a Greek word; and once, when they were drawing up a decree, advised them to erase another that had been inserted in it. (Sueton. in Tiberi, c. 71.) The two words were monopoly and emblem. And though the magistrates in general were then become more condescending to the Greeks, they retained this point of state with regard to other nations, whose languages they esteemed barbarous, and would give themselves no trouble of acquiring. Pilate indeed, according to St. Matthew, asked at our Lord’s trial, “Whom will ye that I release unto you, Barabbas, or Jesus, which is called Christ?” And again, “What shall I do with Jesus, which is called Christ?” But I judge this to be related, as the interpreter by whom he spake delivered it, in Hebrew.—(See Wolfius on Matt. xxvii. 2.) For if the other Evangelists have given his exact words, he never pronounced the name of Jesus, but spake of him all along by a periphrasis: “Will ye that I release unto you The King of the Jews?” “What will ye then, that I shall do unto Him whom ye call The King of the Jews?” Thus he acted in conference with the rulers, and then ordered a Latin inscription, without mixture of foreign words, just as St. Mark repeats it:—

THE KING OF THE JEWS,

which is followed by St. Luke, only that he has brought down This is, from the above superscription, as having a common reference to what stood under it.

THIS IS

THE KING OF THE JEWS.

It is very possible that a better account may be given of the three forms of the inscription; but I think I am well founded in asserting that there were variations in it, and that the shortest was that of St. Luke, in the Latin.—Townson’s Works, vol. i. p. 199.

S. Reger has published a Dissertation on the Title on the Cross, and comes nearly to the same conclusions as Townson, who does not however refer to, nor appear to have seen his treatise. He supposes that the inscription varied in each language, and that they might have been written on three several tablets in this manner:—

He mentions many opinions on the imagined difficulty—"Alii enim duos Evangelistas Mat-thæum et Lucam duo verba οὗτός ἐστιν, non ex titulo descripsisse, sed sententiæ perficiendæ gratiâ adjecisse. Alii vero Marcum et Johannem dicta verba neglexisse; præterea tres reliquos cognomen Nazareni; Marcum et Lucam vero nomen proprium JESUS omisisse, quamobrem ex omnium Evangelistarum descrip-tionibus tres conformes formant inscriptiones, hoc modo: οὗτός ἦν ἰησοῦς ὁ νᾶζαρεὺς ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἰουδαίων. Hic est Jesus Nazarenus Rex Judæorum."— See the Dissertation ap. Crit. Sac. vol. xi. p. 241, &c.

NOTE 25.—PART VII.

ON THE NECESSITY OF THE ATONEMENT.

HE hangs upon the cross, for us, and for our salvation! The Son of God dies for the restoration of man! The manifested God, who was present at the creation of this scene of his glory; who, for the sins of one generation of man, brought the deluge of waters upon the earth; He who was seen in the firmament, commanding the fire to descend upon the Cities of the Plain; the Dweller between the cheru-bim, the Form which tabernacled in the moving flame, guiding his people through the wilder-ness; the King of glory, the Lord of angels, the Ruler of the universe, "the Man that was the Fellow of Jehovah," the future Judge of the word, He hangs upon the cross, and offers himself a willing sacrifice for the sins of an offending world. That this Holy and Mighty Being should die as a man, amidst the indigni-ties and cruel mockings of the higher as well as of the lower ranks of his people for the sins of those who pierced him, and of all who in ages to come should believe in this wonderful atonement, is a mystery so truly sublime, that the intellectual powers of man, while in the body, cannot fully comprehend its effects and benefits. This Wonderful and Holy Being, whose mysterious death we are now contem-plating, is revealed to us, not merely as the Lord of mankind, but as the Superior of angels. Evil spirits knew Him, and fled: good spirits ministered to Him. He spake of the invisible world, as of the scene of existence to which He had been accustomed, and of angels and devils as his obedient or rebellious subjects. It is evident, therefore, that the actions of our Lord, while in his state of humiliation, were the subjects of attention to an innumerable host of intellectual and spiritual creatures who, we may suppose, are all more or less interested in the heavenly sacrifice. Angels in humble sub-mission desired to look into this great mystery; fallen spirits retained the malignity of their evil nature, saw, believed, and trembled. They fell from their high estate by their own pride and ambition, without external temptation, and they are left to the consequences of their wilful dis-obedience. Man, having been created of a compound nature, and liable to evil, did not, like them, fall away by his own original, innate perverseness, but by the enticements of a supe-rior and evil spirit. For man Christ died—for man there is hope of salvation, and at this solemn moment the seal was affixed to his par-don. Now was the sentence of eternal punish-ment pronounced upon the evil spirits. Satan fell as lightning from heaven; and the captivity of hell was led captive. The voice of mercy confirmed the angels in their obedience, and taught them also that there was no more sacrifice for sin: and the human race were emancipated from the bondage and degradation of the Fall, and exalted to become, with the angels, the sons of God. Thus was moral order, which had been disturbed through the dominion of evil, by the sin and disobedience of the first Adam, restored to the whole universe by the triumph-ant sacrifice of the second Adam.

Sufficient, therefore, is revealed to us to con-vince us of the necessity of this great atone-ment, and to demonstrate to us the holy indig-nation of the Almighty God against sin and sinners. We all carry about within us the sad marks of our fallen nature. The remembrance of some past sin continually arises to embitter our happiness, and to convince us that we have no power to help ourselves. Man requires some other atonement, some other intercession. His former sins cannot be cancelled by peni-tence or reformation", the only offering he has it in his power to make; "the convert and the sinner are the same individual person; and as such, must be answerable for his whole conduct. His sentiments of himself can only be a mixture of approbation and disapprobation, satisfaction and displeasure. His past sins must still, however sincerely he may have reformed, occasion self-dissatisfaction: and this will ever be the stronger the more he improves in virtue. Now, as this is agreeable to truth, there is reason to conclude, that God beholds him in the same light." Therefore man's redemption must be accomplished by other than himself. It is further evident that the blood of bulls and of goats could not take away sin; they were not of the same nature and origin as man, and therefore incapable of making an expiation for the sin he had contracted. These were only the types and figures of a more perfect sacrifice—of that holy victim who was appointed before the foundation of the world. Neither could the sacrifice of any ordinary man make satisfaction for us, because it is clear he would only suffer that punishment which his own sins had deserved; and no satisfaction can be made for others, by suffering that which justice requires for our own offences. No ordinary man could raise himself from the dead, or procure that redemption for another, which he could not obtain for himself. Neither could any ordinary man make satisfaction to the violated laws of God by a life of sinless obedience. He only who had power to lay down his life, and take it up again, could procure for man a resurrection, and deliver him from the eternal death his sins had incurred. He alone, who took upon him human nature, that He might set us an example of human virtue, "who knew no sin," who was perfect and spotless, the Lamb of God, could satisfy the purity of divine justice or reconcile it with his mercy, and the economy of his government. Throughout the whole system of the divine dispensations, the Father uniformly acts by the ministry of the Son, and the Son by the ministry of the Holy Ghost. Had the divine acceptance been wanting to the oblation of our Lord's body, whatsoever virtue it possessed in itself, it would have been incapable of procuring the pardon of sin, or of redeeming man from its punishment and power. Whatsoever he purchased for us, he purchased of the Father by compact, or agreement"; and He is now exalted to the right hand of God, to make there his mysterious intercession for the sins of his people.

As the second Adam, the blessed Lord took our humanity; he restored it to its original dignity and innocence, and then made a sacrifice of it upon the cross, as a vicarious atonement for the sins of the first, and through him of all mankind. He was nailed to the accursed tree, the emblem of Adam's transgression, and was crowned with a crown of thorns, the first fruits of his disobedience. The religion which he died to establish was of an internal, spiritual nature. It was a life of holiness and self-sacrifice. It required the crucifixion of the whole animal and inferior nature; and that the motives, and even the thoughts of the heart, should be brought into subjection. It required a new birth, a new life, of which baptism is the beautiful emblem, teaching us, that as infants are washed immediately on their natural birth, so must the children of God, with Christ, be born again through the grave and death of sin, into the spiritual kingdom, by water and the Spirit. If, during the progress of life, the animal is allowed to triumph over the spiritual man, then the sin of the first Adam still cleaves to us, and the sacrifice of the second Adam pleads for us in vain. The animal life perishes with the body; the accountable life exists through eternity. If the natural man be spiritualized by the subjugation of the flesh, he becomes pure and holy, the companion of angels; but if he be polluted and degraded by his contagion, he then defiles himself, loses the divine properties of his first being, and is fitted only for association with devils and evil spirits. To this fearful condition man was reduced by the fall of the first Adam. To revoke this curse, Christ, the second Adam, became our atonement, by the sacrifice of the whole of the offending, but, in him, sinless nature, upon the tree of the cross: demonstrating to all the world, that the sacrifice of self is the way of salvation, and the most acceptable offering that man can render to his Creator.

Deeply do I pity that blind man, who prefers rather to trust to his own merits, than by faith in the great atonement to hope for salvation through the blood of Christ. Deeply do I feel for him, when he shall be called upon to appear before the judgment-seat of a rejected Saviour, with all his imperfections, all his frailties, and all his violations of duty upon his head, to answer in an unknown state of inconceivable glory, before men and angels, for the sins committed in the body; having spurned the sheltering protection of that MAN who is both a covert from the wind, and a refuge from the storm. How can he hope to escape the wrath of God pronounced upon every offender against his holy laws, when his own beloved Son, as our substitute, who alone bore our sins, underwent such dreadful agonies, both in body and soul? He, who has declared himself of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, has also declared, as fully and plainly, and as repeatedly, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins:" and what blood can have been shed for their remission, but the blood of Christ?

Bishop Watson, in speaking of that arrogant and dogmatical theology, that decrees the rejection of the doctrine of atonement, as inconsistent with the divine attribute of merey, uses the following just observations:—"We know assuredly that God delighteth not in blood; that he hath no cruelty, no vengeance, no malignity, no infirmity, nor any passion in his nature: but we do not know whether the requisition of an atonement for transgression may not be an emanation of his infinite mercy, rather than a demand of his infinite justice. We do not know whether it may not be the very best means of preserving the innocence and happiness not only of us, but of all other free and intelligent beings. We do not know whether the suffering of an innocent person may not be productive of a degree of good, infinitely surpassing the evil of such sufferance; nor whether such a quantum of good could by any other means have been produced".

NOTE 26.—PART VII.

OUR Lord, at the time when he made the gracious promise to the criminal on the cross, was reduced to the lowest state of degradation and contempt. He was deserted by all but his beloved disciple, his mother, and two other holy women, who were standing by the cross, the weeping and agonized spectators of his sufferings. His disciples had forsaken him and fled. The assembled multitude of his enemies and persecutors embittered every pang, by their cruel and exulting mockeries. The Evangelists mention all kinds and classes of people, as if for the purpose of demonstrating the universal rejection of our Lord by the Jewish nation. The people stood beholding—and the rulers with them, deriding—the soldiers mocked him, coming to him, and offering him vinegar—the passers by reviled him, and railed on him—the chief priests mocked him, with the scribes and elders—even the very thief on the cross reviled him, and joined in the common mockery. At this moment of general insult and rejection, the penitent thief alone declared his belief in the innocence of the holy Jesus, and made a public confession of his faith in the divine sufferer.

Our Lord's answer to the penitent thief fully declared that, although in his human form he was faint and dying, enduring the extreme of pain and torture, he was the Lord of the invisible world, and still retained his divine attribute, the power of forgiving sins. The assembled people loudly and unanimously demanded of him to prove his former pretensions by a miracle. They called upon him to come down from the cross to save himself, and they would believe him. They seemed to consider this as a fair challenge. They supposed it impossible that any one, who possessed the power, would not use it under such trying circumstances. They therefore required him to release his body from torture, from the nails, and the wood, and come among them. But, ever consistent with himself, and faithful to the duties of his divine mission, instead of complying with their wishes, which were confined to temporal objects, he showed the nature of his kingdom by the promise of salvation to a repentant soul. The Jews had frequently threatened to kill Christ, because he asserted his power to forgive sin. "Who can forgive sins," they exclaimed, "but God alone?" and therefore, according to their own acknowledgment and belief, he still persevered in his divine claims; and at the point of death proclaimed that their long-promised God was before them, obscured in the form of a man.

The forgiveness of the penitent thief may be considered as revealing to us that God's mercy may be extended to the last moments of life; but we have no reason whatever to presume that it shall be so with any of us. No human being can ever again be placed in the same situation as this criminal. We cannot be called upon to follow our Saviour to Calvary, to witness his dying agonies; to hear the bitter tauntings of the rabble, and, in the midst of derision and suffering, to declare our faith in a crucified Saviour. When Christ shall again become visible to man, He will be seen in his glory, and all the holy angels with him. Let no man therefore be guilty of delaying repentance, with the hope of eventual salvation, because the penitent thief was forgiven at the last. The account of the pardoned criminal is related by one Evangelist only, as if the Holy Spirit foresaw the perversion of the passage. "One instance only," to use the language of a celebrated divine, "of the acceptance of a dying repentance is recorded; one, that none might despair, and only one, that none might presume."

NOTE 27.—PART VII.

ON OUR LORD'S EXCLAMATION ON THE CROSS.

DR. EDWARDS thinks that the words were repeated twice. The commentators have been much divided as to their signification. Rosenmüller considers the words of our Lord as an expression of suffering and of prayer, which he appropriated to himself. Such also is the opinion of Dr. Pyc Smith, who both in his excellent Discourse on the Atonement, and in his work On the Person of Christ, considers the words as connected with the sequel and general design of the Psalm, of which it is the commencement, and expressing the extinction of all present and sensible comfort. Such also is the generally-received opinion, and the writers in the Critici Sacri, on Matt. xxvii. 46. interpret the passage in a similar manner.

Lightfoot, however, has proposed another interpretation of our Lord's exclamation; he would read it, not, "Why hast thou forsaken me, or left me to the feeling of any spiritual desertion;" but, "Why hast thou left me to such hands, and to such cruel usage?"

Dr. A. Clarke is likewise inclined to favor this interpretation. The exclamation of our Lord (Matt. xxvii. 46.) he would thus render: "How astonishing is the wickedness of those persons, into whose hands I have fallen." God is said in Scripture to do, what he permits to be done, and no decisive argument can be drawn therefore from the expression to prove that he was deserted by his Father. He confirms this interpretation from Mark xv. 34.; the words of which passage, he observes, agree pretty nearly with this translation of the Hebrew—Elis ti me eukaiéleipes; "to what (sort of persons, understood) hast thou left me?" A literal translation of the passage in the Syriac Testament gives a similar sense: Ad quid dereliquisti me? "To what hast thou abandoned me?" And an ancient copy of the old Itala version, a Latin translation before the time of St. Jerome, renders the words thus: Quare me in opprobrium dedisti? "Why hast thou abandoned me to reproach?"

"It may be objected, that this can never agree with the ivari, 'why,' of Matthew. To this it is answered, that ivari must have here the same meaning as elis ti, as the translation of למה, lama; and that if the meaning be at all different, we must follow that Evangelist who expresses most literally the meaning of the original: and let it be observed, that the Septuagint often translate למה by ivari, instead of elis ti, which evidently proves that it often had the same meaning. Whatever may be thought of the above mode of interpretation, one thing is certain, that the words could not be used by our Lord in the sense in which they are generally understood. This is sufficiently evident; for he well knew why he was come unto that hour, nor could he be forsaken of God, in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. The Deity, however, might restrain so much of its consolatory support, as to leave the human nature fully sensible of all its sufferings; so that the consolations might not take off any part of the keen edge of his passion: and this was necessary to make his sufferings meritorious. And it is probable, that this is all that is intended by our Lord's quotation from the twenty-second Psalm. Taken in this view, the words convey an unexceptionable sense, even in the common translation^x."

NOTE 28.—PART VII.

IN John xix. 28. we read, "Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst;" and now, that he hath taken the vinegar, he said, "It is finished," that is, this act was the last circumstance that remained to be fulfilled of all the ancient prophecies and predictions. He took the proffered cup of vinegar, and thereby closed and sealed, by his blood, the Levitical Dispensation, and brought in a more perfect one.

"They gave me gall for my meat,

In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink."

Ps. lxix. 21.

Even the most minute circumstances of our Saviour's life and death were foretold by the Spirit of prophecy many centuries before his birth, and they have all been literally and absolutely fulfilled. See the eloquent passages of Taylor, Horsley, and Porteus, on this section.

NOTE 29.—PART VII.

It is singular that our translators have not observed the three modes of expression which the Evangelists have here adopted. Mark and Luke say ἐξέπνευσε, "he expired." John xix. 30. παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, "he yielded up his spirit." Matthew xxvii. 50. ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα, "he dismissed his spirit." The spirits of mere men are in general violently separated from the body, in a way over which they can have no control: it was for our Lord only to die as the Prince of Life, by an act of supernatural power, and to separate, at his own pleasure, and at his own command, the spirit from the body.

PART VIII.

NOTE 1.—PART VIII.

ON THE BURIAL AND RESURRECTION OF OUR LORD.

WHEN our first parents disobeyed the command of God, we are told, that their “eyes were opened.” The word in the original language^a, which is thus rightly translated, is applied to the breaking forth of a flower from its calyx. The proper meaning, therefore, of the passage seems to be, that as a flower bursts forth at the appointed season from the darkness and imprisonment of the enclosing calyx, so did our first parents enter upon an entirely new mode of existence, when they had taken of the forbidden fruit. We are unable to form any adequate idea of their condition in a state of innocence. Our notions are so uniformly derived from experience, that we cannot, from the intended indefiniteness of the language of Scripture, represent to ourselves the primeval innocence and happiness of a sinless state. Whatever it might have been, the narration of the Fall assures us of this important fact, that their condition in their new existence arose out of the state of their minds, in their former paradise. They desired evil before they committed an act of sin, and thus began an unfitness for remaining in a spiritual and perfect state: they accomplished the act which was forbidden, and thus completed that unfitness. The account of the Fall shows us that the principle of evil being admitted into the heart, and ruling there, renders man unfit for the immediate presence of God, in a spiritual or heavenly condition, and therefore banishes us from heaven by its own nature: and those, therefore, who die under its influence, carry with them into an invisible state, an eternal incapacity for the enjoyment of that place or state, to which Christians will be exalted. As our first parents carried with them, into the new and fallen condition, into which sin had brought them, the memory of their transgression, the consciousness of the justice of God, and all the same powers of reasoning, will, reflection, and the other intellectual faculties, which they had before exercised and perverted—in like manner shall all their descendants enter upon their future life, with the consciousness of their relative situation with respect to the Almighty, with the memory of the actions done in their state of probation, and with all the powers and faculties which now enable them to think, act, and reason. If the soul be immortal, its properties and powers must be immortal also. The man continues the same, both in the present and future stages of his existence, so long as the same consciousness, memory, and powers are united^b.

The doctrine of the resurrection of the body is one of the most important in the Inspired Volume, and as such a visible demonstration of its truth has been vouchsafed to us in the Patriarchal, the Levitical, and Christian Dispensations. The resurrection of the body of Christ is an earnest of our own resurrection, and shows us in what form we shall arise from the dead: for we are assured that we shall be like unto him. As the second Adam rose from the dead with a real body, so shall he also “cause the fashion of our body of humiliation to be made like unto his body of glory, according to the energy of his power, subduing all things to himself^c.” The resurrection shows to us the manner in which we shall be clothed with a body, which shall be suited to the invisible world. It has completed the chain of evidence which convinces us of our immortality. It demonstrates, by an undeniable fact, the certainty of our future existence, and the unjustifiable folly of those who live in this stage of their being without preparation for the next. It is the one indissoluble link which unites heaven and earth.

In proportion to the importance of this fundamental doctrine has ever been the discussion respecting its evidence and truth. Various objections have been at various times adduced, for the purpose of impugning the truth of the different accounts of the resurrection given by the Evangelists. These may be all classed under the separate heads of—difficulties arising from the conciseness and studied brevity of the Evangelists—from the accounts of the angels, whether they were the same or different—from the terms used by the Evangelists to denote the respective times, when the several parties who attended at an early hour at the sepulchre set out, or arrived there—and likewise the difficulty which arises from the description of the tomb. These objections will be discussed in the notes to this part, which has been arranged after a most careful and repeated investigation of the several plans of harmonies, proposed by the principal writers on the subject. It may, however, be necessary to premise, with respect to the first principal difficulties now mentioned, that the Evangelists wrote without any intention of giving a harmonized narrative of all the occurrences which took place on the morning of the resurrection. Each mentions more particularly the circumstances which he considered most important to be known by those whom he addressed; and, in most instances, one seems to supply what the other had omitted.

^b I have not thought it necessary to allude here to the curious questions which have been agitated, respecting the nature of the body of Adam before he fell; and whether we shall rise from the dead in the same form, or whether the resurrection body will be surrounded with a glory, such as clothed the form of the man who is represented by Ezekiel as appearing between the cherubim.—See on these points, Lord Barrington's Essay on the Dispensations, 1732, p. 11, note.

^c Horsley's Four Sermons on the Resurrection, p. 219.

The intention of St. Matthew was, to counteract the impression produced by the falsehoods of the high priests, and the keepers of the sepulchre. St. Mark notices those things of which St. Peter, under whose inspection his Gospel was written, must have been an eye-witness: and St. Luke takes up the narrative of events on the day of the resurrection where St. Matthew left off, and introduces another party, who came later to the sepulchre; and adds some things which took place on that day, which St. Matthew had omitted. John added some events in which himself had been more especially concerned, and which he had witnessed.

The second difficulty, the appearances of the angels, has been considered as the most important, but without just reason. We are unacquainted even with the laws of animal life; we know of some facts, and deduce some inferences, but of the laws of life we still remain ignorant. It ought not, therefore, to excite surprise that we cannot comprehend the laws of angelic life. These beings might have become visible or invisible at pleasure; or they might at pleasure have altered their appearance. The same angel spirit who assumed a terrible countenance to overawe the guards might have put on a mild and tranquil aspect when he addressed the women. Other angels might have been attending, though they were invisible while their companions spoke: and though a short time only elapsed between the arrival of the second party, and the departure of the first, no difficulty can be justly drawn from the inquiry, whether it was the same angel or another? The general conclusion, however, is, that the angels of St. Matthew and St. Mark were different. The angel mentioned by Matthew, xxviii. 1., sat in the porch of the tomb, and had assumed a terrible appearance to overawe the guard; but the angel, Mark xvi. 5., was another withinside the sepulchre, in the inner apartment. The two angels spoken of by John, xx. 11., were seen some short time after those mentioned by Matthew and Mark (Matt. xxviii. 1. and Mark xvi. 5.), but whether they were the same, or different, cannot possibly be ascertained. Neither can it be determined whether the angels who manifested themselves to the second party of women, recorded by St. Luke, xxiv. 4., were the same or different. They are represented as appearing like lightning, with a raiment white as snow—as young men clothed in long white garments, the appointed guardians of the crucified body of their Lord, and the happy spectators of his glorious and triumphant victory over death, and the powers of darkness.

The third difficulty, respecting the time, will be discussed in the notes to the seventh section.

The fourth difficulty is local, and has arisen from want of sufficient attention to the particular structure of the holy sepulchre; which consisted of two parts, the porch, or anti-chamber, from which a narrow passage led into the inner vault, or tomb, where the body was deposited. Matthew critically distinguishes τάφος, “the tomb,” from μνημεῖον, “the sepulchre,” in general. The other Evangelists use μνήμα, and μνημεῖον indiscriminately^d. This difficulty will be more particularly considered in the notes to the twelfth section.

In reply, however, to all the general objections which have been made to the minor circumstances here alluded to, we may assert, with the utmost boldness and confidence, that we have abundant and every requisite evidence to convince us of the truth and certainty of the fact, of the resurrection of the body of Christ. It would be impossible to enumerate the many writers who have illustrated this subject, and demonstrated the certainty of the fact. The last^e who has discussed it has considered the various proofs, as they may be derived,— 1st, From the prophecies of Jesus, that at a certain time he was to rise from the dead.

2d, From the fact that at this precise time his body was, by the confession of all who had access to know, not to be found in the sepulchre in which it had been laid, although the most effectual precaution had been taken to prevent its removal.

3d, From the positive testimony of the disciples, that after this time they frequently saw him, conversed with him, and received from him those instructions upon which they acted in publishing his Gospel.

4th, From the success which attended their preaching, founded upon the alleged fact that he had actually risen.

All of which arguments are considered at great length, in an admirable and forcible manner. Mr. Horne^s too has summed up the collective evidence in support of this great event with his usual perspicuity. "If we peruse," he observes, "the history of that event with care, we must conclude either that Christ arose, or that his disciples stole his body away. The more we consider the latter alternative, the more impossible it appears. Every time, indeed, that our Saviour attempted to perform a miracle, he risked his credit on its accomplishment: had he failed in one instance, that would have blasted his reputation forever. The same remark is applicable to his predictions: had any one of them failed, that great character which he had to support would have received an indelible stain. Of all his predictions, there is none on which he and his disciples laid greater stress, than that of his resurrection. So frequently, indeed, had Jesus Christ publicly foretold that he would rise again on the third day, that those persons who caused him to be put to death, were acquainted with this prediction; and, being in power, used every possible means to prevent its accomplishment, or any imposition on the public in that affair.

"After the crucifixion and death of Christ, the chief priests applied to Pilate, the Roman governor, for a watch, and sealed the sepulchre in which the body was deposited. By this guard of Roman soldiers was the tomb watched; and on the resurrection of Christ, they went and related it to the chief priests, who bribed them with money, promising to secure their persons from danger, and charged them to affirm, that Christ's disciples stole his body away while they were sleeping, (Matthew xxviii. 11-15.) This flight of the soldiers, their declaration to the high priests and elders, the subsequent conduct of the latter, the detection and publication of their collusion with the soldiers by the apostles, and the silence of the Jews on that subject, who never attempted to refute or to contradict the declarations of Christ's disciples—are all strong evidences of the reality and truth of his resurrection. A few additional considerations will suffice to show the falsehood of the assertion made by the chief priests.

"On the one hand, the terror of the timid disciples, who were afraid to be seen, and the paucity of their number; on the other hand, the authority of Pilate and of the Sanhedrin; the great danger attending such an enterprise as the stealing of Christ's body, the impossibility of succeeding in such an attempt, both from the number of armed men who guarded the tomb, and also from the lightness of the night, it being the time of full moon, at the great annual festival, when the city was full of people, and many probably passed the whole night (as Jesus and his disciples had done) in the open air, the sepulchre also being so near the city as to be enclosed within the walls; all these circumstances combine to render such an imposture as that, which was palmed upon the Jews, utterly unworthy of credit. For, in the first place, is it probable that so many men as composed the guard would all fall asleep in the open air at once? 2. Is it at all probable that a Roman guard should be found off their watch, much less asleep, when, according to the Roman military laws, it was instant death to be found in such a state? 3. Could they be so soundly asleep as not to awake with all the noise which must necessarily be made by removing the great stone from the mouth of the sepulchre, and taking away the body? 4. Is it at all likely that these timid disciples could have had sufficient time to do all this, without being perceived by any person? How could soldiers, armed, and on guard, suffer themselves to be overreached by a few timorous people? 5. 'Either,' says Augustine, 'they were asleep or awake: if they were awake, why should they suffer the body to be taken away? If asleep, how could they know that the disciples took it away? How dare they, then, depose that it was stolen?' From the testimony of the enemies of Christianity, therefore, the resurrection of Christ may be fully proved.

"Further, the conduct of the priests and elders towards the soldiers evidently implies a conviction that our Saviour was actually risen. They were now certain that he was not in the tomb. If there had been any suspicion that his disciples were in possession of the dead body, these rulers, for their own credit, would instantly have imprisoned them, and used means to recover it, which would have quashed the report of his resurrection for ever. There can be no doubt, therefore, of their conviction that he was actually risen from the dead. If Jesus had appeared to the priests and rulers, it could have served no good purpose, as they were already convinced of the fact, but would not acknowledge it to the people. Supposing that his appearance to them, after his resurrection, would have changed their minds, and induced them publicly to confess the truth, the testimony of the priests and rulers would have been very suspicious to posterity; it would have been said that they were influenced by some political motive. Besides, this would have weakened the testimony of the disciples; for the men who bribed the soldiers could secretly have bribed them; therefore the support of the priests and rulers would have rendered the declaration of the chosen witnesses suspicious. Their inveterate opposition to the cause, and violent persecution of the Christians, remove all suspicion of priestcraft and political design. If the disciples had agreed to impose upon the world in this affair, common sense would have directed them, first to spread the report that our Lord was risen from the grave, and then to employ an individual, whom they could trust, to personate him, and to appear before the multitude in such a manner and at such times as would not endanger a discovery: as our Lord never appeared to the multitude after his resurrection, this removed all suspicion that the disciples had contrived a scheme for deceiving the people.

"These considerations show that our Saviour's appearance, after he rose from the dead, only to a competent number of witnesses, who were intimately acquainted with him before his decease, is a circumstance highly calculated to establish the truth of his resurrection to posterity.

"The character of the apostles also proves the truth of the resurrection of Jesus Christ; and there are nine considerations which give their evidence sufficient weight, viz.

"1. The condition of these witnesses.—They were not men of power, riches, eloquence, or credit, to impose upon the world. They were poor, and mean, and despised: they were also incredulous of the fact itself. It is evident, that though our Saviour foretold his resurrection, yet after his death the disciples did not expect it, and therefore were with difficulty convinced of its reality. But as it was a subject of the highest importance to them and to the world, they obtained the fullest satisfaction of its truth. Intimately acquainted with his person after his resurrection, they felt his body, frequently examined his person, renewed the private conversations which he had with them before his decease, and enjoyed an intimacy with him, as removed the possibility of their being deceived.

"2. The number of these witnesses.—This was more than sufficient to establish any fact. When St. Paul published a defence of our Lord's resurrection, he declared to the world that Jesus appeared to five hundred witnesses at one time; and he appealed to a number of them, who were then alive, for the truth of his assertion. Could all those men agree voluntarily to maintain a vile falsehood, not only altogether unprofitable, but also such as involved them in certain dishonor, poverty, persecution, and death? According to their own principles, either as Jews or Christians, if this testimony, to which they adhered to the last moment of their lives, had been false, they exposed themselves to eternal misery. Under such circumstances, these men could not have persevered in maintaining a false testimony, unless God had wrought a miracle in human nature to enable impostors to deceive the world.

"3. The facts, which they themselves avow:—not suppositions, distant events, or events related by others, but real facts, which they have beheld with their own eyes. "That . . . which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life . . . declare we unto you." (1 John i. 1. 3.)

"4. Observe the tribunals before which they gave evidence. The members of these tribunals were Jews and heathens, philosophers and rabbis, courtiers and lawyers. If they had been impostors, the fraud would certainly have been discovered.

"5. The place in which they bore testimony.—It was not at a distance where it would have been difficult to detect them if they asserted a falsehood; but at Jerusalem, in the synagogue, in the prætorium.

"6. The agreement of their evidence.—These witnesses were separated from one another: many of them were imprisoned, separately examined, severely tried, and cruelly tortured, yet they all agreed in every part of their testimony. In no instance whatever did they contradict either themselves or one another; but cheerfully sealed with their blood this truth,—that they saw and conversed with Jesus after he was risen from the dead. Every person, possessed of common sense, must see the absolute impossibility of this agreement among the witnesses, if the subject of their testimony had been a falsehood.

"7. The time when this evidence was given.—It was not after the lapse of several years, but only three days after our Saviour's crucifixion, that they declared he was risen—yea, even before the rage of his enemies was quelled, and while Calvary was yet dyed with the blood they had shed. If the resurrection of Christ had been a fraud, it is not likely that the apostles would have come forward in open day, and thus publicly have affirmed it.

"8. Consider the motives, which induced them to publish the fact of Christ's resurrection:—It was not to acquire fame, riches, glory, or profit.—By no means. On the contrary, they exposed themselves to sufferings and death, and proclaimed the truth from a conviction of its importance and certainty.

"9. Lastly, the miracles performed by these witnesses in the name of Jesus, and in confirmation of their declaration concerning the resurrection of Jesus, are God's testimony to their veracity. No subject was ever more public, more investigated, or better known, than the transactions of the apostles. St. Luke, an historian of great character, who witnessed many of the things which he relates, published the Acts of the Apostles among the people who saw the transactions. It would have blasted his character to have published falsehoods which must instantly be detected; it would have ruined the credit of the Church to have received, as facts, notorious falsehoods. Now the Acts of the Apostles were written by St. Luke, received by the Church, and no falsehood was ever detected in that book by Jew or Gentile. The primitive fathers attest its truth and authenticity, and heathen authors record some of the important facts which are related by the sacred historian. In the second chapter, we are informed that the apostles, who were known to be unlearned fishermen, began to speak the several languages of those people, who at that time were assembled at Jerusalem from different countries. When the people were astonished at this undoubted proof of inspiration, the apostles thus addressed the multitude:—‘Ye men of Israel, hear these words! Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you, by miracles and signs (which God did by him in the midst of you), as ye yourselves also know—this Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are all witnesses.’ To the gift of tongues, as a proof of inspiration, was added a number of undoubted miracles, in confirmation of this testimony concerning Jesus Christ, which are related in the Acts of the Apostles, and were published among the people who witnessed them.”

Though these arguments are apparently sufficient to satisfy the most determined skeptic, we are by no means contented to rest the merits of this cause upon general statements alone. As the Evangelical narrative has been so frequently objected to by the opponents of Christianity, many writers who have been as willing as the most resolute skeptic to abandon the cause of Christianity, if they had deemed it on inquiry to be unworthy of support, have devoted so much attention to this part of the inspired history, that every incident recorded, and every word that relates it, have been repeatedly examined with the most acute and diligent attention; and the result has been, to place the authenticity of the sacred story on the firmest foundation.

The principal embarrassment in the history of the resurrection arises from the account of the time at which the women came to the sepulchre. It was long supposed that they came there together, and a great difficulty was consequently felt, as to the one angel mentioned by Matthew and Mark, and the two mentioned by St. Luke. Lightfoot has endeavoured to reconcile this apparent discrepancy, by supposing that they saw one angel, as they went together, sitting on the entrance stone, and another in the inside; a solution which appears by no means satisfactory. The reasoning by which the later harmonizers have concluded that there were two, and not one party of women only, will be given in the notes to the second section.

By one of those singular coincidences which sometimes occur, three competent and learned men were engaged at the same time in studying the scriptural account of the resurrection. These were Pilkington, a country clergyman, whose work is a monument of patient investigation; Doddridge, the well-known author of the Family Expositor; and West, a layman; whose Treatise on the Resurrection will always be valued by those who would understand the evidences of their religion. These three writers, unknown to each other, all came to similar conclusions respecting two companies of women. Mr. West's work was actually published when Pilkington's was ready for publication; and the latter has directed his reader to correct one of his sections, in consequence of Mr. West's observations on the resurrection. The section itself had been printed off. Dr. Doddridge had but just published the part of his Expositor, containing the Gospels, and at the end of his postscript to this part of his work, he thanks Mr. West for the advantage he had derived from his labors, and points out in what respects they had differed from each other. The only variation with respect to the two parties of women is, that Doddridge supposed them to have left the city by different ways, and therefore that they did not meet till they arrived at the tomb.

As it may seem necessary to give some account of the several theories of the three authors who have so deeply studied this subject, (before the plan I have adopted be considered,) I shall give here the abstract of the harmonies of the resurrection proposed by West, and by Dr. Townson; the elaborate work of the latter being a correction, and a more systematic arrangement of the whole account laid down by the former. To these I shall add that of Mr. Cranfield, of Trinity college, Dublin, who, in a prize essay on the subject, proceeded with great attention once more through the whole mass of reading necessary to enable him to decide on some minute points in which he differs from Dr. Townson. In the disposal of each event in this Arrangement, no notes will be requisite where the harmonizers are agreed; where they differ, the reasons will be assigned.

I have endeavoured to express in the titles to the sections, the conclusions to which I have been led from the perusal of these authors.

The best abstract of Mr. West's plan is that compiled by Dr. Doddridge, in the postscript to the first part of the Family Expositor.

“During the time of our blessed Redeemer's lying in the grave, several of the pious women who had attended him from Galilee, together with some of their female friends and acquaintance at Jerusalem, agreed to meet at his sepulchre early on the morning of the third day, to embalm the body. Mary Magdalene, the other Mary, Salomé, and Joanna, were principal persons in this appointment: the chief care of preparing, that is, pounding, mixing, and melting the spices, was left to Joanna and her company, who were to be there about sunrising; whereas the two Marys and Salomé (of whom Matthew and Mark chiefly write) came thither, πρωί, before the appointed time early in the morning, or as the day dawned, in order, θεωρεῖσαι, to view the sepulchre, that they might judge whether they and their companions could be able to remove the stone which closed it, or whether it would be necessary to call in other assistance, as they then knew nothing of the guard which was set upon it. While these three women last mentioned were on their way, Jesus arose, when the angel had opened the sepulchre and struck the guards into amazement and consternation; the consequence of which was, that some of them went to the Jewish rulers, and joined in contriving and propagating the senseless falsehood of the body being stolen, and others went into other parts of the city, and told the matter as it really was. In the mean time, the angel disappeared, and Mary Magdalene, approaching the sepulchre, discerned from some distance that the very large stone that stopped it was rolled away, and, concluding from thence that the body was removed, left the other Mary and Salomé to wait for Joanna and her company, while she herself ran to Peter and John, to acquaint them with what she had discovered. While she was gone, these two (the other Mary and Salomé) went toward the sepulchre, and entering into it, saw, to their great astonishment, an angel, who told them that Jesus, whom he knew they sought, was not there, but was risen from the dead, and gave it them in charge to go and acquaint his disciples with it, and to let them know that he would give them a meeting in Galilee. The greatness of their consternation prevented them from saying any thing immediately to any one, even to some of their own company, who might pass and repass within their view at least, and so occasioned a delay which left room for some other circumstances. Just as they were on their return, Peter and John came (perhaps passing by them at some distance,) and Mary Magdalene followed them. John at his first arrival only looked into the sepulchre; but when Peter came and entered it, John went in too, and from the circumstances in which he saw things, believed that Jesus was risen; though the angel (who could appear or disappear at pleasure) did not render himself visible to either. They returned to the city; and Mary Magdalene, who was now alone, stooping down to look into the sepulchre, saw two angels; but (perhaps imagining they were two young men, whom curiosity or accident might have brought thither) took little notice of them, and continued weeping in deep thought and distress, till Jesus appeared, and made himself known to her in those very remarkable words, John xx. 17., which Mr. West illustrates with some very peculiar observations^ε. Leaving her very suddenly, our Lord appeared to the other Mary and Salomé, whom he permitted to embrace his feet, comforted them under their fear, and renewed the assurance the angel had given them, that he would meet his disciples in Galilee. While these things were passing at some distance, and the scene at the sepulchre was clear, Joanna and the women who brought the spices (and of whom Luke only writes) came, and entering into the sepulchre, at first saw no one in it, till the two angels, who a few minutes before had appeared to Mary Magdalene, made themselves visible to Joanna and her attendants, and assuring them of the resurrection of Jesus, reminded them how it had been foretold by himself, with the previous circumstances of his sufferings, but gave them no charge concerning the information to be carried to the apostles; that having been committed to the others. Yet (as it was natural to suppose they would) some of this second company ran to the city, and, by whatever accident it happened, reached the eleven, and some other disciples who were with them, before the two Marys and Salomé arrived, telling them (which was all they could tell them), that they had seen a vision of angels, who asserted that Jesus was alive. Peter, on this, ran a second time to the sepulchre (Luke xxiv. 12.), and not entering as before, but only stooping down and looking into it, he saw no angels, or any thing else but, τὰ ὀθόρια κελευρα μόνα, 'only the linen clothes lying' there, on which he returned; and just on his making that report, the two disciples who went that day to Emmaus, or some from whom they received their information (Luke xxiv. 22-24.), left the place before the arrival of the two Marys and Salomé; who retarded, as was hinted above, by some unknown accident, (perhaps by guessing wrong as to the place where they might find the largest company together,) at last, however, reached them, and made abundant satisfaction for the little delay (for all might perhaps have passed in an hour), by assuring them, not only that they also had seen an angel, who informed them of their Lord's resurrection, but that Jesus himself had appeared to them, and had even permitted himself to be touched by two of them."

^ε "Mr. West observes, that this text, 'I am not yet ascended,' &c. comprehends in a few words a variety of most important hints, which have not commonly been taken notice of in them; particularly that our Lord intended by them to recall to the minds of his disciples the discourse he had with them three nights before, in which he explained what he meant by going to the Father (John xvi. 28.); and by twice using the word 'ascend,' designed to intimate, that he was to go up to heaven, not merely in spirit, as the pious dead do, but by a corporeal motion and translation, and that it would be some time before he took his final leave of earth by this intended ascension; all which weighty expressions and predictions concur with a thousand other circumstances to show how impossible it was that such an apprehended appearance should have been merely the result of a disordered imagination; a consideration which Mr. West illustrates at large, as he also does the mistaken apprehension of the disciples, who, when some of their companions, whose veracity they could not suspect, testified they had seen the Lord, thought his body was not risen, but that it was only his spirit that appeared to them."

This is Mr. West's scheme of this important story; and the reader will perceive, that it chiefly differs from that of Dr. Doddridge in these two circumstances:—That it supposes the women to have made two different visits to the sepulchre, and, in consequence of that, two distinct reports; whereas his unites them, (though he does not suppose they came all together, but that they met there): and that it also makes Peter to have run to it twice, of which there can be no reasonable doubt, though Dr. Doddridge, before he perused Mr. West's plan, had incorporated Luke's account with that of John, relating to his running thither with John, on Mary Magdalene's first report.

Dr. Townson prefaces his plan by observing, that the chief difficulties which occur in the evangelical history of the Lord Jesus, from his death to his ascension, are found in the morning of his resurrection. The events related of it fell within a short space of time, and were nearly coincident, or quickly successive to each other. They are told briefly, and but in part, by the Evangelists, with few notes of time or order in the Gospel relative to another. It cannot therefore excite surprise, that learned men have judged variously of their connexion, and have pursued different methods of reducing them into one narrative. Many of them have succeeded so far as to show by a very probable arrangement, that the Gospels are wholly reconcilable with each other.

This is an important point; yet what may suffice to prove that there are not characters of disagreement in the facts recorded, may not quite satisfy us that they are altogether rightly methodized.

Mary Magdalene is mentioned by St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. John, as going early to the sepulchre on the first day of the week. St. Mark joins two others with her; Mary the mother of James, and Salomé the mother of Zebedee's children. He names these three; and his context will not allow us to suppose that there was any other person of their party. St. Luke, who speaks of a greater number of women going to the sepulchre, has so guarded his account of them as not to include the three just mentioned; and what is said by him of their vision and behaviour at the sepulchre is totally unlike any thing that is related of the two Marys and Salomé. If these things can be made to appear evident, from a comparison of the Evangelists, we must then, in justice to them, consider the women as going to the sepulchre in a less and larger company.

I shall now subjoin, however, a summary of the arrangement proposed both by Dr. Townson and Mr. Cranfield, and add a table of Scripture passages. The reader will be then able to perceive, at one view, the variation of the Arranger from both, and his agreement or disagreement with either. The following is a summary of Dr. Townson's proposed arrangement:—

SECTION I.—Friday Evening. Our Lord's disciples, and the women that had followed him from Galilee, were not absent from his crucifixion, "They stood beholding afar off."

Only his Virgin Mother, Mary her sister, mother of James and Joses, and Mary Magdalene, with the disciple whom Jesus loved, and to whose protection he then recommended his mother, are mentioned as venturing to approach his cross.

But when Joseph of Arimathea had obtained leave from Pilate to inter the body, the Galilean women in general followed it to the sepulchre, and saw where and how it was laid. They then hastened to the city, to purchase and prepare spices that evening, for anointing it as soon as might conveniently be done after the Sabbath; which, as beginning about sunset, was then coming on. But Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, two of those who had been standing by his cross, did not depart with the rest. They continued "sitting over against the tomb."

SECTION II.—Saturday.—Towards the close of this day, which was the Jewish Sabbath, the chief priests and Pharisees, with Pilate's permission, set a guard upon the sepulchre, which was to secure it till the end of the third day.

The same evening, when the Sabbath was over, Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, who had lost their opportunity before, bought their share of spices, with the concurrence of a third, Salomé, the mother of Zebedee's children, who had probably been engaged the foregoing evening in attending and supporting the mother of our Lord, whom he had recommended to the protection of her son, the beloved disciple.

SECTION III.—Sunday Morning.—Very early the next morning, and probably before the time settled for opening the sepulchre, these three women hastened to visit it by themselves.

The two Marys set out before it was daylight, I presume because they lodged further from the sepulchre than Salomé, whom they called upon to accompany them; and while they were on their way, an angel descended, and rolled away the stone that closed the entrance of the tomb, and Christ arose.

The guard, terrified at the sight of the angel, retired from the sepulchre as he approached it, and, when they were a little recovered from their consternation, quitted the garden in which it stood.

The women arrived when the soldiers were gone, and at the rising of the sun. On drawing near to the sepulchre they perceived that the stone was rolled away: and Mary Magdalene, concluding that the body was removed, hurried back to tell Peter and John.

When she was gone, the other Mary and Salomé came to a resolution of examining more exactly; and ventured into the sepulchre, in the first part of which, it being divided into two, they beheld an angel sitting on the right side, who bade them not be afraid, assured them that Jesus was risen from the dead, and sent a message to his apostles by them. Having heard his speech, they hastened out of the sepulchre and to a distance from it, with fear and great joy.

Soon after came Peter and John; and, having inspected the tomb, without seeing the angel, or speaking to the women that had seen him, departed.

SECTION IV.—Sunday Morning.—Mary Magdalene followed, as fast as she was able, and when they went away, staid behind weeping at the sepulchre; then, after a little pause, stooped down, and looked into the tomb, where two angels were sitting, who asked her why she wept; to whose question having returned an answer expressive of her anxiety about the body of our Lord, she drew back, and saw him standing by her, but at first did not perceive who he was. He quickly made himself known to her, and sent a message to his apostles by her.

SECTION V.—Sunday Morning.—Mary Magdalene, in going to communicate her happy intelligence to them, fell in again with her two friends, the other Mary and Salomé. In their way Christ met them, and bid them "All hail!" He then permitted them to embrace his feet, and repeated the substance of the message to the apostles, which the angel, seen in the sepulchre, had delivered to the two latter.

While these things were doing, a party of the guard came into the city to the chief priests, by whom, and a council of the elders called together, they were instructed what report they should spread on this occasion.

SECTION VI.—Remaining Transactions of Sunday Morning.—Another company of women, at the head of whom was Joanna, came now to the sepulchre. Some of these had been ready to set out early for it.

But while they were collecting their whole party, and proceeding slowly in waiting for each other the time, which they had probably agreed on for meeting there to anoint the body, might be a little past. They therefore expressed no wonder, as had the former party, at seeing the tomb open. Their surprise was, when they had entered and searched it, not to find the body of the Lord Jesus; when two angels stood by them, and assured them that he was risen, and reminded them of a prophecy concerning his own death and resurrection, which they had heard him utter in Galilee. The women recollected the prophecy, and went and reported "all these things unto the eleven, and to all the rest."

Other evidences of the Lord's resurrection had been laid before them by the two Marys and Salomé, but to little purpose. So strong were their prejudices, that the words of the women seemed to them as idle tales.

Yet St. Peter was so struck with their accounts, that he ran to the sepulchre, to see if he could there behold the angels of whom they had spoken.

SECTION VII.—Sunday Afternoon and Evening.—It is not said in what time of this day our Lord appeared to St. Peter; but it was probably after Cleopas and his companion were set out from Jerusalem. These two were joined on the road by a stranger, whom they discovered at Emmaus to be the Lord himself. On this discovery they hastened back to Jerusalem, to the apostles assembled privately with some others of the disciples, and found them in possession of the fact respecting St. Peter. They then began to relate their own story, when the Lord himself stood in the midst of them, and having composed their minds, alarmed at his appearance, and having satisfied their doubts, left them full of joy that they had seen the Lord.

SECTION VIII.—The six Days following that of the Resurrection.—It is not recorded that our Lord showed himself to any of his disciples during this interval. He seems to have left them to the testimony of those who had seen him; and they endeavoured to persuade their brethren of the reality of his resurrection, but without working a thorough conviction in their minds. Among those who had been absent when he appeared on Sunday night, was St. Thomas, who spoke his own and the sentiments of others in declaring, that nothing short of ocular demonstration could clear up his doubts.

SECTION IX.—The Octave of the Resurrection.—On this day the apostles were assembled probably in the same place, plainly at Jerusalem, and with others of the disciples, when the Lord came to them as before, the door being again fastened, and reproved them, at least in addressing himself to St. Thomas, "for their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen." St. Thomas with all humility confessed his offence, and no more difficulty remained with him and those of the company who were in the same situation. It is likely that our Lord now appointed the time and place in Galilee, where they should see him again.

SECTION X.—The time in which the Disciples were in Galilee.—The apostles then left Jerusalem, and went into Galilee; and it seems as if they were allowed to communicate the design of their going to many of the followers of Christ, and that a multitude of them resorted to the mountain in Galilee, where he had promised to meet them. As soon as they beheld him, they paid their adoration to him. Some, however, that had not seen him before, and then saw him at some distance, were not without their doubts of his bodily presence. But he graciously came and conversed with them, and satisfied all, that it was he himself, risen from the dead. He then declared, that all power was given unto him in heaven and in earth.

SECTION XI.—The Disciples still in Galilee.—Before the disciples quitted Galilee, our Lord again showed himself to seven of them, by the lake of Tiberias. He there signified in what manner St. Peter should die, and that St. John should long survive.

SECTION XII.—From the Return of the Disciples to Jerusalem to the Ascension.—The disciples went back to Jerusalem, earlier I presume than was necessary to prepare for the feast of the Pentecost (Acts xx. 16.), and that therefore they went by a divine direction.

While they were assembled there, Christ instructed them in the things pertaining to the kingdom of God; and when the fortieth day, including that of his resurrection, was come, he led them out as far as to Bethany; and he lifted up his hands and blessed them; and, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven, and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high.

The disciples having paid their adoration to him, returned to Jerusalem with great joy, and passed their time in the temple, praising and blessing God, and preparing their hearts for the promised descent of the Holy Spirit upon them, who was to enable them to go forth and preach the glad tidings of salvation successfully to Jews, Samaritans, and Gentiles.

Mr. Cranfield has arranged his Harmony in twelve sections, the titles of which sufficiently explain the alterations he proposes in the disposition of events given by his learned predecessor.

SECTION I.—The women (Mary Magdalene,

Mary the mother of James, and Salomé) set out to view the tomb—an angel descends—opens the tomb—Christ rises from the dead.

SECTION II.—The women arrive—and see the stone taken away—Mary, concluding that the body of Christ had been removed, runs to inform the disciples—the other two women remain behind—the transactions at the tomb during Mary Magdalene's absence.

SECTION III.—Peter and John, in consequence of Mary Magdalene's report, set out with Mary Magdalene for the sepulchre—they examine the tomb, and depart—Mary Magdalene stays at the tomb—Christ appears to her.

SECTION IV.—Mary Magdalene goes with the message she received from Jesus, and falls in with the other Mary and Salomé, who were waiting for her at some distance from the sepulchre—Jesus appears to the three, and sends a message to the disciples—as they are going, the watch report to the chief priests—the transactions at the tomb.

SECTION V.—Besides the three women already mentioned, another company of Galilean women arrive, after these events, at the sepulchre—what then took place at the tomb—Luke collects briefly the testimony of both parties—the disciples continue incredulous—some of the disciples visit the tomb.

SECTION VI.—Christ appears to St. Peter—the two going to Emmaus—who go to the disciples—Christ appears to all.

SECTION VII.—The rest of the disciples are incredulous—particularly Thomas.

SECTION VIII.—Christ appears to all—Thomas believes.

SECTION IX.—Christ appears to the disciples in Galilee.

SECTION X.—The disciples still in Galilee—Christ appears to them at the sea of Tiberias.

SECTION XI.—Christ appears to all the apostles at Jerusalem.

SECTION XII.—Christ leads his disciples as far as Bethany—commissions them to proselytize all nations—and ascends to heaven.

It is not necessary to insert here the plan of the Arranger; it is given in the titles to the respective sections. If these titles should be regarded by any as too minute, he would reply, his object has been to examine every incident, and every supposed difficulty in the fullest manner.

It does not appear necessary to enter into any detailed examination of the harmony proposed by Hales, Newcome, Macknight, or Doddridge. The first of these agrees generally with Townson—Newcome's plan is among the number studied by Cranfield, as are also those of Macknight and Doddridge. Since Mr. West's publication indeed, the differences have been very few, and are so entirely questions of opinion, that their decision does not in the least affect the veracity of the Evangelists^h. Thus—it cannot be made evident at what exact time our Lord showed himself to St. Peter on the day of his resurrection, but all are agreed as to the fact. We may, in short, consider the question respecting the consistency of the four Evangelists, to be completely set at rest by the labors of these learned authors. They have left little more to be done by their successors than to incorporate the results of their labors, and thus make their researches and their discoveries familiar to the common reader. They will always be enumerated among the most eminent illustrators of the Sacred Volume. They have consecrated their jewels to the service of God, and their offerings will ever shine among the most brilliant ornaments of his holy temple.

NOTE 2.—PART VIII.

MARK XV. 42. ὄψις γενομένης, “the early evening being now come,” or “being immediately past,” for the word γενομένης has both these meanings. The early evening began at three in the afternoon, and continued till sunset; or till about six, and a little after. The late, or second evening, began at six, and lasted till nine. Both evenings are called ὄψις: but St. Luke describes the earlier evening by a periphrasis, and that which began at sunset by the proper name among the Greeks, ἑσπέρα, Luke xxiv. 29.

NOTE 3.—PART VIII.

IN Isaiah liii. 9. we read,—

“He made his grave with the wicked,
And with the rich in his death.”

On referring to the original, it will be observed that the word רשעי is may be the dual number, and that רשע is the singular. The construction therefore may be, “His death shall be with two criminals, and with one rich manⁱ.” This rendering adds great force to the prophecy.

^h When this part of the work was going to press, I procured a work entitled The New Trial of the Witnesses. It revives many of the exploded and long-answered objections—urges no new remarks—and does not appear worthy of more especial notice. Assertion supplies the place of argument, as is usual in the great majority of books of this nature.

The peculiar providence of God ordained, that our Lord should suffer on a day succeeded immediately by the Jewish Sabbath, and in a place where an honorable disciple of his had a sepulchre, so lately hewn in the rock, that no one had ever been laid in it. These things decided at once where the body should be deposited, when leave to dispose of it had been obtained by Joseph. His own new sepulchre was nigh at hand. Had it been at a distance, the case would have been altered. The followers of our Lord would have been inclined to carry his body first to the house of some friend, where they would naturally suppose they could perform the ceremonies previous to interment with more honorable tokens of respect. But while they had been studying to complete them with order and decorum, the Sabbath would have come on; and then, wherever the body was, it must have remained till that day of rest was over, and the third was begun, on which he was to rise from the dead. A providential concurrence of circumstances compelled them to take it directly from the cross to a place that best suited the great event of the third day; and where, in the mean while, the Jewish rulers had access to it, and before the beginning of that day set a guard upon it, as a testimony against themselves. If Joseph of Arimathea had not begged the body, it would have been buried in the common grave with the malefactors. In making this request, it is not probable that he could have been actuated by the idea that he was thereby fulfilling a prophecy. We must consider the circumstance as one of those minute and apparently accidental events, which demonstrate to us that the providence of God overrules all the actions of man to the accomplishment of his own purposes.

NOTE 4.—PART VIII.

ON THE OPINION THAT “TWO PARTIES OF WOMEN VISITED THE SEPULCHRE.”

As these are the first passages in which the different women are severally referred to, we may take the opportunity of inquiring whether that opinion may be considered as correct, which has within the last century been so strenuously defended,—that there were two parties of women who attended at the sepulchre. We ⁱ See Doddridge in loc. and Schoetgen on the manner in which the ancient Jews interpreted the passage, Hor. Heb. vol. ii. p. 552, 553.—Lightfoot's Harmony, 8vo. edit. vol. iii. p. 168.

must first examine the accounts of the number which were present at the crucifixion, and at the interment of the body.

The women named in this part of the Gospels, besides the Virgin Mother of our Lord, are these :—

Mary Magdalene, whose name occurs in all the Gospels, and, except John xix. 25., is constantly mentioned first.

Mary the mother of James the Less, and Josès, supposed to be Mary the wife of Cleopas, the sister of our Lord's mother, John xii. 35. ; and if so, the Evangelists all speak of her.

Salomé, the mother of Zebedee's children ; compare Matt. xxvii. 56. with Mark xv. 40. St. Mark only has given us her name.

Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, mentioned by St. Luke only, viii. 3. and xxiv. 10.

The blessed virgin mother of Christ having been recommended by him, while she stood by his cross, to the protection of St. John ; the mother of this his beloved disciple seems pointed out by that recommendation, as the proper person to attend and support her in the extremity of her grief, and to be with her at his abode, when he had conducted her thither ; and it is further probable that Salomé bore this part in the melancholy offices of that evening, because St. Matthew mentions only the two Marys, with whom she is naturally joined, as sitting over against the tomb after the interment ; St. Mark also mentions only these two on that occasion ; whence we presume that she was not with them when they followed the body to the sepulchre.

The Galilean women, who had attended the body of our Lord to the sepulchre, and seen how he was laid, then went back to the city, to prepare spices and ointments before the commencement of the Sabbath, that they might be ready for use on the morning after it. To prepare these spices was probably little more than to purchase them, according to a remark of Dr. Lardner ; for in so populous a city as Jerusalem, where there was a constant, and often a sudden demand for them, they would be sold ready compounded. Short, therefore, as the time was before the Sabbath began, it would be sufficient for this purpose. And that the women did so employ it is manifest from St. Luke, whose words literally translated run thus :—" And the women also which came with him from Galilee followed after, and beheld the sepulchre, and how his body was laid ; and being returned, prepared spices and ointments. And they rested indeed the seventh day, according to the commandment ; but on the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they went into the sepulchre, carrying the spices which they had prepared."—Luke xxiii. 55, 56. xxiv. 1. On which words Grotius observes, that nothing can be clearer than that the spices were purchased by these women on the evening before the Sabbath, and not after it. But this, which is so clear of the Galilean women in general, is to be understood with an exception of three of them ; Salomé, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James.

It is probable, as hath been shown, that Salomé was not in the procession to the sepulchre ; and it is no less probable, that the two Marys did not quit it with the other Galilean women. Matt. xxvii. 59–61. The words of St. Matthew seem to imply, that even after the closing of the sepulchre, they still lingered near it, till it was too late to purchase their spices that evening. The fact is certain that they purchased none till the Sabbath was past.

Let us now consider the objections which have been, or may be made to this arrangement.

It may be said, if we divide the women into two parties, it is not easy to apprehend how they could have been at the sepulchre without any sight of each other ; since all the Evangelists assign nearly the same time for their coming thither. It is to be remembered, that the verb ἐρχομαι, used by the Evangelists, bears the sense of " going " as well as " coming ; " and it here means, the time when the women went from their several houses ; in which case there is no difficulty in conceiving the means that may have kept the two parties asunder, as long as we suppose it requisite.

Let us but consider the situation of certain places in Jerusalem, and we shall find it not only possible, but probable, that these things should have fallen out as they have been stated ; and indeed that they could not well have happened otherwise, if we may rely on a map of that city, not of arbitrary construction, but compiled from ancient documents. In Zebedee's house, Salomé, whether then his wife or widow, would abide with her son St. John. It stood very near to that which the map of Dr. Townson, which is here referred to, calls the Dung-gate ; which opened the nearest way to the sepulchre from that part of the town. In this house would be deposited the spices prepared on the preceding evening by her, Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, as the most convenient place from which they might be taken to the sepulchre. Her friends, the two Marys, who had staid at the sepulchre by themselves on Friday evening, probably lodged together, in an interior part of the city, at least more remote from the Dung-gate, and on that account went forth before it was clear daylight, that they might be in good time at Zebedee's house ; from which, when all things were ready, they and Salomé proceeded to the sepulchre, so as to be there at the rising of the sun. The lodgings of Joanna, whose husband was steward to Herod, we may fix in or near the palace ; the direct way from which to the sepulchre was through the Gate of the Valley. It is seen, at once, that this palace and Zebedee's house were in different quarters of the city. They, therefore, who started from either, had little inducement to make such a round, as would be necessary to call at the other; when it was supposed they would all meet at the sepulchre.

The map of Dr. Townson shows also, that the distance from Herod's palace to the sepulchre was at least twice as much as from Zebedee's house. If, therefore, the three women that went from the latter to the sepulchre, and reached it about six, were half an hour in going, they who set out from the palace, at the same rate of walking, twice the distance, would be there half an hour later. But we can hardly believe them to have been thus expeditious, as to have arrived but half an hour after the first party. Early in the morning, as Joanna and one or two of her friends were prepared to set out, they had to wait for others, who might live at some distance, or not be quite so punctual; and, when they were collected, the women of Galilee, and the women of Jerusalem, if any of them were slow walkers, the rest could get on no faster, if they were to keep together in a body. We may therefore well allow near an hour between the arrivals of the two companies at the sepulchre; and this is amply sufficient for all that is supposed to have happened in the interim.

The errand of the women, who had seen an angelic vision, was to the apostles; of whom, St. John would dwell in his own house, that had been his father Zebedee's. Nor was St. Peter's far from him, John xxii. 2. To these the women would first repair, as Mary Magdalene had before. And wherever the rest of the apostles were to be found, unless the path towards their lodgings lay through the Gate of the Valley, which we have no reason to suppose, the company that first retired from the sepulchre could not meet the other advancing towards it. Herod's palace may be admitted to have been where the map places it. It may seem more questionable, how the site of Zebedee's house, originally, we may imagine, an obscure building, could be recovered, when the whole city had been razed to its foundations. But Jerusalem stood on the risings and sinkings of very uneven grounds, intersected as well as encompassed with walls, the bases of which would remain; and thus the parts into which it had been distributed, and the contents of each division, were more easily recollected and ascertained, than if the like calamity had befallen a city built on a plain. And the Christians who had retired to Pella, and the mountains beyond Jordan, before the siege, being returned to it after its destruction, would be guided by certain standing marks to the structures which they had before held in veneration. And to rebuild them as near as might be in the old places, and call them again by their old names, might be no unpleasing consolation to those who resettled in the fallen city. Nor from the desolation of Jerusalem to the present day has the succession of its Christian inhabitants been ever long interrupted; often as it has changed its masters, and suffered by its conquerors, Romans, Persians, Saracens, Mamalukes, and Ottomans. If fable had added its conceits to traditionary truths in these matters, yet I do not find that it has interested itself about Zebedee, or told any thing of him that required his presence, or an abode for him at Jerusalem. The true reason why a house is assigned him in it seems to have been, that he really had one, the same probably which his son, St. John, called his own house (John xix. 27.); it might come to them from their ancestors; and Zebedee, though he resided in Galilee, might feel the usual reluctance to part with his inheritance, and that in the holy city. It might even be more valuable to him and his friends, at the great festivals, and on other occasions, than the price of a dwelling in such a part of the city.

In order therefore to illustrate this plan, Dr. Townson has given in his elaborate work a very satisfactory map of Jerusalem, on which we may rely, as it is not one of arbitrary construction, but compiled from ancient documents, by Villalpandus. In this map are distinctly pointed out the site of the house of Zebedee, of St. Mark, of St. James, and St. Thomas.

Villalpandus was a learned Spaniard of Cordova, well known for the Commentary on Ezekiel, and Designs of Solomon's Temple; and celebrated by many authors of name for his skill and accuracy in these researches. Among other eminent men who have adopted his topography of Jerusalem as the most satisfactory, is Bishop Walton, in his Polyglott.

These four houses that are numbered in Dr. Townson's map, and did not come properly under the consideration of Villalpandus, are from the view of Jerusalem, given by Cotovicus, an eminent civilian of Utrecht, who visited Palestine in the year of our Lord 1598.

Though in this view he sets down the Dung-gate not as it stands in Villalpandus, but as in the present city, much changed in situation and shape from its ancient form; yet he places the houses in question precisely as they are disposed in Villalpandus's map, near to a line by which he distinguishes the course of the wall that divided the old city from Mount Calvary. Herman Witsius says of him, that he examined Jerusalem with curious eyes. And so certainly thought a traveller of great note, who was there about twelve years after him, our countryman, Mr. George Sandys. For the drawings of Cotovicus of the temple, of the holy sepulchre, and other parts of Jerusalem, are closely followed in Sandys' Travels; and the praise which Mr. Maundrell bestows on the latter for exactness in these matters belongs equally to the other.

The map of Villalpandus, with the addition of the houses from Cotovicus, illustrates the incidents of the morning of the resurrection, as if it were fabricated for that very purpose. And yet we may venture to affirm, that these learned men had not the most distant idea of the use to which their designs are applicable. Their notion, it may be presumed, was the same as was generally entertained, that the women all went to the sepulchre in one company, which is not particularly favored by either place separately; and, when they are thus united, is rather discountenanced by them; for hence it appears, while all the women were hastening to the same place, how much time some of them must lose by going to join the others, for the sake of setting out with them. The history not being framed to tally with the map, nor the map with the history, their undesigned agreement adds to the credibility of both.

Leaving, however, all arguments of this nature, let us consider the more authentic evidence derived from the sacred narrative itself, that the women were divided into two parties. These, for the sake of method and clearness, shall be reduced under certain heads.

1. St. Mark's account of the women that went to the tomb on the morning of the resurrection, does, in just construction, exclude all but those whom he names.

He speaks of these women, or some of them, in the five following places. First, "There were also women looking on afar off: among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the Less, and of Joses and Salomé;" xv. 40. Secondly, "And Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses beheld where he was laid;" xv. 47. Thirdly, "And when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary, the mother of James and Salomé, bought sweet spices, that they might go and anoint him;" xvi. 1. Fourthly, "And very early in the morning of the first day of the week they go unto the tomb;" xvi. 2. Fifthly, "Now Jesus, having risen early the first day of the week, appeared first to Mary Magdalene;" xvi. 9.

2. St. Luke's account does not include the women named by St. Mark; it bears tokens of being the description of an entirely distinct company.

In speaking of the women that attended the body of Christ from the cross to the tomb, St. Luke does not say, the women also that came with him from Galilee; but, as we shall find if we consult the original, "women also that came with him from Galilee" (Luke xxiii. 55.), there being no article accompanying γυναῖκες, which therefore allows us, with good reason, to conjecture that he intended to comprehend only the majority, not the whole company of these women, in his subsequent account of them; nor at present does he mention any of them by name. He speaks of them as follows: "And women also that came with him from Galilee followed after, and beheld the tomb, and how his body was laid; and, being returned, prepared spices and ointments."

3. The accounts given of the conduct of the women, when they arrived at the tomb, imply a first and second company. And besides the vision to Mary Magdalene alone, there were two angelic appearances and speeches, each to a different set of women, in the tomb.

St. John says, that when Mary Magdalene saw the stone taken away from the tomb, "she runneth and cometh to Simon Peter, and to the other disciple whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, 'They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him,'" xx. 2. As these words evidently imply that the other women who came to the tomb with Mary Magdalene felt the same disappointment and concern with her in the same situation; so also they clearly show, that, before the women entered the tomb, they were very well assured that the body of Jesus was not in it. They imply another thing: that so early was the arrival of the women at the tomb, that they had not the smallest idea that any of his friends would be there before them to get it open.

But this will receive still greater confirmation from the two subsequent positions.

4. The accounts given of the behaviour of the women in the tomb are accounts of two different parties.

The women, whom St. Matthew and St. Mark speak of, were affrighted, not only at the first sight of the angel, but after he had done speaking to them. Both Evangelists represent them as hastening away from his presence, by going out quickly, and fleeing from the tomb.

But the women described by St. Luke were calm and composed; and if they had recovered such presence of mind while the angels were yet speaking, there is no reason to imagine that, having heard such happy intelligence, they were then seized with a sudden terror, and fled from the tomb trembling and amazed. St. Luke's words certainly convey no such idea of their departure from it.

5. The speech of the two angels, considered as spoken to a subsequent company, has an obvious propriety.

It would be presumption to affirm, antecedently, what the two angels ought or ought not to have spoken; but when we have their speech before us, we may examine and judge, whether the circumstances of it suit better with the whole company of the women, or with one part of them, not exactly in the same situation with the other. If the women did not visit the tomb all together, the going thither of Joanna and her party has been rightly placed, after Mary Magdalene had left it a second time, and when our Lord had showed himself to her. And but a short space intervened between this going thither, and his meeting the two Marys and Salomé, saying unto them, "All hail!" At this juncture it was that the two angels were addressing themselves to Joanna and those who had just searched the tomb with her. When therefore Christ was not only risen, but had appeared in that body which the Father had raised from the grave, it might well be asked of those, who were much perplexed because they found not his body where it had been deposited, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

In every point of view, then, the division of the women into two distinct companies, going successively to the tomb on the morning of the resurrection, corresponds exactly with the evangelical accounts of the incidents of that morning. It embraces all the circumstances related of the women, and of the angels seen by them, and unites the whole into one intelligible, consistent history.

See, both for this and the subsequent notes on the following sections, Cranfield's Harmony of the Resurrection, and Dr. Townson's Discourses, with their references.

NOTE 5.—PART VIII.

WE read, in Matt. xxvii. 59-61, "And when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock: and he rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed. And (or, But) there was Mary Magdalene and the other Mary sitting over against the sepulchre." The words seem to imply an opposition between the departing of Joseph, and the abiding of the two women; and that this sitting over against the tomb was subsequent to the closing of it with a great stone. This solemn act could not force them away from the object of their grief. They still lingered as near to it as they could, sitting on the ground. And in this posture of mourning they continued, till reverence for the Sabbath obliged them to retire; when it was too late to prepare their contingent of spices.—Dr. Townson, vol. ii. p. 86.

NOTE 6.—PART VIII.

THIS conduct of the Pharisees and chief priests compelled them also to become unwilling witnesses of the resurrection of our Lord. The attempt of the women to enter the sepulchre on the morning when he arose, sufficiently proves that they had not anticipated any other obstacle to the embalming the body, but that which might be occasioned by the size of the stone. They were utterly unprepared to meet with a guard, or to find the seal of the Sanhedrin on the tomb. This conduct, however, of the rulers of the people, was attended with many important advantages. They satisfied themselves that the dead body was safely lying in the tomb, before they proceeded to place the seal. Their testimony, therefore, that our Lord was really dead, must have corroborated in the strongest manner the great truth of the resurrection, and that our Lord had risen, as the apostles declared; for no common power could have eluded the jealous caution of the rulers, or have escaped the proverbial vigilance of a Roman guard. Their sealing the sepulchre also prevented the violation of the tomb, by any of the guard themselves, who might have been tempted to steal the spices in which the body was enclosed.

NOTE 7.—PART VIII.

THE word ἡγόρασαν properly signifies not "they had bought," but "they bought." The Vulgate renders it "emerunt." Mary Magdalene and the other Mary had staid at the sepulchre till it was too late to buy their spices; but both they and Salomé took the earliest opportunity of procuring them after the Sabbath was over; that is, after six o'clock in the evening of Saturday, the day preceding the resurrection. The word was rendered "had bought," by our translators, on sufficient authority; for the perfect tense is sometimes used in this manner.—(See Chandler on Matt. xxviii. 17.) It is, however, most probable, that they supposed this translation to be absolutely necessary to render the Evangelists consistent with themselves. In Luke xxiii. 56., they read that the spices were prepared before the evening of the Sabbath. They supposed, according to the general notion, that there was one party only of women; and imagined there would be an absurdity in so translating Mark xvi. 1., as if that one party had procured additional spices after the Sabbath. Whereas it is by a scrupulous adherence to the plain meaning of the Scripture that all difficulties are removed. The comparison of these two passages might alone have been sufficient to show that there were two parties of women. This seems to have escaped the attention of Mr. Valpy; who, in his valuable edition of the Greek Testament, observes, that the word ought to be rendered as if it was preterpluperfect. His argument is derived from Luke xxiii. 56., which refers only to the other party of women.

NOTE 8.—PART VIII.

ON THE TIME WHEN THE WOMEN SET OUT FOR,
AND ARRIVED AT, THE SEPULCHRE.

WE now come to the question concerning the time when the women set out for, and reached, the sepulchre. This difficulty, like all others, vanishes on a careful examination of the language of the Evangelists.

Lightfoot^a has attempted to illustrate the various expressions of the Evangelists, which describe the time when the women came to the sepulchre, from the distinction of twilight among the rabbins. His reasoning is founded on the old supposition, that there was but one party of women; and is, besides, arbitrary and unsupported by authority. To inquire more accurately into the time, we must endeavour to ascertain the full meaning of the terms which are used by the Evangelists. The words of St. Matthew are, ὅψις δὲ σαββάτων, τῇ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ εἰς ἡλῆν σαββάτων, ἦλθε. “Late after^b the Sabbath, at the dawning of the first day of the week.”

Τῇ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ, “at the dawning,” is used for σὺν τῇ ἑφ’ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ, “along with the dawning morn.” ἦλθε—the proper meaning of this word seems to be, that they set out from their homes at this time. The word ἐρχομαι signifies both, “to go to,” or, “set off to,” as well as, “to arrive at,” any place.

Mark xvi. 1, 2. τοῦ διαγενομένου σαββάτου, ἅμιν πρωτὶ τῆς μιᾶς σαββάτων. “After the Sabbath was thoroughly past, very early on the first day of the week.”

Here διαγενομένου σαββάτου, is explanatory of Matthew’s ὅψις σαββάτων: δια in composition strengthening the signification. Πρωτὶ includes the whole time of the early watch; and,

^a The distinction of twilight among the rabbins is thus given by Lightfoot;—1. אֵילָתָא דְּשַׁחֲרָי “The hind of the morning, the very first perceptible light of the dawn, the women went towards the sepulchre.” 2. מְשִׁכִּיר בֵּין הַכֶּלֶת לְלֵבָן “when the difference between purple and white may be distinguished.” 3. מְשִׁאֵר הַמִּזְרוֹחַ “when the east begins to lighten.” 4. בִּנְיָן הַחֲמָה “sun-rise.” According to these four phrases we may interpret the evangelical narratives. St. Matthew says, τῇ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ, “as it began to dawn.” St. John says, πρωτὶ σκοτίας ἔτι οὖσας, “early in the morning, while it was yet dark.” St. Luke’s expression corresponds to the third, ὑποθρονου βαθείας, “very early in the morning:” and St. Mark uses a phrase corresponding to the fourth, ἅμιν πρωτὶ, ἅμιν πρωτὶ, “very early in the morning;” and yet ἀνατείλαντος τοῦ ἡλίου, “at the rising of the sun.”—Lightfoot’s Works, Dr. Bright’s edit. vol. ii. p. 359.

^b The word ὅψις ought to be translated “after,” “late after,” or “long after:” for the Sabbath among the Jews ended on the Saturday night, when it could not be dawning towards the first day of the week. Schmidius has quoted Plut. in Numa, ὅψις τοῦ βασιλέως χρόνον, “after the time of the king;” and Philostratus, ὅψις τῶν Τροϊζῶν, “after the Trojan war.”—See also Bos. Exercit. ap. Bowyer, p. 134.

to mark the dawn, Mark adds ἅμιν, “very,” which is especially put elliptically for ἐννυχον ἅμιν, by Mark himself, i. 35. “very far in the night.”

The πρωτὶ was the epithet given to the last watch, from three in the morning to six; the time therefore implied by St. Mark was probably about four o’clock, or a little after.

Luke expresses the time, τῇ δὲ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων ὑποθρονου βαθείας. “On the first day of the week, while the rising [sun] was deep,” sunk beneath the horizon.

The morning twilight begins as soon as the sun arrives within eighteen degrees below the horizon, for then the smallest stars disappear. This phrase also is used by the best classical writers: Aristophanes, Thucydides, Aristides, &c. use it, and Plato explains it, Ἡ οὐ πρωτὶ ἔτι ἐστιν; παρὰ μὲν οὖν—ὑποθρονου βαθείας. “Is it not yet early—surely it is—the rising [sun] is deep.”—Crito, p. 32. It is not, however, of so much importance to consider, in this place, the passage of St. Luke, as he relates the time at which the second party proceeded to the sepulchre^c.

John expresses the precise time of the πρωτὶ or “early watch,” differently from Mark. Τῇ δὲ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων, πρωτὶ, σκοτίας ἔτι οὖσας. “On the first day of the week, early, while it was still dark.” This is more definite than St. Mark. Σκοτία should not be rendered “dark,” as in our translation. It is a diminutive of σκοτός. Πρωτὶ, ὑπ’ ἡοῖ, οἱ σὲν τεύχεσι θωροήθηεντες. “Early about morn, they armed with their weapons,” where ὑπ’ ἡοῖ seems to be a contraction of ὑποφωσκούσης ἑω, “sublucente Aurora.”

The first part only of the second verse of Mark xvi. is inserted in this section, on the supposition of Townson, and more particularly of Cranfield, who considers the latter clause only to relate to the arrival of the women at the sepulchre, while the former refers to the time of their leaving home^d.

The principal difficulty in reconciling these various accounts arises from the expression here used by St. Mark, the word ἐρχομαι being supposed, by commentators, to signify both to arrive at the sepulchre, or to leave their own homes to go there. “Those who support the latter opinion,” says Mr. Cranfield, “have no doubt the best of the argument, and have offered very probable reasons for the justness of their plans.” However, as some have objected to this opinion, it may be proper to see how far the setting out of the women admits of incontrovertible proof, by a comparison with one text and the other; in order to which, it is necessary that we should first bring in view the following words of St. Mark, Καὶ ἅπαν πρωὶ—ἔρχονται ἐπὶ τὸ μνημεῖον, xvi. 2. The word πρωὶ signifies the last quarter of the night, called the morning watch, consisting of the three hours next before the rising of the sun, and ended at it. The phrase ἅπαν πρωὶ, must denote the beginning, or not long after the beginning, of this watch, and also the dawning of the day; as will easily appear from another passage in the same Evangelist, which is πρωὶ, ἔννυχον ἅπαν, chap. i. 35. The word ἔννυχον, as it stands here, I suppose to signify the darkness of the night; and St. Mark appears to have used it explanatory of ἅπαν πρωὶ. The meaning, therefore, of the whole phrase seems to be, towards the ending of the night, or near the dawning of the day; and perhaps the words may admit of a more proper translation than that we find in the established version, viz. "Very early in the morning, towards the dawning of the day." It might hence be fairly concluded, had we no other argument to go upon, that ἅπαν πρωὶ (xvi. 2.) signifies somewhat the same time as ἅπαν πρωὶ (i. 35.) But that the phrase alludes to the dawning of the day appears evident from the parallel place in St. John, where the words σκοτίας ἔτι οὐσης, are designed to show in what part of his πρωὶ the act of the women took place. It is also worthy of regard, that St. Matthew likewise, in the parallel passage, speaks of the act of the women as taking place at the dawn. The word ἅπαν, therefore, is used in a very emphatic and significant sense, and every way concurs to show that St. Mark meant to point out by it, the early part of the morning watch, or the beginning of the dawn. But the same Evangelist (xvi. 9.) has dropped the very significant ἅπαν, and only says, that Jesus arose πρωὶ. This variation of expression, in respect of different facts, denotes that what the one described as taking place ἅπαν πρωὶ, "very early in the morning," did happen prior in time to that which took place, πρωὶ, only "early in the morning." The dropping of an adjunct of a superlative sense, and using the word of positive import only, by itself, is a strong indication of this. When the women now arrived at the sepulchre, they were almost instantly acquainted by the angelic vision that Jesus was risen. He arose therefore before the women arrived: but his resurrection took place πρωὶ, only "early in the morning;" consequently St. Mark has used the verb ἔρχομαι, to express some other act of the women which took place ἅπαν πρωὶ, "very early in the morning," before Jesus arose; and what can this be but their setting out from their homes? Now the rest of the Evangelists express, by the same verb, an act of the same women which took place at break of day, a point of time exactly parallel with the ἅπαν πρωὶ of St. Mark: but this cannot be their arrival, because the distance of the sepulchre from Jerusalem was such, as to render it altogether impossible that they could be there instantaneously. They therefore speak of the setting out of the women; and this is agreeable to the series of St. Matthew's narration. We shall only observe, that the Evangelists have left us to infer the arrival of the women from their subsequent contexts; in which it is so clearly implied, that there was no necessity for them to give us any express information about it.

The words of the section, then, may be thus paraphrased:—

Matt. xxviii. 1. After the Sabbath,

Mark xvi. 2. at about four in the morning,
the first day in the week,

John xx. 1. while it was still dark,

Matt. xxviii. 1. as the dawn of the first day of the week was beginning, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary left their home,

Mark xvi. 2. and go to the tomb,

Matt. xxviii. 1. to view the tomb.

NOTE 9.—PART VIII.

BISHOP HORSLEY has supposed that the women saw the descent of the angel, and the rolling away the stone; but it is evident that this opinion is erroneous, for they did not arrive till it had already been removed. Compare Mark xvi. 4. Markland^g observes on these words, σεισμός ἐγένετο μέγας, "there had been a great trembling among the soldiers," not an earthquake. Hesychius σεισμός· τρόμος.

NOTE 10.—PART VIII.

MATT. xxvii. 52, 53.—Καὶ πολλὰ σώματα—ἡγέρθη. Καὶ ἐξεληθόντες ἐκ τῶν μνημείων μετὰ τὴν ἔγερσιν αὐτοῦ, εἰσῆλθον εἰς τὴν ἁγίαν πόλιν. This seems to be the best way to read this passage. When he yielded up the ghost, the graves opened: and after his resurrection the bodies of those who had been dead went into Jerusalem, and appeared to their friends. They were the first-fruits of the resurrection^h.

The Jews believed, that in the time of their Messiah, the bodies of their patriarchal ancestors should arise from the dead. It is demanded, Why did the patriarchs so earnestly desire to be buried in the land of Israel? Because they died in that land, and in that land they shall live again in the days of their Messiahⁱ. And again, the promised land is called ארץ חמדה, "the land of their desire," because the patriarchs enjoyed there many blessings. Jacob desired to be removed to that land, because he and his ancestors should there live again, in the days of the Messiah—מפני שהם חיים תחלה—לימות המשיח.

There is another tradition to be found also in the book Sohar, which speaks in such an evidently scriptural manner on the subject of the future resurrection, that it is most probable it has been borrowed from the writings of St. Paul.

There is certainly no absurdity in the supposition of Fleming, that many of the saints of the Old Testament might have now risen, and been miraculously revealed to some of the more depressed of our Lord's disciples. Neither is it impossible that this might have been a part of the expectation of Abraham, when he rejoiced to see the day of Christ, and he saw it, and was glad^k.

Klopstock, in his Messiah, has made a most beautiful use of the opinion, that the bodies of the patriarchs, and others of the Old-Testament saints, arose at this time.

How great must have been the astonishment of the people and of their rulers, when they passed by the sepulchres of the dead to behold them open, and the bodies that had been buried visible, and slowly and gradually, perhaps, recovering from the repose of death! Here would have been seen the venerable figure of some aged patriarch, bursting the carments of the tomb, the folds and wrappings of the embalmer. There, might be seen the beloved form of some cherished child, or parent, over whose recent grave the flowers had not yet ceased to bloom, who was still lamented, and still wept, bearing witness to the great event. It is not impossible that many of those who had beheld the actions, and believed in the words of the Son of God, while on earth, were now restored to life, and were permitted to appear to their friends, as an undeniable evidence of the truth of Christ's resurrection, and of his conquest over death and the grave. The tombs of the rich and the poor opened to the gaze of the astonished spectator: "the corruptible put on incorruption, and the mortal assumed immortality." The bones were seen to come together; the sinews and the flesh to unite and to revive. The monuments of marble, the sepulchres of rock, shook and were rent asunder. The mouldering dust, by a silent and mysterious process, assumed again its form and features, and acknowledged the power of an invisible Conqueror over the last great enemy of man. The combat between death and life was again renewed, and death was swallowed up in victory. Scenes, such as these, but ten thousand times more sublime and wonderful, are reserved for those that shall be alive in the latter days upon the earth; when the trump of the Archangel shall sound, and the Mediator, attended with all the company of angels, in the glory of his Father, shall receive the full recompence of his sacrifice: for his voice shall call the dead from their graves, and, amidst the wreck of humanity, announce to the astonished living, that the reign of immortality has begun, and that the triumph of their God is complete.

The veil which hides the future world from the intrusion of man, seems to be partly removed when we read this passage. Time may engrave his changes upon us; the eye may lose its brilliance, the limb its activity, the frame its strength; but, God be thanked for the consolation of a Christian, and the hope of a resurrection to life! The religion of Him who died for man, and laid waste the empire of death in that moment when he yielded to its sceptre, can support us through the miseries of this state of trial, and bear us safely through the valley of darkness and corruption. This religion is the only solid foundation of hope, or happiness, both here and hereafter.

NOTE II.—PART VIII.

I HAVE adopted the emendation of text in this passage proposed by Mr. Cranfield, after a careful consideration of the reasoning of Archbishop Newcome and Dr. Benson. The text requires only to be pointed differently; and, without any alteration of the Greek Vulgate text, the whole passage is made consistent. The original reads thus: ver. 2. Μαὶν πρὸς τῆς μὲν σαββάτων ἐρχομαι ἐπὶ τὸ μνημεῖον, ἀνατελάντος τοῦ ἡλίου: ver. 3. καὶ ἔλεγον πρὸς, κ. τ. λ. If we place a period at μνημεῖον, and read the beginning of ver. 3. with the latter part of ver. 2, as one sentence, the narrative is complete, and the difficulty arising from the impossibility of uniting Μαὶν πρὸς with ἀνατελάντος τοῦ ἡλίου, vanishes. I have done this. The former part of the verse is in Section VII; it reads thus—Ver. 2. They came unto the tomb.

3. And they said to each other,
2. About the rising of the sun,
3. Who shall roll away, &c.

The same reading was in the harmony^l of Ammonius: et orto jam sole dicebant; and in the Æthiopic version.

I shall subjoin Mr. Cranfield's remarks on the criticisms which have been proposed to remove the difficulty, and to which he rightly objects. Mark xvi. 2.—this place, as it stands in the received text, has created great embarrassment to the commentators and harmonists, owing to the difficulty of reconciling the descriptive ἀνατελλαντος τοῦ ἡλίου, with the descriptive λαν πρωῒ. For this question is obvious, How can the dawning of the day be at the rising of the sun? or, in other words, How can two hours before sunrise be no space of time? Such is the natural question that arises from perusing the received text of the above place; and therefore, as this text labors under so great an inconsistency, there must be a fault in it; but, as it is not possible that so gross a blunder (lying within the small compass of thirteen words) could escape the notice of St. Mark, who appears, in many instances, which it is needless to point out, to be a clear and circumspect writer, the received reading cannot be genuine. Two ways have been proposed for removing the difficulty. It has been said, that if we adopt the reading of Beza's MS. which is ἀνατέλλοντος, orientem, the seeming inconsistency in St. Mark will thus be reconciled; for λαν πρωῒ cannot admit of ἀνατελλαντος. To which I must reply, that neither can it admit of ἀνατέλλοντος, unless it can be proved that this word signifies the dawning of the day; a sense which surely no accurate person will attempt to assert it possessed of. The word must signify, at least, that the upper limb of the sun was very near the sensible horizon, and therefore, as there can only be the difference of a few minutes between the times denoted by this reading and that in the received text, I think it very immaterial which we follow.

Another way proposed to remedy the difficulty is, that ἔρχονται should be taken with λαν πρωῒ, in the sense of "going," or "setting out," and always understood with ἀνατελλαντος τῷ ἡλίῳ, in that of "coming," or "arriving." The ellipsis, however, which this opinion introduces, is certainly very harsh and unusual; and, I think, too farfetched for being adopted, as it does not seem to flow in an easy manner from the context of the Evangelist; for λαν πρωῒ and ἀνατελλαντος τοῦ ἡλίου are evidently made by the common reading of the place, to be both connected with the same verb, ἔρχονται; and therefore the proposer of this solution should have offered one important amendment to make good his opinion. What this is may easily be seen by part of what follows. In the most ancient MSS. there is no distinction of words; no space left between every two words, but all the letters in one line are close together. This being the case, we have warranty to point the text so as to exclude out of it the sentence in which λαν πρωῒ is, which may be done by placing a period or full stop immediately after the word μυημεῖον. This would entirely remove the difficulty; for then ἀνατελλαντος τοῦ ἡλίου would have no connection with λαν πρωῒ, and it would clearly appear, that the two descriptive phrases related to different times, for which, in all probability, the Evangelist intended them both, &c.

NOTE 12.—PART VIII.

Looking up they saw with surprise, θεωροῦσιν, that the stone was rolled away, ἦν γὰρ μέγας σφόδρα, "for it was very great." This was the cause of their surprise.—See Bowyer, p. 181.

NOTE 13.—PART VIII.

ON THE FORM AND DIMENSIONS OF JEWISH SEPULCHRES.

THE distance of the holy sepulchre from Jerusalem was not one mile. It is necessary to remember this fact to account for the rapid going and coming of the agitated and anxious followers of Christ.

Mary Magdalene, as soon as she discovers the stone is rolled away, leaves her companions, without approaching to examine the sepulchre, to inform St. Peter and St. John of this unexpected occurrence; no doubt hoping to receive some explanation from them, or to have the benefit of their exertions in this unlooked-for event.

Other difficulties in the account of the resurrection arise from our not sufficiently understanding the form of the sepulchres which were used by the Jews.

The form of the sepulchres among the Jews is thus prescribed by the rabbis—"He that selleth his neighbour a place of burial, and he that takes of his neighbour a place of burial, let him make the inner parts of the cave four cubits, and six cubits; and let him open within it כוכין ח' eight sepulchres. They were accustomed, says the gloss, to bury the same family in the same cave; whence if any one sold his neighbour a place for burial, he sells him room for two caves, and a floor in the middle. כוך is the very place where the body is laid."

It cannot, however, be supposed that every person who might wish to purchase a burial place, if he desired it for himself alone, was compelled to conform to this law. It will be observed, that nothing is said of Joseph of Arimathea requiring this sepulchre for his family, it seems indeed to have been peculiarly his own for his own use.

The rabbins (says Dr. Townson) prescribe that a Hebrew sepulchre should have a court before it, through which you are to pass to the door that leads into the cave or proper place of sepulture. They direct the court to be made of six cubits, or nine feet square^o.

There is an area or portico of the prescribed dimensions before that which is now called the holy sepulchre, and which seems not ill entitled to the name which it has long borne. For though in the reign of the Emperor Adrian the sepulchre of Christ was buried under a vast mount of earth, and on this mount was set up an object of pagan worship in despite to the Christians, yet the place was pointed out to them by these very signs of idolatry standing over it; and when this mountain of earth, with all that had been erected over it, was about two centuries after cleared away, by order of Constantine the Great, then, as Eusebius expresses it, "the cave, the Holy of Holies, obtained a similitude of our Saviour's resurrection;" which words allude not only to the burial and resurrection of the blessed body that had lain in this sepulchre, but also to the form of the Jewish sanctuary. For the title of Holy of Holies given to the cave imports, that it had a holy place before it, and was divided into two, like the sanctuary. It is therefore an indirect testimony of Eusebius, a native of Palestine, where he lived many years, concerning the platform of our Lord's sepulchre.

Let us now examine the form of it by the Evangelists. St. Matthew tells us that the angel "rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it," (Matt. xxviii. 2.); St. Mark, that the women saw this angel, or "young man clothed in a long white garment (xvi. 5.) sitting on the right side." But they did not perceive him till they were entered into the sepulchre. He had therefore not rolled the stone out of it, but to one side of it; yet he had rolled it from the door. The door therefore was in a partition that divided the sepulchre in two; and the whole of the inward division was not visible to those who stood in the outer. The angel said to the women, "Come, see the place where the Lord lay," (Matt. xxviii. 6.) They were therefore standing where they did not command a sight of that place; yet they were within the sepulchre; for as soon as he had finished his speech to them, they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre. Mark xvi. 8. So St. Mark says; and so also St. Matthew, rightly understood; for his words are, "they departed quickly from the sepulchre," (Matthew xxviii. 8.), means evidently they departed quickly out of the sepulchre; as the same mode of expression is translated in other passages. Thus the real, as the reputed sepulchre, consisted of a place of sepulture, and an enclosed court or area, as did often the sepulchres of the Greeks. Μνημα, or μνημεϊον, is the general name given by the Evangelists to the tomb; but τάφος is the word used by St. Matthew. The μνημεϊον, or whole of the sepulchre, consisted of the τάφος, or place where the body was deposited, and the οκέπη, or outer court^r.

The sepulchre is called in the original Mnema, or Mnemeion, by all the Evangelists; but St. Matthew has besides another word on this occasion in Greek, Taphos; and his use of this word carries such marks of discrimination, and he is so little apt to deal in a variety of terms, when one will precisely answer his intent, that it may be justly concluded that St. Matthew employs two words, because one of them sometimes expresses his meaning more exactly than the other, and that they are distinct in his acceptance of them, as much as with us a "church" and its "chancel." What was in the Taphos was within the Mnemeion; but what was in the Mnemeion was not therefore within the Taphos. The Jewish rulers, who would take what they judged the most certain measures to retain the body of Christ in their possession, requested a guard for the Taphos, (Matt. xxvii. 64.) The Taphos they secured by sealing the stone, (ver. 66.) The two Marys sat over against the Taphos on Friday evening, (ver. 61.) The women went to visit the Taphos, as the great object of their care, early on Saturday morning, (Matt. xxviii. 1.) In this therefore the body had been laid; but because they had not been in it, when they saw the angel, and as soon as he had done speaking to them fled away, they are said to have "departed quickly out of the Mnemeion." (ver. 8.) Now if the two words are of different application in St. Matthew, it is plain there was a difference in the places to which they are applied^q.

Mr. Cranfield objects to this opinion of Dr. Townson, that the angel appeared to the first party of women, in the outer court, sitting on the stone, on the right side. He endeavours to prove at some length, that the angel was within, in the inner part of the tomb. As this question, however, does not appear of much importance to the history, I shall merely refer to the discussion of the point—it will be found in p. 548, observations on section i.

^r Potter's Antiquities, vol. ii. book iv. chap. vii. p. 221. third edition.

^q The inner part of the μνημεϊον was also called μνημεϊον, thus *καὶ τὸ μνημεϊον τὸ τοῦ Αὐγούστου αὐτόματον ἀνοίχθαι, a phrase which evidently restrains μνημεϊον to the signification of nothing more than the mere tomb, in which the body of Augustus was laid.

NOTE 14.—PART VIII.

THEIR emotion and agitation were so great that they were confused and overpowered with the mingled sentiments of astonishment, incredulity, fear, and delight. What will be our own overpowering emotions when we shall behold the same Saviour in glory, on our own resurrection from the dead!

NOTE 15.—PART VIII.

I HAVE preferred the decision of Townson and West, to that of Dr. Lardner and Mr. Cranfield, with respect to the insertion of Luke xxiv. 12. as parallel with this passage of St. John. West's arguments on this point induced both Pilkington and Doddridge to alter their harmonies according to his arrangement. There is reason to believe that the Evangelists have observed, in the events they severally record on the subject of the resurrection, an exact order of time. But this is an exception, if St. Luke and St. John both describe the same going of St. Peter to the sepulchre: for that in which St. Peter and St. John went together was before any report of the women concerning a vision of angels. When St. Peter went with St. John, it was in consequence of his interview with Mary Magdalene; it is expressly asserted that he descended into the sepulchre, and saw the linen clothes lie; he went at this time to be satisfied that the body was actually removed. In the visit mentioned by St. Luke, it appears that his object was to ascertain if he also could see the angels who had been visible to the women, mentioned Matt. xxviii. 8. The two visits of St. Peter are represented as proceeding from different motives, and the circumstances attending them are related as having taken place at separate parts of the tomb. See Townson, Cranfield, West, and their references.

NOTE 16.—PART VIII.

THE disciple whom Jesus loved came first to the sepulchre, and when he had stooped (standing on the floor of the outer apartment, that he might look into the burying-place), saw the linen clothes lie; yet went he not in. But Peter went in, &c. that is, from the floor he went down into the cave itself, where the rows of graves were, כִּי־יָ, in which, however, the body of Jesus only had been deposited.

St. Peter entered and examined the tomb, St. John went in also; and he says of himself, "And he saw and believed". What he saw was the same that St. Peter did: but what did he believe? An answer to this, I trust, we shall be able to collect from some circumstances in the history. When Peter went into the tomb he saw the linen clothes, κελιμενα, lying at full length, as when the body was in them; and the napkin, ἐντετυλιγμένον, folded up in wreathes in the form of a cap^s, as it had been when it was upon our Lord's head. The Apostle, θεωρεῖ, accurately viewed, with some degree of contemplation, the burial clothes lying thus in such remarkable order: and it is no wonder he was astonished at this state of the tomb, which he could not account for; and though it might have seemed to him to border somewhat on the miraculous, yet it does not appear, from this part of the history, that he had any idea of the reality of our Lord's resurrection^t. The astonishment of Peter excited the attention of John, who then went down into the sepulchre, and on seeing that the body must have miraculously slipped out of its grave clothes, which lay in their right order, he saw and believed.

St. John's belief, then, of the resurrection arose from what he saw; "He saw and believed:" but, at the same time, he honestly and candidly acknowledges his "slowness of heart to believe the sure word of prophecy;" and seems in a manner to reprehend himself for grounding his belief merely on what he saw, when he should have founded it rather on the unerring prophecies of Scripture, which were written for his learning; but he adds, as an apparent apology, "that they knew not the Scripture, that he must rise again from the dead." The interpretation contended for seems to flow in a natural and easy manner from the context of the Evangelist, and shows the inutility of ἐκ before ἐπιστεύσεν in the Cambridge MS. or version; the Latin translation of which has no negative particle^u. But however we must be allowed to assert, that neither a report nor insinuation of the resurrection was necessary to John's believing it; he might have believed the resurrection, and did believe it, as the context of the Evangelist shows, without any prior report; and he inferred it, as he reasonably might, from the state of the tomb, which afforded to an impartial and thoughtful mind, a very strong presumptive argument of the reality of that miracle. When St. John therefore entered the tomb, and accurately examined the linen clothes, a new combination of ideas must have extorted from him a belief which he could not have had before; a belief of something more momentous than the report that the body had been taken away: and what belief could this have been but of the resurrection? We may observe also, that St. John's believing the resurrection from what he saw is contrasted with his not knowing, and therefore not believing, it from Scripture.

If it be said, that when the women told the eleven of the resurrection, the apostles disbelieved them, and received their report as idle tales, and that this account therefore is inconsistent with St. John's believing the resurrection, it may be answered, it is not necessary to suppose that St. John made a public declaration of his belief; he might have thought it prudent to keep it inwardly to himself; for, "he might have believed that Christ had risen again, though this faith or belief was yet weak, and stood in need of some further proof to confirm it." Therefore, while the women were reporting their glad tidings, and most of the Apostles scoffing at them as idle tales, St. John, who had no positive certainty of the truth of what they asserted, might have held his peace, and said nothing either for or against them; in which case, it might have been then presumed, that he was in the same mood of thinking as the others, though he takes care himself to tell us, that he was not*.

NOTE 17.—PART VIII.

"MARY," says Lightfoot, "stood at the sepulchre without; that is, within the cave, on the floor, but without that deeper cave, where the כִּבּוֹץ, or 'places for the bodies,' were deposited." She had followed the disciples, but they had left the sepulchre immediately after they had satisfied themselves of the absence of the body. She now arrived the second time at the tomb, and disappointed at finding they had left it without communicating the result of their inquiry, she weeps at the supposed profanation of the sepulchre by the unknown hands which had removed the body of her Lord, and at the scene of misery, anguish, and death, to which she had been witness. That Mary was now alone is evident from the manner in which St. Mark, xvi. 9., describes the appearance of our Lord to her, as well as from the way in which the same narrative is told at greater length by John, xx. 11-14.

THE doctrine of the ministry of angels, so much esteemed by the primitive Church, as well as by the most eminent and pious Christians of all ages, has now become one of those which, without any one well-founded argument, is to be reasoned away. The repeated appearances of angels, both in the old and new dispensations, seem designed to point out to us the near, though mysterious, connexion of the invisible state with that which we now inhabit. And what can be more consolatory to the believer than the idea which this and other passages of Scripture appear so much to corroborate, than the belief that the angels of heaven are around us, the ministering spirits of God, for our good, watching over us, and fulfilling the wisdom of his providence? Why should this opinion be disclaimed? Angels were present at the creation; they have been repeatedly manifested to man. To Isaiah the seraphim appeared veiling their faces with wide-spreading wings. The form that was visible to Ezekiel had the semblance of a lambent flame, enveloping what seemed its body. To the women they appeared in shining garments, and to the keepers at the sepulchre as lightning, with raiment white as snow. They are the happy possessors of that blessedness to which the spirits of the departed hope to be admitted. And they shall be again visible in their thousands of thousands, at that magnificent and glorious triumph, when the Ancient of Days shall sit on the throne of his glory, and the assembled universe be summoned before his high tribunal. Is it impossible, then, that they are the invisible, yet efficient agents, in many of those innumerable events which are attended with moral and religious benefit to individuals and to the world; which are but too generally ascribed to incidental circumstances, or to the well-laid plans of human policy?

The soul of man is gifted with powers and properties which are distinct from the human body, and which it possesses in common with superior beings. I cannot believe, therefore, that idea to be irrational, which represents the manner of our present union with the invisible world by the following ingenious and curious image. Suppose a number of lighted lamps were placed in a room, one of which only was covered with an earthen vessel, the lamp so encumbered, as soon as the covering was either broken or removed, would find itself in the same state and condition with the other lamps. So it may be with the accountable spirit of man. The earthen vessel of the body may be broken by violence, or silently destroyed by sickness or age, but, as soon as the veil or the covering of the body is removed, the unfettered spirit finds itself the companion of kindred spirits, which, though now unseen, are continually surrounding it. The time is not far hence, when we shall know, even as we are known; in the mean time, the very attempt to speculate upon these things, elevates and purifies the mind²⁰.

NOTE 19.—PART VIII.

ON THE RESURRECTION.

As woman brought death into the world, a woman was made the first witness of the resurrection of life. Of the manner of Christ's existence after he arose from the dead we can form no adequate conception. The manner of the resurrection of the same body was, and is, one of the most incomprehensible difficulties of Christianity; and our Lord therefore has condescended to teach the doctrine, not, like the generality of his other doctrines, by arguments and reasoning, but by repeated facts, and those of the most undeniable nature. And he taught it, lastly, by his appearing to his disciples after his resurrection.

Before that time our Lord had lived among his disciples as a man among his companions. He was in all points like unto them, sin only excepted. After that event his body, though to appearance the same as it had ever been, assumed various properties and powers which it had not before possessed. We read, that when the disciples had assembled in a room, the doors of which were shut for fear of the Jews, Jesus suddenly stood in the midst. On the evening of the day of his resurrection, he joins himself to two of his disciples as they were going to Emmaus. He enters into conversation with them. He talks of the Scriptures and of himself till their hearts burn within them. But their eyes were holden and they did not know him. When they came to their own home, he sat down with them, and then it was, in breaking the bread, that he made himself known; but at the very instant, when they were filled with joy, he became invisible: he vanished out of their sight. Before his resurrection our Lord had conversed familiarly with his disciples; after that event he was seen only occasionally among them, in a more solemn and mysterious manner. His great object on these occasions seems to have been, to increase their faith, and to convince them that the same body they had beheld committed to the ground, was now raised to life again in a glorified form. He proves to them that a door, or a wall, or the sides of a grave, could not oppose his progress. He passes through solid matter as through the yielding air, yet he had still a body which they could touch and handle, bearing the marks of the spear and the prints of the nails. The day of his ascension arrives, Christ ascends by his own power. No horses of fire, no chariots of fire elevated him. Of himself, he raised himself, a Divine and Glorious Being, into the blue firmament of heaven; and he ascended where he still remains, with his Father, and our Father, with his God, and our God.

This doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which our Lord and Saviour thus taught by action, is explained in the Epistles of St. Paul, by the most powerful and eloquent reasoning. "Some man will say, how are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come? That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain." That is, as the laborer may commit to the ground, in the winter or in the spring, the seed of a flower, or a grain of wheat, which in the course of its appointed time rises from the ground in a different and superior form, with the beautiful blossom, and the fragrant flower; so also the mouldering body, which is committed to the ground, may be called the seed of that body which shall be raised from the grave in glory. We are removed from the sight of our nearest kindred and our dearest friends. "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust." But the pale and corrupting corse, the cold clay, the fading features, and the icy limbs shall burst from the tomb of earth, and be clothed with the beauty of holiness! "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body; it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power." It is sown as the bare grain, and the worthless seed; but after the winter of the grave is over, when the dead, small and great, shall stand before God, the bodies of men shall be raised in the same form, and invested with the same nature and properties, as that with which their Divine Master arose from the tomb. "Our vile bodies shall be made like unto his glorious body." More than this the Scripture does not reveal. Why it was that neither Mary Magdalene, nor the other disciples going to Emmaus, nor his own apostles at the sea of Tiberias, were not at first able to recognise our Lord, though they afterwards knew him, is among those mysteries which we shall understand hereafter, when we ourselves shall arise from the grave, and renew our former friendships in our glorified bodies.

"MARY MAGDALENE is here said to have turned herself back; and afterwards, in ver.

16, again to have turned herself. Schacht, in his Harmony of the Resurrection, proposes, as a solution of the difficulty, the supposition, that in the first instance she only turned her head, and in the second her whole body. Or, he adds, after her address to Jesus as the gardener, she may again naturally enough have directed her attention to the sepulchre. This is from Koecher. I prefer the former solution."—Dr. F. Laurence's Remarks on Scripture, p. 73.

NOTE 21.—PART VIII.

ON THE WORDS, "TOUCH ME NOT."

Μή μου ἅπτοι. Mr. Chandler would translate this, "Embrace me not,—hold me not." And he produces many examples from Homer, Xenophon, and Euripides, Hec. ver. 339, ἅψαι μητρὸς, "embrace thy mother." Ἀναβέβηκα he would translate as a present tense, as it must mean, he says, John iii. 13., when Christ had certainly not ascended. He quotes Homer also in the first Iliad, ver. 37, for the similar use of another compound from the same primitive verb, ὃς Χρόσσην ἀμφιβέβηκας: he would then join this, not with the preceding, but with the following sentence; and the whole sense will be, "Hold me not; for I am not yet going to ascend to my Father: but go unto my brethren, and say unto them, I do ascend (for I shall shortly ascend) unto my Father and your Father, unto my God and your God."

He brings many instances of the present tense (as ἀναβαίνω here) being used to signify what is shortly to be done.

Vogelius has here a very ingenious conjecture of μή οὐ πτοοῦ, "be not afraid," for μή μου ἅπτοι, "touch me not." This approaches so near to the traces of the letters, and, besides, so resembles the first address of Christ to the women in Matthew, and of the angel to the women in Matthew and Mark, "Fear ye not, be not affrighted;" that, if it were supported by any manuscript authority, I should willingly adopt it. But the Sacred Text should not be altered on conjecture only.

Bowyer, in his Conjectures, proposes μή, μου ἅπτοι. "No; (I am not the gardener, as you suppose;) touch me." And for this he quotes Paulus Bauldrius, in Neoceri Bibliotheca. But it seems to me too farfetched a reading, and inconsistent with Mary's previous recognition of Christ, in the appellation of Rabboni.

Koecher observes, that Michaelis proposes to make it an interrogation, "Do you not touch me?" as inviting that test of his real appearance. Kypke, in his Observations (he says) explains the passage as a prohibition of adoration until after his ascension.

On the whole, I continue to adhere to Chandler's explanation; to which I would add, that ἀμφιβέβηκας is explained by the Pseudo Didymus, as περιβέβηκας, ὑπερμαχεῖς, clearly giving it a present signification, and showing that the other compounds of the same verb are used in the same manner. Thus too the preterpluperfect tense of the simple verb is used by Homer to denote merely past time, as equivalent to the aorist of other verbs, δ' Οὐλυμπόνδε βεβήκει, Iliad ὁ. 221; which the same scholiast interprets by ἀπεκλήλυθει, ἐπορεύθη. Aristophanes has βεβήκως περι σκυμνοῖς, which the scholiast explains by ὑπερμαχῶν σκυμνοῖς.

St. John has a similar form of another compound of βαίνω, used for the present tense, chap. v. ver. 24. ἀλλὰ μεταβέβηκεν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωὴν. Some of the Latin MSS. in this place translate μεταβέβηκεν by "transit;" and some Greek MSS. of inferior note and modern date, feeling a supposed incongruity, read μεταβήσεται, as thinking the future more consistent with the rest of the context.

Homer has βέβηκε, or βεβήκει, in the sense of a simple, present, or past, and that in a connexion, which so marks it, six or seven times, and never otherwise.—Dr. Laurence's Remarks on Scripture, p. 73-75.

NOTE 22.—PART VIII.

THAT Mary Magdalene rejoined her two friends when Christ appeared to them seems to be most probable, from comparing Matt. xxviii. 9. with John xx. 18. Dr. Townson translates St. Matthew's words, they were going to tell [to report] to the disciples; and St. John, Mary Magdalene cometh to tell [to report] to the disciples. He speaks of her, not as arrived among them, but on her way to them.

It may be made probable too by the behaviour of the women. Mary would have told them, if she thus rejoined them, that Christ had actually appeared to her; and they would have been thereby prepared to meet him, with that composure which they seem to have done. Immediately on seeing him, they embraced his feet and worshipped him. When the others saw him, they did not know him, and were terrified. This conduct appears to be the result of some preparatory disclosure.

NOTE 23.—PART VIII.

THE absurdity and folly of this story are admirably displayed in Mr. West's treatise. No complaint was made against the soldiers, no punishment inflicted on the disciples, no alarm had been given when the poor, dispirited disciples came to roll away the stone, and break the seal, and profane the sepulchre; all the sixty soldiers and their commander were with one accord asleep, although at the same time the penalty of sleep was death; and the noise of rolling away the stone could not awake even one of the party. And this overpowering sleep had seized them, when they had been placed here for one night only, for the special purpose of securing the very tomb which was thus profaned! But it was in this instance, as it is in the general conduct of men: reasoning, which would disgrace an idiot in the common occurrences of life, is amply sufficient to excuse us to ourselves, for denying or disbelieving the solemn truths of Christianity.

NOTE 24.—PART VIII.

THE reasons which have induced West, Townson, Cranfield, Doddridge, Horsley, Newcome, Gleig, Pilkington, and I believe every writer since the time of West, to conclude that two parties of women came to the sepulchre at different times have been already noticed. At present let us inquire, according to this hypothesis, When the second company arrived at the tomb; whether between the two visits of Mary Magdalene to it, or after the second? For the following reasons, their arrival seems rightly placed after she left the sepulchre the second time: it is certain that no one was there earlier than she was, and therefore they who did accompany her, but made a distinct visit thither, and as the case requires, neither saw her nor her friends, nor was seen by them, must have come during her absence. Her first absence was when she ran to tell Peter and John: but then she left the other Mary and Salomé behind, who went into the sepulchre and saw and heard the angel. When they were fled away, came the two apostles; and these were followed by Mary Magdalene returning. The time, therefore, between the departure of the other Mary and Salomé from the sepulchre, and the coming of John and Peter to it, seems too short an interval for the arrival and departure of the other women in such manner, that both parties might keep clear of all sight of each other. And the more we prolong this interval, the less probable we make it that Mary Magdalene, after she had seen the Lord, should have rejoined her two friends, when he showed himself to them also. And yet it appears so much the sense of St. Matthew, and I think of St. John, that she was with them, that it is a point by which we ought to abide, unless there are cogent reasons to the contrary. As I am not aware of any such, I espouse the opinion which seems the most likely, that Mary was gone the second time from the sepulchre before Joanna and her company got to it.

NOTE 25.—PART VIII.

A GREAT difficulty has been found in this passage of St. Luke xxiv. 9, 10. by those commentators who consider the tenth verse to be explanatory of the preceding verse. The five verses preceding the ninth give an account of the appearance and speech of the angels to the women of whom St. Luke has been speaking. The ninth informs us, that these women came and reported all “these things” to the apostles, and all the disciples. The tenth is supposed to be explanatory of the ninth; and therefore that the women named in it had been at the sepulchre together, had there seen the vision of the angels, and then had come as one company to the apostles and all the disciples.

On a larger view however of this history, another construction may be judged necessary.

Gerhard^x, Benson^y, Macknight^z, Lardner^a, Pilkington^b, and Doddridge^c, have all concluded that “these things are to be taken distributively; that Mary Magdalene reported some things, and the other women reported the rest. They believe that, though St. Luke has, in the tenth verse, put the whole account of what the women related together, the Evangelist refers to that which was related by Mary Magdalene, as well as by the second party of women.”

The evidences of the resurrection, then, which the women could produce were these:—

1. The appearance of the angel to Mary the mother of Joses—of two to Mary Magdalene—of Christ to Mary Magdalene—his second appearance to the women—the two angels who stood by the women, when they had been in the tomb and found not the body of the Lord Jesus.

It will be observed, from this statement, that each of the women had something different to relate. The expression of St. Luke, “these things,” must be referred to the various collected reports they had all brought. The expression therefore in the ninth verse, ἀπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν ταῦτα πάντα, must refer to the report of Joanna, whose account he had been immediately relating, and αἱ ἕλεγον—ταῦτα, to the whole company. See this point discussed at length by Townson, Cranfield, and others.

is certainly omitted in many manuscripts of great authority, or it is marked with an asterisk, or separated from the preceding part of the Gospel. It relates nothing inconsistent with the accounts of the other Evangelists, and appears to have been drawn up as an epitome of the various appearances of our Lord.

Mr. Cranfield has labored much to prove that this verse refers to the first visit of St. Peter mentioned by St. John. Dr. Townson, on the contrary, has defended the present order of St. Luke, and concludes that the Evangelist here relates the second visit of St. Peter to the sepulchre, when our Lord manifested himself to him. It is certain that Christ appeared to Peter about this time; for when the two disciples came from Emmaus to the other disciples, this very circumstance was the subject of their conversation. This fact is further confirmed by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 5. He was afterwards seen by the other apostles.

NOTE 27.—PART VIII.

I HAVE placed this clause by itself, as it was most probably on his return from the sepulchre, after he had received the accounts of the women that our Lord appeared to St. Peter. His desire to see our Lord, and perhaps to implore his forgiveness, as well as that characteristic eagerness and ardor, by which he was on all occasions distinguished, excited in him the desire to make his second visit to the sepulchre to examine it, to be again convinced that the body was removed; and in the hopes of meeting our Lord, if Christ would condescend to meet him. Cranfield very beautifully observes, "St. Peter had denied his Master, and had his Master showed himself to any other of the men before he showed himself to him, might he not have thought his repentance ineffectual, his reconciliation impossible, and consequently be plunged into despair? Though his fall was attended with inconceivable aggravation, yet the magnanimity and mercy of his Saviour was still greater, and knew no bounds."

NOTE 28.—PART VIII.

THESE sections are arranged in their present order upon the concurrent testimony of all the harmonizers, as well as the internal evidence. Every thing recorded in them affords a new source of wonder. Christ, in his glorified form, passes through the folded or barred-up doors, as if his body were like the light, or the air, and yet he appeals to his disciples to satisfy themselves that he was not a spirit, but possessed of material and solid flesh. We are assured that with this same body he ascended into another state, and that our bodies shall be made like his at the day of the resurrection. Philip. iv. ad fin^d.

NOTE 29.—PART VIII.

THIS desponding sentiment, "We trusted that it had been he that should have redeemed Israel," &c. must have been the general opinion of our Lord's disciples. All their hopes were buried with him in the sepulchre. They thought it impossible that he whom they had lately seen bleeding, and expiring on the cross, "the very scorn of men, and the outcast of the people," should by his own power break the bands of death, and rise again in greater beauty and perfection, "For as yet they knew not the Scriptures."

The Scriptures represent, in many passages, that "it behoved Christ to suffer." This was typified in the patriarchal age, by the offering up of Isaac—in the Law, by the brazen serpent—by the sacrifice of the animals, particularly by that of the paschal lamb. In the prophets:—1. Isa. liii. 5, 7, 8.—2. Daniel's prophecy, Dan. ix. 25, 26. "the Messiah shall be cut off."—3. Zech. xii. 10. "they shall look on me whom they have pierced."—In the Psalms; Ps. ii. 1-3. xx. 1-18. xvi. 10.

"Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell;

Neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."

It was intimated that he should rise again the third day—Isaac the third day was released—sacrifices eaten the third day. The resurrection does not seem to be alluded to in the Prophets, except in the type of Jonah, and in Isa. liii. and Zech. xii. 10. But on the prophecies and types fulfilled in the sufferings of Christ, see the sermon of Joseph Mede on Luke xxiv. 32. Hales's Analysis, vol. ii. part 2; and West On the Resurrection.

NOTE 30.—PART VIII.

IT has been supposed that this verse ought to be read interrogatively, for, in Mark xvi. 13., we learn that the apostles did not believe the testimony of the two disciples from Emmaüs, while it is here asserted that they were saying,

^d See Kuinoel, where the different opinions concerning the body of Christ are briefly summed up. See also Bishop Horsley's Sermons on the Resurrection, Sermon Fourth. I am contented with the facts of Scripture, and dare not indulge in the various conjectures which present themselves on these subjects. at the very time when the disciples from Emmaus came into the room, "The Lord has risen," &c. This difficulty is removed, if we suppose that our Lord had appeared to St. Peter, and they were expressing their incredulity at the moment the disciples arrived from Emmaus, in the language of this passage, "Has the Lord risen, and has he indeed appeared unto Simon?"

NOTE 31.—PART VIII.

THIS verse of St. Mark has generally been supposed to refer to our Lord's appearance to his disciples on the evening of his resurrection. But St. Luke and St. John both describe the first appearance of Christ to his disciples, and neither of them gives the least intimation of any thing like reproof, which they then heard from the mouth of their affectionate Lord. The whole of his discourse and behaviour to them was directed at that time to the composing of their troubles, and the satisfying of their doubts. Reprehension was reserved for the following Sunday, when a whole week having been allowed them to examine and compare the proofs of his resurrection, and to call to mind his own predictions and promises concerning it, they who continued incredulous were become more worthy of blame. Then if he said no more by way of reproof than what he said to St. Thomas, it was a reprehension of the rest of the company who were in the same state of mind: and it is sufficient to justify St. Mark's expression, "He upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart." St. Mark says, "He appeared unto the eleven," and it was of consequence to inform us that he was seen by the apostles; but when he adds, "And he upbraided them with their unbelief," he extends his view to all those whom he had spoken of as incredulous in the preceding verse

NOTE 32.—PART VIII.

THE first appearances of our Lord to his apostles appear to have taken place uniformly on the first day of the week; and from their consequent observance of that day, originated the Christian Sabbath.

NOTE 33.—PART VIII.

ON THE EXCLAMATION OF ST. THOMAS, AND ON THE WORD ΠΡΟΣΚΥΝΕΩ.

THE disbelief of the apostles is the means of furnishing us with full and satisfactory demonstration of the resurrection of Christ. Throughout the divine dispensations, it is to be observed, that every doctrine, and every important truth, is gradually revealed; and here we have a conspicuous instance of this progressive system. An angel first declares the glorious event! The empty sepulchre confirms the women's report. Christ's appearance to Mary Magdalene showed that he was alive—that to the disciples at Emmaus proved that it was at least the spirit of Christ, by his expounding the prophecies, and breaking of bread—that to the eleven showed the reality of his body, and the conviction given to St. Thomas, proved it the self-same body that had been crucified. The resurrection was testified by the conviction of the senses. The ear heard it, and blessed—the eye saw it, and gave witness—the hand was satisfied with feeling—the intellect was fed upon the heavenly teaching—and the Holy Ghost descended in confirmation of the holy truth. The miracle of the draught of fishes gave evidence of the continued existence of the same divine and almighty nature, which had been displayed before the crucifixion, and the Spirit of God was manifested in opening the Scriptures, till their hearts burned within them. Every possible demonstration was vouchsafed that man could receive, or God bestow. The wounds which had been inflicted upon the body of Christ were still visible, bearing testimony to his identity, unclosed, yet free from corruption. Incredulity itself was satisfied, and the convinced Apostle exclaims, in the joy of his heart, "My Lord and my God."

The question whether St. Thomas, at the moment of his conviction, intended his address to our Lord as an act of religious worship, must be decided by a consideration of the conclusions from which it must have originated. St. Thomas had denied the possibility of the resurrection. Our Lord convinced him of his error; then he expressed himself in these remarkable words, "My Lord and my God." "So far," says Bishop Horsley, "as the disciples believed in Jesus as the Messiah, in the same degree they understood and acknowledged his Divinity. In the first interview of Nathanael with our Lord, when he proved to him his omniscience, he exclaimed, 'Thou art the Son of God,' thou art the Divine and expected King of Israel. When the miraculous draught of fishes convinced St. Peter of the power of Christ, he addressed him as his 'Lord.' When the Angel Jehovah appeared to the patriarchs of old, they all worshipped and paid their homage in the same manner, and with similar expressions to those used by the Evangelists. It was some sudden proof of divinity in the mysterious Personage who addressed them, which elicited the language of homage and adoration."

The exclamation of the Apostle was, 'O

Κύριος μου, καὶ ὁ Θεός μου, in the nominative, which is frequently put for the vocative, in pure as well as in Hellenistic Greek. It seems, however, preferable to read the passage, σὺ εἶ understood, "Thou art my Lord, even my God;" or, as the word Κύριος corresponds to the principal names given in the Old Testament to the manifested God of Israel, it would be better to interpret the exclamation accordingly, as if he had said יהוה אלהי, or, as the Jews were accustomed to omit the ineffable name, and substitute אדוני in its place, he might have used only the latter אדוני אלהי. It seems, however, more probable, that on the present occasion he would omit the substituted term, and express himself in the very language of the Scriptures, יהוה אלהי. This was the name given to the manifested God of the Old Testament, and the exclamation of the Apostle, therefore, may be more fully rendered, "Thou art the Lord Jehovah, the manifested God of my fathers."

It is true that the word προσκυνέω, in the original, which is rendered by our translators by the term "worship," is used by the Evangelist to denote civil respect, or the homage due to persons of rank and dignity. But the word is one of general import; and the cases in which it must be understood of religious adoration on the one hand, or of civil homage on the other, can be discriminated only by attending to the circumstances in each instance. To assist in determining the true sense in the examples under consideration, let the following remarks be considered:—

1. Out of sixty places in which this word occurs in the New Testament, there are only two or three in which it indisputably bears the inferior sense; there are forty-three in which it is manifestly to be understood of religious worship; and the remaining instances are those of application to Christ, the genuine import of which we are desirous of ascertaining.

2. Our Lord, during the whole of his public ministry, evidently made it a principle of his conduct, to disavow and refuse all earthly eminence. The repeated attempts which were made to invest him with the regal dignity he inflexibly discountenanced. Even when he was accosted with an epithet which he might have accepted very inoffensively, he rebuked the person who gave it, because he perceived it was the language of adulation rather than of sincere conviction—"Why callest thou me good?" On the contrary, he never refused acknowledgments of spiritual supremacy. He openly claimed to be called Lord and Master, the Son of God, and the King of his Church.

A translation of the New Testament into Hebrew has been lately published by the London Society for Promoting the Conversion of the Jews; in this translation the words of St. Thomas are rendered literally אדוני ואלהי.

This Hebrew translation, so far as I am able to judge, appears to be executed with ability and faithfulness^e

NOTE 34.—PART VIII.

BEZA reads this passage, οὐδὲ ἐδίστασαν, "they did not doubt any longer." The Prussian version reads, προσεκύνησαν αὐτῷ, οἱ δὲ ἐδίστασαν, "they worshipped him, even those who had doubted." In which sense it should be οἱ τε. Grotius interprets it, "but some had heretofore doubted." Bishop Pearce conjectures, that those who doubted did so because they might be at a greater distance from him than others, and therefore could not so well distinguish.

NOTE 35.—PART VIII.

ST. MATTHEW'S words are, καὶ προσελθὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐλάλησεν αὐτοῖς; implying, that when our Lord first appeared to them it was at a distance: προσελθὼν is rendered by Grotius, "accedens."—See Townson, p. 167, and Bowyer, p. 136.

NOTE 36.—PART VIII.

THE contents of this section are very curious and important. So little did the apostles anticipate their future elevation, as the reformers of the religion of the world, that they had absolutely returned to their former occupation as fishermen of Galilee. Humble and unambitious, they appear to have as much forgotten all the splendid hopes and expectations of the past, as they were ignorant of their future high destinies.

NOTE 37.—PART VIII.

THESE words may either refer to the third appearance which St. John relates, or the third appearance Christ made to the apostles, when all, or most of them, were together. He manifested himself to ten of them (John xx. 19.); again to eleven of them (ver. 26.); and at this time to seven (see ch. xxi. 2.) But when the accounts of all the Evangelists are collated, we shall find that our Saviour distinctly revealed himself eleven times after his resurrection.

NOTE 38.—PART VIII.

PETER was now in the act of girding on his dry clothes, and our Lord, according to his custom, spoke from the object before him.

NOTE 39.—PART VIII.

THIS command was given for the fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaiah (ch. ii. 3).—

“For out of Sion shall go forth the Law,
And the Word of the LORD from Jerusalem.”

On the feast of Pentecost the publication of the Law on Mount Sinai took place; and on its approaching anniversary a New Dispensation was to be delivered to the world, the substance and substitute of the former figurative economy. The injunction of our Lord evidently shows an appointed analogy between the Old and New Dispensations. The time when this address was spoken by our Lord cannot be exactly ascertained. There is reason, however, to believe that what is related in this and the following section took place when the apostles were returned to Jerusalem, after they had seen Christ in Galilee, with this order, “to tarry in Jerusalem:” the instructions contained in the last chapter of St. Luke, from the end of the 43d verse, are considered as more nearly connected, in point of time, than with the transactions which immediately precede them, as given by that Evangelist. The harmonists likewise refer to this period (the latter part of the forty days), and all that is related by St. Matthew, in his last chapter, from the 18th verse; and also what is mentioned by St. Mark in his concluding chapter, from the end of the 14th verse.

NOTE 40.—PART VIII.

THE arrangement of the contents of this section has been principally made on the plan proposed by Mr. Cranfield, which appears to me to be preferable to that of Dr. Townson.

NOTE 41.—PART VIII.

CRANFIELD is of opinion, that from ver. 18. of Matt. xxviii.—from ver. 15 to 19 of Mark xvi.—and from ver. 50 to 52 of Luke xxii. must be referred to the address of our Lord to his disciples, on the occasion of his ascension into heaven. The speech of our Lord in St. Matthew, he observes, begins thus: “All power is given to me in heaven and on earth.” Some harmonists have made this clause to have been spoken on the mountain in Galilee, separating it from the remaining part of the speech; but, whenever it was uttered, the rest of the speech must have been spoken on the same occasion, by reason of the connective particle οὐρ. Our Lord here declares all power in heaven and on earth to be given to him at his resurrection; in consequence of which power, he proceeds to tell his disciples, that he had the authority and right to commission them to convert, baptize, and instruct the world: “Go ye therefore,” that is, in consequence of this power, or absolute authority. On the above clause our Lord founds his authority to commission his disciples: it was, therefore, rather unskilful to destroy the force of the argument by dismembering the speech. Now, as we learn from St. Mark, that our Lord did not commission his disciples till he led them out to his ascension, so, as we are not aware of any reasons to the contrary, we think it best to assign this passage in St. Matthew to the time of the ascension. Indeed, the passage itself furnishes internal evidence that it was spoken on this occasion: it implies that the disciples were fully instructed, and that our Lord was now going to take his final leave of them. We say, final leave; for the words, “Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,” can have no other meaning than this, “Though I am going now to ascend with my body into heaven, and therefore shall be no longer visibly upon earth; yet will I always be spiritually with you, and your successors, and direct the Church, even unto the end of the world.” This seems to me a strong indication that the passage in question can have been spoken on no other occasion than that of the ascension.

It is observable, that the Evangelists were more careful in giving us the words of our Lord, than in noting on what particular occasions they were spoken. The speech in St. Matthew, for instance, one might think, at first view, was given on the mountain in Galilee. He indeed says, that our Lord spoke then unto his disciples; but I cannot apprehend that he would commission them so soon, and give them to understand that he was then about to take his final leave of them, and ascend into heaven. For the ascension did not take place till what we may call long after the appearance on the Galilean mountain. St. Matthew, then, not thinking it material to notice what particular words our Lord spoke on the mountain in Galilee, only says, “That Jesus came up and spake unto his disciples.” This was enough to show us, that he of consequence removed the doubts of those of his disciples who had not beheld him till then after his resurrection. We may render and point the 18th verse in the following manner: "Then Jesus came up, and spake unto them."

We may understand this clause as the ending of the transaction on the mountain in Galilee, so far as we have it recorded. And as our translators have rendered, in innumerable instances, the participle as if it were a verb, so we may be allowed the same liberty here, especially when the true meaning of the Evangelist and the just method of harmonizing seem to require it: and render λέγων, not literally, "saying," but, "he saith." This therefore may begin a new paragraph continued on till the end of his Gospel; which paragraph we are under the necessity of supposing was meant by St. Matthew to relate to the ascension. Had the Evangelist written καὶ λέγει, the matter would not be capable of dispute. But, on the other hand, when we discover sufficient reasons to assure us that this paragraph refers to our Lord's last appearance to his disciples, and, consequently, that its place should not be regulated by the word λέγων; and when we also take into account the manner of the Evangelists in several instances, how they, by reason of their close adherence to brevity, seem to bring into one view, as belonging to one and the same transaction, things which, on a minuter inspection, we find to relate to different transactions; the liberty may be allowed to the harmonist of departing from the usual translation of the original reading, so far as he may judge it necessary. The passage in St. Luke contains internal evidence that it must be understood of no other than our Lord's last appearance to his disciples on Mount Olivet.

NOTE 42.—PART VIII.

WE must not understand δύναμις, which we translate "power," in this verse, as we do ἐξουσία, which is translated by the same word in the preceding verse. In the former, the infinite authority of God over all times and seasons is particularly pointed out: in the other, the energy communicated by him to his disciples, through which they were enabled to work miracles, is particularly intended.

NOTE 43.—PART VIII.

THE difficulty of this verse, when collated with the accounts given by the other Evangelists, is thus removed by Dr. Lightfoot.

1. In Luke xxiv. 50. we read, "He led them out as far as Bethany," and in this passage (Acts i. 12.) that when the disciples came back from the place where our Lord had ascended, "they returned from Mount Olivet, distant from Jerusalem a Sabbath-day's journey." But now the town of Bethany was about fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem (John xi. 18.), and that is double a Sabbath-day's journey.

2. Josephus tells us, that Mount Olivet was but five furlongs from the city, and a Sabbath-day's journey was seven furlongs and a half.—Antiq. lib. xx. cap. vi. Ὁ καὶ τῆς πόλεως ἀντικρὺς κείμενον, ἀπέχει στάδια πέντε: "which being situated in front of the city is distant five furlongs."

These things are all true:—1. That the Mount of Olives lay but five furlongs distant from Jerusalem. 2. That the town of Bethany was fifteen furlongs. 3. That the disciples were brought by Christ as far as Bethany. 4. That when they returned from the Mount of Olives, they travelled more than five furlongs. And, 5. Returning from Bethany, they travelled but a Sabbath-day's journey. All which may be easily reconciled, if we would observe, that the first space from the city was called Bethphage, which part of the amount was known by the name "to the length of about a Sabbath-day's journey," till it came to that part which is called Bethany. There was a Bethany, a tract of the mount, and also the town of Bethany. The town was distant from the city about fifteen furlongs, i. e. about two miles, or double a Sabbath-day's journey: but the first border of this tract (which also bore the name of Bethany) was distant but one mile, or a single Sabbath-day's journey.

Our Saviour led out his disciples, when he was about to ascend, to the very first region or tract of Mount Olivet, which was called Bethany, and was distant from the city a Sabbath-day's journey. And so far also from the city itself did that tract extend itself which was called Bethphage: and when he was come to that place where the bounds of Bethphage and Bethany met, and touched one another, he then ascended; in that very place where he got upon the ass when he rode into Jerusalem, Mark xi. 1. Whereas, therefore, Josephus saith, "that Mount Olivet was but five furlongs from the city," he means the first brink and border of it. But our Evangelist must be understood of the place where Christ ascended, where the name of Olivet began, as it was distinguished from Bethphage.

NOTE 44.—PART VIII.

ON THE VISIBLE ASCENSION IN EACH OF THE THREE DISPENSATIONS.

It has been supposed by Grotius, that the Gospel of St. John was originally terminated at the end of the 23 verse of chapter xx., and the remainder of the Gospel was added by the Church at Ephesus. This opinion, however, is rejected by Wetstein, Michaelis, and Whitby.

It is remarkable, that in each of the three Dispensations a visible ascension of the body has taken place,—some holy personage has been visibly taken up into heaven. In the first of these periods, between the Creation and the Deluge, Enoch was translated: “He was not,” say the Scriptures, “he did not die;” for “he walked with God, and God took him.” During the second period, from the Deluge to the Advent of our Saviour, Elijah was visibly taken up into heaven:—“It came to pass as he and Elisha still went on and talked, that, behold! there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven.” During the third period, which has continued nearly two thousand years, in which we and the whole Christian Church now live, and which will be concluded only by the day of judgment, Christ, our Lord, while in the act of blessing his disciples—“and while they beheld, was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight.” He ascended into heaven, and he now sitteth, till he shall again come to judge the living and the dead, at the right hand of God. Whatever were the sundry ways and divers manners in which God, by his Prophets, appealed to the Jewish world; whatever reception we ourselves may give to the precepts and the sanctions of his Evangelists and Apostles, who have more especially written for the Christian Dispensation, this is undeniable, that God, in every age, has made most abundant provision to demonstrate to all the certainty of another life and another state of being. In the great mercy of our Almighty Creator, this solemn truth has been enforced by three visible ascensions into heaven, an earnest to the world of the certainty of that great day, when all the Church of God, from the days of Adam, till the sounding of the trumpet of the Archangel, shall assemble before the judgment-seat of Christ. As surely as Enoch, and Elijah, and our Lord Jesus Christ ascended into heaven, so also shall we ascend from our graves, to give an account of the deeds done in the body, whether they be good or bad.

Where is now the body of Christ, which ascended in a visible and tangible shape? Wherever body exists, it must exist in reference to place, and heaven cannot therefore be merely a state or condition. There must be, then, in some part of the universe of God, a place in which the glory of the Deity is more immediately and peculiarly manifest, where the body of Christ now is, the real “Holy of Holies.” There is the seat of that happiness which is peculiarly prepared and destined for the faithful followers of Christ. There is the abode of angels; there are the spirits of the just made perfect; there is God, the Judge of all. To that place, and to the state and condition of happiness which is enjoyed there, every son of man may arrive, to whom the invitation of divine mercy has been extended. There is our home—here is our pilgrimage. There is our Father—here we are pilgrims and strangers. There is the Son of God, our Brother, and our Friend—here we live among fallen creatures, a cold and selfish world. There is peace, and repose, and rest—here is vexation, turbulence, and sorrow. Frail indeed is the veil of mortality which separates us from that holy mansion of God our Father; and poor and contemptible are the toys and follies that bind us to earth, and prevent us from anticipating, with serene and rational confidence, the summons to the invisible world that most assuredly awaits us. He that numbers the very hairs of our head, in whose book all our members are written, will not leave us nor forsake us in the grave. He shall separate our corrupted and mouldering bodies from the confused mass of atoms, by which they may be surrounded, with as much faithfulness and truth as the loadstone will draw to itself the smallest filing of steel from the innumerable grains of sand by which it may be encompassed. Why then should it seem a thing impossible to you that Christ should raise the dead? The voice of inspiration has declared,— “Thy dead men shall live,

Together with my dead body shall they arise,—
And the earth shall cast out the dead.”

(Isa. xxvi. 19.) And that same glorified body, which the disciples saw ascend, shall at the last day descend, and conduct us from the grave and gate of death to the glorious home of holiness and purity, to the new Jerusalem, the city of the living God.

NOTE 2.—PART IX.

ON THE APPOINTMENT OF MATTHIAS.

FROM this event many have inferred the right of popular interference in the election of ministers. He indeed must be a superficial reader who draws this conclusion, which an accurate consideration of the history directly invalidates. The election was made under peculiar circumstances which can never recur; before the platform of the Church was decisively established; before the apostles had received power from on high; and when their number was confessedly incomplete. If the number of names, which were together about an hundred and twenty, had been designed to comprehend the whole Church of that period, and the women, who followed Christ from Galilee (and for whose exclusion on this occasion there is no satisfactory reason), are included in the number, the eleven apostles and the seventy disciples, who would not separate before Pentecost, will form a very considerable part of the congregation. But in the interval between the resurrection and the ascension of our Lord, the Church was so numerous, that above five hundred brethren (1 Cor. xv. 6.) could be collected at one time and place to see him; and the circumstances of his appearance to his disciples were not such as to afford an opportunity of assembling them for a particular purpose, nor would they at this crisis be forward in declaring themselves; nor is it probable that any of them would return to his home before the feast, which he came to celebrate at Jerusalem. St. Peter, however, standing up in the midst of the hundred and twenty disciples, that is, to less than a fourth part of the brethren, addressed himself only to the men and brethren, an exclusive salutation of the apostolic college, as some have supposed, but which appears to be an indiscriminate manner of addressing an audience, whether of ministerial persons specifically, of disciples generally, or even of Jews and heathens. Its precise application must be determined from other relative expressions in the apostle's discourse. Now the repeated use of the pronoun us (Acts i. 17, 21, 22.), in speaking of Judas, who was numbered with us; of the men, who have companied with us; of the Lord Jesus going in and out among us, and of his being taken from us, and of the new candidate's being a witness with us of his resurrection, seems to imply in the speaker a peculiar connexion and identity of office with the persons whom he was addressing; and indeed the allusion to the ascension exclusively confines his meaning to the apostles. It is also worthy of remark, that in the address of the apostles to the multitude of the disciples on the day of Pentecost, this particularity of persons is actually observed: "Look YE out seven men, whom WE may appoint over this business," (Acts vi. 3.) Again, the apostle speaks of Judas as having obtained part of this ministry, of this ministry with which you and I are entrusted, and which in the subjoined prayer is described as the ministry and apostleship, or ministry of the apostleship, (Acts i. 17, 21.) He speaks likewise in a demonstrative manner of certain persons, who were present (ver. 21.), and out of whom the election was to be made, as distinguished from those whom he was addressing, and who were to make the election; and whom he supposes to be acquainted with the circumstances which rendered it necessary to supply the place of Judas from among those who had been their constant companions from the beginning, (Acts i. 22.) To be a witness of the resurrection is an expression frequently appropriated in the Scriptures to the apostles, and to them alone; and to be made a witness of the resurrection with us is to be raised to the apostolate with us. It may also be supposed, that the electors were possessed of equal authority with St. Peter, and placed the same reliance on their own judgment as on his recommendation; he maintained the necessity of substituting one for Judas; they nominated two candidates, and left the ultimate choice to the Searcher of hearts; while in the election of the deacons seven men were required by the apostles, and seven men were accordingly elected. Hence it may be concluded, that the persons whom St. Peter addressed, and who were to elect the candidates, were the apostles themselves. The choice of the electors was however limited; they were not to elect any new and inexperienced convert, but one of those who had companied with them all the time that the Lord Jesus had gone in and out among them, a description highly appropriate to the seventy; and if the application to them be admitted, and if it be maintained, in opposition to the preceding argument, that St. Peter's discourse was addressed to them in connexion with the apostles, the natural conclusion will be, that the seventy nominated, and the apostles approved; and Barsabas and Matthias must both be included in the number of the seventy. But whatever was the capacity of the electors, whether apostles or the seventy, or both acting in concert, they appointed two; they did not presume to supply the vacancy by the nomination of an individual successor; they did not before the effusion of the Spirit esteem themselves competent to judge of the respective merits of the candidates, whom they proposed; they commended their case in earnest prayer to God, and left the matter to his arbitration and decision; and with this diffidence in their own judgment, and this reference of the whole affair to the divine pleasure, it is most inconsistent to suppose that they would appeal to the opinion of an indiscriminate multitude. The election was concluded by lots, and the lot fell upon Matthias, and in devout acquiescence in the divine preference, without any imposition of hands, which on other occasions was the form of ministerial ordination, he was numbered with the eleven apostles. The inferences from this history must be drawn with care and deliberation; the circumstances of the Church were peculiar: St. Peter's discourse was not addressed indiscriminately to the people; the powers of the electors were limited, and they were exercised in dependence on the divine will; the persons elected were persons of experience in the service of the Lord; the choice was decided by God, who may have ruled the votes of the electors not less than the fall of the lots. Matthias therefore became an apostle by the will not of man, but of God; he was translated from an inferior condition, which was therefore distinct from the superior one to which he was admitted; he was numbered with the eleven by virtue of the divine preference; and every trace of popular election and of ministerial ordination is excluded^a.

Mosheim^b concludes, from the mode of expression here adopted by St. Luke, that the successor of Judas was not chosen by lot, as is generally supposed, but by the suffrages of the people. St. Luke says, καὶ ἔδωκαν κλήρους αὐτοῖν; but Mosheim thinks, that if the Evangelist wished to say they cast lots, he would have written καὶ ἔβαλον κλήρον, or κλήρους. But as it is impossible to reason from what the Evangelist ought to have written, rather than from what he has written, we cannot place much confidence in his remarks, particularly when we consider the manner in which the Jews usually express this idea; their phrase being (see Levit. xvi. 8.) נָתַן גּוֹרֵל, which corresponds to the Greek word κλήρος, used by the Evangelist; they gave, or cast forth the lot. As the foundation of Mosheim's argument is thus removed, it cannot be necessary to examine his inferences. The correct interpretation of a passage of Scripture destroys a whole legion of errors^c.

NOTE 3.—PART IX.

THIS passage, Acts i. 19., ought to be in a parenthesis, as being spoken by St. Luke. "Esse hunc verum pro additamento Lucæ habendum, satis dilucide verba ipsa docent. Quorsum enim Petrus Apostolis dixisset, Judæ triste fatum omnibus Hierosolymitanis innotuisse? quam absona fuisset etiam vocis Akeldama, omnibus præsentibus satis notæ, interpretatio! Accedit etiam quod ager ille haud dubie hoc nomen successu demum temporis accepit. Est igitur hic versus parentheseos nota a reliquis sejungendus. ἀκeldάμα, Syr. Chald. דמא קהל ager cædis, scil. cruentus, ἀγρός αἵματος, Matt. xxvii. 8^d.

NOTE 4.—PART IX.

THE word ἐπαυλις, habitation, in this passage corresponds with the Hebrew בֵּית רֹעֵה, which signifies the house appointed for the shepherd who is commissioned to take charge of the fold. Hence it is rendered in the authorized translation by a secondary meaning: the original sense of the word, however, would have better expressed the idea of the office and authority which Judas had abdicated. The first part of the verse is quoted by St. Peter from Ps. lxii. 26. and in the Alexandrine version we find the same word, γενεθίτω ἡ ἐπαυλις αὐτῶν ἡρημαμένη καὶ ἐν τοῖς σκηνώμασιν αὐτῶν μὴ ἔστω ὁ κατοικῶν. Hesychius, ἐπαυλις—μάνδρα βοῶν, ἢ οἴκημα, ἢ ἀυλή, ἢ στρατοπεδία, καὶ ἡ ποιμενικὴ ἀυλή.

The word ἐπισκοπήν, therefore, ought to be so interpreted, as to correspond with the former part of the verse: it implies an office in which the possessor exercises authority and control over those subject to his charge.

NOTE 5.—PART IX.

ON THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST.

THAT our blessed Redeemer was here addressed in the words “Thou, Lord! who searchest the heart,” may be inferred from the fact, that St. Peter had used the term “Lord” (ver. 21, 22.) immediately before this invocation, when he assuredly spoke of the Messiah. In the election of presbyters afterwards, in the several churches, the apostles commended them “unto the Lord, in whom they had believed,” (Acts xiv. 23.) That Lord was unquestionably Christ. In the Apocalypse, (ii. 23.), our Saviour expressly and formally assumed the title—“All the Churches shall know, that I am He which searcheth the reins and hearts.” Upon this passage of Scripture alone we should be justified in offering up our prayers to Christ, as “our God, and our Lord,” as our only Mediator, and our only Saviour.

The Divinity of Christ appears to me to rest upon this solid and unchangeable foundation—that the inspired writers seem throughout the whole of their pages to take it for granted. They are only anxious to prove Jesus of Nazareth to be the expected Messiah, which title implies his Divinity; and this point being gained, they consider it as a truth which required no additional argument. Whenever the course of their reasoning led them to touch upon the subject of the real nature of the Messiah, their very inspiration seems to be insufficient to clothe in adequate language their exalted ideas of his glory. When they attempt to describe Him, it is in the same words as they use when they speak of the Supreme Being. When they address Jesus the Christ, the Messiah of the prophets, the same humble adoration is observed as when they worship God the Father Almighty. The truth of this mode of representing the argument will appear from the following very brief statement of the ascriptions of glory which are alike applied to the Father Almighty, and his only Son, our Lord.

The comparison may be illustrated by the following table, given us in a late learned and elaborate work:—

TO GOD. TO CHRIST.

1. Εὐλογία, Εὐλογία,

Blessing; the utterance of gratitude from the universe of holy and happy beings, for all the divine bestowments.
2. Δόξα, Δόξα,

Glory; the manifestation to intelligent beings of supreme excellence.

3. Σοφία, Σοφία,

Wisdom; the most perfect knowledge combined with holiness and efficient power in ordaining, disposing, and actuating all beings and events to the best end; and this especially with respect to the salvation of mankind.
4. Τιμή, Τιμή,

Honor, worth, value, dignity, intrinsic excellence, supreme perfection.
5. Δύναμις, Δύναμις,

Power; ability to effect completely and infallibly all the purposes of rectitude and wisdom.
6. Ἰσχύς, Ἰσχύς,

Might; power brought into action.
7. Σωτηρία, Σωτηρία,

Salvation; deliverance from sin, and all evil, and bestowment of all possible good.
8. Εὐχαριστία,

Thanksgiving; the tribute from those who have received the highest blessings, to the Author of all their enjoyments.
9. Πλοῦτος,

Riches; the fulness of all good; the possession of all the means of making happy.
10. Κράτος,

Dominion; supreme power and goodness triumphing over all enmity and opposition.

The seven principal perfections are attributed to each. The eighth thanksgiving is given to God, and not to Christ; yet there is evidently nothing in this ascription more peculiarly divine than in the preceding, and the same is applied to Christ in other words, the most full and expressive that can be conceived. The remaining two are attributed to Christ and not to God; a plain proof that the inspired writer was under no apprehension that he might be dishonoring the Father, while ascribing infinite possessions and supreme empire to the Son.

On comparison with another passage, we find the very same notation of worthiness or dignity, attached to the Father and to the Saviour; in the one case it is, “Worthy art Thou, O Lord! to receive the glory and the honor and the power;” and in the other, “Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive the power and riches and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and blessings.”—See Smith’s Messiah, vol. ii. part ii. p. 565.

NOTE 6.—PART IX.

Εἰς τὸν τόπον τὸν ἴδιον. If we are right in interpreting the language of the New Testament in the same sense as it was understood by those to whom it was addressed, and no canon of criticism seems more certain, we must adopt the common rendering of this passage—“That he might go to his own place.” It was a common sentiment among the Jews, that “He that betrayeth an Israelite shall have no part in the world to come.” And Lightfoot quotes another similar expression from Baal Turim, in Num. xxiv. 25. “Balaam went to his own place, that is, into hell;” and from Midrash Coheleth, fol. 100. 4. It is not said of the friends of Job, that they, each of them, came from his own house, or his own city, or his own country, but from his own place, מִמְּקוֹם שֶׁנִּתְּחַצֵּר לוֹ בְּגֵהֶנִּים, that is, “from the place provided for them in hell.” The gloss is, “from his own place,” that is, “from hell, appointed for idolators.”

The Alex. MS. reads δικαιον, instead of ἴδιον, which would strengthen this interpretation.

Many passages from the apostolic fathers are quoted by Whitby, Benson, and Kuinoel, to prove that this expression was used by them also in this sense. Ἐπεὶ οὖν τέλος τὰ προάγματα ἔχει, ἐπικύεται τὰ δύο, ὅμου ὃ τε θάνατος, καὶ ἡ ζωὴ, καὶ ἕκαστος εἰς τὸν ἴδιον τόπον μέλλει χωρεῖν, quia igitur res finem habent, incumbunt duo simul, mors, et vita, et unusquisque in proprium locum iturus est.—Ignatius in Ep. ad Magnes. c. 5. and Clemens Rom. Ep. I. ad Corinth. p. 24. ed. Wottoni.—Polycarp in Ep. ad Philip. c. 9.—Epist. Barnab. sect. 19. After such evidence we may agree with Dr. Doddridge, that the interpretation of Hammond, Le Clerc, and Œcumenius, is very unnatural, when they explain it of a successor going into the place of Judas.

NOTE 7.—PART IX.

ON THE DESCENT OF THE HOLY GHOST ON THE DAY OF PENTECOST.

THE sins of man and their evil designs occasioned the confusion of tongues; the redemption of man brought with it the revocation of that judgment in the wonderful gifts of the Holy Ghost, which are recorded in this section. In the former instance men were leagued together for the purpose of propagating a false religion, but were miraculously frustrated in their plans by the interposition of Almighty God, who rendered them suddenly unintelligible to each other: in the latter case, when the true religion was to be delivered to the world, and its appointed ministers were assembled in obedience to a divine command, at Jerusalem, the sentence of condemnation was revoked: the Holy Spirit descended in testimony of the divine truth; and, by a miraculous diffusion of tongues, empowered the meek and lowly of the earth to communicate the glad tidings of salvation “to every nation under heaven.” The same miracle that first separated mankind, was now made the means of their reunion. All were invited to acknowledge the same God, and again to become members of the One True Religion. A sensible demonstration was given of the presence of the Holy Spirit. It took place before a mixed multitude assembled from every part of the civilized globe, who by this providential arrangement became witnesses of the fact, and spectators of the divine commission given to the apostles. Fire had always been considered by the Jews as an emblem of the visible presence of the Deity; the people of Israel now saw it descend in the form of cloven tongues upon the despised followers of the crucified Jesus. They saw it descend upon them on the anniversary of the same day, when the Law which was to bring them to Christ was first delivered to them: nor could any outward form be more appropriate or figurative to represent the gift and powers it was intended to convey.

It likewise intimated to the Jews that God had now appointed the day of Pentecost to be commemorated for the introduction of a New Law, and a New Dispensation, which was solemnly ratified by the effusion of the Spirit of God. The glorious covenant of redeeming grace was fully and finally disclosed, the Holy Ghost testifying the exaltation and Divinity of Christ, by the accomplishment of the promise which our Lord had given. “This is He that shall testify of me.” In his Godhead, Christ could only be known by the evidence of the Holy Spirit—in his manhood, the knowledge of Him was imparted by the testimony of the apostles. “When we consider (to use the language of an eminent modern divine) the magnitude of the commission intrusted to the apostles to teach all nations, and their acknowledged incompetency to carry it into effect, we can thus only be struck with the immense disparity between the end to be attained, and the means by which it was to be accomplished.”

The previous conduct of the apostles, during the last trying scenes of our Saviour’s life, shows that they were by nature eminently unfit to fulfil the important duties to which they were now called; the selection therefore of these ignorant and timid men was the best evidence that all human aid was laid aside, and that the Gospel was to be established, not by the "wisdom of men, but of God." Natural means were rejected, that spiritual things might be made manifest by the Spirit. He, the most energetic of our Saviour's apostles, who on the first appearance of danger shrank from the scrutinizing glance of a maid-servant, and three times, even with oaths and curses, denied the Holy One of Israel, now, armed with the Spirit of truth and of power, speaks before the astonished multitude as the ambassador of God, and was the instrument of adding in one day to the newly-formed Church three thousand souls. "Is this," says Dr. Heylin, "the illiterate fisherman? Is this the carnal disciple, who presumed to rebuke his Lord, when he first mentioned the cross to him? Is this the fugitive, apostate, abjuring Peter?"

Nor were the other disciples in any way more distinguished for their courage and firmness. By one, Christ was betrayed, and by all he was deserted and abandoned; yet such were the men ordained of God to "go into all the world, and to preach the Gospel to every creature." But God's strength was to be made perfect in weakness, and the ordinary and extraordinary influences of the Holy Ghost descended to supply all the natural deficiencies of the chosen followers of Christ. As men, they were commissioned to bear their human testimony to the truth of those facts, of which they themselves had been the eyewitnesses; but of spiritual things, the Holy Ghost was to testify, coöperating with them in their labors, and supplying them with those graces which were then only necessary in, and therefore limited to, the apostolic age.

Under the different titles ascribed to the Holy Ghost, they were qualified and prepared to undertake the great work to which they were devoted. "The Comforter" administered to their fearful and pusillanimous nature supernatural strength, fortitude, perseverance, and consolation—"As the Spirit of Truth," he illuminated their dark and uncultivated minds, and gave repaired energy to their slow comprehensions, "teaching them all things, and bringing all things to their remembrance." As "the Witness" he was continually with them, renewing their corrupt hearts and affections, and disposing them to holiness and purity of life. He endowed them with spiritual gifts, with the word of wisdom, of knowledge, and of faith, and "worked with them, to confirm their word with signs following" (Mark xvi. 20.) These signs may be considered as the more visible and extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit, and were, if we may be allowed to say so, necessary to distinguish the divine wisdom and knowledge of the apostles from human acquirements, and from human superiority. In Judæa only, their low origin and neglected education would either be known or believed; in other countries some further testimony was requisite to confirm their important declarations, than that which had wrought such a miraculous change on them at the day of Pentecost. For this purpose, therefore, the "gifts of healing and working of miracles" were added to the word of wisdom and knowledge. They possessed the power of restoring the dead to life, and by a word consigned the living to the grave (Acts v. 9, 10, &c.), their very shadows had virtue in them, the sick were recovered from handkerchiefs that had only touched their persons. Thus was the Gospel established as far as related to the human nature and actions of Christ, by the testimony of man; but to his Godhead by the "testimony of God" (1 Cor. ii. 1.), and by "the demonstration of the Spirit and power." The former was demonstrated by holiness of life, by unrepining martyrdom and patient suffering; the other by miracle and inspiration.

These were the great credentials of our faith, and the hallowed evidences on which our holy religion rests. When, however, the Church through these means was established, and the canon of Scripture, through divine knowledge and prophecy, was completed, the necessity for inspiration and miracle gradually ceased. "But," observes Mr. Nolan, "from these lively oracles, the Spirit still speaks the same language which it dictated to the Prophets and the Evangelists, while the Sacred Text still perpetuates the remembrance of those miracles which were openly wrought by the apostle and saint, to evince the divinity of our religion. To those who still require inspiration and miracles as evidences of its truth, the word of revelation lies open; and the religion which it details affords the most convincing proofs of supernatural intervention; prophecy, of itself, sufficiently proclaims the source from whence it sprang; and Christianity exhibits in its establishment a standing miracle." In the present day the gifts of tongues would be disregarded, and considered as useless when languages may be so easily acquired.

Those infidels who now scorn the evidence of prophecy which has declared the glorious triumph of Christianity over all the persecuting opposition of its powerful opponents, and who see it progressively extending over the unconverted world, would in all probability doubt even if a miracle were wrought in their favor. What indeed can be a greater evidence of the truth of Revelation than the living miracle of the perpetual preservation of the Jews, as a distinct body, separated from their fellow-men, holding in their hands the Hebrew Scriptures, and bearing testimony of their divine origin, and of their own perverse blindness and condemnation! Of such men I would say, "Though one rose from the dead, yet will they not be persuaded."

The extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit, being vouchsafed for one especial purpose only—the benefit of the Christian Church, as soon as that Church was established, and the canon of Scripture completed, were gradually withdrawn; though the ordinary operations, without which no child of Adam can "be renewed unto holiness," are to be continued for ever, "even unto the end of the world." This was the consoling and gracious promise our Lord gave to his disciples before he was visibly parted from them. He informs them of his departure, and at the same time declares, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you:" and again in another Evangelist, "Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." This most merciful promise was at first given to the apostles, and through their ministry to the universal Church; Christ himself having appointed outward means of grace, by which he has engaged to maintain a constant communion with his Church, through the operations of the Holy Ghost.

The spirit of Christ through the Holy Ghost still acts in the administration of holy orders, in the study of the revealed word, in public and private worship, and in the sacraments (1 Cor. vi. 11. John vi. 55, 63. 2 Thess. ii. 13. Ephes. v. 25, 26, &c.) These are the means of grace by which the ordinary operations of the Holy Ghost are imparted; and these are the sources from which alone we have reason to expect those continued and spiritual gifts which are essentially necessary to the renovation of fallen man, and his reconciliation with God. Every amiable feeling and affection, every virtue, and every grace, are the fruits of the Holy Spirit. He alone, by a secret and internal operation, changes and transforms the "spirit of our mind," and enlarges and improves every faculty of our soul, healing all its sicknesses. He checks the solicitations of sense, counteracts our natural propensities, arms us against the flatteries and allurements of the world, and against those spiritual enemies which are ever on the watch to assail our weaknesses, and to tempt our virtue. "He," to use the words of the eloquent Barrow, "sweetly warmeth our cold affections, inflaming our hearts with devotion towards God; he qualifyeth us, and encourageth us to approach the throne of grace, breeding in us faith and humble confidence, prompting in us fit matter of request, becoming our Advocate and Intercessor for the good success of our prayers." He is our only Comforter and Intercessor on earth—through Him alone we can attain to "that most excellent gift of charity which never faileth, which believeth all things, and hopeth all things," surviving the wreck of time, the perfection of man here, and his happiness hereafter^e.

A variety of opinions have been advanced respecting this miracle of Pentecost. The most rational and the most general is, that the gift of tongues lasted during the ministry of the apostles; and that as soon as the purpose for which it was given was accomplished, it was gradually withdrawn.

Others contend that it was but temporary, and intended to answer only an immediate purpose; that the miracle was not wrought upon the apostles themselves, but upon the people only, who were suddenly enabled to understand in their own various dialects, the words which were spoken by the apostles in the Galilean language.

Others attempt to do away the miracle altogether. Eichhorn suggests, that to speak with tongues, means only, that some of the apostles uttered indistinct and inarticulate sounds; and those who uttered foreign, or new, or other words, were Jews who had come to Jerusalem, from the remote provinces of the empire, and being excited by the general fervor of the people, united with them in praising God in their own languages. Herder is of opinion that the word γλῶσσα is used to express only obsolete, foreign, or unusual words. Paulus conjectures, that those who spoke with different tongues were foreign Jews, the hearers Galileans. Meyer, that they either spoke in terms or language not before used; in an enthusiastic manner, or united Hebrew modes of expression, with Greek or Latin words. Heinrichsius, or Heinrich, that the apostles suddenly spoke the pure Hebrew language, in a sublime and elevated style. Kleinius, that the apostles, excited by an extraordinary enthusiasm, expressed their feelings with more than usual warmth and eloquence. Such are the ways in which the modern German theologians endeavour to remove the primitive and ancient belief in the literal interpretation of Scripture. "Thinking themselves wise, they become fools." Learning, so perverted by the inventions of paradoxes, which can tend only to darken the light of Scripture under the pretence of illustrating its sacred contents, becomes more injurious to the consecrated cause of truth than the most despicable ignorance, or the most wilful blindness. The errors of ignorance, the fancies of a disordered imagination, the misinterpretations of well-intending theories, are comparatively harmless, when contrasted with the baleful light which renders the Scripture useless, by producing doubt in the attempt to overthrow facts.

Byrom of Manchester, also, and others, have endeavoured to lessen the force of this miracle, by representing that the influence of the Spirit was not so imparted to the apostles as to enable them to speak in various languages, but that when the apostles addressed the multitude in their native Galilean dialect, the Parthians, Medians, &c. who were present, understood them each severally in their own language. It is well remarked by Thilo, that if this had been the case, the words of St. Luke would have been λαλῆσιν αὐτοί, ἀκούοντων ἡμῶν, ταῖς ἡμετέραις γλώσσαις, whereas his expression is, λαλοῦντων αὐτῶν ταῖς ἡμετέραις γλώσσαις, unde etiam patet, miraculum hoc non fuisse in audientibus, sed in apostolis loquentibus. He then goes on to prove that they spoke successively the various languages of the hearers and spectators of the miracle—they began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance, καθὼς τὸ πνεῦμα ἐδίδου αὐτοῖς (ἀποστόλοις) ἀποφθέγγεσθαι, non ἐδίδου αὐτοῖς (ἀκροαταῖς) εἰσακῆσαι. B. Schmidius—Syrus, loquebantur lingua, et lingua, i. e. pluribus linguis^f.

NOTE 8.—PART IX.

THE words here used by St. Luke, καὶ ἐν τῷ συμπληρῶσθαι τὴν ἡμέραν τῆς πεντεκοστῆς, are thus happily translated by B. Dn. Erasmus Schmidt (in not. ad loc.) et cum completum esset tempus usque ad diem festum Pentecostes:—“And when the time was fulfilled, even up to the day of Pentecost.” The Jews reckoned the day of Pentecost to begin fifty days after the first of Unleavened Bread, which was observed the day after the paschal lamb was offered. The law relative to this feast is found in Levit. xxiii. 15, 16. Perhaps the Evangelist is thus particular in pointing out the time, on account of the striking analogy that exists between the Old and New Dispensations in this and other great events. In the former, the paschal lamb of the Passover was broken and fed upon, in remembrance of the great deliverance of the children of God from the hands of their temporal enemies, by whom they were detained in bondage and subjection. In the latter, at the celebration of this figurative feast, Christ our Passover was slain to deliver all that would believe on Him from the great enemies of their salvation, Satan, sin, and death, and to rescue their spirits from the unhappy thralldom of these cruel taskmasters. He died for us that we might be spiritually fed by his body and blood.

^f Salmasius was of opinion that the miraculous gifts lasted but for one day.—See the Dissertations on this event in the Critici Sacri—Kuinoel, Comm. in Lib. Hist. N. T. vol. iv.—Nolan On the Holy Ghost—and Faber On the ordinary Operations, &c.

In the former Dispensation, at the day of Pentecost, God gave his Law on Mount Sinai, with thunder and lightning, fire, storm, and tempest, with all the awful demonstrations of an offended Deity. In the fulness of time, at the feast of Pentecost, God again manifested himself, and revealed a more perfect Law—on both occasions circumstances characteristic of the peculiar nature of the Law were observed—the same divine power was demonstrated, but in the latter instance divested of its terrors. On both occasions the presence of God was manifested by the sound of rushing winds supernaturally excited, by fire descending from heaven, and, as some suppose, by the sudden thunder which accompanied the Bath Col. The account of St. Luke is so very brief, that we cannot be certain whether the latter proof of the presence of God was given; but it is the most probable opinion, and is very strenuously defended by Harenburgh, in the 13th volume of the Critici Sacri^g. At the Passover, Christ proved his human nature by submitting to the most ignominious death to which that nature could be exposed: at the day of Pentecost he gave evidence of his divine nature and exaltation, by miracle, and by power, and by fulfilling to the utmost the promise he made to his disciples while with them upon earth (John xiv. 16-18.), “He humbled himself that he might be exalted.”

In the Jewish tabernacle God testified his acceptance of the first sacrifice that was offered on the holy altar by the descent of fire from heaven. When Christ made a sacrifice of his body on the altar of the cross, thereby abolishing all burnt offerings of bulls and of goats, the apostles, as priests and ministers of his new covenant, as the living sacrifices acceptable to God, received a similar token of divine approbation, by fire from heaven resting upon them in the form of fiery tongues. Thus are all the mysteries of Omnipotence shadowed out as “through a glass darkly,” and thus, may we not suppose, that the last revelation given to man by St. John typifies, in like manner, those eternal realities of the New Jerusalem, of which we can form no higher idea than the Jews of old entertained of the glorious privileges and blessings, of which we are now the happy partakers in the Christian dispensation?

^g The opinion is principally founded on the words in Acts ii. 6. Γερούνης δὲ τῆς φωνῆς ταύτης, which both Harenburgh and Schoetgen would render in this manner, φωνῆς verte tonitru. Sic saepe vox ἡρ in Hebraeo, et vox Græca, Apoc. i. 15.—x. 3. Schoetgen refers also to Heinsius, in Aristarcho Sacro, c. 14, and 25. Doddridge defends the common translation by observing, that it was not the sound of thunder or rushing wind which collected the people together, but the miraculous effusion of tongues. This, however, must still remain a matter of doubt, as we are only informed in the sacred narrative, that when the multitude came together, they were confounded to hear every man speak in his own language.

NOTE 9.—PART IX.

VARIOUS opinions have prevailed respecting the place where this miracle occurred. The temple, the house of Mary the mother of John, of Simon the Leper, of Joseph of Arimathea, of Nicodemus, have each been alternately fixed upon. This point must ever remain in a great degree a matter of doubt; I am, however, induced, by the arguments of the celebrated Joseph Mede, to think that this miracle took place in an upper room of some private house, set apart for religious services, rather than in the temple which was so soon to be destroyed, and its figurative service superseded by a spiritual worship and purer discipline.

It is not probable that the despised followers of the crucified Jesus should be allowed, as an associated body, to assemble together in the temple, for the purpose of joining in a new act of devotion, by those priests who had so short a time before been the persecuting instruments of their blessed Master's condemnation and crucifixion^h.

NOTE 10.—PART IX.

MARKLAND supposes that instead of "these men are full of new wine," the passage should be read, "these men are, without doubt, under the strong inspiration of the goddess Γλευκώ." He would read γλευκοῦς as derived from γλεῦκος, "must." For the sake of ridicule, the person or goddess Γλευκώ (Gen. 605, 605.), formed as Θάλλω, Αὔξω (Poll. viii. 9. Segm. 10.) is used. So likewise Ἀείεστω, and Εὔεστω, Dea Politica. Those who opposed the apostles intended by this expression to sneer at the mean appearance and obvious poverty of the fishermen of Galilee, as no one opened their vessels of last year's γλεῦκος, so early as June, unless impelled by necessityⁱ.

This, however, seems to be a strange remark: the witnesses of the miracle at Pentecost were Jews; and, though some of them who were Hellenists had resided in Greece or Rome, it does not appear probable that they would make an allusion to the mythology of the heathens in preference to their own traditions; in which they read that there was a demon called קרר-קום which possessed those who were drunk with new wine, which gave the drinker not only wit and gayety, but the power of speaking other languages^j; and to this agent we may justly suppose the Jews would have ascribed the eloquence and fluency of the apostles, if they had attempted to account for the effects of the Holy Spirit by any supernatural influence. But as we find that this was not the case, and as the conjecture, that a reference was made to the heathen mythology, can only be derived from the word γλεῦκος, the present translation of the passage may be considered as giving its genuine signification^k.

NOTE 11.—PART IX.

ST. PETER here particularly addresses himself to these ἔτεροι (ver. 13.) who represented the apostles as drunkards to the Jews of Judæa and Jerusalem, because those who were assembled from distant parts might not have been so well acquainted with the prophecy of Joel (ii. 28.), which he now declares to have been fully accomplished on this occasion. And he urges upon those who hear him this predicted promise of the Holy Spirit, as a glorious evidence of the exaltation and resurrection of the crucified Jesus, who was "both Lord and Christ." Let those who doubt the inspiration of Peter, compare what he now is with what he formerly was, the weak and timid disciple, who deserted and denied his best Friend and gracious Master.

The prophecy of Joel was not applied to the great effusion of the Holy Spirit by St. Peter only; the traditions of the Jews record its reference to the same event, in the days of the Messiah. Schoetgen quotes on this subject the following paragraphs from Tanchuma, fol. 65. 3. and Bammidbar Rabba, sect. 15. When Moses placed his hand upon Joshua, the holy and blessed God said וְיָנִיחַ הַיְּהוָה בְּיָדְךָ, that is, in the days of the Old Testament—one prophet prophesies at one time, but לְעוֹלָם הַבָּא, in the days of the Messiah, all the house of Israel shall prophesy, as is said in Joel ii. 48.

Likewise from Midrasch Schochartof in Jalkut Simeoni, part i. fol. 221. 2. and fol. 265. 4. on Numb. xi. 29.

The people assembled therefore at the festival of Pentecost, who were acquainted with this prediction and its traditional interpretation, were now the spectators of its actual fulfilment, and were appealed to by tradition, by prophecy, and miracle, to acknowledge the Divinity of Christ, and the real nature of his mission. The words "last days," in ver. 17, is shown by Schoetgen to refer to the days of the Messiah, by two references to the Book Zohar, באחרית, הַיָּמִים הַבָּאִים *Diebus postremis, die sexto, qui est millenarius septimus, כִּי יֵיתִי מִשִּׁיחָא, quando Messias veniet; nam dies Dei S. frequent exhortations to the wealthy to be rich in good works; but not the least intimation that they were required to sell their possessions. It must have been a voluntary sacrifice to have made the offering acceptable.

NOTE 12.—PART IX.

SCHOETGEN remarks on this passage, that in all the rabbinical writers he has never met with the application of this passage to the Messiah. We have reason, therefore, to suppose it was applied now for the first time. The Apostle at the moment of inspiration, when the remembrance of Christ's wonderful resurrection was still fresh in the memory of the people, asserts, by that strongest and most irrefragable argument, that this prophecy also related to Christ, and was by him alone fulfilled, for "his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption." The veil, that had been for so long a period spread over the face of Moses, was now to be gradually withdrawn, and through the Spirit of God spiritual things were to be compared with spiritual.

The expression ἡ γλῶσσα μὲν, in ver. 26, in the original is rendered by כְּבוֹדִי, my glory—this word is often used for נַפְשִׁי, my soul.

NOTE 13.—PART IX.

BISHOP HORSLEY was of opinion that the cloven tongues remained upon the apostles after they went down among the people. This he thinks is alluded to in the expression, "that which ye now see and hear," ver. 33. If so, another beautiful analogy exists between the giving of the Law to Moses, when "the skin of his face shone, while he talked with him," (Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30.), and the communication of the Law to the apostles, when the fire of heaven again rested upon man.

NOTE 14.—PART IX.

THAT this unbounded liberality was not commanded by St. Peter is evident from his address to Ananias, Acts v. 4. And that it was not intended as a precedent is equally clear from all the Epistles, in which frequent mention is made of a distinction between the rich and poor, and

IN the opinion of the learned Joseph Mede, the words here translated "from house to house," would have been better rendered "on the house." In his curious Dissertation on the Churches for Christian Worship in the Apostles' Times, he observes, that the early Christians, not having stately structures as the Church had after the empire became Christian, were accustomed to assemble in some convenient upper room, set apart for the purpose, dedicated perhaps by the religious bounty of the owner to the use of the Church. They were distinguished by the name Ἀνώγειον, or Ὑπερῶον, (an upper room), and by the Latins Cenaculum, and were generally the most capacious and highest part of the dwelling, retired, and next to heaven, as having no other room above it. Such uppermost places were chosen even for private devotions (Acts x. 9.) There is a tradition in the Church that the room in which the apostles were in the habit of assembling was the same apartment as that in which their blessed Lord celebrated with them the last Passover, and instituted the mystical supper of his body and blood for the sacred rite of the Gospel. The same room in which on the day of his resurrection he came and stood in the midst of his disciples, the doors being shut, and having shown them his hands and his feet, said, "Peace be unto you," &c. (John xx. 21.) The same in which eight days (or the Sunday after), he appeared in a similar manner to them being together, to satisfy the incredulity of Thomas, and to show him his hands and his feet. The same hallowed spot where the Holy Ghost descended, imparting to them wisdom, faith, and power. The place where James, the brother of our Lord, was created by the apostles Bishop of Jerusalem: the place where the seven deacons, whereof St. Stephen was one, were elected and ordained: the place where the apostles and elders of the Church at Jerusalem held that council, the pattern of all councils, where the first controverted point was decided: and afterwards the place of this Cenaculum was enclosed with a goodly Church, known by the name of the Church of Sion, upon whose top it stood, to which St. Jerome, in his Epitaphium Paulæ (Epist. 27.) applies those words of the Psalmist,—

"Her foundations are in the holy mountains;
The LORD loveth the gates of Sion
More than all the dwellings of Jacob."

St. Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, calls it the Upper Church of the Apostles, and he states, "the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles in the likeness of fiery tongues, here in Jerusalem, in the Upper Church of the Apostles."—Cyril, Hierosol. Cat. 16. Should the tradition be true, it is evident that this Cenaculum, from the time that our blessed Saviour first hallowed it, by the institution and celebration of his mystical supper, was devoted to a place of prayer and holy assemblies. And thus, perhaps, should that tradition, which the venerable Bede mentions, be understood; that this Church of Sion was founded by the apostles; not that they erected the structure, but that the building, from the time it was made a Cenaculum by our Saviour, was by his apostles dedicated to a house of prayer.

The Greek words κατ' οἶκον, used in this passage (ver. 46.), and rendered in our translation "house to house," may be interpreted like ἐν οἴκῳ, "in the house;" and we find it is so rendered both by the Syriac and Arabic, and likewise by the New Testament in other places, Rom. xvi. 3–5. 1 Cor. xvi. 19. Coloss. iv. 15. Philemon i. 2. And we, moreover, find this Cenaculum called Οἶκος, in the second verse of this chapter. And the same phrase, breaking of bread, is used a little before in the 42d verse, which is wont to be understood of the communion of the Eucharist; and by the Syriac interpreter is expressly rendered by the Greek word fractio eucharistiæ; and again at chap. xx. ver. 7, according to that of St. Paul, the bread which we break, &c. Why should it not then be so used here? And if this interpretation is admitted, it follows that the passage in question must be intended to signify, that when the apostles had performed their daily devotions in the temple, at the accustomed times of prayer, they immediately retired to this Cenaculum, or upper room, where, after having celebrated the mystical banquet of the holy Eucharist, they afterwards took their ordinary and necessary repast with gladness and singleness of heart. It further proves, that the custom of the Church to participate the Eucharist fasting, and before dinner, had its beginning from the first constitution of the Christian Church.

When we consider even to our own day how many spots tradition has transmitted to us as the scene of some eventful history, I cannot but receive the hypothesis of the excellent Mede as probable, and consistent with reason and Scripture. We know that the oak of Mamre was venerated till the days of Constantine, and can we say it is not probable that the sepulchre of the Son of God—the last room that he visited—which he consecrated by his presence after the resurrection, and by the descent of the Holy Spirit, in testimony of his exaltation, should not be commemorated by his devout and faithful followers? Who doubts that Edgar was killed at Corfe Castle, or William Rufus in the New Forest? The particular spots where the martyrs were burnt in Canterbury, in Smithfield, and at Oxford, are still pointed out by tradition: and many instances of a similar nature might be collected from the histories of every country. Whence then arises the supposed improbability, that the early Christians would cherish the memory of the wonderful events in which they were so deeply interested?

NOTE 16.—PART IX.

It seems difficult to interpret these words in their literal sense, when we remember the numerous miracles of our Lord, and the abundant proofs the Jews received that he was their promised Messiah. The ἀγνοία, here referred to, would be better rendered by the word error, or prejudice, as Whitby proposes. Lightfoot again endeavours to show that the ignorance here spoken of, consisted in their mistake of the place of our Lord's birth, and in their expectations of a temporal, instead of a spiritual, kingdom. Wolfius would point the passage differently; he thinks the expression ὅσπερ καὶ οἱ ἄρχοντες ὑμῶν, refers not to ἀγνοίαν, but to ἐπράξατε, and the meaning is, therefore, scio vos ignorantia adductos, ut faceretis, sicut duces vestri, scil.: ἐπράξαν. It is my opinion that St. Peter, in this passage, intended to intimate to the Jews that their conduct and condemnation of the Holy Jesus proceeded from their ignorance of their own prophets, with whom they ought to have been better acquainted. The sense of the passage appears to be this: "Ye did it without knowing what ye were about." The following verse corroborates this interpretation".

NOTE 17.—PART IX.

THE words, "when the times of refreshing shall come," commentators suppose should be rendered, "that the times of refreshing may come." This opinion is defended by the following parallel passages, where the same word ὅπως ἂν is used: Ps. ix. 14. ὅπως ἂν ἐξαγγελῶ—the Hebrew is, למען אספרה. "That I may show forth," &c. Ps. xcii. 7. ὅπως ἂν ἐξολοθῇσθῶσι. Heb. להשמד, "That they may be destroyed for ever." Ps. exix. 101. ὅπως ἂν φυλάξω. Heb. למען אשמור, "That I might keep." Acts xv. 17. ὅπως ἂν ἐκζητήσωσι, "That they might seek," &c. So in the same verse, "Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, ὅπως ἂν ἔλθωσι, that the times of refreshing may come," &c. Markland has made the same remark, but proposes to connect ὅπως ἂν with ἐπλήρωσεν, ver. 18. putting (μετανοήσατε ἁμαρτίας) in a parenthesis:—"Those times which God before had showed, he hath so fulfilled—THAT times of refreshment may come: ὅπως ἂν for ἵνα." The times of refreshing appear here primarily to refer to the blessings which should accompany the extension of the dominion of the Messiah, if he were at length acknowledged by his people. The words have been severally applied to the preachers of the Gospel—the influences of the Spirit—and the intervening period between this time and the destruction of Jerusalem, which was allotted to the Jews for repentance and conversion.

From the arguments of the Apostle, compare ver. 16 with 19, 20, and 26, the cure of the lame man may, I think, be considered as a significant action, or miracle; whereby St. Peter wishes to demonstrate to the Jews, while their first impression of surprise and astonishment lasted, that the same faith in the Holy One and the Just, which "hath made this man strong," and recovered him to "perfect soundness" of body in the presence of them all, was only a shadow or figure of its efficacious power in healing the diseases of that nation, and restoring it to its former spiritual elevation and dignity, if they would be persuaded, even now, to acknowledge as their Messiah the Prince of Life, whom God raised from the dead.

NOTE 18.—PART IX.

THE Greek word προεκηρυγμένον, here translated, "which before was preached," is rendered in nearly forty MSS. as if it signified προεχειρισμένον ὑμῖν, "who was before ordained for you, or foredesigned"—ὑμῖν being read with an emphasis. The meaning therefore of the expression is, "That God may send Jesus Christ, who was before designed for you, in the predictions of the Law and the Prophets."

prove, at great length, that the earliest notion which men had of immortality, was their resurrection and restoration to the paradisiacal state. The notion of immortality entertained by the patriarchs was their resurrection in the land of Canaan, and eternal possession of that land in a glorified condition. He supposes that the expression of St. Peter in this passage is an allusion to the anticipated restoration of mankind to their former condition of innocence and happiness: and his opinion is confirmed by the peculiar metaphors under which St. John, in the Apocalypse, describes the future state. Lightfoot would render the word ἀποκαταστάσις, by "accomplishment," instead of "restitution." By whatever word we express the idea, it is still the same. St. Peter refers to the eventual completion of the happiness of mankind, by the universal establishment of Christianity, and the blessings of its influence; a period which all the prophets have anticipated in their sublimest visions, which the best men, in all ages, have delighted to contemplate, and which, in our own day, we have reason to hope, is progressively advancing.

NOTE 20.—PART IX.

ON THE PARALLEL BETWEEN MOSES AND CHRIST.

As St. Peter has applied this passage to our Lord, it will be unnecessary to examine the arguments by which some writers would apply the prediction of Moses to the long line of prophets that came after him. It is sufficient for us to know, that even when taken collectively, they were not like unto him in so many points as Jesus of Nazareth.

Jortin gives the following parallel:—

The resemblance between Moses and Christ is so great and striking, it is impossible to consider it fairly and carefully, without seeing and acknowledging that He must be foretold where he is so well described.

First, and which is the principal of all, Moses was a lawgiver and the mediator of a covenant between God and man. So was Christ. Here the resemblance is the more considerable, because no other prophet beside them executed this high office.

The other prophets were only interpreters

^t "Hunc locum quidam de Josua, alii de prophetis in genere enarrant. Sed prophetæ non erant Mose per omnia similes. Nam Moses videbat Deum in speculari lucido; prophetæ, in non lucido. Præterea Moses videbat Deum facie ad faciem, loquebatur eum eo ore ad os: non sic reliqui prophetæ. Debet igitur peculiariter accipi de Christo, qui fuit scopus omnium prophetarum," &c.—Drusius in Deut. xviii. 15. Crit. Sacri, vol. ii. p. 131.

^u Jortin's Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 282, et seq.

and enforcers of the Law, and in this respect were greatly inferior to Moses. The Messiah could not be like to Moses in a strict sense, unless he were a legislator. He must give a Law to men, consequently a more excellent Law, and a better covenant than the first. For if the first had been perfect (as the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews argues) there could have been no room for a second.

2. Other prophets had revelations in dreams and visions, but Moses talked with God, with the Λόγος, face to face. So Christ spake that which he had seen with the Father, Num. xii. 6-8.

All the prophets of the Old Testament saw visions and dreamed dreams—all the prophets of the New were in the same state. St. Peter had a vision; St. John saw visions; St. Paul had visions and dreams. But Christ neither saw visions, nor dreamed a dream, but had an intimate and immediate communication with the Father—he was in the Father's bosom—and He, and no man else, had seen the Father. Moses and Christ are the only two in all the sacred history who had this communication with God.—Bishop Sherlock, Disc. 6.

3. Moses in his infancy was wonderfully preserved from the cruelty of a tyrant—so was Christ.

4. Moses fled from his country to escape the hands of the king—so did Christ, when his parents carried him into Egypt. Afterwards, "The Lord said to Moses in Midian, 'Go, return into Egypt; for all the men are dead which sought thy life,'" Exod. iv. 19. So the angel of the Lord said to Joseph in almost the same words, "Arise, and take the young child, and go into the land of Israel, for they are dead which sought the young child's life," Matt. ii. 20. pointing him out, as it were, for that prophet which should arise like unto Moses.

5. Moses refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction—Christ had all the kingdoms of the world offered him by Satan, and rejected them; and when the people would have made him a king, he hid himself, choosing rather to suffer affliction.

6. "Moses," says St. Stephen, "was learned, ἐπαιδευθῆναι, in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds;" and Josephus, Ant. Jud. 2. 9. says, that he was a very forward and accomplished youth, and had wisdom and knowledge beyond his years; which is taken from Jewish tradition, and which of itself is highly probable. St. Luke observes of Christ, that "he increased (betimes) in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man;" and his discourses in the temple with the doctors, when he was twelve years old, were a proof of it. The difference was, that Moses acquired his knowledge by human instruction, and Christ by a divine afflatus. To both of them might be applied what Callimachus elegantly feigns of Jupiter,— Ὅξυ δ' ἀνίβησας, τὰ χινοὶ δέ τοι ἱλθον ἱουλοὶ, Ἀλλ' ἔτι παιδὸς ἔδωκ' ἐφράσσασθαι πάντα τέλεια.

7. Moses delivered his people from cruel oppression and heavy bondage—so did Christ from the worst tyranny of sin and Satan.

8. Moses contended with the magicians, and had the advantage over them so manifestly, that they could no longer withstand him, but were forced to acknowledge the divine power by which he was assisted—Christ ejected evil spirits, and received the same acknowledgments from them.

9. Moses assured the people whom he conducted, that if they would be obedient, they should enter into the happy land of promise;—which land was usually understood, by the wiser Jews, to be an emblem and a figure of that eternal and celestial kingdom to which Christ first opened an entrance.

10. Moses reformed the nation, corrupted with Egyptian superstition and idolatry—Christ restored true religion.

11. Moses wrought a variety of miracles—so did Christ; and in this the parallel is remarkable, since beside Christ "there arose not a prophet in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and wonders which the Lord sent him to do."

12. Moses was not only a lawgiver, a prophet, and a worker of miracles, but a king and a priest. He is called a king, Deut. xxxiii. 5., and he had indeed, though not the pomp, and the crown, and the sceptre, yet the authority of a king, and was the supreme magistrate; and the office of priest he often exercised—In all these offices the resemblance between Moses and Christ was singular. In the interpretation of Deut. xxxiii. 5. I prefer the sense of Grotius and Selden to Le Clerc's. The parallel between Moses and Christ requires it, and no objection can be made to it. The apostolical constitutions also, if their judgment be of any weight, call Moses "High Priest and King;" τὸν ἀρχιερέα καὶ βασιλέα, vi. 3.

13. Moses, says Theodoret, married an Ethiopian woman, at which his relations were much offended; and in this he was a type of Christ, who espoused the Church of the Gentiles, whom the Jews were very unwilling to admit to the same favors and privileges with themselves. But I should not choose to lay a great stress upon this typical similitude, though it be ingenious.

14. Moses fasted in the desert forty days and forty nights, before he gave the Law: so did Elias, the restorer of the Law: and so did Christ before he entered into his ministry.

15. Moses fed the people miraculously in the wilderness—so did Christ with bread and with doctrine; and the manna which descended from heaven, and the loaves which Christ multiplied, were proper images of the spiritual food which the Saviour of the world bestowed upon his disciples. John vi. 31, &c.

16. Moses led the people through the sea—Christ walked upon it, and enabled Peter to do so.

17. Moses commanded the sea to retire and give away—Christ commanded the winds and waves to be still.

18. Moses brought darkness over the land—The sun withdrew his light at Christ's crucifixion. And as the darkness which was spread over Egypt was followed by the destruction of the firstborn, and of Pharaoh and his host—so the darkness at Christ's death was the forerunner of the destruction of the Jews, when, in the metaphorical and prophetic style, and according to Christ's express prediction, "the sun was darkened, and the moon refused to give her light, and the stars fell from heaven," the ecclesiastical and the civil state of the Jews was overturned, and the rulers of both were destroyed.

19. The face of Moses shone when he descended from the mountain—the same happened to Christ at his transfiguration on the mountain. Moses and Elias appeared then with him; to show that the Law and Prophets bare witness of him; and the Divine Voice said, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye him!" alluding most evidently to the prediction of Moses, "Unto him shall ye hearken."

20. Moses cleansed one leper—Christ many.

21. Moses foretold the calamities which would befall the nation for their disobedience—so did Christ.

22. Moses chose and appointed seventy elders to be over the people—Christ chose such a number of disciples.

23. The Spirit which was in Moses was conferred in some degree on the seventy elders, they prophesied—and Christ conferred miraculous powers on his seventy disciples.

24. Moses sent twelve men to spy out the land which was to be conquered—Christ sent his apostles into the world, to subdue it by a more glorious and miraculous conquest.

25. Moses was victorious over powerful kings and great nations—so was Christ, by the effects of his religion, and by the fall of those who persecuted the Church.

26. Moses conquered Amalek by lifting and holding up both his hands all the day—Christ overcame his and our enemies when his hands were fastened to the cross. This resemblance has been observed by some of the ancient Christians, and ridiculed by some of the moderns, but without sufficient reason I think.

27. Moses interceded for transgressions, and caused an atonement to be made for them, and stopped the wrath of God—so did Christ.

28. Moses ratified a covenant between God and the people, by sprinkling them with blood—Christ with his own blood.

29. Moses desired to die for the people, and prayed that God would forgive them, or blot him out of his book—Christ did more, he died for sinners.

30. Moses instituted the Passover, when a lamb was sacrificed, none of whose bones were to be broken, and whose blood protected the people from destruction—Christ was that Paschal Lamb.

31. Moses lifted up the serpent, that they who looked upon him might be healed of their mortal wounds—Christ was that serpent. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." The serpent, being an emblem of Satan, may not be thought a fit emblem to represent Christ; but the serpents which bit the children of Israel are called fiery serpents, seraphim. Now, "sunt boni angeli seraphim, sunt mali angeli seraphim, quos nulla figura melius quam prestare exprimas. Et tali usum primum humani generis seductorem putat Bachai."—Grotius. Therefore Christ, as he was the great and good Angel, the Angel of God's presence, the Angel, καὶ ἑξοχὴν, might be represented as a kind of seraphim, a beneficent healing serpent, who should abolish the evil introduced by the seducing lying serpent; and who, like the serpent of Moses, should destroy the serpents of the magicians: as one of those gentle serpents who are friends to mankind.

"Nunc quoque nec fugiant hominem nec vulnere cædunt, Quidque prius fuerint, placidi meminere dracones."

Εἰσὶ δὲ περὶ Θύβας ἱστοὶ ὄφεις, ἀνθρώπων οὐδαμῶς δηλῆμονες.

HERODOTUS, ii. 74.

32. All the affection which Moses showed towards the people, all the cares and toils which he underwent on their account, were repaid by them with ingratitude, murmuring, and rebellion, and sometimes they threatened to stone him—the same returns the Jews made to Christ for all his benefits.

33. Moses was ill used by his own family; his brother and sister rebelled against him—there was a time when Christ's own brethren believed not in him.

34. Moses had a very wicked and perverse generation committed to his care and conduct; and, to enable him to rule them, miraculous powers were given to him, and he used his utmost endeavour to make the people obedient to God, and to save them from ruin; but in vain: in the space of forty years they all fell in the wilderness except two—Christ was given to a generation not less wicked and perverse; his instructions and his miracles were lost upon them; and in about the same space of time, after they had rejected him, they were destroyed.

35. Moses was very meek, above all the men that were on the face of the earth—so was Christ.

36. The people could not enter into the land of promise until Moses was dead—by the death of Christ the kingdom of heaven was opened to all believers.

37. In the death of Moses and Christ there is also a resemblance of some circumstances. Moses died, in one sense, for the iniquities of the people; it was their rebellion which was the occasion of it, which drew down the displeasure of God upon them, and upon him (Deut. i. 37). Moses therefore went up in the sight of the people, to the top of Mount Nebo, and there he died when he was in perfect vigor, when his eye was not dim, nor was his natural force abated—Christ suffered for the sins of men, and was led up, in the presence of the people, to Mount Calvary, where he died in the flower of his age, and when he was in his full natural strength. Neither Moses, nor Christ, as far as we can collect from sacred history, was ever sick, or felt any bodily decay or infirmities, which would have rendered them unfit for the toils they underwent; their sufferings were of another kind.

38. Moses was buried, and no man knew where his body lay—nor could the Jews find the body of Christ.

39. Lastly, as Moses, a little before his death, promised the people “that God would raise them up a prophet like unto him”—so Christ, taking leave of his afflicted disciples, told them, “I will not leave you comfortless; I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter.”

It is only necessary to add, in the words of an eminent divine, (see Clarke’s Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion), that the correspondencies of types and antitypes, though they be not of themselves proper proofs of the truth of a doctrine, yet they may be very reasonable confirmations of the foreknowledge of God; of the uniform view of Providence under different Dispensations; of the analogy, harmony, and agreement between the Old Testament and the New. The analogies cannot, without the force of strong prejudice, be conceived to have happened by mere chance, without any foresight or design. There are no such analogies, much less such series of analogies, found in the books of mere enthusiastic writers living in such remote ages from each other. It is much more credible and reasonable to suppose what St. Paul affirms, that, in the uniform course of God’s government of the world, “all these things happened unto them of old for examples, τύπα, or types,

1 Cor. x. 11., and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.” And hence arises that aptness of similitude in the application of several legal performances to the morality of the Gospel, that it can very hardly be supposed not to have been originally intended.

Bishop Horsley^v has proposed a criticism, which may add another circumstance to the parallel between Christ and Moses.

We read in Numb. xii. 3. “that the man Moses was very meek.” With what truth this character might be ascribed to Moses, see Exod. xii. 11–14. v. 22. xi. 8. xxxii. 19–22. Numb. xi. 11–15. xvi. 15. and xx. 10–12. Schultens renders the passage; “Now the man Moses gave forth more answers than,” &c. i. e. more oracular answers: “erat responsor eximius præ omni homine.”

If this remark is just, our Lord would be like unto Moses in this point also: Christ being himself the divine oracle by whom Moses had spoken to the people^w.

NOTE 21.—PART IX.

THE names of the pastors here mentioned show us the powerful opposition against which the infant Church had to contend. The Sanhedrin—the aged Ananus, or Annas, who by his influence secretly directed every public measure, and as many as were of his kindred—were gathered together against them. The John and Alexander here spoken of appear to have been, next to Annas and Caiaphas, the principal and most eminent persons in Jerusalem.

John, according to Lightfoot, is probably no other than Rabban Johanan, the son of Zaccai, frequently mentioned in the talmuds. It is said of him, that he had been the scholar of Hillel, and was president of the council after Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, who perished in the destruction of the city, and that he lived to be a hundred and twenty-three years old. A remarkable saying of his, spoken by him not long before his assembling with the rulers and elders, mentioned Acts iv., is related in the Jerusalem Talmud thus: Forty years before the destruction of the city, when the gates of the temple flew open of their own accord, Rabban Johanan, the son of Zaccai, said, “O temple, temple, why dost thou disturb thyself? I know thy end, that thou shalt be destroyed; for so the prophet Zechariah has spoken concerning thee,—

‘Open thy doors, O Lebanon,
That the fire may devour thy cedars.’”

He lived to see the truth of what he had foretold^z.

The Alexander here mentioned is supposed by some learned men^y to be Alexander the alabarch, or governor of the Jews who dwelt in Egypt; and were he at Jerusalem at the time, nothing would be more probable. For the assembly here spoken of does not seem to be the ordinary council of the seventy-one, but an extraordinary council, composed of all the chief men of the Jewish nation, from every part of the world, who happened then to be at Jerusalem; and several such, it is likely, there might be upon the account of some feast. Josephus says of this Alexander, that he was the noblest and richest of all the Jews in Alexandria of his time, and that he adorned the nine gates of the temple at Jerusalem with plates of gold and silver^z.

NOTE 24.—PART IX.

THIS section presents us with a picture of what every Christian Church ought to be, and what every Christian Church will probably be, when the fulness of the Spirit shall be poured out in the last days, and the consummation of all things arrive. Here we meet with no factions or divisions on the part of the people—no jealousy—no party spirit—no desire of distinction disturbed the pure harmony of the primitive Church. The apostles, as the spiritual fathers of God's household, without opposition, superintended all things, and directed the disposal of the extensive and benevolent contributions of the faithful. The first law of their divine Master was fulfilled—mutual and holy love was the sacred bond of their union, the ruling principle of their life and actions. But in these days of luxury and refinement, self engages all our thoughts, and all our cares—no other interest can be admitted, and the exploded doctrine of Christian love is alike ridiculed and despised.

NOTE 25.—PART IX.

FROM these words it is evident that the crime of Ananias was something more than an ordinary act of deception. It was a direct sin against the Holy Ghost. It was a distrust of his power. It was an attempt to impose upon the Holy Spirit himself, an endeavour to discover if the secret things of the heart were manifest to Him. It was therefore necessary that a severe and exemplary punishment should be inflicted on the first offending person, to convince others of the continued presence, and of the divine power of that Holy Spirit under whose influence the apostles acted, and who worked with them for the dissemination of the Gospel. Ananias is here said to lie to God, because he lied to the Holy Spirit, which had descended upon the apostles; hence it is clear, that if he that lieth to the Spirit lieth to God—the Holy Spirit must be God. Ananias appears to have been further tempted to this sin in the expectation that as he insisted it was the whole of the purchase money, both he and his wife for the future would be provided for from the common funds of the Church; while at the same time they retained a portion for their private purposes. Doddridge calls it an affront directly levelled at the Holy Ghost himself in the midst of his astonishing train of extraordinary operations. This display of divine power had its intended effect (Acts v. 11, 14, 15.), it preserved the Church pure, and protected it from those hypocritical professors, who, had it not been for fear of a similar punishment, might have been induced to join the apostles, in the hope of those temporal advantages which the contributions of the primitive converts afforded.

NOTE 26.—PART IX.

THESE verses, from 12 to 17, as they stand in our Bibles, are considered as intermingled and confused, and as such have been variously arranged by commentators. In their present disposition I have adopted the plan of Dr. Adam Clarke, as the most natural and the most consistent with the intention of the previous miracle, and the effects which it produced.

Bishop Sherlock, however, is of a different opinion, and, in a communication which he made to Bowyer, states that they ought to be divided thus—

After verse 11, go on to ver.

14 “And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women.

12 And they were all with one accord in Solomon’s porch.

13 And of the rest durst no man join himself to them; but the people magnified them.

12 And by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people.

15 Inasmuch that they brought forth,” &c.

By the οἱ ἁπλῆτες, ver. 12, Bishop Sherlock would understand “the new converts;” by the οἱ λοιποὶ, ver. 13, “the unconverted.”—See Bowyer.

NOTE 27.—PART IX.

Τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τούτου—אורו ראש. Few circumstances more fully display to us the utter contempt in which the Jews held our Lord and his followers than this expression. They would not even pronounce his name.

NOTE 28.—PART IX.

WE read, Acts v. 34., that a Pharisee named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in great reputation among all the people, was one of the Jewish Council, or Sanhedrin. This agrees exactly with what is delivered in the Jewish talmuds. We are informed by them, that Gamaliel, the son of Simcon, and grandson of Hillel, was president of the Council; that he was a Pharisee; that he was so well skilled in the Law, that he was the second who obtained the name of Rabban, a title of the highest eminency and note of any among their doctors; and concerning him is this saying, “From the time that Rabban Gamaliel the Old died, the honor of the Law failed, and purity and Pharisaism died.” He is called Rabban Gamaliel the Old, to distinguish him from his grandson, who was also called Rabban Gamaliel, and the great-grandson of this grandson, who was also called by the same name, and had the same title, and were both of them, as the talmudists say, presidents also of the Council.

They tell us that Rabban Gamaliel the Old died eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem^b, that is, in the year of our Lord 52, about eighteen years after the convention of the council, before whom the apostles were brought, as related in the Acts. We read also in Josephus, of Simeon, the son of this Gamaliel, as being one of the principal persons of the Jewish nation about three years before the destruction of Jerusalem.

NOTE 29.—PART IX.

It was a common saying among the Jews, כל עצה שהיא לשם שמים כופה להתקיים omne consilium, quod ad gloriam Dei suscipitur, prospero eventu gaudebit.—Schoetgen, Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 424.

NOTE 30.—PART IX.

ON THE ORIGIN AND NATURE OF THE OFFICE OF DEACON.

WE now read the first account of the election of any order of men in the Christian Church from among its own members. The apostles and the seventy had been ordained to their sacred work by their Divine Master himself. The increased number of converts now made additional assistance necessary, and the manner in which the Seven were set apart deserves both the attention and imitation of every society united together in the name of Christ.

It is the misfortune of the Christian Church, that every, even the most minute point, has been made the subject of controversy; we must therefore begin our inquiry into the nature of the office to which the Seven were appointed, by endeavouring to ascertain from what body of men they were selected, before they were set apart by the apostles. It has been questioned whether they were of the seventy—of the hundred and eight, who, together with the apostles, composed the number of the hundred and twenty upon whom the Spirit fell at the day of Pentecost—or, of the general mass of converts, now added to the Church. Lightfoot^c supposes them to have been of the hundred and twenty. These, he observes, were they that were of Christ's constant retinue, and "compained with him all the time that he went in and out among them;" and who, being constant witnesses of his actions, and auditors of his doctrine, were appointed by him for the ministry. These are they that the story meaneth all along in these passages, "They were all together"—"They went to their company"—"Look ye out among yourselves"—"They were all scattered abroad, except the apostles"—"They which were scattered abroad preached," &c. The Jews say, "Ezra's great synagogue was of a hundred and twenty men." And their canons allow not the setting up of a Sanhedrin of three and twenty judges in any city, but where there were a hundred and twenty men fit, some for one office and employment, some for another^d.

If we may give credit to Epiphanius, the seven deacons were of the number of the seventy. If this was the case, and if they had been made partakers of the miraculous gifts, they were already invested with the power both of preaching and administering the sacraments. No imposition of hands, therefore, was necessary to set them apart for this office. The fact seems to be, that the difficulties and embarrassments arising from the incipient disputes between the widows of the Hellenists and of the Hebrews, might have increased so much, and excited so much dissension and unkindness, that it became necessary to select some of the next rank to the apostles, and appoint them for this express purpose. The general opinion however is, that the deacons were chosen from among the general mass of believers.

The second and the following verses are thus paraphrased by Hammond—"And the twelve apostles, calling the Church together, said unto them, We have resolved, or decreed, that it is no way fit or reasonable, that we should neglect the preaching of the Gospel, and undertake the care of looking to the poor.

"Therefore do you nominate to us seven men, faithful and trusty persons, the most eminent of the believers among you; that we may consecrate or ordain them to this office of deacons in the Church, and intrust them with the task of distributing to them that want out of the stock of the Church; and in the choice of them let it be also observed, that they be persons of eminent gifts and knowledge in divine matters (see ver. 10.), who consequently may be fit to be employed by us in preaching the word, and receiving proselytes to the faith by baptism. (Chap. viii. 5. 12.)

"And by that means we shall be less disturbed, or interrupted, in our daily employment of praying and preaching the Gospel."

The general opinion, as it is here expressed by Hammond, certainly is, that the deacons were selected from among the mass of believers; and that the Greek words τὸ πλῆθος τῶν μαθητῶν, here rendered "the multitude of the disciples," refers to the community or society of Christians, called sometimes πάντες, the all (1 Tim. v. 20.), πλείονες, the many (2 Cor. ii. 6.) and sometimes Χριστιᾶνοι, Christians, or Followers of Christ; and also Matt. xviii. 17. Ἐκκλησία, the Church.

From whatever body of men the deacons were selected, the narrative before us informs us of two important facts. The utmost caution was used on the part of the apostles to prevent the admission of inferior or unworthy men into the offices of the Christian Church. The apostles, the heads of the Church, prescribed the qualifications for the office, the people chose the persons who were thus worthy, and the apostles ordained them to the appointed office. Every Church we infer, therefore, is entitled, and is bound to follow this plan of conduct. Its ecclesiastical heads are the sole judges and directors of the qualifications required for the fulfilment of any sacred office; the persons who are to fill those offices must be taken from the general mass of the people, and they are then, when thus known and approved, to be set apart by prayer, and laying on of the hands of those to whom that power is rightly committed. Till they are thus set apart, their own qualifications and the general approbation of the people do not constitute their right of admission to the offices of the Christian Church. If Scripture is to be our guide in matters which concern Christian societies, as well as in those which interest us as individuals, these are the directions it has for ever given to the Churches of Christ, in every nation, wherever its sacred pages have been imparted. The apostles alone called the Church together, and gave them directions to look out from among them seven men of good report, specifying at the same time their necessary endowments and numbers; and reserving to themselves the power of appointing them to the sacred office. And when we consider that the gifts of the Holy Ghost were one indispensable qualification, and may be regarded as the preëlection to some sacred function; no possible authority can be derived from this portion of Scripture to sanction the laity in taking upon themselves the choice and appointment of their respective ministers. The same rules which were on the present occasion prescribed, we have reason to suppose, were observed likewise in the nomination of bishops and deacons in other Churches. For in St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy and Titus, we read that he desires the bishop who ordains, to inquire most particularly into the character of those who were admitted into the high sacred functions. In Titus (i. 6.), for a bishop, seventeen necessary qualifications are enumerated; and in Timothy (iii. 2.), fifteen. The same inquiries and the same discipline (compare ver. 6. and 10.), although the former are not so particularly specified are also required before the election of deacons, (1 Tim. iii. 8.) "They," says the Apostle, "that have used the office of a deacon well, purchase to themselves a good degree," that is, a degree towards the order of presbyter.

We are now to inquire into the nature and extent of the diaconal office. If we refer to the Scripture on this subject, we shall find that Philip, one of the deacons, preached and baptized, (Acts xxi. 8. and viii. 12. 29. 40.); and that St. Stephen also, who was another, preached, and did great wonders and miracles among the people, (Acts vi. 8. 10.); "and they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake." Whether Philip and others of these deacons preached and baptized, not in their character of deacons, but as Evangelists, or as belonging to the Seventy, has been a subject of dispute. It is clear that before their ordination, the apostles themselves were engaged in the ministry of the tables; for the treasure of the Church being laid at the apostles' feet, distribution of it was made to every man according as he had need, (Acts iv. 35.) That work, therefore, which the apostles themselves performed, till an increase of duties compelled them to appoint others to officiate for them, cannot in any way be regarded as inconsistent with the high commission which they received to teach and to baptize all nations. The office of the deacon is mentioned by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Philippians, as a spiritual and perpetual office, then settled in the Church, they being the appointed attendants on the bishop, as we read in Epiphanius^c. A bishop cannot be without a deacon. Throughout the whole history of the Acts of the Apostles they are never once called Ministers of the Tables, although they are said to be appointed for that work—no other name is given to them but that of deacons; and St. Jerome (To. 5. F. 251. K.) speaks of them as the ministers not only of the priests, but also of the widows and tables. And when it is remembered that the gifts of the Holy Spirit were particularly conferred upon them, the order of deacons, like that of the apostles, may be considered of divine institution, and decidedly ecclesiastical, established for ever in the Christian Church.

The evidence of the fathers is no less clear; their writings are to be valued not only for their testimony to the opinions of the primitive Church, but for their statements of facts. The customs of the contemporaries of the apostles, or their successors in the next age, when those customs were universal in every country where Christianity was established, are related by the fathers; and they have ever been esteemed, therefore, as useful chroniclers, and as our best guides in all questions concerning the faith or discipline of the early Church. When the fathers are unanimous in asserting the prevalence of a custom in the day in which they lived; when they describe it as universal; when they declare it to have prevailed in the age of the apostles; and when their testimony is confirmed either by the positive affirmation of Scripture, or is alluded to in Scripture, or is supported by rational inference from the language of Scripture, we are justified in pronouncing such opinion, custom, or practice to have been either instituted, or at least sanctioned by the apostles. If there be any thing of a doubtful nature in the passages of Scripture, which relate the opinion or practice in question, the corroborating evidence of the fathers must be considered as decisive of any discussion arising from the subject. This authority of the primitive fathers will enable us to ascertain the real nature of the diaconate which was now instituted, and became an ordinance for ever in the Christian Church.

In answer to those who consider that the order of deacons is only a temporary or civil office, instituted for the serving of tables, it must be urged, as Bishop Pearson^f rightly observes, that the tables of the apostles were common and sacred. Justin Martyr^g mentions them as attendants on the bishops at the Agapæ or Love Feasts, when the Eucharist was also celebrated; and that they distributed the bread and wine (after its consecration by the bishop) to the communicants. St. Polycarp^h, in his Epistle to the Philippians, (p. 17. edit. Oxon.

^f "Ita ordo quidam in Ecclesia singularis jam tum impositione manuum institutus est. Actus quidem, ad quem instituti sunt, nihil aliud est, quam diaconeré τραπέζαις, et constituti sunt ἐν ταῖς τῆς χορείας, quæ consistebat ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ τῇ καθ' ἑαυτοὺς. Officium tamen non fuit mere civile, aut œconomîcum, sed sacrum etiam, sive Ecclesiasticum. Mensæ enim Discipulorum tunc temporis communes, et sacræ etiam fuere; hoc est in communi convictu Sacramentum Eucharistiæ celebrabant." &c.—Pearsoni in Acta Apostol. Lectione, p. 53. Schoetgen has decided in favor of the opinion which is apparently best supported by Scripture, that the deacons were of two kinds, of tables, and of the word. The diaconship or ministry of tables ceased after the first dispersion, and Philip then resumed the diaconship of the word. "Post διασπορὰν πρὸ cessabat διακονία τῆς τραπέζης, et Philippus postea resumebat διακονίαν τοῦ λόγου."—Schoetgen, Hæcæ Hebraica, vol. i. p. 428.

1644.) exhorts the deacons to behave themselves unblameably as the deacons or ministers of God in Christ, and not of men. St. Ignatiusⁱ also, in his Epistle to the Trallians, has these words—"And deacons, being the ministers of the mystery, or rather of the mysteries, of Jesus Christ, ought by all means to please all men, for they are not dispensers of meat and drink, but ministers of the Church of God." St. Cyprian^j writes (Epist. 65. Ord. Pamel.) "But deacons ought to remember, that the Lord chose apostles, that is, bishops and governors; but after the Lord's ascension into heaven, the apostles constituted deacons for themselves, to be attendants upon them as bishops, and upon the Church."

Many similar references might be given; but it is only necessary here to add, that they were ordained by the imposition of hands by the apostles, in the very same manner as priests were ordained; and that this solemn ceremony could not have been used, had the deacons been designed only for civil and temporary purposes.

Mosheim has endeavoured to show that the seven deacons were not the only persons appointed by the apostles to take charge of the poor, as there must have been curators for that office long before this period, in consequence of the increasing numbers of the Church; and there must, therefore, in fact, have been deacons before there were any such by name. He argues, that these ministers having been selected from amongst the indigenous Jews, who in number far exceeded the foreign ones, it was found that they were not strictly impartial, but were apt to lean a little more than was right in favor of their fellow-citizens, and those of their own country, and discovered a greater readiness in relieving the widows of native Jews than the others. The foreign Jews, whom St. Luke terms Greeks, being much dissatisfied at this, and murmuring greatly against the Hebrews on account thereof, the apostles convoked the members of the Church, and commanded them to nominate seven men of approved faith and integrity, to whom the management of the concerns of the people might without apprehension be committed. The people complied with these directions, and chose by their suffrages the appointed number of men, six of them being Jews by birth, and one a proselyte of the name of Nicolaus. These seven deacons, as we commonly call them, were all of them chosen from amongst the foreign Jews. This he thinks is sufficiently evident, from the circumstance of their names being all of them Greek; for the Jews of Palestine were not accustomed to adopt names for their children from the Greek, but from the Hebrew or Syriac languages. From these circumstances Mosheim believes that these seven men were not entrusted with the care of the whole of the poor at Jerusalem; for can any one suppose, he continues, that the Hebrews would have consented that the relief of their own widows and poor should be thus committed to the discretion of the Jews of the foreign class? The native Jews would in this case have been liable to experience the same injustice from the foreign brethren, as the latter had to complain of, whilst the alms were at the disposal of the Hebrews; and instead, therefore, of at once striking at the root of the evil which they proposed to cure, the Apostle would, by such an arrangement, have merely applied to it a very uncertain kind of remedy. Besides, the indigenous Jews made no complaint against those who had hitherto managed the concerns of the poor; and consequently there could be no necessity for their dismissal from office. It appears, therefore, clear beyond a doubt, that those seven men were not invested with the care of the poor in general, but were appointed merely as curators of the widows and poor of the foreigners or Greeks; and that the others continued, under the guardianship of those, who, prior to the appointment of the seven, were entrusted with the superintendence and discretionary relief of the whole. Champ. Vitranga saw the matter evidently in this light, as is plain from his work, De Synagoga, lib. iii. part ii. cap. 5. p. 928. As to the reason which caused the number of these men to be fixed at seven, I conceive that it is to be found in the state of the Church at Jerusalem, at the time of their appointment. The Christians in that city were most likely divided into seven classes; the members of each of these divisions having a separate place of assembly. It was therefore deemed expedient that seven curators should be appointed, in order that every division might be furnished with an officer or superintendent of its own, whose immediate duty it should be to take care that the widows and the poor of the foreigners should come in for an equitable share of the alms and benefactions, and to see that due relief was administered according to the necessities of the different individuals^k.

Lightfoot^l, Dr. Clarke, and many others, have attempted to assimilate the כַּנְסִין of the Jewish synagogue with the Christian deacons, now appointed. There does not appear to be any other resemblance than this, that one part of their duty was common to both—the charge of the poor. That the office of deacons among the Christians was more than this, has been shown both from Scripture, and its only right interpreters on these matters, the early fathers.

NOTE 31.—PART IX.

LIGHTFOOT remarks on this verse, “It is so constant an opinion of the ancients, that the most impure sect of the Nicolaitans derived their name and filthy doctrines from the ‘Nicolas’ here mentioned (see Rev. ii. 15.), that so much as to distrust the thing would look like contradicting antiquity. But if it were lawful in this matter freely to speak one’s thoughts, I should conjecture (for the honor of our Nicolas), that the sect might rather take its derivation from נִיכּוֹלֵא Necola, ‘Let us eat together;’ those brutes animating one another to eat things offered to idols. Like those in Isa. xxii. 13. נִיכּוֹל בָּשָׂר וְנִשְׁתֵּי חֶמֶר. ‘Let us eat flesh and drink wine^m.’”

As the Nicolas here spoken of was a deacon appointed by the apostles, and therefore must have been filled with the Holy Ghost, it is not probable he should have apostatized so far from the true faith, as to have become the founder of a sect whose doctrines were so disgusting in their nature, and so repugnant to truth, as to bring down the strong condemnation of our Lord in the book of Revelation already referred to.

NOTE 32.—PART IX.

ON THE DATE OF THE MARTYRDOM OF ST. STEPHEN.

THE chronologers of the New Testament have generally assigned the martyrdom of St. Stephen to the year 33 or 34 of the vulgar æra, from the supposition that our Lord was crucified in the year 33. In this arrangement the opinion of Benson has been adopted, which places the death of Christ in the year of the vulgar æra 29, and of the Julian period 4742. This hypothesis will, I trust, be found consistent with the general opinion respecting the date of the martyrdom of Stephen. St. Luke not having given us in the Acts of the Apostles express data for the chronology of either of these great events, several arguments seem to warrant and justify the dates here affixed to the different portions of the Sacred History, from the ascension, 29, to the martyrdom of St. Stephen, 33.

It will be observed that these dates are as follow:—

The establishment of the Christian Church, by the miracle at Pentecost, and first accession of converts.....	29
The increasing prosperity of the Church, after the healing of the cripple.....	30
The increase of the Church, in consequence of the death of Ananias and Sapphira....	31
The increase of the Church, in consequence of the imprisonment and release of the apostles	32
Persecution and death of Stephen.....	33

It must be remembered that St. Luke, who was the author of the Acts of the Apostles, was principally anxious to relate the chief circumstances of the life of St. Paul, and those actions of St. Peter, which were introductory to the preaching of the Gospel among the Gentiles. In many instances, therefore, he has not only studied brevity, but has passed over a variety of important journeys and circumstances familiarly alluded to in St. Paul’s Epistles. He almost wholly omits what passed among the Jews after St. Paul’s conversion—the dispersion of Christianity in the East—the lives and deaths of the apostles—the foundation of the Church at Rome—St. Paul’s journey into Arabia and other events. It may therefore excite surprise that the Evangelist, who is in general so eminently concise, should so frequently repeat similar expressions, unless we consider them as relating to distinct occurrences in the Church. We find for instance in Acts ii. 47. after the feast of Pentecost, “the Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved.”

Acts iv. 32. after the healing of the cripple—the multitude of them that “believed were of one heart and of one soul.”

In Acts v. 14. after the death of Ananias—

“believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women.”

And, after the release of the apostles, Acts vi. 7.—“the word of God increased, and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith;” all which expressions and different events seem to imply, that a much longer period than one year elapsed before the dispersion of the Church at Jerusalem and the martyrdom of St. Stephen; and this supposition has induced me to place the latter with the generality of commentators in the year 33.

I cannot but think that Daniel’s celebrated prophecy of the seventy weeks describes with much accuracy the gradual establishment of Christianity at Jerusalem, in the progressive manner apparently related by St. Luke. Prideaux makes the seventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years, which were to elapse between the going forth of the decree to build the city, and the confirming of the covenant, to commence with the year of the Julian period 4256, which he considers as correspondent with the year 458 before Christ, the first seven weeks terminating with the complete establishment of the Jewish Church and state, forty-nine years after. Threescore and two weeks were then to elapse, after which Messiah was to be cut off, Dan. ix. 26., and this brings us to the year 4739 of the Julian period, and 26 A.D. Thus far we are agreed.

There now remains to conclude the prophecy, the one week, or seven years. In this week (see Dan. ix. 27.) the covenant is to be confirmed —“and in the midst of it he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease.” Prideaux assigns to these seven days, or years, the following events:—

J. P.

4739 The first day of the week—the ministry of John begins to confirm the covenant.

4742 The middle of the week—the ministry of Christ.

4746 End of the seventieth week—Christ is crucified.

Highly as I respect the authority of Prideaux, I cannot coincide in this arrangement of events, by which he would interpret this wonderful prophecy. Daniel appears to me to assert, in the most express manner, that the sacrifice shall be caused to cease in the midst of the week, and it could not possibly cease till our Lord, the typified Sacrifice, was offered up. It is further declared, that the covenant shall be confirmed through the whole week. These considerations have induced me to give a more literal interpretation of the passage, which seems to me also corroborated by other chronological calculations. I consider, then, the prophecy to be fulfilled by the following arrange ment of events, which I would substitute for those given by Prideaux; and by which his hypothesis is made to harmonize with that of Benson, Hales, and others:—

J. P. A.D.

4739 26 First day of the week—Christ’s ministry begins, and the covenant is confirmed.

4742 29 In the half-part or middle of the week—the Messiah is cut off, and the sacrifice is caused to cease by the death of Christ. He confirms his covenant by sending down the Holy Spirit.

4743 30 The covenant is further confirmed by the second great effusion of the Holy Spirit.

4744 31 The death of Ananias and the rapid increase of the Church prove the truth of the covenant.

4745 32 The covenant is more fully confirmed by the complete establishment of the Church, the conversion of the priests, &c.

4746 33 The last year of the seventy weeks begins, and the covenant is ratified by the blood of the first martyr. Then, and then only, the Jews began to fill up the measure of the iniquities of their fathers, by resisting the testimony of the Holy Ghost. The seventy weeks having now expired, they are permitted to persecute the Church of Christ even unto death, drawing down upon them by their abominations and cruelty, the destruction of their city and sanctuary, the desolation predicted both by our Lord and his prophets.

In addition to the arguments already given in favor of the present arrangement, which makes nearly four years intervene between the death of Christ and the martyrdom of Stephen, I must add the authority of Tacitus; who states that after the death of Christ his religion was for a time suppressed, but that it afterwards broke out, not only in Judæa, but through the whole world. This latter clause seems to me evidently to refer to the first persecution of the disciples, when they were obliged to fly from Jerusalem, and carried with them the Gospel in every direction. Some time must have elapsed before the Church could have been so fully established, as to have become obnoxious to the Jewish rulers, its founders being the most despised and humble of men. The passage from Tacitus refers to the persecution of the Christians by Nero—“Quos, vulgus Christianos appellabat. Auctor nominis ejus Christus, qui Tiberio imperitante, per Procuratorem Pontium Pilatum, supplicio affectus erat. Repressaque in præsens, exitiabilis superstitio rursus erumpebat, non modo per Judeam, originem ejus mali, sed per urbem etiam, quo," &c.

NOTE 33.—PART IX.

ON THE SYNAGOGUE OF THE LIBERTINES.

VARIOUS opinions have been entertained respecting the synagogue of the Libertines here mentioned. Mr. Horne supposes, and so likewise do Bishop Marsh and Michaelis, that the word Λιβερτινοί is evidently the same as the Latin Libertini. "Whatever meaning we affix to this word," says Bishop Marsh, "(for it is variously explained), whether we understand emancipated slaves, or the sons of emancipated slaves, they must have been the slaves, or the sons of slaves, to Roman masters; otherwise the Latin word Libertini would not apply to them. That among persons of this description there were many at Rome, who professed the Jewish religion, whether slaves of Jewish origin, or proselytes after manumission, is nothing very extraordinary. But that they should have been so numerous at Jerusalem as to have a synagogue in that city, built for their particular use, appears at least to be more than might be expected. Some commentators, therefore, have supposed that the term in question, instead of denoting emancipated Roman slaves, or the sons of such persons, was an adjective belonging to the name of some city or district; while others, on mere conjecture, have proposed to alter the term itself. But the whole difficulty is removed by a passage in the second book of the Annals of Tacitus, from which it appears that the persons, whom that historian describes as being libertini generis, and infected (as he calls it) with foreign, that is, with Jewish superstition, were so numerous in the time of the Emperor Tiberius, that four thousand of them, who were of age to carry arms, were sent to the island of Sardinia; and that all the rest of them were ordered, either to renounce their religion, or to depart from Italy before a day appointed. This statement of Tacitus is confirmed by Suetonius, who relates that Tiberius disposed of the young men among the Jews then at Rome (under pretence of their serving in the wars), in provinces of an unhealthy climate; and that he banished from the city all the rest of that nation, or proselytes to that religion, under penalty of being condemned to slavery for life, if they did not comply with his commands. We can now therefore account for the number of Libertini in Judæa, at the period of which Luke was speaking, which was about fifteen years after their banishment from Italy." Bishop Marsh has, however, omitted to observe that these four thousand Libertini were sent to the island of Sardinia as soldiers—coercendis illic latrociniiis; and they were not expected to escape from that place—et si ob gravitatem cæli interissent, vile damnum.

Bishop Pearce looks for the Libertines in Africa. He observes that the Libertines, the Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, are here joined, as having one and the same synagogue for their public worship. And it being known that the Cyrenians (chap. ii. 10.) lived in Lybia, and the Alexandrians in the neighbourhood of it, it is most natural to look for the Libertines also in that part of the world. Accordingly we find Suidas, in his Lexicon, saying upon the word Λιβερτινοί, that it is ὄνομα τοῦ ἔθνους, the name of a people. And in Gest. Collationis Carthagini habitæ inter Catholicos et Donatistas, published with Optatus's Works, Paris, 1679 (No. 201, and p. 57.), we have these words:—"Victor episcopus Ecclesiæ Catholicæ Libertinensis dixit, 'Unitas est illic; publicam non latet conscientiam.'" From these two passages Bishop Pearce thinks that there was in Lybia a town or district called Libertia, whose inhabitants bore the name of Λιβερτινοί, Libertines, when Christianity prevailed there. They had an episcopal see among them, and the above-mentioned Victor was their bishop at the council of Carthage, in the reign of the Emperor Honorius. And from hence it seems probable that the town or district, and the people, existed in the time of which Luke is here speaking. They were Jews, no doubt, and came up, as the Cyrenian and Alexandrian Jews did, to bring their offerings to Jerusalem, and to worship in the temple there. Cunnæus, in his Rep. Heb. ii. 23., says, that the Jews who lived in Alexandria and Lybia, and all other Jews who lived out of the Holy Land, except those of Babylon and its neighbourhood, were held in great contempt by the Jews who inhabited Jerusalem and Judæa, partly on account of their quitting their proper country, and partly on account of their using the Greek language, and being quite ignorant of the other. For these reasons it seems probable that the Libertines, Cyrenians, and Alexandrians had a separate synagogue (as perhaps the Cilicians and those of Asia had), the Jews of Jerusalem not suffering them to be present in their synagogues, or they not choosing to perform their public service in synagogues where a language was used which they did not understand.—Annal. lib. ii. c. 85. Marsh's Lect. part vi. p. 70. In Tiberio, c. 36. NOTE 34.—PART IX.

ON ST. STEPHEN'S APOLOGY BEFORE THE SANHEDRIN.

IN this address of St. Stephen to the Jews, he seems desirous to prove to them by a reference to the lives of their venerated ancestors, the error of their prevailing expectations and opinions. From the promise given to Abraham (Gen. xvii. 8.), they expected that God would put them in possession of the land of Canaan, that is, the enjoyment of this present world.

As this prediction had never been entirely fulfilled (Numb. xxxiii. 55, 56.), the Jews were led to suppose it would receive its full completion in the person of the Messiah; and to this notion perhaps may be attributed their deep-rooted and preconceived ideas of the temporal nature of Christ's kingdom. When our blessed Lord, therefore, rejected all earthly power and distinction, and left them still under the dominion of the Romans, they concluded he could not be the predicted Son of David.

St. Stephen begins by endeavouring to convince them of their misapprehension on this point of the sacred promise, by demonstrating to them through a recapitulation of the history of the patriarchs, that such could not have been the meaning of the prediction: for even their father Abraham (he argues) to whom the land was first promised, "had none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on." The other patriarchs in the same manner passed a life of pilgrimage and affliction, and never attained to the blessed inheritance. Abraham, the father of the faithful, and the friend of God, had no possession till his death; then only he began to take possession of his purchase, clearly intimating the spiritual signification of the promised Canaan. Moses had a prospect of that land, but he died before he could attain to it, and all those who came out of Egypt with him, without even a glimpse of it, fell through unbelief in the wilderness. The righteous only hath hope in his death. The eminent characters here brought forth by Stephen, may be considered (as Mr. Jones of Nayland remarks) as signs so exactly suited to the thing signified, as if the truth itself had been acted beforehand. In Joseph we see a man, wise, innocent, and great, hated by his brethren, and sold for a slave to heathen Egyptians. In his humiliation he was exalted. Heathens, to whom he had been given over, bowed the knee before him—his own family were preserved from perishing—he became the saviour of all—administering to them bread, the emblem of life—and to him every knee bowed, both of his own kindred and strangers. He was tempted and triumphed; he was persecuted and imprisoned under a malicious and false accusation; he was not actually crucified, but he suffered with two malefactors, and promised life to one of them, and delivered himself by the Divine Spirit that was given to him. He was seen twice by his brethren; the first time they knew him not, but the second he was made known unto them. And thus we trust it will be at some future day, when the brethren of Jesus Christ shall become like the brethren of Joseph, sensible of their crime, and say with them in the bitterness of their souls, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore have all our evils come upon us."

The parallel between Moses and Christ is so exact, and has been so fully proved (Note 20, p. *227.) even from their very birth, that it is here unnecessary to make any further allusion to it. It is evident the Jews considered the arguments of St. Stephen in this light, otherwise they would not have been so violently exasperated against the speaker. Having thus demonstrated from these typical characters, that thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and having accused the Jews of following the same persecuting and rebellious conduct which led their ancestors to refuse Moses, saying, "Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us?" St. Stephen, in the next place, notices another opinion, of which they were more particularly tenacious, their own exclusive privileges, which persuaded them into the belief that it was utterly impossible that the Gentiles should ever be admitted into the same covenant with themselves. From the history of the past the inspired Disciple now deduces the possibility of the event; and illustrates it by recalling to their memory the fact that the tabernacle of witness, the first Church of the Jews which was appointed in the wilderness, had been given to the Gentiles, for Joshua had carried it with him into Canaan, when the latter were in possession of the Holy Land. A significant action, testifying that both Jew and Gentile, through the Captain of their salvation, should be made partakers of the same temporal and spiritual blessings. Afterwards, in allusion to the idea they entertained, that their temple and Law were of perpetual duration, to continue even unto the end of the world, St. Stephen declares to them that God does not dwell in temples made with hands, and immediately reproaches them for not understanding the spiritual signification of their appointed worship and ordinances.

It is evident, then, through every part of this discourse, that the object St. Stephen had in view, was to represent to his countrymen the nature of Christ's religion, and to set before them, in the most touching manner, his sufferings and their own conduct, which was an aggravated completion of the crimes of their ancestors. "For which," says the Martyr, with indignant eloquence, "which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? and they have slain them which showed before of the coming of the Just One; of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers." The truth and justice of the dying Stephen's appeal was too severely avenged, and too bitterly felt for the Jews not to have had a perfect knowledge of its intention and individual application; and unless it is considered in this light, it will be difficult to account for the powerful sensation it occasioned^a.

The destruction of the Jewish temple imparts this impressive lesson to every Christian nation and individual, that the trueness of a Church does not constitute its safety, but that the continuance of the divine blessing is only secured by the maintenance of a pure faith and consistent conduct. The temple itself was to be esteemed and valued as the habitation of the Divine Presence, making the building holy—in the same way that our bodies are sanctified and purified, and are made the temples of the Holy Ghost, by the indwelling spirit of grace within us. If with the Jews, as individuals, we resist the holy influences of God, his presence will be withdrawn from us, and we shall bring down upon our earthly tabernacle the same fearful and inevitable destruction which was poured down upon the temple of Jerusalem. We shall be delivered over to the hand of the enemy.

NOTE 35.—PART IX.

IN Exodus xii. 40. it is said the Israelites were to be sojourners four hundred and thirty years, reckoning from Abraham's leaving Chaldea, when the sojourning began; here four hundred years is mentioned, reckoning from the birth of Isaac, thirty years after Abraham's departure from Chaldea.—See Gen. xv. 13, and Josephus, Antiq. ii. 152, and ix. 1.

Markland ap. Bowyer would read this verse in the following manner—that his seed should sojourn in a strange land (and that they should bring them into bondage, and entreat them evil) four hundred years. He observes, it seems to be St. Stephen's purpose to relate how long they were to be sojourners and in a foreign country, rather than how long they were to be in bondage and affliction, which they were not four hundred years: they were in Egypt only two hundred and fifteen. The parenthesis is the same as if it had been καὶ αὐτὸ δουλωθήσεται, καὶ κακοθήσεται, which is very common; δουλώσουσιν relates to the Egyptian treatment of the Israelites; καλώσουσιν, to that they met with in Canaan, previous to the famine which compelled them to go into Egypt. The δουλώσις is very plainly distinguished from the κακώσις in the next verse.

This opinion incidentally corroborates the interpretation given to Stephen's address. See last note.

NOTE 36.—PART IX.

OF the two burying-places of the patriarchs, one was in Hebron, which Abraham bought of Ephron, Gen. xxxiii. 16. (not as here said of the sons of Emmor); the other in Sychem, which Jacob (not Abraham) bought of the children of Emmor, Gen. xxxiii. 19. Jacob was buried in the former, which Abraham bought; the sons of Jacob in the latter, which Jacob bought. There are many ways of reconciling these discrepancies: Bishop Barrington would point the 15th and 16th verses thus—καὶ ἐτελεύτησεν αὐτὸς καὶ οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν, καὶ μετετέθησαν εἰς Συχέμ καὶ ἐτέθησαν ἐν τῷ μνήματι ὃ ὠνήσατο Ἀβραάμ, κ. τ. λ. Markland is also of the same opinion. Dr. Owen states, the Old-Testament history leads us to conclude that Stephen's account was originally this—"So Jacob went down into Egypt, and there died, he and our fathers; and our fathers were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre," ὃ ὠνήσατο τιμῆς, ἀργυρίου, which he (Jacob) had bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem." Markland supposes, that putting a comma at ἀργυρίου, and παρὰ being interpreted from, may solve the difficulty, and would read—"And were carried over to Sychem: and AFTERWARDS FROM among the descendants of Emmor the father, or son of Sychem, they were laid in the sepulchre which Abraham had bought for a sum of money." This reconciles St. Stephen's account with that which Josephus (Antiq. ii. 8.) relates of the patriarchs, viz. that they were buried in Hebron, being carried out of Egypt, where they died, first to Sychem, and from Sychem to Hebron, to the sepulchre which Abraham had bought. It scarce needs proof that παρὰ with a Gen. expresses motion from, as ἀπεδήμησας παρ' ἡμῶν, peregre a nobis profectus es, Lucian Hermot. p. 528, and ἐξῆλθον παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς, John xvi. 28. The language hints that the translation of the patriarchs from Sychem to Hebron was made after the time of Emmor, under some of his descendants, παρὰ τῶν υἱῶν Ἐμμορ. Sychem, the person here spoken of, might perhaps have his name from the city near which his father lived; but is mentioned here only incidentally, having nothing at all to do with the narration.—See Gen. xlix. 29, &c. For the other illustrations of this passage, see Bowyer's Crit. Conjectures, p. 345, &c. and Elsley, vol. iii. p. 332.

NOTE 37.—PART IX.

ON THE STAR OF THE GOD REMPHAN.

ST. STEPHEN here alludes to a passage in the book of Amos, chap. v. 25, 26, which is rendered with some variation in the Septuagint.

The words of the original in our Hebrew Bibles are—וּמִנְחָה הִנֵּשְׂתָם לִי בַמִּדְבָּר אַרְבַּעִים שָׁנָה בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל: וְנִשְׂאָתָם אֶת כְּכֹת מַלְכָּם וְזֹאת כִּיֹּן צִלְמֵיכֶם כּוֹכַב אֱלֹהֵיכֶם אֲשֶׁר עָשִׂיתֶם לָכֶם:

They are thus translated—

“Have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings

In the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel?

But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch,

And Chiun your images,

The star of your God which ye made to yourselves.”

By the Septuagint—Μὴ σφάγια καὶ θυσίας προσηνέγκατέ μοι, οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ, τεσσαράκοντα ἔτη ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ; καὶ ἀνελάβετε τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ Μολόχ, καὶ τὸ ἄστρον τοῦ θεοῦ ὑμῶν Παφᾶν, τοὺς τύπους αὐτῶν, οὓς ἐποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς.

The quotation in the Acts is evidently from the Septuagint, from the original in which it does not materially differ. The words οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ in the Acts, are placed after ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, and in the Septuagint after προσηνέγκατέ μοι. In the Septuagint we read Παφᾶν,

כִּיֹן צִלְמֵיכֶם

‘Πεμφάν, τοὺς τύπους,

אֲשֶׁר עָשִׂיתֶם לָכֶם

Οὓς ἐποιήσατε προσκυρεῖν αὐτοῖς,

The Hebrew word כִּיֹן (Chiun) in Amos, is rendered by the Septuagint Παφᾶν (Raiphān), and in the Acts Πεμφάν (or Remphan). Various hypotheses have been proposed, to account for this difference. Some have supposed that the Hebrew letter כ, from the transcriber having omitted to insert the lower part of it, has been changed into ר, consequently the word with the points was read Rephan.

Pfeiffer^c has discussed the subject, and collected from various authorities much information. I learn from him that Drusius, with Justin and Theodoret, agree with the opinion already given, and think that the word Πεμφάν is a corruption of μεφάν, which was so written by the error of the transcribers, who mistook כ for ר, and read (Amos v. 26.) כִּיֹן for רִיֹן.

Grotius would read Remphan, and Petit, Rephan; both consider it as a name of Saturn.

Pfeiffer quotes also Kircher, T. 1. Ædip. Egypt. Synl. 4. c. 22. p. 387. who considers that Πηφᾶν was the Coptic name of Saturn.

Dr. Hales proposes the following translation:

“Did ye offer unto me (alone) sacrifices and oblations, pure and undivided in the wilderness, For forty years, O house of Israel? (Nay verily)

But ye (then) carried in procession the shrine of (the sun),

Your king, and of the dog-star, your god;

^b Vitranga, Observationes Sacrae. vol. ii. p. 6.

and in Acts Πεμφάν. In the Septuagint the remainder of the clause is read—Παφᾶν, τοὺς τύπους αὐτῶν οὓς ἐποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς καὶ μετοικιῶ ὑμᾶς ἐπέκεινα Δαμασκού. In the Acts—Πεμφάν τοὺς τύπους, οὓς ἐποιήσατε προσκυρεῖν αὐτοῖς; καὶ μετοικιῶ ὑμᾶς ἐπέκεινα Βαβυλῶνος.

Vitranga^b would account for the difference between the Hebrew and the Septuagint by supposing that the copyists of the Inspired Writings frequently placed the poetical parts of the Old Testament in the proper order of their clauses; which he considers to have been not only metrical, but frequently rhythmical. Many instances might be found to support this opinion, and to prove its probability. Vitranga arranges the second Psalm on this plan. The 145th I remember having seen elsewhere disposed in a similar manner. He concludes that the verses in the Hebrew of Amos were arranged in their poetic order, and that the Septuagint translators read these clauses not in their right order from right to left, but from the higher line to the lower, and thus caused the variation in question. He would thus arrange both the original and the translation:—

וְנִשְׂאָתָם אֶת כְּכֹת מַלְכָּם

Καὶ ἀνελάβετε τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ Μολόχ

כּוֹכַב אֱלֹהֵיכֶם

Καὶ τὸ ἄστρον τοῦ θεοῦ ὑμῶν.

Your images, which ye made for yourselves to worship, and ye do so still.

Wherefore I will carry you away beyond Damascus, (nay even) beyond Babylon.” Amos v. 21–27. Acts vii. 42, 43.

Dr. Hales^d endeavours to prove that Chiun was the dog-star; and that the Hebrew words כּוֹכַב, כִּיֹן, ought to be read as one compound word, corresponding with the Greek Ἀστροῦς κίων, or Ἀστροκύων, the dog-star: whence he supposes that the Greek κίων is derived from “Chiun.” He then wishes to show that Chiun and Remphan, or Raiphān, or Rephan, were the same.

Archbishop Newcome^e thinks, that the order of the words in the Septuagint is preferable to that in the Hebrew. Their collocation in the Hebrew, he observes, is unnatural, and points out a mistake in the copies. He would render the passage—“Nay, but ye bare the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun, your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves.” Newcome mentions a MS. 612, which places the words thus:—“Chiun, your god, the star [of] your images.” He interprets the word Chiun, after Spencer^f, as a name of Saturn, and remarks the reading of Πεμφάν in δ and of Πεμφεν, Παῖφάν, Παφάν, Πεμφάν, Πεφα, Acts vii. 43. where the MSS. vary, may be accounted for two ways; כִּיּוֹן may have been read כִּיּוֹן, there being a similarity in the two initial letters: or Rephan, the Egyptian name for Saturn, may have been used by translators who lived in Egypt, as an equivalent term to Chiun.

Selden supposes this god Chiun might have been represented as a star with certain symbols of distinction^g. Lightfoot^h has also a long criticism upon this word. Before his time the word Παιφάρ had been generally interpreted as if derived from the Hebrew רפא, a giant. Lightfoot would rather derive it from רפיון or רפה, weak, and weakness; after giving his reasons for so doing (see Lightfoot, vol. viii. p. 434.), he proceeds by saying, "Be it therefore that Moloch is the sun, or Remphan or Chiun should be Saturn, we read of the introduction of Moloch into the land of Israel, but of Chiyun not at all, only in the prophet Amos, and here in the mention of Remphan. When I read that in I Kings xii. 30. 'That all the people went to worship the calf in Dan;' and observe farther, that Dan was called Panias, I begin to think that פֶּזֶר, Phan, in Παιφάρ, Rephan, and Πεμφάρ, Remphan, may have some relation with that name; and that Dan is mentioned rather than Bethel, because the idolatry, or calf of that place, continued longer than that of Bethel." Mr. Faberⁱ, the last author who has treated on these subjects, states, we are told by Aben Ezra, that Saturn or Chronos was styled by the Arabs and Persians Chivan; which is palpably the same as the Chiun of Amos. But Chiun, or Chivan, seems to be only the Buddhic title Saca, or Sacya, in a more simple shape: for since the Chinese distinguish their god Fo, or Buddha, by the name of Che-Kya, or the Great Kya, writing the Indian appellation Sacya in two words instead of one, it is probable that Sacya is a compound term, denoting the illustrious Cya or Chiun.

Such are the various hypotheses of these learned men to reconcile the apparent discrepancy between the Hebrew, the Septuagint, and St. Luke. The conclusion to which we may most safely come seems to be, that Rephan, Remphan, and Chiyun, were all well-known names given to the same idol-deity; it was consequently a matter of indifference which St. Stephen mentioned in his address. There is no greater variation between his account, that of the Septuagint, and the Hebrew, than there would be between three writers who severally asserted that the Duke of Wellington, the Prince of Waterloo, and the Duke of Ciudad Rodrigo, gained the battle of Waterloo.

It is almost impossible to believe that the people of Israel, while their God was among them, leading them through the wilderness, could have fallen down to images or idols, unless they had believed in some common principles, which alike prevailed both among themselves and the idolators. It is well known to every reader of Scripture and primitive history, that there were many doctrines, rites, observances, and ceremonies, regarded with equal veneration by the Jews and pagans. It appears from the testimony of antiquity and the researches of Bochart, Gale, Stillingfleet, Bryant, and Faber, that the leading doctrines of all the ancient religions were the same; and the several rites thus common to all, are to be traced to that period when mankind were few in number, and the primitive religion consequently but little corrupted. Among the observances which appear to have been thus common to the earliest inhabitants of the earth, were the general adoption of moveable arks, and of the cherubic emblems. These were preserved by the idolators, who added to them in proportion as their innovations multiplied upon the patriarchal religion, till at last they resorted to rites, which are described at large by various authors. The worship of the golden calf was the first act of idolatry on the part of the Israelites; this they would perhaps have justified to themselves, on the plea that the calf to which they bowed down was only the representation of their own cherubim. Probably the next act of idolatry was this here mentioned by St. Stephen. Moloch, or Remphan, or Chiun, (for they are all the same personage,) was the compound idol, originally designed to represent the great father, or Noah, which was afterwards made the emblem of the sun, the god of Tsabaism. Without professedly forsaking the worship of Jehovah, the Israelites hoped to unite another god with him, and by so doing gave his glory to another. This was the beginning of their idolatry, and turning to worship the host of heaven; and was the cause of their not offering those sacrifices which their Law required.

Mr. Faber has endeavoured to prove that the star of Remphan, or Moloch, was the diluvian star of the Persic Mithras, or Tashhter, Astarte, Typhon, and Dardanus. He attempts, in his learned and most interesting work on the origin of that idolatry, to show that "in the theology of the Gentiles all those deities whose history traces them, in their human capacity, to the great father, or Noah, were venerated in their celestial character as the sun. The compound word Remphan, or Ram-phan, may either (he observes) signify the lofty Phanes, or may possibly be the name of the Indo-Scythic Rama, united with that of Phanes, or Pan." This deity is rightly judged, by Seldon and Beger, either to be the same as Saturn, or to be immediately connected with him, under the appellation of Chiun^j. He believes the origin of the notion of this star, which was nearly the same as that of the Dioscuri, or Cabiri, had its beginning from the traditional opinion that a star shone during the deluge, thirty days and nights, while the waters were increasing: for which he gives many authorities. If Mr. Faber's hypothesis be well founded, the Israelites, in venerating the god Moloch, or Remphan, imagined they were commemorating their ancestors, and the event of the deluge. The fact perhaps may be as he supposes; but the motive of their conduct can be attributed only to their carnal nature. They thrust Moses from them, and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt. Idolatry not only permitted but countenanced vice; and the Israelites were pleased with the first apology they could discover for the gratification of their passions.

I have already, in another place^k remarked the apparent difficulty respecting the conduct of the Israelites in worshipping the golden calf immediately after they had left Egypt, when the wonderful miracles which their tutelar God had wrought must have been still impressed on their minds. We learn, from this quotation of St. Stephen, that they worshipped also the host of heaven, and adopted many of the idolatrous rites and emblems of the Sabianism of the Egyptians.

ON THE MEANING OF THE WORDS "ΕΙΣ ΔΙΑΤΑΓΑΣ ΑΓΓΕΛΩΝ."

SCHOETGEN^l, Whitby^m, Grotiusⁿ, and others would consider this passage as referring to the attendance of the angels at the promulgation of the Law on Mount Sinai. The Jews founded this opinion on the use of the word מַלְאֲכִים in the Pentateuch, instead of יְהוָה; which word, though it is a common name for God, is applied to the angels. Compare Ps. xevii. 7. with Heb. i. 6., and Ps. viii. 6. with Heb. ii. 8. The Jews were also accustomed to say of Moses, מַלְאֲכִים עָלָה אֶצֶל ה'—"He ascended to the angels, who neither eat nor drink, and with whom therefore he neither ate nor drank".

Parkhurst would interpret the passage with reference to the fire and lightning and thunder, which attended the giving of the Law. The learned Lightfoot, however, would interpret the phrase with reference to the succession of angels, i. e. messengers, or prophets, who successively appealed to the Jewish Church. I would not, he observes^p, render this Ἀγγέλων, by the Hebrew word מַלְאֲכִים, "angels," as the Syriac and Arabic interpreters have done; but by שְׁלִיחִים, "messengers;" so שְׁלִיחַ צְבִיר is Ἀγγελος Ἐκκλησιας, "the angel," or "messenger of the Church." The Jews have a trifling fiction, that those Israelites that were present at Mount Sinai, and heard the Law pronounced there by God himself, should have been like angels; that they should never have begot children nor died; but, for the time to come, should have been like to angels, had it not been for that fatal and unfortunate crime of theirs in the matter of the golden calf. If εἰς διατάγας Ἀγγέλων might admit of this passive construction, "that men might be disposed in the same predicament or state with the angels;" then I should think our blessed martyr might, in this passage, remind them of their own opinion, and the more smartly convince them of their ἀνομία, "transgression of the Law," even from what they themselves granted. As though he had said, "Ye have received a Law, which you yourselves confess would have put men into an angelical state; and yet you have not observed it."

But if this clause will not bear that interpretation, it is doubtful in what sense the word Ἀγγέλων must be taken; and whether εἰς διατάγας, "unto the dispositions," be the same with διὰ διαταγῶν, or διὰ διαταγῆς, "by the dispositions, or disposition." That expression in Gal. iii. 19. agrees with this; διαταγῆς δι' ἁγγέλων, "ordained by angels;" and in both these places it would be something harsh to understand by angels those heavenly spirits strictly and properly so taken; for what had they to do in the disposition of the Law? They were present indeed at Mount Sinai, when the Law was given, as many places of the Holy Scriptures do witness; but then they were but present there; for we do not find that any thing farther was done or performed by them. So that the thing itself makes it necessary, that in both places we should understand by angels the "messengers" of God's word; his prophets and ministers. And the particle εἰς may retain its own proper force and virtue, that the sense may come to thus much; viz. "ye have received the Law unto the dispositions of messengers," i. e. that it should be propounded and published by ministers, prophets, and others: and that according to your own desire and wish, Exod. xx. 19. Deut. v. 25. and xviii. 15, 16., and yet ye have not kept the Law. Ye desired prophets, and ye had them, yet which of those prophets have not you persecuted?

If the severe language of the martyred Stephen was justly applicable to the Jews, because they rejected the testimony of their prophets or the Law, which had been preached to them by the angels of heaven; how much more deserving of condemnation must the Christian be, who rejects not only all these evidences, but the teaching of the promised Redeemer, and his holy apostles! Resisting the Holy Ghost was the crime of the Jews; they refused to believe upon sufficient evidence, and persevered in evil against reason and conscience. If we look upon the Christian world, on every side is presented to us the same fatal conduct. All are blessed with the knowledge of the Gospel, and the divine evidences by which it has been established. The grace of God is given to us. The Spirit of God has come down to us and upon us. It is within and around us appealing, warning, reminding, entreating us, as a kind and affectionate friend, to obey its power, to submit to its influence.

NOTE 39.—PART IX.

THE Great High Priest, who had passed into the holy of holies to intercede for man, looked down from heaven, and opened the veil of the firmament, that his first martyr might gaze on his exaltation and glory. The bystanders were too much engaged with the work of destruction upon earth to look up to heaven; and even if they had so done, it is by no means certain that the appearance of the Shechinah would have been manifested to them also. It is related by St. Luke as a fact, and not as a vision; neither is it unphilosophical to believe that He who had visibly ascended into heaven, and had promised to prepare a place there for those who love him, should impart to his holy and suffering servant, in his hour of martyrdom, a prospect of those celestial scenes to which his spirit would soon be admitted—the exceeding great reward of the righteous.

We do not yet understand the nature of the universe of God. The blue expanse that encircles our planet on all sides prevents us from seeing much of space in the day time. Our view is then limited to the sun, whose distance is comparatively small. In the night our view is bounded by the magnificent fretwork, with which the God of Christianity and of creation has spangled the beautiful arch above us. The distance of the visible stars is so great, that the intellect of man is bewildered in the attempt to comprehend it. If we call in the assistance of the telescope, we add to our wonder and embarrassment, and when we seem to have arrived at the very verge of the visible creation, our reason still convinces us, that the telescope of the greatest power has taught us but little. The wildest flight of imagination, which delights itself with the theories of stars whose light has not yet arrived at the solar system; and of innumerable clusters of constellations, invisible to man, which extend to infinity, appears but the calm and sober effort of reason, when the subject of its thoughts is “so great a God, as our God⁷.”

The Christian, however, must propose these questions to himself: “Amidst all this waste or worlds”, where is the heaven of his religion? Where is the abode of the body of Christ, which visibly ascended into another place through the firmament above us?” The Christian cannot be defrauded of his consolations by the powers or the telescope, nor the loftiest flights of imagination. The God who made the noble universe, gave also Christianity to man, to direct him to an existence in a state of immortality. But if there is a state, or condition, there must also be a place in which we shall dwell; and that place, we are repeatedly assured, is the same which the body of Christ now possesses. It St. Stephen was permitted to see the Shechinah in that place, his visual faculties must have been so strengthened that the inconceivable distance between earth and heaven was, as it were, annihilated. St. Stephen, filled with the Holy Ghost, saw, in the flesh, his blessed Redeemer. The heaven of heavens was brought near to man, and the first Christian martyr was enabled to behold it, as a pledge and earnest of his own immortal happiness; and through him a pledge to all those who by the same faith shall offer themselves living and acceptable sacrifices to God. When we consider the sublime and glorious realities to which we are destined, and the manner in which life and immortality have been secured to us by the crucified Saviour, the manifested God of mankind, surely we lose sight of our great and invaluable privileges when we permit ourselves to be enthralled by the pleasures and attractions of this evil world. The faith of a Christian has done very little for man, if it does not enable him to break the chains which kept the heathen in bondage, and deliver him from the galling tyranny of unrestrained passions.

Witsius, who has permitted few points of theology entirely to escape him, has remarked on the circumstance of St. Stephen seeing the heavens opened⁸.

Paul's Epistle to Philemon, in which he styles himself Paul the Aged, to discover the probable age of that Apostle at this time. Others again think, that the latter passage ought to be rendered Paul the Ambassador. No argument for the former supposition can be safely deduced from the expression here referred to, as ρεῖριος, or ρεῖρισκος, is used with great latitude. In the Septuagint, which is the best lexicon for the signification of words in the New Testament, the Greek word ρεῖρισκος is used for soldiers, 2 Macc. xii. 27., or men of mature age. It corresponds also with מַנְשֵׁי, men, Josh. ii. 1. and 23; and, among the classical writers, it is used in the same manner. Kuinoel quotes Phavorinus to prove that it described any age between twenty-three and forty; and his authority is confirmed by Diogenes Laertius, 8-10. and Xenophon, Cyr. viii. 3, &c. where the word ρεῖρισκος occurs, and ἀνὴρ, § 11. is immediately after used as an equivalent expression.

NOTE 41.—PART IX.

THAT the exclamation of Stephen is sufficient to prove his belief, and the belief therefore of the early Church in the Divinity of Christ, appears further from the manner in which the Jews were accustomed to speak of death. Their common saying was, "That was the most easy death, when the Shechinah received the spirit of the just man." Schoetgen quotes Jalkut Rubeni, fol. 86. 2. "Justi perfecti non moriuntur ab angelo mortis, sed tantum per osculum; nam השכינה נקבל נפשם ipsa Shechinah animas eorum suscipit."

"I shall always insist," says Bishop Horsley, in his answer to Priestley, "that the blessed Stephen died a martyr to the Deity of Christ. The accusation against him was 'his speaking blasphemous things against the temple and the Law.' You have forgotten to add the charge of blasphemy against Moses and against God." The blasphemy against the temple and the Law, probably, consisted in a prediction, that the temple was to be destroyed, and the ritual Law of course abolished. The blasphemy against Moses was, probably, his assertion that the authority of Moses was inferior to that of Christ. But what could be the blasphemy against God? what was there in the doctrine of the apostles which could be interpreted as blasphemy against God, except it was this, that they ascribed divinity to one who had suffered publicly as a malefactor? That this was the blessed Stephen's crime none can doubt, who attends to the conclusion of the story: 'He looked up steadfastly into heaven,' says the inspired historian, 'and saw the glory of God,' (that is, he saw the splendor of the Shechinah; for that is what is meant when the glory of God is mentioned, as something to be seen), 'and Jesus standing on the right hand of God.' He saw the man Jesus in the midst of his divine light. His declaring what he saw, the Jewish rabble understood as an assertion of the Divinity of Jesus. They stopped their ears; they overpowered his voice with their own clamors; and they hurried him out of the city, to inflict upon him the death which the Law appointed for blasphemers. He died as he had lived, attesting the Deity of our crucified Master. His last breath was uttered in a prayer to Jesus; first for himself, and then for his murderers. 'They stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit;" and he cried with a loud voice, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge."' It is to be noted, that the word, God, is not in the original text, which might be better rendered thus:—'They stoned Stephen, invoking, and saying,' &c. Jesus therefore was the God whom the dying martyr invoked in his last agonies, when men are apt to pray, with the utmost seriousness, to him whom they conceive the mightiest to save."

It is well observed by Kuinoel, that if St. Stephen had invoked God the Father, the Evangelist would have written κύριε τοῦ Ἰησοῦ. A similar expression to that of the dying martyr is found Apoc. xxii. 20. where we read ἐρχου κύριε Ἰησοῦ. We ought not therefore to read Θεὸν after ἐπικαλούμενον, but to understand the former words τὸν κύριον Ἰησοῦν.

NOTE 42.—PART IX.

THESE chapters are most carelessly divided in our Bibles. The first clause of ver. 1. evidently belongs to the preceding verse. The account of the burial of Stephen seems to be more appropriately introduced immediately after the narrative of his martyrdom, rather than parenthetically, in the history of the subsequent persecution."

NOTE 43.—PART IX.

THE apostles were protected by the especial providence of God, to continue to build up the Church at Jerusalem till the time arrived for the general dispersion of Christianity throughout the world. The secondary causes of their safety during the heat of the present persecution are unknown. They were not, as some have imagined, too obscure to be noticed, for they had already repeatedly incurred the public censure of their rulers: nor can we suppose that the high priest, or his coadjutors, were afraid of inflicting the same punishment on them as on others. They seem to have been preserved by an Almighty Providence, to promote the unity of the Church, by directing and governing the remnant of those who were left at Jerusalem. For unto the Jews first the Gospel was to be preached. Lightfoot endeavours to prove, that those who were obliged to fly from that city, and went every where preaching the Gospel, were the hundred and eight who together with the apostles made up the hundred and twenty mentioned at the beginning of the Acts. His reasons are:—

That the Evangelist commences with the history of the hundred and twenty and pursues it throughout.

By instancing Philip, he shows what class of men is understood, when he says “they were scattered.”

The term εὐαγγελίζουενοι, is never applied to any other than to preachers by function.

Persecution would first look to the preachers. Many of the common Christians were left at Jerusalem^x.

NOTE 44.—PART IX.

THE word ἐλυμάλετο, in this passage, which our translators have rendered “he made havoc of the church,” properly signifies, to ravage as a wild beast, to destroy as a beast of prey. It is used in this sense in the Septuagint, Dan. vi. 22. λέοντες οὐκ ἐλυμάλαντό με, “the lions have not devoured, hurt, or torn me,” and Psalm lxxix. 13. ἐλυμάλαιτο αὐτὴν σὺς ἐκ δρυμοῦ, “The wild boar from the wood hath spoiled, or laid waste this vine.” For quotations to the same effect, from classical authors, see a profusion in Wetstein in loc.

In the first edition of this Arrangement I gave, from Vitringa, a concise view of an ingenious theory, by which he attempts to prove that there are, in the history of Samson, several remarkable typical allusions to some of the leading incidents in the life of St. Paul. He arranges his imagined resemblances under three heads. The events of Samson’s life which preceded the encounter with the lion—the combat itself—and the consequences which followed. The numerous coincidences which the ingenuity of this writer has led him to remark, are extremely fanciful; and as I find no allusion in the New Testament to this supposed type, I do not think the mere ingenuity of the parallel a sufficient reason for giving a more particular account of it in these pages.

Vitringa is not the only writer who has discovered some allusion to St. Paul in the Old Testament. Witsius^y has quoted Cocceius, who has followed with some variations the authority of Tertullian, Ambrose, Jerome, and St. Augustine, in applying to St. Paul (Gen. xlix. 27.)—

“Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf:

In the morning he shall devour the prey,
And at night he shall divide the spoil.”

The fathers would thus explain this prophecy—Paul, in the morning of his life, like a wolf devoured the Church; and in the evening, or the decline or latter division of his life, divided the spoils of the Gentiles, delivered from the dominion of Satan, with Christ and his Church. The interpretation of Cocceius is more elegant—He observes that the Israelites, as a nation, had their rising and their setting; and on each occasion Benjamin was conspicuous. Saul was the first king of the nation, and defeated their enemies; another Saul, in the decline of the state, divided the spoils taken from Satan, the Jews, and the Gentiles. Witsius, however, rejects both these interpretations, and shows that the predictions were more probably fulfilled in the history of the tribe of Benjamin. The wolf also is used as an emblem of corrupt and erroneous teachers rather than of the faithful and zealous.

Though Witsius rejects these supposed meanings of the passage, he inclines to the opinion of Jerome, Theodoret, Nicolaus à Lyra, Pellicanus, and others, that Psalm lxviii. 28. is rightly applied to the Apostle of the Gentiles. He prefers the Junian version—“Illie sic Benjamin, parvus, et dominator eorum; principes Jehudæ, et cætus eorum; principes Zebullonis principes Naphtali.” The first part of this passage may refer to St. Paul, the latter to the other apostles, who belonged to the districts of Zabulon and Naphtali. Altinguus, in his Treatise De Schiloh Dominatore, lib. v. cap. 20, and in his Comment. on the Psalm, Oper. tom. ii. part iii. p. 111, ap. Witsi., has revived and defended this opinion. It is not impossible that the verse ought to have been thus interpreted: Bishop Horne, however, has not noticed it.

NOTE 45.—PART IX.

THE apostles (Acts viii. 1.) had not yet left Jerusalem. This Philip, therefore, must not be confounded with the apostle. It was the deacon, who, after his mission to Samaria, went to his own house at Cæsarea, where St. Paul was afterwards received. (Acts xxi. 8.)

The first effect of the Gospel of Christ was the removal of hatred and jealousy, and all the hateful and debasing passions. For centuries the Jews had refused to hold any intercourse with the Samaritans—for centuries they had been objects of detestation to each other. The Gospel is given to the world—the Jew becomes the friend of the despised Samaritan, and preaches to him the truth of God. Odious as the Samaritans were to the Jews, they were the offspring of common ancestors; and perhaps on this account they were the first invited to become members of the Messiah's kingdom. The Gospel is preached as men were able to bear it, first to the Jew, then to the Samaritan—next to the Proselytes of Righteousness—then to the Proselytes of the Gate—and lastly, to the idolatrous heathen.

NOTE 46.—PART IX.

SIMON MAGUS appears to have been one of the first who arrogated to himself the loftier names which were appropriated to the anticipated mysterious Being who was at this time universally expected upon earth. In several MSS. of the greatest authority, as well as in the principal of the ancient versions, is this remarkable reading—οὗτός ἐστιν ἡ δύναμις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη, “this man is the power of God, which is called, or which is, the Great^z.” And the inspired writer here informs us, that he confounded and astonished the people, and took advantage of their ignorant wonder to assume these extraordinary honors. He deceived the people by his great skill in various tricks and juggling^a, assisted probably by his superior knowledge of the powers of nature. Ecclesiastical history has handed down to us a large collection of improbable stories respecting this man^b. Arnobius, a writer of the third century, relates that he flew into the air by the assistance of the evil spirit, and was thrown to the ground by the prayers of St. Peter. Others tell us that he pretended to be the Father, who gave the Law to Moses; and that he was the Messiah, the Paraclete, and Jupiter, and that the woman who accompanied him, who was named Helena, was Minerva, or the First Intelligence; with many other things equally absurd, which are collected by Calmet, to whom the reader is referred^c.

Justin, and after him Irenæus, Tertullian, Eusebius, Cyril, and others of the fathers, have asserted that Simon Magus was honored as a deity by the Romans, and by the senate itself, who decreed a statue to him in the isle of Tyber, where a statue has since been found with this inscription—“Semoni Saneo Deo Fideo, Sacrum Sext. Pompeius Sp. F. Mutianus donum dedit.” Some suppose this to have been the statue to which Justin alluded; but as it does appear to have been erected by the senate, the most able critics have rejected the idea of Magus' deification by the Romans. Dr. Middleton, not perhaps the best authority, for he endeavoured to reject all he could find reason to discredit, treats the story with contempt; while a modern author^d, who is no less venturesome, espouses the opposite opinion, and defends it at great length. This ingenious speculatist indeed attempts to prove that Josephus and Philo were Christians, and that primitive Christianity was a system of Unitarianism. They were certainly as much entitled to the name of Christians as the modern Unitarians; both disguising their Christianity with equal skill.

It does not however appear necessary to enter further into the subject, nor to discuss the conclusion of Vitranga, that there were two Simon Magus'. I shall only add, which is more to the purpose, that Wolfius, Krebs, Rosenmüller, and others, are of opinion that the Simon here mentioned is the same as the person spoken of by Josephus as persuading Drusilla to leave her husband, and to live with Felix, the procurator of Judæa^e.

NOTE 47.—PART IX.

ON CONFIRMATION.

IT is the custom at present among many who profess Christianity, to despise every ordinance of which they do not perceive the evident utility. They must comprehend the causes and the reasons of an institution, or it is treated with contempt. In all enactments of merely human origin this conduct is defensible, because experience proves to us that human laws are made to accomplish some known and definite benefit; and if they fail in that object, they are considered useless. Yet no human legislature will permit its laws to be disobeyed with impunity, even in those cases where they have evidently failed in their purpose; for the will of an individual is required to submit to the authority of the state: and there are few cases in which the resistance of an individual can be justified upon the plea of his inability to discover the reasonableness or propriety of a law.

If we are thus required to act in matters of common life, the same principles of conduct are more binding when applied to the Divine Law. We are in general able to discover the causes for which it pleased God to appoint to the Jew the observances of the Mosaic Law, and to the Gentile the lighter yoke of the Christian code. The divinity of both covenants was ratified and confirmed by miracle and prophecy, and man in both instances, without any appeal being made to his reason, was required to yield unreserved obedience, because it was the will of God; for, as the Apostle says, "we walk by faith, not by sight."

One very remarkable characteristic alike distinguishes the Mosaic and Christian institutions: in both it is to be observed, that although on any peculiar and extraordinary occasion the supernatural influences of the Holy Spirit might be imparted to some favored individuals; they were never bestowed in ordinary cases, unless the appointed means of grace were observed on the part of the worshipper: thereby affording the highest sanction in favor of the outward ordinances, both of the Jewish and Christian religion. If in the former dispensation the penitent would entreat for pardon, he brought his sacrifice. If a child desired admittance into the Church of God, it must be either by circumcision or by baptism; if he would renew in his youth the promises which had been made for him in his childhood, he feasted on the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, or on the body and blood of Christ, in the feast of the Christian sacrament. The means of grace are attended with the influences of the Spirit of God, and he who obeys the will of God always partakes of the blessing.

The passage of Scripture which is contained in this section is the first account in the Christian covenant of a new means of grace, which was sanctioned by an evident impartation of the divine influences. Peter and John went down to Samaria to impart to the new proselytes the gifts of the Holy Spirit; the evangelists who converted them, not having authority to perform the higher functions of the apostolic order. The same Almighty Being who instituted the outward means of grace, withheld the gifts of his Holy Spirit till they could be communicated by his chosen servants in his own appointed way.

If we are required to deduce moral inferences from other passages of Scripture; if the conduct of God to his ancient Church be still justly made a source of encouragement, and a motive to perseverance to Christians at present, on what grounds are we to reject the inferences that naturally arise from such facts as those now before us? Are we not right in concluding that this action was intended not only for the peculiar benefit of the Samaritan converts, but for an example to all the Christian Churches, from that age to the present? The enactments of Christianity are to be found in the conduct of Christ and his apostles; their practice is the best model for the right government of the Churches.

From this conduct of the apostles the ancient primitive Church has uniformly required, that those who are admitted as infants into the Christian Church by baptism, should in maturer years be confirmed in their Christian profession by prayer and imposition of hands. Though the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were conferred only by extraordinary men, appointed for that especial purpose, it was believed that his ordinary gifts might be imparted by the authorized ministers who were set apart for the service of the sanctuary. As the miraculous gifts were requisite at the first formation of the Christian Church, so now, when the Christian religion is fully established, its ordinary influences are equally necessary to enable man to recover the lost image of God, of which he had been deprived by the fall. It is but too usual with a certain class of religionists to undervalue the external rites of Christianity: but it is our duty to examine whether any, and what rites were observed by the apostles, and to follow their authority; rather than to inquire into the reasonableness or propriety of the apostolic institutions. The Roman Church has erred by adding to the enactments of Scripture; the opposite extreme is to be no less avoided, of depreciating or neglecting its commands. That Church is most pure whose discipline approaches the nearest to that which was practised by its divinely-appointed founders, and is recorded for our example in the New Testament.

I conclude this subject by availing myself of the high authority of the pious and eloquent Bishop Horne, who observes, speaking of Mr. Law, (vol. i. p. 214,) that although "the government and discipline of the Church will not save a man, yet it is absolutely necessary to preserve those doctrines that will. A hedge round a vineyard is a poor paltry thing, but break it down, and all they that go by will pluck off her grapes. And no sin has been punished with heavier punishments for that reason, than throwing down fences, and making it indifferent whether a Christian be of any Church or none, so he be but a Christian, and have the birth of the inspoken word. But if Christ left a Church upon earth, and ordered submission to the appointed governors of it, so far as a man resists, or undervalues this ordinance of Christ, so far he acts not like a Christian, let his inward light be what it will."

NOTE 48.—PART IX.

THE expression “which is desert,” in the opinion of Glassius^f and Schoetgen^g, refers to the way and not to the Gaza itself. Kuinoel^h approves of the opinion of Heinrich and Wassenburgh, that the clause was not found in the original text, but was subsequently introduced.

NOTE 49.—PART IX.

THE name of the eunuch is supposed to have been Indichⁱ. It is probable he had but lately embraced the Jewish faith. Candace is a name common to the female sovereigns of that part of the country. A passage from Pliny is quoted by Benson and others to prove this—“Regnare fœminam Candacen, quod nomen multis jam annis ad reginas transit.”

If this remark of Pliny be just, and it is confirmed by a passage of Dio Cassius, quoted by Kuinoel, the authority of Strabo may be admitted to strengthen the Scripture account. He tells us—Τούτων δὲ ἦσαν καὶ οἱ τῆς βασιλείας στρατηγοὶ τῆς Καρδάκης, ἣ καὶ ἡμᾶς ᾔρξε τῶν Αἰθίοπων ἀνδρική τις γυνή, lib. 17. Pearson, however, is of opinion that this authority is of little weight^k.

NOTE 50.—PART IX.

ON THE DIFFERENT READINGS OF ISAIAH liii. 7, 8.

THIS quotation has been usually classed among those which are taken from the Septuagint, and not from the original Hebrew. The difference between the Hebrew and the Septuagint appears at first sight to be considerable; that between the Septuagint and the Acts is very slight. It is indeed most probable that the Ethiopian would be reading that version which was in the most frequent or general use among the Hellenistic Jews in Egypt, a country which bordered so nearly upon his own; and where the Septuagint version had been sanctioned by the Alexandrian Jews, and originally made under royal authority.

Pezronius^l thinks the present reading is corrupt in the Hebrew, and the Greek version right. Alex. Morus^m is of opinion that the original reading of the Hebrew was לְקַח בְּעֶצְרוֹ—“in his affliction he was taken from his judgment:” to which reading Wolfius would assent, altering only the position of the two last words. The latter critic supposes that וּ was read for ב, and the ו should be joined to the preceding word. “Sic enim reddi,” he observes, “Ebræa possunt: propter angustiam et a judicio sublatus est, sive sublatus est iudicium, quod idem plane est: nam cuius tollitur iudicium, ille iudicio seu condemnationi eximitur.”

Doddridge conjectures that there must have been another reading in the copy used by the Septuagint translators. He considers this reading to have been not לְקַח וּבְעֶצְרוֹ as the original now stands, but לְקַח מִשְׁפָּט בְּעֶצְרוֹ—this supposition, however, is unsupported by manuscripts.

After a careful examination of these authorities, I cannot but think that the only alteration requisite is in the pointing of the first clause; and that the Septuagint have properly expressed the meaning of the Hebrew. If a pause is placed after the words לְקַח וּבְעֶצְרוֹ, and after בְּעֶצְרוֹ, the Greek would read thus, “He opened not his mouth in his humiliation.” With respect to the Hebrew, it may be observed that the prefix וּ is sometimes used in the sense of “because of,” “by reason of,” Exod. vi. 9., and the proper interpretation of וּבְעֶצְרוֹ, from the same root is “to restrain,” “confine,” &c. The word therefore implies affliction or humiliation, and may be rendered “because of restraint,” or “because of affliction or humiliation.” With respect to the second clause, “and from judgment,” it is evident that the sense is the same even as the passages now stand. “And he was taken from judgment,” is the Hebrew phrase, signifying, “he was removed from, or deprived of, a just judgment.” “His judgment was taken away” is the translation of the New Testament and Septuagint, that is, “His just judgment was not allowed him.” The same circumstance is expressed whether we say that a criminal was deprived of a fair trial, or a fair trial was not allowed him: nor would the variation in the language justify the charge of inaccuracy, if the two phrases were indiscriminately used. If these remarks shall be thought correct, we may avoid all recourse to the unwarrantable mode of inventing a various reading to reconcile a supposed discrepancy.

Tract.* 2, de Pronomine, p. 712, of his collected works, and 190 of the separate work—“ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν τῆς καταβαίνειν ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ εἰς Γάζαν, αὐτὴ ἐστὶν ἔρημος—ad viam, quæ a Jerusalem descendit Gazam; αὐτὴ hæc, seu quæ est deserta. Proposed mode of reading the above, so as not to alter either the Hebrew or the Septuagint:—place the pause after מעצר, and ταπεινώσει, rendering the former phrase by the words “because of restraint or affliction;” or “humiliation;” giving the full signification in the second clause of the word משפט, in which case it will appear evident, that the meaning of both expressions will be the same.

NOTE 51.—PART IX.

BISHOP LOWTH remarks on the parallel passage of Isaiah liii. 8.—“My learned friend Dr. Kennicott has communicated to me the following passages from the Mishna, and the Gemara of Babylon, as leading to a satisfactory explication of this difficult place. It is said in the former, before any one was punished for a capital crime, proclamation was made before the prisoner by the public crier in these words—כל מי שזרע לו זכות יבא וילמד עליו—“quicumque noverit aliquid de ejus innocentia, veniat et doceat de eo.”—Tract. Sanhedrin. Surenhus. par. iv. p. 233. On which passage the Gemara of Babylon adds, that ‘before the death of Jesus, this proclamation was made for forty days; but no defence could be found.’ On which words Lardner observes, ‘It is truly surprising to see such falsities, contrary to well-known facts.’—Testimonies, vol. i. p. 198. The report is certainly false: but this false report is founded on the supposition that there was such a custom, and so far confirms the account above given from the Mishna. The Mishna was composed in the middle of the second century, according to Prideaux; Lardner ascribes it to the year of Christ 180.”

Casaubon has a quotation from Maimonides, which further confirms this account; Exercit. in Baronii Annales, Art. 86. Ann. 34. Num. 119.

“Auctor est Maimonides in Pirck 13. ejus Libri ex opere Jad, solitum fieri, ut cum Reus, sententiam mortis passus, a loco judicii exhibat ducendus ad supplicium, præcederet ipsum רכרן אֶחָדָא, præco; et hæc verba diceret. Ille exit occidendus morte illa, quid transgressus est transgressione illa, in loco illo, tempore illo, et sunt ejus rei testes ille et ille. Qui noverit aliquid ad ejus innocentiam probandam, veniat, et loquatur pro eo.”

Now it is plain from the history of the four Evangelists, that in the trial and condemnation of Jesus no such rule was observed, (though, according to the account of the Mishna, it must have been in practice at that time:) no proclamation was made for any person to bear witness to the innocence and character of Jesus; nor did any one voluntarily step forth to give his attestation to it. And our Saviour seems to refer to such a custom, and to claim the benefit of it, by his answer to the high priest, when he asked him of his disciples, and of his doctrine—“I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: behold! they know what I said.” John xviii. 20, 21. This, therefore, was one remarkable instance of hardship and injustice, among others, predicted by the prophet, which our Saviour underwent in his trial and sufferings.

St. Paul, likewise, in similar circumstances, standing before the judgment-seat of Festus, seems to complain of the same unjust treatment; that no one was called, or would appear to vindicate his character. “My manner of life (ἐν ᾧ βίωσας με, רוּרִי) from my youth, which was at first among my own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews: which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify; that after the strictest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee.” Acts xxvi. 4, 5. רוּרִי signifies age, duration, the time, which one man, or many together, pass in this world; in this place, the course, tenor, or manner of life. The verb רוּרִי signifies, according to Castell, “Ordinam vitam sive ætatem egit, ordinavit, ordine constituit.” In Arabic, “Curavit, administravit.”—Lowth’s Isaiah, notes, p. 240.

NOTE 52.—PART IX.

WE have been so accustomed, and that rightly, both on the internal evidence, and on the testimony of the Jewish and Christian Churches, as well as on that of the contents of this section, to apply the words of Isaiah to our Lord, that many readers will be much surprised to hear that various other interpretations have been given, even by Christian theologians. There is a long list of names of authors mentioned by Kuinoel, with the opinions they have espoused. Doederlein, by the "servant" of Jehovah (Isai. lii. 13.), of whom the prophet continues to speak in the ensuing chapter, understands the Jewish people. Others, the pious Jews; others, the converted Gentiles; and others, the prophets after the captivity. Some suppose it to mean Cyrus; Grotius imagines Jeremiah to have been designed. Many approve the decision the treasurer of Candace was about to arrive at, and conclude the prophet himself to have been meant. Some refer the words to Hezekiah, others to Uzziah. See Kuinoel, In Lib. Hist. N. T. p. 317., and Doddridge's note in loc. Dr. Hammond too has intimated, that this prophecy might have been fulfilled in some one who lived shortly after Isaiah. The Jews interpret it "of the afflictions of Israel;" but see Schoetgen, vol. ii.

NOTE 53.—PART IX.

THIS verse is wanting in a great number of manuscripts. Griesbach, Matthæi, Michaelis, and others, would expunge it from the canon. In the manuscripts where it is found it is read variously. Whitby would retain it; observing, that the verse was probably omitted, in later times, because it opposed the delay of baptism, which the catechumens experienced before they were admitted into the early Church.

NOTE 54.—PART IX.

THE reading in the Alexandrian and some other manuscripts is, "the Holy Spirit fell upon the eunuch, but an angel of the Lord took away Philip," which is probably the true reading.

NOTE 55.—PART IX.

ON THE DATE, DESIGN, AND ORIGINAL LANGUAGE OF ST. MATTHEW'S GOSPEL.

THIS section gives an account of the state of the infant Church at this time, and may be considered as an introduction to the history of St. Paul. By him the new converts had been compelled to fly from Jerusalem, and he was now persecuting them even to strange cities; not only to Damascus, but to other adjacent towns.

I would refer to this period the publication of St. Matthew's Gospel. Both the fathers and heretics of the early Church have unitedly acknowledged that the first Gospel was written by this Evangelist, and at an early date. It was very improbable that a long space of time should be allowed to elapse, without any attempt on the part of the apostles to supply the converts with a published account of the life and sufferings of the blessed Jesus; particularly as those converts who had not seen the miracles of our Lord, or of his apostles, were prevented by the furious persecution which was now going on, from regularly attending the Christian assemblies. Indeed, there seems to be strong ground for believing that not only the Gospel of St. Matthew, but also those of St. Mark and St. Luke were written soon after the commencement of some persecution or other of the Christian Church. The Church consisted, at this time, solely of Jewish believers, and the first Gospel was primarily intended for the instruction of the Jews in Jerusalem and in Judæa. This purport was as uniformly asserted and believed, as its early composition. "His Gospel, doubtless," says Dr. Townson, "was designed for the benefit of the universal Church, as well immediately by the history and doctrine of Christ, as mediately by a right institution of the Jewish believers, who were to be the first teachers of the Gentiles. But the Holy Spirit under whose influence it was written, seems to have guided, or left St. Matthew to recite many particulars more directly relative and interesting to the Jews. This is meant by saying, that he wrote for their instruction. And this was the sense of antiquity."

We read in Justin Martyr's Apology, that the Jews circulated among their brethren, their own invented account of the resurrection (Matt. xxviii. 13.) imputing the removal of the body to the spoliation of the tomb by the apostles. This circumstance affords an additional proof of the great probability that St. Matthew would publish his Gospel at an early period, and address it to the Jews, to counteract the erroneous statement of the authorities at Jerusalem. As St. Matthew had held a public office under the government, it was most probable that he was selected to write the history of his blessed Lord's life, as being more known than the other disciples, and therefore the most likely to excite attention.

Bishop Tomline remarks, that the apostles, immediately after the descent of the Holy Ghost, which took place only ten days after the ascension of our Saviour into heaven, preached the Gospel to the Jews with great success; and surely it is reasonable to suppose that an authentic account of our Saviour's doctrines and miracles would very soon be committed to writing for the confirmation of those who believed in his divine mission, and for the conversion of others; and more particularly to enable the Jews to compare the circumstances of the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus, with their ancient prophecies relative to the Messiah: and we may conceive that the apostles would be desirous of losing no time in writing an account of the miracles which Jesus performed, and of the discourses which he delivered, because, the sooner such an account was published, the easier it would be to inquire into its truth and accuracy; and consequently when these points were satisfactorily ascertained, the greater would be its weight and authority". On these accounts the learned prelate assigns the date of St. Matthew's Gospel to the year 38.

"The sacred writers," says Mr. Horne, from whom I extract the principal part of the remainder of this note, "had a regard to the circumstances of the persons for whose use they wrote, and we have therefore an additional evidence for the early date of this Gospel, in the state of persecution in which the Church was at the time when it was written; for it contains many obvious references to such a state, and many very apposite addresses both to the injuring and to the injured party". During this calamity, the members of the Christian Church stood in need of all the support, consolation, and assistance, that could be administered to them. But what comfort could they possibly receive, in their distressed situation, comparable to that which resulted from the example of their suffering Master, and the promise he had made to his faithful followers? This example and those promises St. Matthew seasonably laid before them, towards the close of this season of trial, for their imitation and encouragement, and delivered it to them, as the anchor of their hope, to keep them steadfast in this violent tempest. From this consideration Dr. Owen was led to fix the date of St. Matthew's Gospel to the year 38.

"Dr. Lardner", however, and Bishop Percy^q, think that they discover marks of a lower date in St. Matthew's writings. They argue from the knowledge which he shows of the spirituality of the Gospel, and of the excellence of the moral above the ceremonial Law; and from the great clearness with which the comprehensive design of the Christian dispensation, as extending to the whole Gentile world, together with the rejection of the Jews, is unfolded in this Gospel. Of these topics they suppose the Evangelist not to have treated, until a course of years had developed their meaning, removed his Jewish prejudices, and given him a clearer discernment of their nature.

"This objection, however, carries but little force with it. For, in the first place, as Dr. Townson has justly observed, with regard to the doctrinal part of his Gospel, if St. Matthew exhibits a noble idea of pure religion and morality, he teaches no more than he had heard frequently taught, and often opposed to the maxims of the Jews, by his Divine Instructor. And when the Holy Spirit, the guide into all truth, had descended upon him, it seems strange to imagine that he still wanted twenty or thirty years to enlighten his mind. If he was not then furnished with knowledge to relate these things as an Evangelist, how was he qualified to preach them to the Jews as an apostle?

"In the next place, it is true that the prophetic parts of his Gospel declare the extent of Christ's kingdom, and the calling and acceptance of the Gentiles. But these events had been plainly foretold by the ancient prophets, and were expected by devout Israelites to happen in the days of the Messiah^r; and in those passages which relate to the universality of the Gospel dispensation, the Evangelist merely states that the Gospel would be successfully preached among the Gentiles in all parts of the earth. He only recites the words of our Saviour without any explanation or remark; and we know it was promised to the apostles, that after Christ's ascension, the Holy Spirit should bring all things to their remembrance, and guide them into all truth. Whether St. Matthew was aware of the call of the Gentiles, before the Gospel was actually embraced by them, cannot be ascertained; nor is it material, since it is generally agreed, that the inspired penmen often did not comprehend the full meaning of their own writings when they referred to future events; and it is obvious that it might answer a good purpose to have the future call of the Gentiles intimated in an authentic history of our Saviour's ministry, to which the believing Jews might refer, when that extraordinary and unexpected event should take place. Their minds would thus be more easily satisfied; and they would more readily admit the comprehensive design of the Gospel, when they found it declared in a book, which they acknowledged as the rule of their faith and practice^s.

"Once more, with respect to the argument deduced from this Evangelist's mentioning

^r Thus Zacharias, the father of the Baptist, speaks of Christ as coming "to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death," (Luke i. 79.) which description includes the Gentiles; and Simeon expressly calls him "a light to lighten the Gentiles," (Luke ii. 32.)

prophecies and prophetic parables, which speak of the rejection and overthrow of the Jews, it may be observed, that if this argument means, that, being at first prejudiced in favor of a kingdom to be restored to Israel, he could not understand these prophecies, and therefore would not think of relating them if he wrote early;—though the premises should be admitted, we may justly deny the conclusion. St. Matthew might not clearly discern in what manner the predictions were to be accomplished, yet he must see, what they all denounced, that God would reject those who rejected the Gospel: hence, he always had an inducement to notify them to his countrymen; and the sooner he apprised them of their danger, the greater charity he showed them'.

"Since, therefore, the objections to the early date by no means balance the weight of evidence in its favor, we are justified in assigning the date of this Gospel to the year of our Lord 37, or at the latest to the year 38.

"The next subject of inquiry respects the language in which St. Matthew wrote his Gospel, and which has been contested among critics with no small degree of acrimony; Bellarmin, Grotius, Casaubon, Bishops Walton and Tomline, Drs. Cave, Hammond, Mill, Harwood, Owen, Campbell, and A. Clarke, Simon, Tillemont, Pritius, Du Pin, Calmet, Michaelis, and others, having supported the opinion of Papias as cited by Irenæus, Origen, Cyril, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Jerome, and other early writers, that this Gospel was written in Hebrew, that is, in the Syro-Chaldaic dialect then spoken by the Jews. On the other hand, Erasmus, Paræus, Calvin, Le Clerc, Fabricius, Pfeiffer, Dr. Lightfoot, Beausobre, Basnage, Wetstein, Rumpæus, Whitby, Edelman, Hoffman, Moldenhawer, Viser, Hailes, Jones, Drs. Jortin, Lardner, Hey, and Hailes, Mr. Hewlett, and others, have strenuously vindicated the Greek original of St. Matthew's Gospel. A third opinion has been offered by Dr. Townson, and some few modern divines, that there were two originals, one in Hebrew and the other in Greek. He thinks that there seems to be more reason for allowing two originals than for contesting either; the consent of antiquity pleading strongly for the Hebrew, and evident marks of originality for the Greek.

"The presumption, however, is unquestionably in favor of the opinion that St. Matthew wrote in Greek; for Greek was the prevailing language in the time of our Saviour and his apostles. Matthew, too, while he was a collector of customs, and before he was called to be an apostle, would have frequent occasions both to write and to speak Greek, and could not discharge his office without understanding that language. We may therefore consider it as highly probable, or even certain, that he understood Greek. Besides, as all the other Evangelists and Apostles wrote their Gospels and Epistles in that language for the use of Christians (whether Jews or Gentiles) throughout the known world; and as St. Matthew's Gospel, though in the first instance written for the use of Jewish and Samaritan converts, was ultimately designed for universal dissemination, it is not likely that it was written in any other language than that which was employed by all the other writers of the New Testament. This presumption is corroborated by the numerous and remarkable instances of verbal agreement between Matthew and the other Evangelists; which, on the supposition that he wrote in Hebrew, or the vernacular Syro-Chaldaic dialect, would not be credible. Even those who maintain that opinion are obliged to confess that an early Greek translation of this Gospel was in existence before Mark and Luke composed theirs, which they saw and consulted. The main point in dispute is, whether the present Greek copy is entitled to the authority of an original or not: and as this is a question of real and serious importance, we shall proceed to state the principal arguments on both sides.

"The modern advocates of the Hebrew Gospel, above enumerated, lay most stress upon the testimonies of Papias (bishop of Hierapolis, A. D. 116), of Irenæus (A. D. 178), and of Origen (A. D. 230); which testimonies have been followed by Chrysostom, Jerome, and others of the early fathers of the Christian Church. But these good men, as Wetstein has well observed, do not so properly bear testimony as deliver their own conjectures, which we are not bound to admit unless they are supported by good reasons. Supposing, and taking it for granted, that Matthew wrote for the Jews in Judæa, they concluded that he wrote in Hebrew": and because the fathers formed this conclusion, modern writers, relying on their authority, have also inferred that Matthew composed his Gospel in that language.

"It only remains that we briefly notice the third opinion above mentioned, viz. that there were two originals—one in Hebrew, the other in Greek, but both written by St. Matthew. This opinion, we believe, was first intimated by Dr. Whitby", and is adopted by Dr. Hey, Dr. Townson, Bishop Gleig, and some other modern divines. The consent of antiquity pleads strongly for the Hebrew, and evident marks of originality for the Greek. Bishop Gleig thinks, that St. Matthew, on his departure to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, left with the Church at Jerusalem, or at least with some of its members, the Hebrew or Syriac memorandums of our Lord's doctrines and miracles, which he had made for his own use at the time when the doctrines were taught, and the miracles performed; and that the Greek Gospel was written long after the apostles had quitted Jerusalem, and dispersed themselves in the discharge of the duties of their office. This conjecture receives some countenance from the terms in which Eusebius¹⁰, when giving his own opinion, mentions St. Matthew's Gospel. 'Matthew,' says that historian, 'having first preached to the Hebrews, delivered to them, when he was preparing to depart to other countries, his Gospel composed in their native language; that to those, from whom he was sent away, he might by his writings supply the loss of his presence^x.' This opinion is further corroborated by the fact, that there are instances on record of authors who have themselves published the same work in two languages. Thus Josephus wrote the History of the Jewish War in Hebrew and Greek^y. In like manner, we have two originals, one in Latin, the other in English, of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church, and also of Sir Isaac Newton's Optics. As St. Matthew wanted neither ability nor disposition, we cannot think he wanted inducement to "do the work of an Evangelist" for his brethren of the common faith, Hellenists as well as Hebrews; to both of whom charity made him a debtor. The popular language of the first believers was Hebrew, or what is called so by the sacred and ancient ecclesiastical writers: but those who spoke Greek quickly became a considerable part of the Church of Christ.

"From a review of all the arguments adduced on this much-litigated question, I cannot but prefer the opinion which, indeed, best harmonizes with the consent of antiquity,—that St. Matthew wrote first a Hebrew Gospel for the use of the first Hebrew converts. Its subsequent disappearance is easily accounted for, by its being so corrupted by the Ebionites that it lost all its authority in the Church, and was deemed spurious, and also by the prevalence of the Greek language, especially after the destruction of Jerusalem, when the Jewish language, and every thing belonging to the Jews fell into the utmost contempt. It also is clear that our present Greek Gospel is an authentic original, and consequently an inspired production of the Evangelist Matthew, written (not as Bishop Gleig and other writers suppose, long after our Lord's resurrection and ascension, but) within a few years after those memorable and important events^z."

^z Horne, Crit. Introd. vol. ii. pp. 238-243.

This view of the probability that the Gospel of St. Matthew was written in both languages appears to me to be most correct. It is possible that the real state of the case might be this. When the persecution began, or was beginning, St. Matthew, who perhaps might have already committed to writing the memorable events of Christ's history, might have distributed among his own countrymen, the converts of Jerusalem, an account of the transactions and teaching of our Lord; but as the persecution was not confined to Judæa, but extended to Gentile cities, the converts who had taken refuge in them would be naturally anxious to have the Gospel in that language which was most generally understood, that the glorious works of redemption and salvation might be made known unto them as well as unto us. It is probable, therefore, that the Hebrew Gospel was first used, while the converts remained in Judæa, or at least during the continuance of the Pauline persecution; and that it might have been given about six years after the ascension, when the persecution was beginning; in the year 34 or 35, the date which is here assigned to it. The Greek Gospel might have been given about two or three years later, when the converts returned to Jerusalem, and required inspired histories of our Lord to be sent to their brethren at those cities in which their safety had been secured.

This hypothesis will reconcile some few of the discrepancies which have embarrassed many inquirers in their research into the early history of the Church. It accounts for the early disuse, and non-appearance of the Hebrew Gospel—it agrees with the early date assigned by Dr. Townson, Bishop Tomline, and Dr. Owen, who refer the writing of St. Matthew's Gospel to the year 37, or 38,—it corresponds with the internal testimony in favor of a very early date, and is supported by the reasoning of Bishop Tomline and Dr. Owen.

NOTE 56.—PART IX.

ST. LUKE not having specified the time of Paul's conversion, and the apostle himself not having done it in his Epistles, the opinions upon it vary much. Some place his conversion in the year of the crucifixion, or at the beginning of the following year; others seven or eight years after, in the second year of Claudius. I have preferred the opinion which steers between these two extremes, and place the conversion of St. Paul at the year 35, about the time that war was declared between Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee, and Aretas, king of the Arabs^a.

^a Spanheim, De Contr. Paul. p. 197. Pearson, Lardner, Hales, Horne, and others.

This epoch does not seem attended with any difficulty. It agrees very well with "the fourteen years" that the Apostle reckons between his conversion and the third voyage that he afterwards made to Jerusalem. It furnishes, moreover, some very natural reasons, why being at Damascus he was immediately in safety there, and why he afterwards retired into Arabia, rather than into any other place, and why upon his return from Arabia he no longer found protection at Damascus; and it is the date which is generally adopted.

Herod and Aretas quarrelled, for the reasons mentioned by Josephus, Antiq. lib. 18. cap. 7, and they came to an open war in the year 36. Herod's army was defeated. The Romans took his part; but the death of Tiberius, which happened in the month of March, in the year 37, stopped the Romans, who were marching against the Arabs. Vitellius, who was commander of the Roman army, heard the news of his death at Jerusalem during the feast of the Passover.

The use of the expression in these authors may be adduced as one among many other proofs, that St. Luke, the writer of the Acts, was a learned man, and one therefore who was more likely to examine into the truth, origin, and nature of the religion he had embraced than many of the more ignorant converts.

NOTE 58.—PART IX.

THE authority of the Sanhedrin of Jerusalem was very great, so that not only the Jews who inhabited the land of Israel, but the Babylonian and Alexandrian Jews received its decrees, and obeyed them with reverence. They acknowledged the Sanhedrin as the bulwark of the oral law. They more especially submitted to its authority in accusations of heresy, and trial of false prophets, which the Sanhedrin alone was supposed competent to consider. The Romans, to whose power the whole of Arabia at this time submitted, granted to the Jewish council the power of imprisonment and scourging, not only over the Jews of Palestine, but over other synagogues, which willingly, in religious matters, yielded to the control of the Sanhedrin.—See on this subject the note at the end of chap. ix. sect. xxxv.

NOTE 59.—PART IX.

THIS expression was common among the ancient Jews. We read in Is. xl. 3. the phrase לִרְרֵךְ יְהוָה—and among the later Jews, לִרְרֵךְ הַנוֹצְרִים secundum morem Christianorum.—Schoetgen. vol. i. p. 444.

NOTE 60.—PART IX.

ON THE CONVERSION OF ST. PAUL.

IF St. Paul had been asked before he left Jerusalem for Damascus, by one of those despised Christians whom he was now on his way to persecute, "What proof do you require to convince you that Jesus is the Messiah?" it is not improbable that he would have replied, "I demand that evidence which was given to my fathers, the evidence of the manifested Shechinah, the presence of the Angel Jehovah, and the audible voice from heaven." From education, reason, or prejudice, we all generally adopt some criterion of truth, to which every proposition is brought. This was his criterion: and what must have been the feelings of this relentless persecutor, when the very evidence he required was vouchsafed to him—when He, the despised, the insulted, the crucified Jesus, in the glory of the Shechinah—from heaven itself—reproved the blindness of his zeal, and convinced him that the same Holy Being who had suffered on the cross, was the Angel Jehovah, the long-expected Messiah of the Jews! The simple words, "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest," how severely must they have penetrated and wounded the heart of this zealous offender! In a moment, he was overwhelmed and convicted of the excessive guilt of his conduct, and the majesty of the God of his fathers. The blindness that was inflicted upon him was typical of that spiritual darkness which was the cause and origin of his crime; it was a trial of his faith and repentance; and his recovery from it was intended to prove to him and to the world, that a man is in darkness and the shadow of death till he has received that true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. The scales which had concealed from his view the glorious light of the Gospel of Christ fell from his eyes—he saw and believed, and the Holy Ghost gave him power to discern spiritual things.

How fearfully will the sons of Israel mourn and lament, when this Holy Being shall again reveal himself from heaven in the glory of the Shechinah, and reprove them for their want of faith and hardness of heart! The history of St. Paul offers them the highest hopes and consolations; it shadows out to them the darkness of their spiritual state, the necessity of a baptism of repentance, and the forsaking of their former sins and errors, and the restoration of their sight. At his second coming the glory of Israel shall be made known unto them—their hearts shall be changed, and they shall look on him whom they have pierced.

Lord Barrington and Whitby are of opinion that St. Paul did not now see our Lord. The former derives his argument from the expression (ver. 5,) “Who art thou, Lord?” Whitby observes, that in the Old Testament men are often said to have seen the Lord, when they only saw the glory, the symbol of his presence (Exod. xxiv. 10–12. Deut. iv. 12, 15.), and that in the parallel accounts of his conversion in other parts of the Acts, St. Paul mentions only having seen the glory that shone round him, and not the person of our Lord. He adds, that if the words imply that the person of our Lord was seen, it must have rather been in the way than in the heavens. It would however be easy to show that the ancient Jews used the word שׁוֹרָה, which is here rendered δόξα, to express not only the glory which surrounded the Divine Personage, which appeared to the patriarchs, but also the Great Being himself; and it seems most probable that his countrymen would understand the expression in that sense. The general opinion, however, appears to be most correct, which affirms, that at this time the visible manifestation of the person of Christ was made to the Apostle. Witsius^b defends the general opinion with much skill and energy: Doddridge does the same. Macknight espouses the same side of the question: Saul, he observes, arose from the earth, and with his bodily eyes beheld Jesus standing in the way. We are absolutely certain, that on this or some other occasion, Saul saw Jesus with the eyes of his body; for he hath twice affirmed that he saw Jesus in that manner (1 Cor. ix. 1.), “Am I not an apostle? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?” (chap. xv. 8.) “Last of all (ἔσχατον καὶ ἔμμενον) he was seen of me also, as of an abortive apostle.”

Now it is to be observed, that this appearance of Jesus, Paul places among his other appearances to the rest of the apostles, which, without all doubt, were personal appearances. Besides, if Saul had not seen Jesus in the body, after his resurrection, he could not have been an apostle, whose chief business was, as an eyewitness, to bear testimony to the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. I acknowledge, that if we were to form our opinion of this matter solely upon the account which Luke hath given of it (Acts ix. 3–6.), we could not be sure that Saul now saw Jesus. Yet if we attend to the words of Ananias, both as recorded in this chap. ver. 17, “The Lord Jesus who appeared to thee (ὁ ὁφθεις σοι, who was seen of thee) in the way;” and as recorded Acts xxii. 14. “The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth:” also, if we consider the words of Christ, “I have appeared unto thee for this very purpose, to make thee a minister, and a witness of those things which thou hast seen;” and that Barnabas declared to the apostles, how he had seen the Lord in the way (Acts ix. 27.), I say when all these expressions are duly attended to, we shall have little doubt that Saul saw Jesus standing before him in the way (ver. 17.), when in obedience to his command he arose from the ground.

But not being able to endure the splendor of his appearance, or perhaps the better to express his reverence, he fell to the earth anew, and remained before him in that posture, till Christ ordered him to arise a second time, and go into the city, where it should be told him what he was to do, (Acts ix. 6.) Then it was that on opening his eyes he found himself absolutely blind. This I suppose is a better account of Saul’s seeing Jesus, after his resurrection, than with some to affirm, that he saw him in his trance in the temple, or in his rapture in the third heaven, for on neither of these occasions did Saul see Jesus with his bodily eyes; the impression at these times having been made upon his mind by the power of Christ, and not by means of his external senses, so that he would not have been qualified by such a vision to attest Christ’s resurrection from the dead. I know that Paul had another corporeal sight of Jesus, namely, after he had made his defence before the council, (Acts xxiii. 11.) But as the First Epistle to the Corinthians, in which Paul

Qua luce significabatur gloria apparentis Christi, quæst stella illa matutina, oriens ex alto, sol justitiæ, lux ad illuminationem gentium, et gloriam populi Israelitici; et qui se luce veluti amictu operit. In eâ luce, ipse se conspiciendum præbebat Jesus. Sic enim Paulo Ananias, Act. ix. 17. rursus xxii. 14. et Jesus ipse Act. xxvi. 13. ἐκ τούτου ὁφθεις σοι.—Witsii *Meletem. Leidens. de Vit. affirmed that he had seen the Lord, was written before he was favored with that second corporeal sight of Jesus, he cannot be thought in that Epistle to have spoken of an event which had not then taken place.

It cannot be necessary to discuss here the absurd hypothesis of Kuinoel, who endeavours to show that there was nothing miraculous in the conversion of St. Paul, whom he would represent as journeying to Damascus, thinking of the lesson of moderation taught him by Gamaliel, and of the arguments he might accidentally have heard in favor of the Messiahship of Christ, when sudden thunder in a clear day alarmed him, and he imagined that he heard a voice: the whole of the three several narratives in the New Testament of St. Paul's conversion overthrow this absurd theory. His sudden loss and recovery of sight, and the consequent communication of the Holy Spirit, by a person divinely appointed, were indisputable evidences as to the reality of the appearance that had befallen him on his way.

That St. Paul was neither a hypocrite, an enthusiast, nor a dupe, has been too admirably proved by Lord Lyttleton to require further illustration.

NOTE 61.—PART IX.

THE expression here used is supposed by some to be proverbial, signifying the injury and hurt they are likely to receive who resist superior power, more especially as relating to God. To confirm this opinion, many classical authors are referred to. Euripides in Bacch. 5. 794. Columella, De Re Rustica, 2. 2. 26, &c. and Pindar, Pyth. 2. 173, who asserts we must not contend against God, but bear the yoke he puts on our neck mildly, and not kick against the goads; that is, remarks the scholiast, not to fight against God, being only men. The great Bochart rejects the idea that the expression is derived from any other authority than that of Scripture itself. Moses uses it when he says Jeshurun waxed fat (et recalcitravit) and kicked against the Law (Deut. xxxii. 15.), and also God himself (1 Sam. ii. 29.), "why kick ye against my sacrifices?" The clause is retained in the Vulgate, the Arabic, Æthiopic, and Armenian versions, although it is not inserted in others, or in the Greek manuscripts. Griesbach likewise rejects it.

NOTE 62.—PART IX.

THIS verse bears the appearance of differing from the parallel passage, chap. xxii. 9., where it is said that the men that were with me heard not the voice. Dr. Hammond remarks, that the word φωνή signifies thunder, and he would reconcile the two texts by reading, "They that were with me heard the voice of the thunder, but heard not the voice of him that spake unto me." The word φωνή is often used in this sense in the Old Testament, Exod. ix. 23, 27, 33, 34. xx. 18. Ps. xviii. 13, &c.

In this verse the word seems to be used in the same sense as chap. ii. 2. (see the note in loc.) with reference to the thunder which usually accompanied the Bath Col, or Voice from heaven; in chap. xxii. 9. it more particularly relates to the Voice itself, which the attendants of St. Paul, in consequence of their alarm and confusion, did not hear, or if they did, without rightly understanding it.

Beza, Vatablus, and Clarius, think that the attendants heard Saul's voice, but not that of Christ. Dr. Benson, as ἀκούειν often signifies to understand, supposes these attendants were Hellenist Jews, who did not understand the Hebrew, which was the language in which Christ addressed Paul. Dr. Whitby and Dr. Doddridge that the Voice from heaven was taken for thunder.—Doddridge, vol. ii. p. 36.

For further solutions of the difficulty, see Wolfius, Curæ Phil. vol. ii. p. 1138. Lord Barington, Dr. Weston, and others, ap. Bowyer, and the commentators.

The Jews say that God three times spoke to Moses, Aaron being by and not hearing the voice; in Egypt, Exod. vi. 28.; in Mount Sinai, Num. iii. 1.; and in Levit. i. 1.

The same mode of expression is used in Schemoth Rabba, sect. ii. fol. 104. 3. in Exod. ii. 2., "The angel of the Lord appeared to him." Why is it thus said so expressly יְהוָה to him because other men were with him, but none of these saw any thing but Moses only. So also in Dan. x. 7.

NOTE 63.—PART IX.

HE lost his sight from the glory of that light.

Michaelis, in Richteri Chirurgischer Bibliothek, b. vi. p. 732, ap. Kuinoel, relates, that an African struck with lightning lost his sight, but recovered it suddenly.

In the Critici Sacri is a treatise on the blindness of St. Paul, considered in its origin, continuance, and cure.

Jortin remarks, that the miracle by which St. Paul was instructed and converted has been thought by some to be of the emblematic and prophetic kind, and to indicate the future calling of the Jews; so that Paul the persecutor, and Paul the apostle, was a type of his own nation.

St. Paul, though the apostle of the Gentiles, never cast off his care for his own brethren, and always expressed himself on that subject with the warmest affection; and he alone, of all the writers in the New Testament, hath spoken clearly of the restoration of the Jews; he earnestly wished for that happy day, and saw it afar off, and was glad. St. Paul was extremely zealous for the Law, and a persecutor of the Christians—so were the Jews.

St. Paul, for opposing Jesus Christ, was struck blind; but upon his repentance he received his sight—so were the Jews, for their rebellion, smitten with spiritual blindness, which shall be removed when they are received again into favor.

St. Paul was called miraculously, and by the glorious manifestation of Christ himself, and was instructed by the same Divine Master: such will perhaps be the conversion and the illumination of the Jews.

St. Paul was called the last of the apostles—the Jews will certainly enter late into the Church.

St. Paul was the most active, laborious, and successful of all the disciples: such perhaps the Jews also shall be after their conversion. But these are rather conjectures of what may be, than discoveries of what must come to pass^c.

NOTE 64.—PART IX.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON CONVERSION.

FROM the manner in which the conversion of St. Paul is related by St. Luke, many have been led to suppose that all those who are really Christians must receive and retain some sensible impression of their conversion; and consequently remember the exact time or moment in which it took place. Others again argue, that St. Paul was selected from the rest of mankind, as Abraham, Moses, the Prophets, and the Apostles were, for the especial purpose of promoting the designs of Providence in effecting the redemption of mankind; and therefore that it affords no sanction for the expectation of any sudden or miraculous conversion for others. Both parties insist with equal earnestness and sincerity in enforcing the doctrine of Scripture, that “without holiness no man shall see the Lord:” but one would look for conversion in some momentary operation of the Spirit of God, without any previous preparation in the heart or conduct of the individual; the other, on the contrary, would rather seek it in the study of the Scriptures, and in the due observance of the progressive and appointed means of grace which are given to all, as necessary to salvation, and which are always attended with the influences of the Holy Spirit.

The former, who believe that God more frequently impresses the mind by some sudden impulse, do not deny that it may sometimes happen, that individuals may be so educated and brought up, that they shall be sanctified from the womb. Thus the celebrated Annesley, the nonconformist divine, declared that he never remembered to have been converted. On the other side it is equally acknowledged, that it may please the same God who miraculously converted St. Paul, to impress in the most unexpected and peculiar manner the mind of any individual, at any time it may seem good to his Providence to do so. He would not, for instance, assert that it was impossible that Constantine beheld a cross, or that Colonel Gardiner heard a voice in the air, or any other circumstance of this nature^d; but his general belief is, that since the canon of Scripture has been completed, the sacraments are the effectual and divinely ordained means of grace by which the Holy Spirit is conveyed to man for his renovation; and that sufficient evidence is given to all men for their establishment in the faith, without any extraordinary or preternatural interference in their favor.

Christianity, it must ever be remembered, is not a system of theoretical opinions, but a system of positive institutions. If so, we may expect miracles at the establishment, but not in the continuance, of the dispensation. In one sense of the word every thing is a miracle, both in the natural and moral world. The growth of a plant is to us an unaccountable event; but we see that it is gradually brought to perfection, by the sun and rain from heaven—these are the appointed laws of nature. In the same way the divine influences of the Holy Spirit, by the appointed means of grace, gradually operate on the heart, till it brings forth the fruits of perfection, and the perfect man is formed. It is certain that the great Creator of the flower or the herb might by a word command them to grow either on the waves of the sea, or on the floor of a room, but as this would be deviating from established laws, we do not anticipate such an occurrence. In the same manner it is not generally to be expected that the Almighty Creator will depart from his own appointed means of salvation to effect the recovery of sinful man, who refuses to be nourished by the common blessings from on high. It is not now to be expected that the heavens will again open, the Shechinah appear, the Bath Col be heard, or the holy flame kindle on holy heads; these indisputable evidences of divine majesty, are reserved for the consummation of all things. In the mean time, God the Creator and Saviour, who provides for the lilies and the flowers of the field, has in his mercy ordained provision for the soul as well as the body of man—"My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed." Without the care and the labor of man the food for the body would be lost in the ground; without the use of the revealed means of grace, the fruits of the Holy Spirit would be looked for in vain. Break up therefore the fallow ground of your hearts (Hosea x. 12.) for it is time to seek the Lord, that the showers and the latter rain may not be withholden (Jer. iv. 3.)

The real question to be decided then is, Whether he is most right who expects the influences of the Spirit to be conveyed to him through the means of those solemn ordinances which God himself has ordained, gradually accomplishing that change of heart, without which spiritual happiness cannot be attained; or whether that opinion is to be preferred, which leads to the anticipation of some sudden impression producing the same effect independent of an humble attendance on the means of grace, in obedience to the divine will.

I am convinced, that if Christians who believe in the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, and the absolute necessity of inward holiness, from the influences of the Divine Spirit, as well as outward morality, were to examine impartially some controverted logomachies, they would not so much differ. If certain systematic words were not so frequently resorted to, there would be much less misapprehension and bitterness. Let us place this subject in more general propositions, and we shall then perceive how slight is the difference which divides these contending parties.

It will be acknowledged by all, that a due regard at least is necessary to external religion for the sake of its Author; but that this very regard to the divine ordinances, if it does not proceed from obedience and love to Him who ordained them, and faith in their spiritual effects and signification, becomes presumption and hypocrisy.

Man at his creation was made perfect; the spiritual triumphing over the inferior nature. When he fell, the earthly or animal nature predominated. As his descendants we are made partakers of the same earthly and animal nature—we are born with it—its existence constitutes our original sin, and we are subject to its everlasting penalties.

The system of revelation is the plan for restoring man to God, by renewing within him that spiritual nature which he lost by the fall of his first parent.

The manner in which this important object is to be accomplished has ever been the same. It is faith in the atonement of one Redeemer, the manifested God of the patriarchs, Jews, and Christians, producing holiness of life.

The manner in which this faith is made effectual has ever been the same. Outward means of grace were instituted from the moment of the expulsion from paradise. Where these external ordinances have been observed through faith, and in compliance with the revealed will of God, his influences have uniformly been imparted, and a spiritual change of heart imperceptibly and gradually accomplished.

The Spirit of God however is not confined to means. The Omnipotence of God is not limited to the measures he has himself revealed or ordained. It is impossible therefore not to believe that the death of a friend or relative, a lingering illness, or any other affliction or circumstance, may not, through divine grace, be made the instrument of salvation, and turn our hearts from this world to serve the living God. But few will hesitate to join with me in the conclusion, that the divine blessing is to be more generally found in those significant and solemn institutions, which The Way—The Truth—and The Life Himself appointed.

This is not the place to enter further into this controversy. The ancient fathers, the reformers in general, and the Church of England make the commencement of our acceptance with God (by whatever name, conversion or regeneration, we may call it) to begin with baptism; and affirm that the influences of the Holy Spirit continue with the Christian through life, to renovate him when he falls, to preserve him in temptation, and to support him in death, unless those influences are quenched by wilful, repeated, deliberate, and persevering sin. This system, which makes our Christian life begin with certain feelings in maturer years, makes the question concerning baptism so very important. The reëstablishment of the ancient union among believers, depends on our estimate of the benefits attendant on that first and most solemnly commanded ordinance—whether it is merely an useful rite, or an appointed means of grace;—or, as it is defined in the Church Catechism, an outward sign of an inward grace. The system which refuses to confine the beginning of our Christian life to baptism, is thus described by a once distinguished writer—"Regeneration has its degrees. Its first step is contrition, and that softening of the heart by which a man is brought to a sense of sin and misery; and under the influence of which he earnestly desires deliverance. The second is a knowledge of Christ, by which whoever is convinced of the sufficiency of Christ to deliver him, denies himself, and flies to Christ, and by a living faith is united to him, and with a filial confidence of deliverance depends upon him; and a filial love towards God is kindled in his heart, by the power of which he serves God with unfeigned obedience, and a holy life. The first step is called the spirit of bondage, and it is properly the effect of the Law; the second is the spirit of adoption, and it is the proper effect of the Gospel^e." The learned writer then proceeds to illustrate this hypothesis by the instance of Cornelius. I think it is evident, that the Scriptures of truth no where command us to have this train of feelings to become acceptable to God. Faith and obedience,—or faith, obedience, and repentance are required: and it is impossible, in general, for the Christian who has been baptized, and has received a religious education, and knows God from his infancy, to say when he begins to have faith, and to have become acceptable to his Maker. Few men can pass through life without many feelings of sorrow for sin, of humility before God, of desire to become more holy. No human being can declare himself spotless before his Creator. But all these emotions are the result of our knowledge of God, and his Son, which are given us by the means of grace; and they proceed from the Holy Spirit which attends them. They are common to all men at all ages; they are experienced by children at the first dawn of reason, and by the aged at the close of life.

Since the Scripture and the means of grace have been given, I believe that all pretensions of this nature are very dubious; though I dare not say that the Father of the spirits of men may not visibly communicate his will to some favored individuals, when he pleases. I believe only, that he has not done so; because the Law of Christ is sufficient to guide any of his creatures to future happiness. Dr. Doddridge relates the anecdote of Colonel Gardiner, as if the circumstance might possibly have been the vivid suggestion of his own mind. The hour was midnight—he was confused with intemperance—the cause of his watchfulness was criminal—he had received a religious education; and the silence and solitude, and the possible reproaches of his conscience led him to some associations of ideas respecting the crucified Saviour, whom he had forgotten. At such a moment he saw, or thought he saw, the cross in the air, and heard the appeal of the imagined figure before him. This appears to me to be the natural result of those laws of mind which God has given to every man. These natural reflections were made the means of grace; for the impression was never erased from his mind. The Spirit of God "prevented him, and put into his mind good desires;" and the consistency of his subsequent life proved that He, who giveth grace to man, was present at the hour of temptation. But it would be the most intolerable presumption, that any man should delay repentance till his mind was affected in a similar manner.

^e "Habet regeneratio suos gradus. Primus gradus est contritio et emollitio cordis, quâ quis adigitur ad sensum peccati et miserię; quo sensu gravatus sitit et esurit liberationem. Secundus gradus est, agnitio Christi, quâ quis de sufficientiâ Christi ad liberandum convictus, seipsum abnegat et ad Christum confugit, eique vivâ fiduciâ cordis inseritur, et cum filiali fiduciâ liberationis in ipsum recumbit, et filialis in Deum amor in corde ejus accenditur, cujus ductu et impulsu servit Deo ingenuâ obedientiâ et novâ vitâ. Primus gradus vocari solet spiritus servitutis, et est proprië effectus legis: posterior spiritus adoptionis, et est proprië effectus Evangelii. Fieri potest ut Cornelius habuerit primum gradum regenerationis, scil. ut fuerit contritus corde et onustus sensu miserię, sitiensque gratiam, eamque quærens; sed non novit veram viam inveniendi et verum medium quærendi, sed sine dubio eam quæsit per propria opera et honestam vitam; quæ tamen opera Deus propter veram contritionem cordis non aspernatus, sed se iis moveri passus est, ad dandos majores regenerationis gradus ad salutem necessarios. Non enim est contra sanam theologiam, quod primitiæ gratiæ regenerantis bene usurpatæ sint causæ impetrantes gratiam majorem. Habenti enim dabitur ut abundantius habeat, Matt. xiii. 12. Moralibus virtutibus, quibus homo seipsum ab aliis per liberum arbitrium naturale nonnihil discernit, nullis promissionibus alligata est gratia regenerationis salvifica: sed initiis gratiæ regenerantis bene usurpatis est alligata, Joh. vii. 17. Et præcipue contritum cor habet magnas promissiones, Psal. li. 19. Isa. lvii. 15." Stres. apud Cradock's Apostolical Harmony, p. 59.

With respect to the cross of Constantine, I subjoin the criticism of Jortin; and I am inclined to agree with this eminent divine, that there was possibly no miracle in this case also; though the result of the victory was most important, as it decided whether Christianity should become the religion of the Roman empire. "A. D. 311, Constantine being disposed to protect and embrace Christianity, which his father had greatly favored, and about to fight Maxentius, prayed to God for his assistance. As he was marching, he saw in the afternoon, in the sky over the sun, a shining cross, with this inscription (τοῦτω νίκα) joined to it. The sight astonished him, and the army which accompanied him. This he related to Eusebius with his own mouth, and swore to the truth of it at a time when many of the soldiers were living." "Ἀμφὶ μεσημβρινὰς ἡλίου ὄρας, ἤδη τῆς ἡμέρας ἀποκλινομένης, αὐτοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς ἰδεῖν ἔφη ἐν αὐτῷ ὀρεαντῷ ὑπερκείμενον τοῦ ἡλίου σταυρὸν τροπαίων ἐκ φωτὸς συνιστάμενον, γραφὴν τε αὐτῷ συνῆσθαι, λέγουσαν, τοῦτω νίκα. Horis diei meridianis, sole in occasum vergente, crucis tropæum in cælo ex luce conflatum, soli superpositum, ipsis oculis se vidisse affirmavit, cum hujusmodi inscriptione: Hac vince."—Euseb. Vit. Const. l. 28. Concerning this story there have been these opposite opinions—That it was a miracle wrought in favor of Constantine and of Christianity: that it was a pious fraud, a mere stratagem of Constantine's, to animate his soldiers, and to engage the Christians firmly on his side. Fabricius, as an honorarius arbiter, comes between both, and allows the fact, but rejects the miracle. Bibl. Gr. 6. 8. "There is," says he, "a natural appearance, a 'solar halo,' which sometimes represents a lucid cross, and this is so rarely seen, that it is no wonder if Constantine and they who beheld it with him accounted it miraculous, especially at that juncture. If this were no miracle, yet it tended to the service of Christianity, and to bring about the great revolution that then happened. There are in historians, ancient and modern, and in the Philosophical Transactions, descriptions of such phenomena, and also of lucid circles or crowns, accompanying them. Fabricius gives an account and a representation of some. Thus far all goes well enough; but the great difficulty is the inscription (τοῦτο νικα), for which Fabricius offers this solution, that γραφή means a 'picture,' as well as a 'writing,' and that λέγειν, when applied to a picture or image, means, 'to denote,' or 'imply,' and that the words of Constantine and Eusebius may be thus interpreted, that by this he should conquer; which image was a lucid crown, a representation or symbol of victory. To this I add, that Eusebius, by not using the words στοιχεῖα, or γράμματα, nor mentioning in what language it was written, seems to speak rather of an emblem or picture, than of a writing. Add to this, that in the standard which Constantine ordered to be made in the form of a cross, in memory of this omen, he placed a crown of gold and jewels on the top of it, and a cypher denoting the name of Christ, but not the words τοῦτο νικα. Euseb. Vit. Const. 1. 31. Amongst the Panegyrici Veteres, the eighth is in praise of Constantine, and celebrates his victory over Maxentius, but says not a word of the cross. The author of this panegyric was a pagan. The ninth also, composed by Mazarius, is silent concerning this prodigy. One of the panegyrists speaks of a last omen, by which he might mean the cross. See Tillemont, H. des Empires, 4. 632. Not. But, after all, it seems rather more natural to interpret γραφήν λέγουσαν of a writing, than of a picture."

NOTE 65.—PART IX.

THE word כלי was commonly used by the Jews to denote either man or woman. St. Peter calls the woman the weaker vessel. St. Paul, alluding to the preachers of the Gospel, observes, "We have this treasure in earthen vessels." Schoetgen quotes the book Zohar on Exod. on Ruth ii. 9.

אלין אינן צדיקיא דאקין כלי יהוה — "the iust are here understood, who are called the instruments or vessels of the Lord."—Schoetgen. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 446.

NOTE 66.—PART IX.

ST. PAUL, in Gal. 1. 16, 17., speaking of his conversion, writes, "Immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood, but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus." Pearson argues from this, that he did not preach in the synagogues at Damascus till after the three years which he passed in Arabia. Michaelis, on the contrary, would connect ver. 20 with 19, on account of the word ἐνθὺς, which word by Dr. Wells is referred to the return of St. Paul to Damascus. He thinks the passages are to be paraphrased thus:—"After he had received meat he was strengthened." Presently after which (according to Gal. i. 16.) he went into Arabia, and having been there instructed in the Gospel, by the revelation of Jesus Christ (Gal. i. 12.), he returned again to Damascus. "Then," or "now," was St. Paul certain days with the disciples at Damascus, and straightway (namely, after his return out of Arabia) he preached Christ in the synagogues^f.

Schleusner is of opinion that the word συμβάζων is to be understood before this clause. See, on the full meaning of this word, Kuinoel, Schleusner, and others.

Biscoe sufficiently shows that St. Paul, as a rabbi, or authorized teacher of the people, was privileged to preach in all synagogues wherever he went.

St. Luke has not noticed this journey; and as St. Paul has merely mentioned it in his Epistle to the Galatians, without relating any thing that he then did, we cannot speak of it with any degree of certainty. St. Jerome has determined that the Apostle did not exercise any ministerial function, and he supposes that by a dispensation, unknown to us, or by an express command of God, he remained silent (Gal. i. 12.)^g. It is very likely that it was in this retreat that he acquired by the reading of the Sacred Writings, and by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, the knowledge that he afterwards displayed. It is further to be observed, that there had been in Arabia Petræa, where St. Paul had retired, a sect of "Jewish Christians," which Epiphanius calls Sampseans^h. They adhered in all things to the Jews. There were some of them who abstained from eating the "forbidden animals." This was a sect of Esseansⁱ, who had embraced Christianity, but who appeared to have only the name of Christians; they studied the Law of Moses, and were remarkable for their hospitality, and simplicity of life and manners.

NOTE 67.—PART IX.

IN 2 Cor. xi. 32. St. Paul mentions as the cause of this stratagem, that the governor of Aretas kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison for the purpose of apprehending him.

Damascus in Syria had been reduced to a Roman province by Pompey the Great, after the war with Mithridates. A difficulty therefore arises, how could Aretas, king of Arabia, be in possession of Damascus and appoint an ethnarch? In the last year of Tiberius, Aretas had waged war with, and defeated Herod Antipas, for the injury he had done to his wife, the daughter of Aretas. Herod, enraged at his defeat, appealed to Tiberius, who commanded Vitellius, the governor of Syria, to attack Aretas, and send him dead or alive to Tiberius. Vitellius prepared to obey, but marched his troops back to their winter quarters, on receiving intelligence, while he was at Jerusalem, of the death of the emperor. At this interval Aretas made an irruption into Syria, and took Damascus, and kept possession of it for some time.

NOTE 68.—PART IX.

THE war between Herod and Aretas, the little communication between distant cities, the seclusion of St. Paul in Arabia, the agitation of the Jews on account of the death of Tiberius, the deposition of Caiaphas by Vitellius, as well perhaps as the desire the priests would naturally feel to suppress the account of the failure of their decree against the Christians of Damascus—sufficiently explain why the apostles at Jerusalem were ignorant of St. Paul's miraculous conversion, till it was announced to them by Barnabas.

The commentators suppose that St. Paul, during his present sojourn at Jerusalem while praying in the temple, fell into that ecstasy or trance mentioned Acts xxii. 17–21. Hales^j translates the word ἐξαποστείλω, “I will send thee forth as an extra apostle to the remote Gentiles, selecting thee, ἐξαγορεύμενος σε, from the people of the Jews, and from the Gentiles, to whom (the latter) I am now going to send thee forth, νῦν ἀποστέλλω, to turn them from darkness unto light, and from the jurisdiction of Satan unto God, in order that they might receive remission of sins, and an allotment among those that are sanctified by faith toward me.”

NOTE 69.—PART IX.

I SHALL here take the opportunity of observing to the Jew who may disbelieve that Jesus of Nazareth was the true and expected Messiah, that the declarations of the New Testament are not only supported by miracles of the same, or of greater, extent and wonder than those of Moses (which I have attempted to show in a former note) but that every testimony which demonstrated the truth of the Mosaic dispensation was vouchsafed in support of the Christian revelation also.—If miraculous gifts were imparted to the Sanhedrin, on its first establishment (Num. xi. 25.), they were likewise granted at the early meeting of the infant Church of Christ, as a pledge of the presence of his Holy Spirit.—Were ecstasies and visions permitted to the prophets of the olden Church, so likewise were they in the apostolic age. St. Paul had his vision in the temple; and again the Lord appeared to him and comforted him, (Acts xxiii. 11.) To St. Peter a sheet descended from heaven for the purpose of unfolding to him the great truth that the Gentiles also were to be made partakers of the Gospel blessings.—If a superhuman knowledge of God and of the invisible world be an internal proof of the inspiration of the writers of the Old Testament, which of these can bear any comparison with the discoveries of the unseen state revealed in the transfiguration, when the bodies of men were seen as they will appear in glory at the last great day—or in the resurrection of our Lord, when the same body assumed new and mysterious properties—when angels were its guardians, and the bodies of the dead arose? Have any of the inspired anticipations of the old prophets exceeded those of St. Paul, who was exalted to a state where he heard things which it was not lawful for man to utter? or have they equalled the more glowing and sublime representations of the Apocalypse, when the beloved disciple, wrapt in the highest visions, describes the perfection of the spiritual temple, and the removal of the curse from mankind?—Did the Urim and Thummim mysteriously communicate the will of God to the suppliant priest? Christ himself hath spoken to us in the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and has committed to us the lively oracles.—Was the voice from the mercy-seat heard by the privileged lawgiver of Israel? Did it whisper in Eden, or speak in thunder at Sinai? Was it heard by Elijah in the wilderness, or by Daniel in Babylon? So also did it thrill into the ears of the priests and the people in the temple, carrying conviction to the inquiring Greeks. It proclaimed, at the baptism of Christ, from the mercy-seat of heaven, “This is my beloved Son.” It arrested the persecuting Saul, breathing out vengeance and slaughter.—Were the angels of heaven the visitors of Abraham at his tent, or of Jacob at Mahanaim? So were they also the glorious ambassadors from heaven, announcing the advent of the Prince of Peace, the promised Messiah.—Was the prophet the discerner of spirits, when he inquired of his servant, “Went not mine heart with thee, when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee?” So likewise did Peter penetrate into the deepest recesses of that covetous heart, which he declared to be in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity.—Was Gehazi struck with leprosy? So also was Elymas with blindness, and Ananias with instant death.—Did Moses foretell the eventual dispersion of Israel nearly two thousand years before it took place? So also do the apostles of the New Testament unanimously predict their future union and reëstablishment in the Holy Land.—Did the Prophet Elisha raise to life the son of the widowed friend of his poverty and persecution? So also did the Apostle St. Peter bid Tabitha arise; and restored from the dead the benefactress of the poor and destitute.—These facts rest on the same species of evidence, and were given for the confirmation of one common system of divine truth, to demonstrate the beautiful harmony that pervades the two covenants, and to convince both Jew and Gentile that the God of both their dispensations is the same God, neither ought his children to be any longer divided.

If the mission of Christ was not confirmed by such stupendous judgments as those which Moses inflicted, when the earth opened and swallowed up Dathan and his coadjutors and all their company, and they went down alive, and the people fled at the cry of them; or by such judgments as caused that equally fearful exclamation, “If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven to consume thee,” and the fire descended—it must be remembered, that the new dispensation was one of mercy—that our Saviour came to seek and to save those that were lost—and that his whole object was to remove the curse of sin, and all its attendant afflictions, diseases, and miseries. His apostles inflicted death on two individuals only for the unpardonable crime of sin against the Holy Ghost; they demonstrated their power in a manner more consistent with the dispensation they were commissioned to establish, by relieving the infirmities and sicknesses of men, and redeeming them from him who had the power of death, that is, the devil.

NOTE 70.—PART IX.

THE trade of a tanner was esteemed by the Jews so contemptible that all those who followed it were required to mention the same before their marriage, under the penalty of the nuptials becoming void.¹ It is recorded in the Mishna, that after the death of a man whose brother exercised the trade of a tanner, the wise men of Sidon decided, that the widow of the deceased was permitted to decline intermarrying with that brother.

This custom explains to us the probable reason why the Evangelist might have been so particular in relating so apparently a trivial circumstance, as the lodgings of the apostle. St. Peter took up his abode with the most mean and despised of his own countrymen, although at this time, without divine interposition, he would have refused to preach to Cornelius, an honorable Gentile.—See Schoetgen, vol. i. p. 447.

See various ordinances among the Jews, ap. Wetstein in loc., expressive of contempt for the occupation of a tanner.

NOTE 71.—PART IX.

DR. LARDNER, contrary to the decision of the generality of commentators, has endeavoured to show that the rest, or peace, or prosperity, which the Church now enjoyed was not to be attributed to the conversion of St. Paul, but to the effects produced among the Jews by the command of Caligula, which directed the statue to be placed in the temple of Jerusalem.—See Lardner's Credibility, vol. i. p. 97–100, and Hales' Chronology, vol. ii. part ii. p. 1191.

NOTE 72.—PART IX.

ON THE STATE OF THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH, AND ON THE APOSTOLIC OFFICE.

WE have now proceeded through the history of the Church of Christ during the time that it consisted only of Jewish converts. We have witnessed the appeal of the merciful Saviour of the world to his chosen people, in the wonderful operations of the Holy Spirit. But the veil was still upon their eyes, and although the Jewish converts may be considered as the first fruits of the Christian Church, yet the Sanhedrin, the leaders of the people, and by far the greater part of the nation still persisted in their blind rejection of Him “to whom gave all the prophets witness.”

At this period the infant Church presented to the world wherever they were scattered, whether in Jerusalem or in the provinces, the interesting spectacle of unbroken “unity and godly love.” There were no controversies, no heart-burnings, no mutual jealousies, to disturb that holy calm, the fruit of righteousness; they obeyed to the utmost that new commandment given to them, “Love one another.” When any occasion of dissatisfaction occurred, such for instance as the complaints of the Grecians on account of their widows, the wound was immediately healed, and the commands of their appointed heads were respected and obeyed. They were one fold under one shepherd. They continued steadfast in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, in frequent celebration of the communion, and in thanksgiving and prayers. They were united in doctrine, practice, and discipline, the three great and only preservatives of real unity and true piety among men.

I. The articles of their doctrine may be easily summed up—They believed that Jesus was Lord and Christ, that is, that he was the Divine Personage, the manifested God of the patriarchs, the true Messiah, Acts ii. 36.—They believed in the necessity of repentance for the crucifixion of the Prince of Life, and of conversion from Judaism to Christianity, as well as from sin to holiness, Acts iii. 38.—the resurrection of Christ, Acts ii. 31.—the elevation of Christ till the time of the restitution of all things, Acts iii. 21.—that Christ was the prophet like unto Moses, Acts iii. 22.—the (eventual) overthrow of the Jewish dispensation, Acts vi. 14. and as we find also from the speech of St. Stephen—the doctrine of the atonement of Christ, Acts viii. 32–35.—and salvation to man by Christ alone; for “there is no other name given under heaven, whereby we can be saved.” That they believed in the necessity of personal holiness, and of the influences of the Holy Spirit, is evident from the manifestations of the Spirit, under which they so immediately lived, and which, on every fit occasion, they imparted, (see Acts iii. 26.) These were the articles of their faith, established on the facts related in the Gospels, of whose truth they must have been convinced from the testimony of eye-witnesses. The great majority of Christians in all countries, however they may have added to the simplicity of the Christian Creed, believe in these, the fundamental and essential doctrines of their faith. But this agreement, which ought to have been a sacred bond of union among Christians, has not protected them from those various divisions and controversies which make the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme.

The twelve articles of the Apostles' Creed may be collected from the teaching of St. Peter in the first chapters of the book of the Acts. (See Bishop Pearson's divisions.)

I. I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, Acts iv. 24.

II. And in Jesus Christ, his only Son our Lord, Acts ii. 38.

III. Which was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, Acts i. 14.

IV. Suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, Acts iii. 13. and iv. 27.

V. He descended into hell: the third day he arose again from the dead, Acts ii. 27, 31. and iii. 15. and iv. 33.

VI. He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God, the Father Almighty, Acts iii. 13, 21. and v. 31.

VII. From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead, Acts iii. 21.

VIII. I believe in the Holy Ghost, Acts ii. 38. and v. 32.

IX. The holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, Acts i. 8. and ii. 39. and iii. 26.

X. The forgiveness of sins, Acts ii. 38. and v. 31.

XI. The resurrection of the body—(this is implied in the resurrection of Christ, see Art. V.)

XII. And the life everlasting. This is implied in the belief in the ascension—see Art. VI.

II. The practice or religious conduct of the Church of Jerusalem was consonant with their knowledge. Personal religion was the criterion of their faith. They were in frequent communion. Their prayers were many—their adherence to the doctrines of the apostles was steadfast—their boundless liberality was founded upon its most acceptable source, self-denial and the sacrifice of the things of the flesh—their motive was the will of God. Peace and joy in God, love to each other, personal holiness, and consequent happiness, characterized this holy communion, and Paradise seemed again restored to this favored portion of mankind. Since this golden age has no Christian Church been so perfect or so prosperous. Never, it is to be feared, will the same felicity be revived till that millennial period, which the wise and good have always anticipated in that petition, “Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven;” when the curse of sin shall be removed from the earth, and the nations shall become the inheritance of the anointed of God; and the uttermost parts of the earth shall be his possession*.

* Vitringa gives a beautiful description of the union of the Church at Jerusalem: “Primæ Ecclesiæ Christianæ, Deo per præconium Christi atque Apostolorum et copiosam distributionem donorum Spiritus Sancti lucem à tenebris producente, formosa erat et splendidissima facies. Omnia, ut vere solent, ridebant. Doctrinæ suæ constabant castimonia. Nihil in cultu, nihil in sacratissimis religionis symbolis adulterinum; regiminis forma optima et ecclesiæ indoli convenientissima. Disciplinæ vigeat exercitium incorruptæ. Diaboli adversus ecclesiam ferocientis impetus ætenuis à Deo cohibebantur, ut per satellites suos, principes mundanos, cursum Evangelii non sufflamen atterit. Hæreticis nullus adhuc dum in ecclesia locus. Et, quod optimum et maximum et post doctrinæ sinceritatem præcipuam in ecclesia considerationem meretur, excelebat divina illa credentium ævi apostolici societas, quibuslibet virtutibus Christianis, et perfusa erat largo imbri donorum Spiritus Sancti. Hic conspicua erant fides illibata, vegeta, corroborata, omnia tentans, omnia potens, zelus pro divina gloria et caussa Christi Regis ardentissimus, nulla metuens pericula, nullis languescens malis; charitas rara, inaudita, et quasi supergressa limites lege præscriptos; gratissima animorum concordia, juncta simplicitate, omnes de malo suspiciones excludenti; mansuetudo, benignitas, humilitas, et quæ

III. The union and happiness which were so eminently enjoyed by the Church of Jerusalem, under the government of the apostles, must have been materially promoted by the observance of one system of discipline. The Church of the Jews established by Moses was one religious society, comprising the whole nation. When the same God, who had given the Mosaic Law, imparted the new dispensation to his chosen people, the first object of Christianity seems to have been, to continue to preserve the whole nation as one religious society. For this purpose they were for many years publicly appealed to, by the teaching, miracles, and fulfilment of the prophecies by our Lord. They were next appealed to by the apostles, and their attempts were also fruitless. Then only it was, that the nation of the Jews, considered as a people in their corporate capacity, represented by their senate and legislature, rejected the God of their fathers. The exertions of the apostles were next directed to save as many of their nation as would believe from the errors of their blinded countrymen, to become the founders of that new religious society which was to be extended among all nations. The especial providence of God preserved from dissensions the infant Church thus composed, till the period of its more ample enlargement arrived. The converts at Jerusalem, therefore, were so confirmed in the truth of their creed, and were so perfectly governed by their apostolical rulers, that when the period of their dispersion came, they carried an uncorrupted and an uncontroverted faith over the world. And as every society must be governed by some authority, they would have taken with them that plan of polity, which the apostles would have established. The question, therefore, of the mode of Church government observed by the apostles becomes interesting and important, as it will point out to us that plan by which the Christian Church was intended to continue as one religious society: for as the Jews were thus united as one Church into one religious society, so it was designed that the whole world should become one holy and catholic Church, of which each nation should become a separate branch.

In all inquiries of this nature, it is our first duty to refer to facts before we proceed to inferences. These are recorded in the nine first chapters of the Acts, and from them certain inferences have been deduced.

An apostle was elected from among the brethren to fill the place of Judas—we infer therefore that the apostolic office was superior to that of the disciples.

The persons who sold their lands for the benefit of the poor placed the proceeds at the disposal of the apostles.—It has been inferred, therefore, that the apostles not only directed the general concerns of the Church, but ordered even the management of the contributions. The primitive Church believed, from this instance, that the benefactions of the members of a Church, for religious purposes, should be consigned to the charge of the governors and rulers of those Churches, and not be distributed at the caprice or pleasure of private individuals.

The election of deacons has been already considered. They were chosen from among the people, presented to the apostles, and appointed to the service for which they were required, after they had been approved by the twelve.—The primitive Church has uniformly considered the election of the seven deacons and their appointment by the apostles, to be the right mode of ordination among Christians for ever. The conduct of Christ and his holy apostles, the men who were moved by the Spirit of God, was believed to be as binding among Christians as the institutions of the Law of Moses were obligatory among the Jews.

After the death of Stephen, the great body of the Church, as has been before observed, was dispersed all around Jerusalem. The apostles alone continued in that city; and we read, in consequence of the great success of Philip the deacon and evangelist in Samaria, the twelve sent down two of their number to impart to the new converts the gift of the Holy Ghost. Whether this was done merely to strengthen the new converts—or to confirm them in the usual sense of that word—or to ordain elders for the purpose of supplying the incipient congregations—or to bestow the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, (for all these have been inferred,) it is not necessary to decide. The important fact is certain; the ministerial function was controlled and subject to a superior ecclesiastical authority, which was demonstrated by the fulfilling of more solemn duties than subordinate preachers were empowered to perform. Christian teachers exercised government over other Christian teachers, and likewise over their converts, without either the permission or the interference of the people. And from the recorded fact, we are justified in concluding that this system of ecclesiastical discipline was uniformly observed by the apostles, and, as such, must be the best model for their successors.

Before the Gentiles, or the Proselytes of the Gate, were invited to become members of the Christian Church, St. Paul was miraculously converted. Three years after which he preached Christ in the synagogues, apparently without either the sanction of an apostle, or the request of the people. This illustrious convert, although he cannot be admitted as a general example, had also authority for what he did. He was (as Biscoe, On the Acts, p. 271, has proved) an ordained elder, doctor, or teacher, among the Jews, and possessed the privilege of preaching in the synagogues. In addition to this human ordination, he was miraculously filled with the Holy Ghost as a qualification for his high office. He was set apart by the Divine Head of the Church himself, who appeared to him from heaven, and commissioned him to go to the Gentiles.

We are now brought to the most important part of the subject—the nature of the authority which was thus exercised by one class of Christian teachers over both the other teachers, and the first converts; or, in other words, of what nature was the apostolic office, and what kind of government therefore is to be exercised in the Christian Church? It will appear, from the united testimony of the Scripture itself, and the authority of some of the most learned theologians who have adorned the Christian world, yet who have been adverse to the episcopal regimen, that the word apostle was well known among the Jews, and that it denoted an officer of high influence and authority, who exercised a delegated power over the ministers and people of separate and distant congregations.

Though the Jews were dispersed throughout the world at the time of our Lord, their numerous congregations were under the control of the high priest and Sanhedrin; and the persons who were sent by them were called their apostles. While every separate congregation was governed by its own rulers of the synagogue, or councils of ten, or three, or twenty-three, the whole Jewish Church, through all its departments, was subject to the authority of the heads of the Church at Jerusalem, and the Romans protected the Jews in exercising the right of governing their own countrymen^l. The Jews, therefore, were accustomed to submit to the control of the Sanhedrin, and would not, when converted to Christianity, object to a continuance of that form of government to which they had thus submitted. We will, however, consider the word in all its significations.

I. The word apostle, ἀπόστολος, says the learned Witsius, literally signifies one who is sent forth. It was used among the Greeks for the word—

II. Πρεσβεύς ἀποστελλόμενος, μεσίτης ειρήνης ἔνεκα, i. e. an ambassador, one sent forth, a mediator to make or establish peace.

III. More especially, ὁ στρατηγὸς κατὰ πλοῦν πεμπόμενος, the leader sent on a naval expedition.—Hesychius.

IV. Νυμφαγωγός, one sent to bring the bride to the house of her husband.—Phavorinus.

In all which senses it is singularly descriptive of the office of the apostles—they were ministers of peace, and commanders of that great expedition which was directed to the isles of the sea, and to the Gentile world; which in Scripture is frequently represented under the emblem of the sea. It was their high office also to present the Christian Church as a chaste virgin to Christ.

In Hebrew, the word ἀπόστολος, or apostle, corresponds to the titles מלאך, שלוח, or שליח. מלאך is frequently used, not only of angels, but of prophets and priests, Hag. i. 13. Mal. ii. 7. In this sense St. Paul calls Christ the apostle of our profession (adding the word ἀρχιερεύς), τῆς δυνάμεως ἡμῶν —of our, that is, the Christian profession, in opposition to the high priest of the Jews.

It corresponds also to the word שלוח. The Jews had their שליח צבור or קהל, ἀπόστολους τῆς ἐκκλησίας, who brought the decrees of the high priest to the synagogues at Jerusalem, and the tithes and victims to the priests, and principally collected for the temple service the tribute of the half-shekel, which was required by the Law of Moses from the whole population. The word, in this sense, was adopted in the Christian Church. It was more especially used to denote the ambassadors and assistants of the patriarchs of the Jews^m.

Dein collapsis Judæorum rebus retenta tamen in synagoga vox, 'Απόστολων, est; talesque signate dicebantur, qui patriarchæ assessores et legati erant, ejusque ἐγκύκλια, γράμματα, circulares literas ad synagogas deferrebat pecuniis per capita colligendis, speciatim auro coronario, coronæ scilicet patriarchali ornandæ, quod loco didragmi exigebant patriarchæ in partibus tam orientis, quam occidentis."—Wits. Melet. Leid. p. 22.

In the Jerusalem Talmud (Sanhed. fol. 18. col. 4.) we are presented with the form of the letters which were issued by the Sanhedrin; from which we learn that the expression "to the brethren," was in common use, and referred to the Jews, whether priests or not, who had authority in the provinces; and to whom the Sanhedrin gave the power to put its decrees in force. It must however be observed, says Lightfootⁿ, that it was not the awe of the power of the Sanhedrin, so much as the innate ambition of the Jews to continue as one people, which made them obedient. And the letters therefore which St. Paul received from the Sanhedrin to the brethren at Damascus, we must suppose not to be imperative, but declarative and persuasive. This remark of Lightfoot is no doubt correct; and it proves the point under discussion: that authority was exercised over the synagogues of the Jews, and that the persons who were deputed to exercise it were called apostles: and, we may add too, that the same desire of union among themselves, which induced the foreign Jews to submit to the jurisdiction of their high priest and Sanhedrin, ought to be a prevailing motive to union among Christians.

"The word apostle," says Mosheim^o, "it is well known, signifies a legate, an ambassador, a person entrusted with a particular mission. The propriety, therefore, with which this appellation was bestowed by Christ on those friends whom he thought proper to select for the propagation of his religion throughout the world is manifest ⁿ Schoetgen. Horæ Hebraicæ, vol. i. 937, who has added this also to his quotations. "Sie ex Nedarim apud R. Samuel Ben David, חסד שמואל, הני כהני שלוחי דירן הם או שלוחי דרר, חסדא, num sacerdotes apostoli proprie an vero apostoli Dei? Quid inde vero? resp. Si dicimus, eos esse apostolos propriâ auctoritate venientes, non necesse est, ut sacerdos sit justus. Si vero dicimus, eos esse apostolos Dei, necesse est, ut justi sint."

^o "Convenit præterea quoad vim significationis cum titulo שלוח צבור, nomen Ἀπόστολος τῆς ἐκκλησίας, Legatus ecclesiæ, quod Paulus bis, nisi fallor, adhibuit in epistolis suis, an quoad usum, dubium.—Imo in ecclesiis Christianis nulli fuerunt legati cætus ad Deum præter Episcopos et Presbyteros, vel præter presbyteriorum præsides. Clerus antiquissimæ ecclesiæ Christianæ constitit tantum presbyteris et diaconis. Legati ecclesiarum, quales in synagogis mediæ erant inter præfectos et diaconos, in ecclesiâ Christianâ nulli fuerunt, tum quia officium legati ecclesiæ (שלוח צבור) ut plurimum in antiquis synagogis non fuit statum et solenne, sed quibusvis viris in synagogâ honoratoribus et rerum sacrarum peritis liberè commissum, tum quia ille precandi actus, qui a legatis ecclesiæ in synagogâ præstabatur proprie ab ipsis synagogæ præfectis præstandus erat, et haud dubie in multis synagogis, ubi doctorum copia non aderat, exercitus est. Cum igitur in primis ecclesiis Christianis omnia quam simplicissimo modo composita fuerint, opus non erat extraordinariis ejusmodi precandi ad Deum legatis, sed præstabat omnino ut hic actus a præside presbyterii seu a legato tam presbyterii quam ecclesiæ totius, perageretur."—Vitringa, De Synag. Veter. lib. iii. pars 2. p. 912.

from this its common acceptation. But the reader will perhaps discover a peculiar force in this term; and more readily perceive the motives which probably induced our Saviour to apply it to those whom he sent forth, when he is informed, that, in the age of which we are now treating, this appellation was appropriated to certain public officers of great credit and authority amongst the Jews, who were the confidential ministers of the high priest, and consulted with by him on occasions of the highest moment. They were also occasionally invested with particular powers, and despatched on missions of importance, principally to such of their countrymen as lived in foreign parts. The collection of the yearly tribute to the temple, which all the Jews were bound to pay, was likewise entrusted to their management; as were also several other affairs of no small consequence. For since all Jews, however widely they might be dispersed throughout the various regions of the world, considered themselves as belonging to one and the same family or commonwealth, of which the high priest residing at Jerusalem was the prefect and head; and as the members of every inferior synagogue, however distant or remote, looked up to Jerusalem as the mother and chief seat of their religion, and referred all abstruse or difficult matters, and any controversies and questions of moment respecting divine subjects, to the decision of the high priest, it was absolutely necessary that this supreme pontiff should always have near him a number of persons of fidelity, learning, and authority, of whose services he might avail himself in communicating his mandates and decrees to those Jews who were settled in distant parts, and in arranging and determining the various points referred to him for decision."

The learned writer then goes on to show the great probability that the officers who were thus entrusted with this delegated authority were called apostles. In the first place, St. Paul himself evidently intimates such to have been the case in the opening of his Epistle to the Galatians, when he terms himself an apostle, not ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων, "of men," nor δι' ἀνθρώπων, "by men," but of God himself, and his Son Jesus Christ, Gal. i. 1. What necessity could there be that this inspired writer should thus accurately define the nature of his commission, and so particularly mark the distinction between himself and an apostle invested with mere human authority, if the Jews, to whom that Epistle is principally addressed, had been strangers to that other kind of apostles commissioned by men, namely, apostles sent by the Jewish high priest and magistrates to the different cities of the Roman empire? This interpretation was long since given to the words of the apostle by St. Jerome, Comm. ad Galatas, tom. ix. opp. p. 124. edit. Francof. "Usque hodie," says he, "à patriarchis Judæ-orum apostolis mitti (constat): ad distinctionem itaque eorum qui mittuntur ab hominibus, et sui qui sit missus a Christo, tale sumpsit exordium: 'Paulus apostolus, non ab hominibus, neque per hominem.'" These words of St. Jerome, who resided in Palestine, and was every way skilled in Jewish affairs, must necessarily be allowed to weigh strongly in favor of the above statement respecting the apostles of the high priest. The meaning they convey indisputably is, that, in the time of St. Paul, it was the practice of the Jewish high priest to send forth apostles, after the same manner as the Jewish patriarchs were accustomed to do at the time he (St. Jerome) wrote: and there appears to be no reason whatever which should induce us to question the credibility of what is thus said. But let us return to the words of St. Paul, in which there is something worthy of remark, which, if my memory does not fail me, says Mosheim, has never hitherto attracted the attention of any commentator. St. Paul says, that he is an apostle, not of men, neither by man. He therefore clearly divides human apostles into two classes; viz. those who were commissioned merely by one man, and those who were invested with their powers by several. Now what does this mean? Who are these men, and who that single man, who, in St. Paul's time, were accustomed to send amongst the Jews certain persons, whom it was usual to distinguish by the appellation of apostles? The single man of whom Paul alludes, could, I conceive, have been none other than the great high priest of the Jews; and the several men, who had also their apostles, were unquestionably the archontes, or Jewish magistrates. The learned well knew that justice was administered to the Jews who dwelt in the different provinces of the Roman empire by certain magistrates, or vicegerents of the high priest, who were termed, after the Greek, archontes, concerning whom a curious and elegant little work was published by Wesseling, Ad Inscript. Beren. Traject. ad Rhēn. 1738, in 8vo. I take the meaning, therefore, of St. Paul to be, that he neither derived his commission from those inferior magistrates, to whom the Jews who dwelt without the limits of Palestine were subjects, nor was he delegated by the chief of their religion, the high priest himself. That these archontes had under them certain ministers, who were termed apostles, much in the same way as the high priest had, is clear from Eusebius, who says—"Ἀποστόλους δὲ εἰσέτι καὶ νῦν ἔθος ἐστὶν Ἰουδαίους ὁρμάζειν τοὺς τὰ ἐγκύκλιον γραμματεῖα παρὰ τῶν ἈΡΧΟΝΤΩΝ αὐτῶν ἐπικουζομένους. Apostolos etiam nunc Judæi eos appellare solent qui archontum suorum litteras circumquaque deportare solent."—Comment. in Esaiam, cap. 18. in Montfauconii Collectione nova Patr. Græcor. tom. ii. p. 424.

Mosheim goes on to prove, that the aversion of the Jews to Christianity must have prevented them from borrowing this title from the Christian Church. As the high priest had probably twelve apostles, to correspond with the number of the tribes, he supposes our Lord appointed twelve also, in allusion to the same. This however is uncertain^p.

The learned Vitringa^q, who had endeavoured to identify the officers of the Christian Church entirely with those of the synagogue, writes, that he is doubtful of the meaning of the words ἐπίσκοποι. I cannot suspect this eminent theologian of disingenuousness, or I should be inclined to suppose that his ignorance in the present instance could be accounted for in no other way; for he expresses himself on other occasions with sufficient decision. St. Paul, in two passages of his Epistles (2 Cor. viii. 23. and Phil. ii. 25.), decidedly applies the expression "Apostles of the Churches," to Epaphroditus and Titus, both of whom, ecclesiastical history informs us, were bishops. Vitringa (p. 913) would apply the term exclusively to the collectors of the money provided by the Churches for the necessities of their members; and to this sense it is also limited by Witsius, Benson, Doddridge, and the divines in general who object to that form of Church government which existed in the early ages of Christianity. It is certain the office of the apostle embraced with this other duties of a much higher and important nature: and these several duties, with the high authority attached to them, must be included in our definition of the office of an apostle.

Bishop Taylor has placed this part of the subject in its proper light. Now these men were not called Ἀπόστολοι, messengers, in respect of these Churches sending them with their contributions:—1. Because they are not called the Apostles of these Churches, to wit, whose alms they carried; but simply Ἐκκλησιῶν, of the Churches, viz. of their own of which they were bishops. For if the title of apostle had related to their mission from these Churches, it is unimaginable that there should be no term of relation expressed. 2. It is very clear that although they did indeed carry the benevolence of the several Churches, yet St. Paul, not those Churches, sent them: "And we have sent them with our brother," &c. 3. They are called Apostles of the Churches, not going from Corinth with the money, but before they came thither, from whence they were to be despatched in legation to Jerusalem: "If any inquire of Titus, or the brethren, they are the apostles of the Church, and the glory of Christ." So they were apostles before they went to Corinth, not for their being employed in the transportation of their charity^r.

Vitringa proceeds further to assert, in the most positive manner, that there were not in the Christian Churches any ambassadors of this nature; and that the only ministers were bishops and presbyters, which were the same, and deacons. It is most true that there were no officers in the synagogue itself bearing the title of apostle, and confined exclusively to the performing of the religious service of one particular synagogue; and it is the very point which I have been endeavouring to establish, and on which the whole question depends. There were, however, among the Jews, officers of this name, whose duty it was to superintend the synagogues at the command of the high priest; in allusion to which, it is highly probable that Christ, our Great High Priest, distinguished his chosen disciples by the same appellation when he invested them with a similar power of superintendence over their converts; implying that those whom he had appointed should have the same influence and authority over his Churches, as the apostles of the high priest and Sanhedrin possessed over the synagogues. The apostles of Christ were not ministers of single congregations; the apostles of the high priest did not confine themselves to the superintendence of one synagogue. The jurisdiction of both extended over countries and districts. As the necessity of government for the new societies made the apostolic office essential in the period when the Church was most pure, so is a similar power of government and superintendence essential at present. It has always been required; and we find accordingly, though the name of apostle was discontinued with the twelve and St. Paul, that the power of ordaining, confirming, and governing, was preserved in the purer ages of our faith, before the papacy usurped upon the primitive episcopacy; or the foreign reformers rejected the latter, in their eager and justifiable abhorrence of the former.

Vitringa, however, acknowledges, in another place^s, that the Sanhedrin sent out persons with ample powers to superintend the synagogues out of the precincts of the Holy Land.

St. Paul calls Christ the Apostle and High Priest of our (i. e. the Christian) profession, (Heb. iii. 1.) He was an apostle, as having received a delegated authority from God over his worshippers; for we read, God anointed him to preach the Gospel to the poor. He was the High Priest, as he himself sent out apostles, with the same delegated authority as he had received over his Christian Churches. His own words are, "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you."

That the Sanhedrin, about the time of our Lord's incarnation, possessed and exerted the Augustus, hearing that the first-fruits were neglected, wrote to the governors of the provinces in Asia to permit the Jews to assemble for banqueting; for that these were not assemblies of drunkenness and debauchery (alluding plainly to the ἑνδομοί, forbidden in the decree of Caius Cæsar), to cause riots and disturbance, but were schools of sobriety and righteousness; of men studying virtue, and bringing in their yearly first-fruits, of which they offer sacrifices, sending holy messengers to the temple at Jerusalem. Then he commanded that none should hinder the Jews from assembling, contributing their money, or sending to Jerusalem after their country manner. Then follows a letter of Norbanus, containing an epistle of Augustus to him, "That the Jews, wherever they are, should, according to their ancient custom, meet together, bring in their money, and send it to Jerusalem."—Ibid. p. 1035, D. "The Jews, wherever they are, by an ancient custom, are wont to bring their money together, and to send it to Jerusalem: let them do this without hindrance." In consequence hereof, Norbanus wrote to the Sardians (Jos. ibid. § 6.) and Ephesians, that whoever should steal the sacred money of the Jews and fly to an asylum, should be taken from thence and delivered to the Jews, (in order to be prosecuted and punished.) in the same manner as sacrilegious persons were to be dragged from all asylums. Jos. Antiq. l. xvi. c. 6. § 4. He sent also to the magistrates of Cyrene, putting them in mind that Augustus had wrote to Flavius, the prætor of Lybia, and to others, who had the care of that province, that the Jews might send their sacred money to Jerusalem without let or hindrance; commanding the Cyrenians to restore what had been stopped, or taken away from the Jews under pretence of tribute, and to prevent the like hindrance for the future. Ibid. sect. 5. privilege of sending out apostles is amply demonstrated by several Roman laws. The Jews were allowed, says Mr. Biscoe, to meet to pay their first-fruits, and to send them, together with whatever money they pleased, to Jerusalem for offerings, and to appoint proper officers to carry it. They were suffered also to determine all disputes and controversies among themselves in a judicial way. They were not only thus indulged in the use of their own customs and laws, but, what is much more, if any laws of the country, where they inhabited, interfered with their customs, they were dispensed with, and not obliged to comply with those laws. Thus, for instance, they were dispensed with in not attending courts of judicature, or giving bail on their Sabbaths or feast-days.

Thus may it be sufficient to show, that when the Gospel was preached to the Church, while it consisted of Jewish converts only, the authority which was exercised by the apostles was not a new thing, nor inconsistent with the manners and customs of the people under their former Mosaic discipline. The same principle of government was adhered to, that order, unity, and faith might still prevail. But instead of the persecuting letters and the armed bands, which were the credentials of the apostles of the former economy, the chosen apostles of the Legislator of a better dispensation were known by the influences of the Spirit, by holiness, purity, patience, and love. They were armed only with the power of truth and miracles, and they proclaimed the Messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth, and the glad tidings of salvation to all mankind. The Spirit of God attended, with its visible influences, the outward means of grace; the Christian priesthood and the Christian people were united in one faith and one discipline; the religion of the heart, which alone is spiritual and efficacious, was preserved by a steadfast adherence to the prescribed rites and forms of the apostolic Church; for the primitive Christians believed that He who gave the wine of the kingdom to man provided also the earthen vessels by which its spirit was preserved.

PART X.

NOTE 1.—PART X.

ON THE PROSELYTES.

In the arrangement of this part of the present work, it will be perceived that I have adopted, in opposition to the authority of Drs. Lardner, Doddridge, and Hales, the opinion of Lord Barrington and Dr. Benson, that the Gospel was preached to the Proselytes of the Gate before it was addressed to the idolatrous Gentiles. That the whole controversy may be fully and explicitly placed before the theological student, I shall submit to him the generally-received opinion respecting the Proselytes, on which Lord Barrington's hypothesis is grounded, and Dr. Lardner's objections, with the manner in which those objections may be removed. It will then be necessary to enter into the various reasons and authorities by which the opinion of Lord Barrington is supported and corroborated. Prideaux^a gives the following account of the supposed different classes of Proselytes. He states, there were two sorts of Proselytes among the Jews. 1st. The Proselytes of the Gate. 2d. The Proselytes of Justice (righteousness). The former they obliged only to renounce idolatry, and worship God according to the law of nature, which they reduced to seven articles, called by them the Seven Precepts of the Sons of Noah. To these they held all men were obliged to conform, but not so as to the Law of Moses. For this they reckoned as a law made only for their nation, and not for the whole world. As to the rest of mankind, if they kept the law of nature, and observed the precepts above mentioned, they held that they performed all that God required of them, and would by this service render themselves as acceptable to him, as the Jews by theirs; and therefore they allowed all such to live with them in their land, and from hence they were called גֵּרִים הוֹשֵׁב, i. e. Sojourning Proselytes, and for the same reason they were called also גֵּרֵי שַׁעַר, i. e. Proselytes of the Gate, as being permitted to dwell with those of Israel within the same gates.

The occasion of this name seems to be taken from these words in the fourth commandment,—"Nor thy stranger that is within thy gates;" which may as well be rendered, "Thy proselyte that is within thy gates;" that is, the Proselytes of the Gate, that dwell with thee. For the Hebrew word ger, which signifies a stranger, signifieth also a proselyte, and both in this place and in the fourth commandment denote the same thing. For no strangers were permitted to dwell within their gates, unless they renounced idolatry, and were proselyted so far as to the observance of the seven precepts of the sons of Noah. Though they were slaves taken in war, they were not permitted to live with them within any of the gates of Jerusalem on any other terms; but, on their refusal thus far to comply, were either given up to the sword, or sold to some foreign people. And as those who were thus far made proselytes were admitted to dwell with them, so also were they admitted into the temple, there to worship God; but were not allowed to enter any farther than into the outer court, called the court of the Gentiles. For into the inner courts, which were within the enclosure, called the chel, none were admitted but only such as were thorough professors of the whole Jewish religion. And therefore, when any of these sojourning proselytes came into the temple, they always worshipped in the court. And of this sort of proselytes, Naaman the Syrian, and Cornelius the centurion are held to have been.

The other sort of proselytes, called the Proselytes of Justice, were such as took on them the observance of the whole Jewish law. For although the Jews did not hold this necessary for such as were not of this nation, yet they refused none, but gladly received all who would embrace their religion; and they are remarked in our Saviour's time to have been very sedulous in their endeavours to make converts, and when any were thus proselyted to the Jewish religion, they were initiated to it by baptism, sacrifice, and circumcision, and thenceforth were admitted to all the rites, ceremonies, and privileges that were used by the natural Jews.

It was on this generally-received opinion that Lord Barrington^b framed his hypothesis, which demonstrates, beyond a doubt, the separate manner in which the Jews, the devout Gentiles, or Proselytes of the Gate, were severally converted to the Christian faith. The holy Gospel, like the grain of mustard seed, was of gradual development, and progressively revealed to the world. We have already seen that the Gospel was first preached to the Jews, and that the first Christian Church was established at Jerusalem. The period in which the Gospel was confined to the Jews, and Proselytes of Righteousness, who enjoyed all the privileges of the former, is supposed to commence, according to Lord Barrington, at the year 29, and end in the year 41. The second period, when the Gospel was preached to the Proselytes of the Gate, begins at the year 41 to 45. The third, when it was preached to the idolatrous Gentiles, is from the year 45 to the year 70, which brings us to the end of the Jewish age, and the destruction of the Jewish state and nation, which implied the abolition of the Law of Moses, relieved the Jews and the Proselytes of the Gate from their adherence to those Laws, and consequently destroyed the distinction of the three periods; all men being then bound only to the faith and obedience of the Gospel, and a subjection to the laws of those countries in which they respectively resided. The more minute divisions of the noble author it will not be necessary to notice, as they appear to me less corroborated than the others, and are not referred to in the present arrangement.

Dr. Lardner's proposition, in reply to this hypothesis of three divisions, is—There was but one sort of proselytes^c.

He then proceeds to describe them by the usual characteristics universally acknowledged to belong to Proselytes of Righteousness—they were called "Strangers, or Proselytes within the gate," and "Sojourners," as they were allowed to dwell or sojourn among the people of Israel. They were so called because they could not possess land; the whole of Canaan being, by the Law of Moses, appropriated to the twelve tribes only.

1. In defence of this hypothesis, Dr. Lardner quotes Exod. xii. 48. Lev. xvii. 8. Num. ix. 14. and xv. 15, 16., all of which ordain a perfect similarity between the Israelite and the sojourning stranger.—Answer: These passages appear to prove that there were certain proselytes, or sojourners, who were not, however, permitted to partake of the Passover, or offer sacrifice, unless they were circumcised.

2. He is of opinion, that no strangers, but those who thus conformed implicitly to the Law of Moses, were permitted to dwell in Canaan; with the exception of travellers or mercantile aliens, whose abode, however, was not to be considered permanent.—Answer: This is assuming the point to be proved.

3. Dr. Lardner supposes that Eph. ii. 13. contains an allusion to the custom of receiving strangers as perfect proselytes in the Jewish commonwealth.—Answer: This may be, but the general opinion that there were two kinds of proselytes is not thereby overthrown.

4. The word proselyte, Dr. Lardner observes, is of Greek origin, equivalent to stranger, long since become a technical word, denoting a convert to the Jewish religion, or a Jew by religion.—Answer: It exactly corresponds to the Hebrew word נָכַר, which means stranger and convert.

5. They are called, in the fourth commandment, "thy stranger within thy gates."—Answer: This passage is quoted by Prideaux (Conn. vol. iii. p. 436) to prove the opposite opinion.

6. The Jews, agreeably to the Law of Moses, reckoned there were only three sorts of men in the world: Israelites, called also home-born, or natives; strangers within their gates; and aliens—or otherwise there were but two sorts of men, circumcised and uncircumcised, Jews and Gentiles, or Heathens.—Answer: The Proselytes of Righteousness were always considered as naturalized Jews, and enjoyed all the privileges as such—or it may be otherwise answered, that the strangers within the gate might refer to the two kinds of proselytes.

^b Preface to the Miscell. Sac. p. xiv. &c.

^c Lardner's Works, Hamilton's 4to. edition, p. 393.

7. Dr. Lardner next asserts, that the word proselyte was always understood in the sense which he gives to it by ancient Christian writers. In support of his argument he adduces the authority of Bede, Theodoret, Enthymius, and Christian Druthmar, who all define a proselyte as one who, being of Gentile original, had embraced circumcision and Judaism: and that the notion of two sorts of proselytes cannot be found in any Christian writer before the fourteenth century, or later.—Answer: We have the internal evidence of Scripture in our favor. The best Jewish writer, Maimonides, mentions them, as well as other Jewish records.

8. Cornelius is not called a proselyte in the New Testament.—Answer: But he is described by those characteristics attributed to Proselytes of the Gate.

9. The apostle refused to preach the Gospel to Cornelius, because he was uncircumcised, (Acts xi. 3).—Answer: The Proselyte of the Gate, like every other uncircumcised Gentile, was regarded as polluted and unclean. Lightfoot, who calls the Proselytes of the Gate, Sojourning Strangers, observes, from the Jerus. Jebamoth, fol. 8, col. 4, that a sojourning stranger was as a Gentile to all purposes.

10. The apostles were commissioned to preach the Gospel in "Jerusalem, in all Judæa, in Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth." In these, and all other places, one and the same character comprehends all Gentiles.—Answer: There seems to be a striking difference between the commission of St. Peter, who was more particularly the apostle of the circumcision, and the commission of St. Paul, who was the chosen vessel of Christ, to bear the testimony of the Gospel to the Gentiles (Acts ix. 15.) The words "I will send thee far hence to the Gentiles" (Acts xxii. 21.), demonstrates the nature of his appointment, and the character of those nations he was commanded to visit, which were beyond dispute idolatrous. St. Peter, to whom the keys of the kingdom of heaven had been committed (Matt. xvi. 19.), is peculiarly employed for the admission of the devout Gentiles; and the conversion of Cornelius has ever been considered as the first fruits of the Gentiles, in whom they were all typically cleansed and sanctified. If, however, St. Peter had been generally sent to the Gentiles, why was St. Paul so miraculously set apart for that purpose?

11. Dr. Lardner gives this remark of Suetonius, speaking of St. Paul's vision of the sheet, "God thereby showed unto his servant, that henceforward he would have all the people of the world, without exception, called to partake in his gracious covenant in his Son Jesus Christ, and to the knowledge of salvation by him." It was so understood by the primitive Christians, the apostles, and evangelists.—Answer: Granted: but this by no means opposes a gradual conversion, but seems rather to corroborate it. Providence, in all his dealings with man, has ever observed a progressive system; the divine dispensations have been always gradually unfolded. Although the apostles were commanded to evangelize all nations, it appears they did not comprehend the full extent of their mission: a vision was necessary to convince St. Peter that it was lawful for him to converse with, or to preach the Gospel to, an uncircumcised Gentile. This vision established the divine intention, that the Gentiles should all be admitted into the Christian Church; and after the prejudices and scruples of this zealous Apostle had, by the intervention of Almighty power, been overcome, and a devout Gentile had been received into the Christian Church, St. Paul, by a similar intervention, by a trance in the temple, obtained his commission to teach and to preach to the distant and idolatrous Gentiles. The vision of the sheet demonstrated the conversion of the heathen world, and it must have acted as an encouragement to St. Paul, who was made the chief instrument of its accomplishment.

Dr. Lardner, in another volume, adduces similar arguments against this hypothesis, which do not, however, appear more satisfactory.

Dr. Lardner then proceeds to argue against the opinion of Lord Barrington and Dr. Benson, that the conversion of the idolatrous Gentiles was unknown to the Church at Jerusalem. As I have not espoused this part of the theory of these two eminent theologians, it is not necessary to enter further into the question. Dr. Lardner, however, has omitted to mention (what appears to me the principal objection), that it would have been impossible to have concealed the circumstance of the conversion of the Gentiles, as the Jews went up yearly from the provinces to Jerusalem, and some of them must have known, and would, without doubt, have communicated the exertions of St. Paul.

Josephus⁷⁰ tells us that all the worshippers of God, from every part of the world, sent presents to the temple at Jerusalem. His expression is the same as that which is used in Scripture⁷¹, ⁷⁰ Ant. 1. 14. vii. ap. Lardner, vol. v. p. 501.

which Dr. Lardner arbitrarily interprets as referring to the Proselytes of Righteousness: and he would render the word σεβόμενοι by "Worshippers," or "Proselytes of Righteousness" only—πάντων τῶν κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην Ἰουδαίων, καὶ σεβομένων τὸν Θεόν.

But when we consider the very extensive manner in which the word σεβόμενοι is used in the New Testament, it is not reasonable to confine it to this very limited sense: in addition to which there is an evident distinction made in different parts of the Acts between the Jews (the Proselytes of Righteousness being always considered as such), and the devout persons by whatever name they were distinguished.—See Acts xvii. 4. 17. and xiii. 43, 50.

Doddridge principally objects to the theory of two sorts of proselytes on the same grounds as Dr. Lardner, whose arguments he strenuously supports in opposition to those of Barrington and Benson.

In his note on Acts xi. 20. he would refer the word Ἑλληνιστῆς to the idolatrous as well as to the believing or devout Gentiles.

Dr. Hales^y has professed himself to be convinced by the arguments of Dr. Lardner and Doddridge. Among the many eminent authorities who agree in the opinion which I have adopted, that there were two sorts of proselytes, may be ranked Selden^z, Witsius^a, and Spencer, who defends this side of the question at great length, in his De Legibus Hebræorum. Michaelis^b justly observes, whoever also acknowledged the revealed religion of the Jews to be divine, was not according to it under the least obligation to be circumcised. This is a point which is very often misunderstood, from circumcision being always represented as a sacrament equivalent to baptism, and from its being inferred without any authority from the Bible, and merely from that arbitrary notion, that since the time of Abraham, circumcision became universally necessary to eternal happiness.

Moses has nowhere given any command, nor even so much as an exhortation, inculcating the duty of circumcision upon any person not a descendant or slave of Abraham, or of his descendants, unless he wished to partake of the Passover: and in the more ancient ordinance relative to it, mention is made only of Abraham's posterity and servants, (Gen. xvii.) In none of the historical books of the Old Testament do we anywhere find the smallest trace of circumcision being necessary to the salvation of foreigners, who acknowledged the true God, or requisite even to the confession of their faith; no, not so much as in the detailed story of Naaman (2 Kings v.); in which, indeed, every circumstance rather indicates, that the circumcision of that illustrious personage can never be supposed. In later times, indeed, long after the Babylonish captivity, there arose among the Jews a set of irrational zealots, with whom the Apostle Paul has a great deal to do in his Epistles, and who insisted on the circumcision even of heathens, as necessary to salvation. But they were opposed not only by the Apostle, but also even before his time, and without any view to Christianity, by other temperate but strictly religious Jews.

Vitringa^c acknowledges the distinction.

of talmudical knowledge, agree with Lord Barrington, and have collected many testimonies to prove the same point.

In the Critici Sacri, vol. i. p. 155, sect. 14, are two dissertations by John Frischinuthius, On the Seven Precepts of Noah, who endeavours to prove that there were two sorts of proselytes. He quotes the words of Maimonides, upon which alone, as Dr. Lardner supposes, the whole question originated^j. We learn from these treatises, that Deut. xiv. 21. was interpreted of the Proselytes of the Gate, by R. Mose Bar. Nachman, p. 156, sect. xx.; while others of the ancients considered it as referring to the Proselytes of Justice. Kimchi says it denoted both, or either; and this seems the most probable opinion. The question, indeed, seems never to have been doubted till Lardner proposed his objections to Lord Barrington's hypothesis, which, as we have now seen, is corroborated by the best and most learned authorities.

It is certain that in the time of the apostles there were a large class of persons who were neither Jews nor idolatrous Gentiles, and who, if they were not called Proselytes of the Gate, and received among the Jews in that capacity, were at least worshippers of the one true God—observed the hours of prayer—gave alms, and built synagogues, because they desired to please God—they must have been known, esteemed, and beloved by the Jews for their actions, although they refused to associate with them, because they were uncircumcised and Gentiles. After the Gospel had been made known to the Jews and Samaritans, to whom could the blessings of the new dispensation with more evident propriety have been revealed than to those devout Gentiles who worshipped the God of Israel, and devoted themselves and their wealth to his service?

God has ever imparted his spiritual knowledge to men, in proportion to their purity and holiness of life—"He that doeth my will shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." The fulness of time for the admission of the Gentiles into the Church, as revealed long before by the prophets, had now arrived. The wall of partition was now broken down, and the devout Gentiles, as a pledge or an earnest of the approaching conversion of the whole heathen world, were admitted even into the holy place, the sanctuary of their God.

The beautiful prayer of Solomon, on the dedication of the temple, is another strong evidence in support of the hypothesis of different sorts of proselytes. Dean Graves^k remarks, "We find the principle here stated, publicly and solemnly recognized: 'Moreover, concerning a stranger that is not of thy people Israel, but cometh out of a far country for thy name's sake; (for they shall hear of thy great name, and of thy strong hand, and of thy stretched-out arm;) when he shall come and pray towards this house; hear Thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to Thee for: that all people of the earth may know thy name to fear thee, as do thy people Israel; and that they may know that this house, which I have builded, is called by thy name.' And again, at the conclusion of this devout address, the monarch prays, 'Let these my words, wherewith I have made supplication before the LORD, be nigh unto the LORD our God day and night, that he maintain the cause of his servant, and the cause of his people Israel at all times, as the matter shall require; that all the people of the earth may know that the LORD is God, and that there is none else.' In this remarkable passage, which is the more decisive as it contains a solemn recognition of the principles and objects of the Jewish law, proceeding from the highest human authority, and sanctioned by the immediate approbation of God, whose glory filled the house of the Lord, during this solemn supplication, we perceive it is clearly laid down not only that the Jewish scheme was adapted and designed to make 'all the people of the earth know that the LORD was God, and that there was none else;' but also that the stranger from the remotest region, who should be led to believe in and to worship the true God, was not only permitted, but called and encouraged to pray towards the temple at Jerusalem, to join in the devotions of the chosen people of God, and equally with them hope for the divine favor, and the acceptance of his prayers, without becoming a citizen of the Jewish state, or submitting to the yoke of the Mosaic ritual or civil law. For the words of Solomon evidently suppose, that the stranger, whom he describes as thus supplicating God, remained as he had originally been, 'not of the people of Israel.'"

From 2 Chron. ii. 17. it appears, Solomon found in Israel strangers of such a rank of life as were fit to be employed in assisting to build the temple, 153,600. These (as the commentators agree, vide Poli Synopsis, and Patrick) were proselytes to the worship of the true God, and the observance of the moral law, though not circumcised. Patrick observes, "These were the relics (as Kimchi thinks) of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, mentioned afterwards chap. viii. 7. But they were not idolators, for then David would not have suffered them to dwell in the land. But they worshipped God alone, though they did not embrace the Jewish religion wholly, by being circumcised. These David had numbered, that he might know their strength and their condition, which did not proceed from such vanity as moved him to number his own people; but out of a prudent care that they might be distinguished from Jews, and be employed in such work as he did not think fit to put upon the Israelites."

The institution of the Mosaic Law which admitted the Gentile proselytes into a part of the temple, called from this circumstance the Court of the Gentiles, may be adduced as another conclusive argument to prove the truth of this proposition. They were admitted to show that they had not been forsaken by their Merciful Creator, but that all those who would forsake idolatry should be taken into covenant with him as well as the Jews.

The constant predictions of their prophets of the eventual reception of the Gentiles ought to have removed the strong prejudices and objections of the Jews on this subject.

NOTE 2.—PART X.

IN that admirable collection of tracts which compose the thirteenth volume of the Crilici Sacri, the reader will find a dissertation on the vision of St. Peter by Bernard Duysing. The whole of this discussion is well worthy of perusal. After examining many critical points, he gives the following explanation of the principal circumstances of the Apostle's vision.

The word σκεῦος, vessel, which corresponds with the Hebrew כֵּל, denotes every kind of vessel, and it is interpreted therefore by the word ὀθόνη, sheet, or any thing woven from flax. Camerarius would render the word ὀθόνη by mappa, a table napkin—Daniel Heinsius, by a shepherd's bag, or sack, in which they were accustomed to put food, platters, or trenchers, and other things.

The sheet was full of fourfooted and wild beasts, creeping things, or reptiles, and fowls of the air. Duysing is of opinion that every thing which is included in these various descriptions was unclean: and he strongly objects to the opinion of Hammond, that the clean and the unclean were here blended together. St. Peter was commanded, from the animals before him, to slay, and sacrifice, and eat. If they had been mingled together, as Hammond supposes, the Apostle might have selected a proper victim, and his answer would not have been correct. If it be said the clean animals were rendered unclean by contact, the Levitical Law (Lev. xi.) teaches us that it was the dead body, and not the living body, that rendered unclean what was otherwise pure. The whole object of the vision was to enforce on the mind of the Apostle a new doctrine, which related to the Gentiles only, and not to the Jews and Gentiles together.

It was a type of the Christian Church, separated from the world, which included every kind of people.

It was bound at the four corners, signifying that the whole world should be received into the universal Church of Christ; and it corresponded with the four horns of the altar, and the oxen that supported the brazen sea, which were turned to the four quarters of the heavens.

It was not without design that the sheet descended from heaven, in the same manner, as the new Jerusalem is represented in the Apocalypse. The Church, though it exists in the world, is not of the world; it is of celestial origin. It is a kingdom which is opposed to the kingdoms of this world, which are uniformly described as wild beasts rising out of the earth, or out of the sea, aspiring to attain to heaven. Like its remarkable type, the tower of Babel, which inverts the natural order of things, the false Church has its foundation on earth, and in vain attempts to reach to heaven. For every one who considers the subject will acknowledge that the laws to be observed in the Church must proceed from God, and ought not to be planned by man under any plausible reason whatever.

The drawing back of the sheet to heaven was designed to teach us, that the Church which has its origin from heaven will return victorious thither. In this representation the condition of the believing Gentiles is described: they were now about to constitute one Church with the believing Jews, and were to be made with them partakers of the heavenly inheritance.

The vision of St. Peter is considered in the same manner by Jones of Nayland. "This act of grace," he observes, "in the divine economy, was signified to St. Peter, by a new licence to feed upon unclean beasts. Peter could not have entered the house of Cornelius according to the Mosaic Law, which he had always observed, because it commanded the Jews to keep themselves separate from heathens in their conversation; as in their diet they abstained from unclean beasts. But when God had mercy upon all, and the Jew and Gentile became one fold in Christ Jesus, then this distinction was set aside." Mr. Jones thus explains the vision:—"The living creatures of all kinds which were presented to St. Peter were the people of all nations; the linen sheet which contained them signified their sanctification by the Gospel; and it was knit at four corners to show that they were gathered together from the four quarters of the world, and brought into the Church." He further observes—"The heathens were taken into the Church on condition that they should put off their savage manners, as the unclean creatures had before put off their natures and became tame, when they were admitted into the ark of Noah, a figure of the Church. This change was again to happen under the Gospel; and the prophet foretells the conversion of the heathens under the figure of a miraculous change in the natures of wild beasts. See Isaiah xi. 6. The moral or spirit of this law is as much in force as ever."

Commentators generally translate the words θῦσον καὶ φάγε (v. 13.), "sacrifice and eat," rather than "kill and eat." Adam Clarke observes—"Though this verb is sometimes used to signify the slaying of animals for food, yet, as the proper notion is to slay for the purpose of sacrifice, it appears to be better to preserve that meaning here. Animals that were offered in sacrifice were considered as given to God: and when he received the life, the flesh was given to those who offered the sacrifice, that they might feed upon it: and every sacrifice had in it the nature of a covenant, and covenants were usually made by eating together of the flesh of the sacrifice offered on the occasion; God being supposed to be invisibly present with them, and partaking of the feast. The spirit of the heavenly direction seems to be this:—The middle wall of partition is now to be pulled down; the Jews and Gentiles are called to become one flock, under one Shepherd and Bishop of souls. Thou, Peter, shalt open the door of faith to the Gentiles, and be also the minister of the circumcision. Rise up; already a blessed sacrifice is prepared: go and offer it to God, and let thy soul feed on the fruits of his mercy and goodness, in thus showing his gracious design of saving both Jews and Gentiles by Christ crucified."

Duysing thus defines the trance or ecstasy which St. Peter fell into. "Per ἔκστασον, secundum H. Stephanum ab ἐξίσταμαι dictam, intelligamus mentis quasi dimotionem ex statu suo naturali, per quem animæ cum corpore commercium, sensuumque usus ad tempus ita suspenditur, ut homo illorum ope nihil extra se positum percipere possit, sed totâ mente in imagines intus objectas convertatur."—See Critici Sacri, vol. xiii. p. 610-620. Jones's Works, vol. iii. p. 44, 45. Clarke in loc.

NOTE 3.—PART X.

THERE is no name given under heaven, by which men can be saved, but the name of Jesus Christ. This is the truth which has been confirmed by miracles, prophecy, and other most incontrovertible evidence. So amply has this truth been demonstrated, that no speculations or theories of our reason, which clash with it, can be received; however plausible the arguments on which they may rest. Without this belief, our religion is degraded into a fine system of morality, and one half of the Scripture is useless and unmeaning.

Some freethinkers have grafted a dangerous error upon this declaration of St. Peter to Cornelius. Rejecting the Gospel dispensation, they endeavour to undervalue or exclude Christianity; maintaining, that to fear God and to work righteousness are the only duties essentially necessary to salvation; and that these were as "old as the creation," inculcated by natural religion, and adopted by the Patriarchal, Heb. xi. 6. Job xix. 25., and by the Mosaical, Matt. xxii. 40.

This may be refuted, and it should seem fully and satisfactorily,—

1. By the case of Cornelius himself, who, though he possessed these requisites, was further, by a special revelation, required to embrace Christianity.

2. By the general commission to the apostles to publish the Gospel throughout the whole world, upon the further terms of faith and baptism in the name of the Trinity.

3. Upon both accounts, therefore, Peter required Cornelius to be baptized or admitted into the Christian Church, and entitled thereby to its higher benefits and privileges.

4. Paul has clearly stated the higher privileges of Jews above the Gentiles, and of Christians above both, in his doctrinal Epistles to the Romans and to the Hebrews.

5. Natural religion, if opposed to revealed, is a mere fiction of false philosophy. That "the world by [human] wisdom knew not God," is a fact asserted by St. Paul, in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, (i. 21.) Such knowledge being too wonderful and excellent for the attainment of mankind, by the confession of the patriarchs and prophets (Job xi. 7. xxxvii. 23. Ps. cxxxix. 6.), and of the wisest of the heathen philosophers.

6. The Patriarchal and Mosaical dispensations were only schoolmasters to the Christian, designed to train the world gradually for its reception in the fulness of time; as subordinate parts of one grand scheme of redemption, embracing all mankind, instituted at the creation, Gen. iii. 15., and gradually unfolding to the end of the world, John iii. 16. Rev. i. 18.

NOTE 4.—PART X.

THE construction of this passage is difficult, and it has consequently exercised the ingenuity of the commentators.

Τὸν λόγον ὃν ἀπέστειλε τοῖς υἱοῖς Ἰσραὴλ, are the words.

Some suppose the accusative is here put for the nominative; others, that there is an ellipse of the preposition κατὰ. Erasmus and Schmi dius would connect τὸν λόγον with οἰδατε in the next verse, and read, οὗτός ἐστι πάντων κύριος, in a parenthesis, repeating ὁἷμα as synonymous with λόγον: in which case the passage would be read, "The word which God sent to the children of Israel, announcing peace through Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all), ye yourselves have known, the word I say, which," &c.

Piscator (ap. Bowyer) would read τὸν λόγον for κατὰ τὸν λόγον, "according to the word" which he sent to the children of Israel. Stolbergius would rather put τὸν λόγον ὅν, for ὅν λόγον, as τὸν ἄρτον ὃν κλῶμεν, 1 Cor. x. 16.—τὸν λόγον ὃν διεθέμην ὑμῖν, Hag. ii. 6. Stolbergius, De Solæcismis N. T. p. 61–64. ap. Bowyer.

Doddridge renders it, "the message" which God sent—Dr. Clarke, "the word."

Boisius supposes, that ἀκούσατε οὖν, or some similar phrase, is to be understood before τὸν λόγον^l.

NOTE 5.—PART X.

To the question, Why was not Christ after his resurrection shown to all the people? it has been answered, 1. Because it was impossible that such a thing could be done without mob or tumult. Let it only be announced, "Here is the man who was dead three days, and who is risen from the dead!" what confusion would be the consequence of such an exposure! Some would say, "This is he:" others, "He is like him," and so on; and the valid testimony must be lost in the confusion and multitude. 2. God chose such witnesses, whose testimony should be unimpeachable; the men who knew him best, and who, by their depositions in proof of the fact, should evidently risk their lives; and, 3. As multitudes are never called to witness any fact, but a few selected from the rest, whose knowledge is most accurate, and whose veracity is unquestionable; therefore God showed not Christ risen from the dead to all the people, but to witnesses chosen by himself, and they were such as perfectly knew him before, and who ate and drank with him after his resurrection, and consequently had the fullest proof and conviction of the truth of this fact^m.

NOTE 6.—PART X.

THIS section seems to prove, in the most decisive manner, that the Gospel was preached to the Proselytes of the Gate, or to such devout Gentiles as Cornelius, before it was preached to the idolatrous Gentiles. We read, in Acts xi. 19., that the dispersed in the persecution of Stephen preached the Gospel to the Jews only. In ver. 20., that these same men, when they arrived at Antioch, preached to the Greeks. As St. Luke has inserted this account immediately after the narrative of St. Peter's visit to Cornelius, and his defence of that measure before the Church at Jerusalem, we may consider this preaching to the Greeks at Antioch, as the result of his public declaration of the vision he had seen: which would be justly considered as a command from God to those who were commissioned to preach, to go to the same description of persons as those whom St. Peter visited. The Jews (ver. 19.) seem purposely contrasted with the Greeks (ver. 20.), and the Evangelist designs to show that the preachers of the Gospel obeyed the command of God, and visited the devout Gentiles of Antioch.

NOTE 7.—PART X.

AFTER the interview of St. Paul and St. Peter at Jerusalem (Acts ix. 31, 32, διερχόμενος διὰ πάντων, says St. Luke), St. Peter went to visit all the Churches of Judæa, Galilee, and Samaria. He goes to Lydda, where he cured Eneas (ibid. ver. 33, 34.) who was a paralytic. After that he was called to Joppa (ibid. ver. 36.), a maritime city of Judæa, where he raised Dorcas. He stops at Joppa, and lived there a long time. From Joppa he goes to Cæsarea (Acts x.), where he converts Cornelius, and stops with him some days, (ibid. ver. 48.) Upon the report, spread at Jerusalem, of St. Peter's having eaten with the Gentiles, he returns into that city, and defends himself before those of the circumcision, (Acts xi. 18.) This voyage of St. Peter's, his preaching in the provinces of Judæa, Galilee, and Samaria, the long sojourn he made at Joppa, with the other events recorded by St. Luke, occupy a space of about three years, during which time St. Paul preaches in Cilicia.

sage, that the word "Church" here refers to the place where a congregation of Christians assembled for worship; or, rather, to that body of people which could assemble in one place. This is but one, out of many instances, in which this learned writer, in his zeal against episcopacy, has proved nothing, by attempting to prove too much. We are not acquainted with the numbers of the Church at Antioch; but we know that at Jerusalem the thousands of converts could not be assembled in one place, yet they are still called the Church.

The Codex Bezae supposes that the name was given by Saul and Barnabas, and renders the 25th and 29th verses thus:—"And hearing that Saul was at Tarsus, he departed, seeking for him; and having found him, he besought him to come to Antioch; who, when they were come, assembled with the Church a whole year, and instructed a great number; and there they first called the disciples at Antioch, Christians."

The word καλεῖσθαι, in our common text, which we translate "were called," signifies, in the New Testament, to appoint, warn, or nominate, by divine direction. In this sense the word is used, Matt. ii. 12. Luke ii. 26. and in Acts x. 22. If, therefore, the name was given by divine appointment, it is most likely that Saul and Barnabas were directed to give it; and the name Christian, therefore, is from God, as well as that grace and holiness which are so essentially required and implied in the character. Before this time, the Jewish converts were simply called, among themselves, Disciples, i. e. scholars, believers, saints, the church, or assembly: and by their enemies, Nazarenes, Galileans, the men of this way, or sect; and by other names, which are given by Bingham*.

NOTE 9.—PART X.

ON THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH OF JERUSALEM AFTER THE HERODIAN PERSECUTION, AND ON THE EPISCOPATE OF ST. JAMES.

THE situation of the Church at Jerusalem was greatly altered by the Herodian persecution. It had hitherto been directed and governed by the joint council of the apostles. But, after that event, we learn from ecclesiastical history, that the superintendence of the Church was confided to James, the Lord's brother. It asserts that he was the first bishop of Jerusalem. The catalogues of the bishops of Jerusalem, which are extant in the early Christian writers, all place James at their head. In the first chapters of the Acts, St. Peter is constantly spoken of as the chief apostle, and the principal person in the Church of Jerusalem; but from the twelfth chapter of that book, which is the first place wherein James is mentioned with any character of distinction, he is constantly described as the chief person at Jerusalem, even when Peter was present. For when St. Peter was delivered by the angel out of prison, he bid some of the disciples go show these things, that is, what had befallen himself, to St. James, as the head of the Church; and to the brethren, that is, the rest of the Church. Again, when St. Paul arrived at Jerusalem from his travels in preaching the Gospel to foreign countries, being desirous to give an account of the success which God had given him, the day following he went in to St. James, as the bishop of that place, and all the elders, who were next in authority to him, were present. In the synod which was held at Jerusalem, about the great question, Whether the converts from Gentilism should be circumcised, St. Peter delivers his judgment as one who was a member of the assembly: but St. James speaks with authority, and his sentence is decisive. The name of James is placed by St. Paul before Peter and John: "James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars." And some of the Church of Jerusalem who came to Antioch, are said to be "certain who came from James;" which implies that James was the head of that Church, otherwise they should rather have been said to come from Jerusalem, or from the Church of that place.

From all this together it plainly appears, that the Church of Jerusalem was under the peculiar care and government of James. The unanimous testimony of the fathers affirms that St. James was made bishop of Jerusalem. Hege-sippus, who lived near the time of the apostles, tells us, that James the brother of our Lord, received the Church of Jerusalem from the apostles, (Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 23.) St. Clement is quoted by Eusebius as asserting the same thing, (lib. ii. cap. 1.) Jerome, Cyril, Augustine, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Ambrose, and Ignatius concur in their evidence.

In interpreting those passages of Scripture, which men of equal judgment, equal piety, and equal knowledge have rendered differently, there are but three ways of deciding—one is, to rely on our own judgment, without regard to any commentators or interpreters—another, to rely on those modern theologians who disregard the testimony of antiquity—and the third, to inquire into the conclusions of the fathers, and the ancient defenders of Christianity. The last plan will seldom lead us into error. The fathers of the Church are unanimous on all those points which peculiarly characterize true Christianity. They assert the Divinity, the Incarnation, and the Atonement of Christ: and thus bear their decisive testimony against the modern reasoners on those points. They are unanimous in asserting that the primitive Churches were governed by an order of men, who possessed authority over others who had been set apart for preaching and administering the sacraments: and certain privileges and powers were committed to that higher order, which were withheld from the second and third. The reception of the canon of Scripture, the proofs of its authenticity and genuineness, rest upon the authority of the fathers; and there are customs of universal observance, which are not in express terms commanded in Scripture, and which rest upon the same foundation. We are justified, therefore, on these and on many other accounts, in maintaining the utmost veneration for their unanimous authority, which has never in any one instance clashed with Scripture—which will preserve in its purity every Church which is directed by them, and check or extinguish every innovation which encourages error in doctrine, or licentiousness in discipline.

The labors of the early fathers, therefore, are in many respects invaluable. They could not have been mistaken in their evidence upon some points, which must be considered as the great landmarks of the Christian Church, and which will ever continue to preserve in their purity the doctrines and institutions of the religion of our common Lord.

The Holy Scripture only alludes to the elevation of the Apostle in the passage before us. St. Peter directs his friends to go and tell James of his deliverance; James, according to the best and most generally-received opinion, presided in the apostolic council; when St. Paul went up to Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 17, 18.), the brethren received him gladly, and the next day he went in unto James, all the elders being present. "For what other reason," says the admirable and judicious Mr. Scott, "should Paul go in to James more especially, or upon what other account should all the elders be present with James, but that he was a person of the greatest note and figure in the Church of Jerusalem? and as he is called an Apostle, that he was peculiarly the apostle of that Church. This, from Scripture, is probable; the unanimous testimony of the fathers of the Church to this opinion makes it certain; and it would be difficult to learn why this large class of men, whose honesty, piety, and freedom from any erroneous bias are universally acknowledged, should have conspired without any possible motive to deceive the world by useless falsehood."

The remarks of Mosheim on this point seem to be deficient in accuracy and judgment. He acknowledges that all ancient authorities, from the second century downwards, concur in representing James the younger, the brother of our Lord after the flesh, as the first bishop of the Church of Jerusalem, having been so created by the apostles themselves; and quotes Acta Sanctor. Mens. Maii, tom. i. p. 23. Tillemont, Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 1008, et seq. He then proceeds to observe,—“If this were as truly, as it is uniformly reported, it would at once determine the point which we have under consideration, since it must close the door against all doubt as to the quarter in which episcopacy originated. But I rather suspect that these ancient writers might incautiously be led to form their judgment of the state of things in the first century, from the maxims and practice of their own times, and finding that, after the departure of the other apostles on their respective missions, the chief regulation and superintendence of the Church rested with James, they without further reason concluded that he must have been appointed bishop of that Church. It appears, indeed, from the writings of the New Testament, that, after the departure of the other apostles on their travels, the chief authority in the Church of Jerusalem was possessed by James. For St. Paul, when he came to that city for the last time, immediately repaired to that Apostle; and James appears thereupon to have convened an assembly of the presbyters at his house, where Paul laid before them an account of the extent and success of his labors in the cause of his Divine Master, (Acts xxi. 19, 20.) No one reading this can, I should think, entertain a doubt of James's having been at that time invested with the chief superintendence and government of the Church of Jerusalem, and that not only the assemblies of the presbyters, but also those general ones of the whole Church, in which, as is clear from ver. 22., was lodged the supreme power as to all matters of a sacred nature, were convened by his appointment.

“But it must be observed, that this authority was no more than must have devolved on James of course, in his apostolic character, in consequence of all the other apostles having quitted Jerusalem; and that therefore this testimony of St. Luke is by no means to be considered as conclusive evidence of his having been appointed to the office of bishop. Were we to admit of such kind of reasoning as this—the government of the Church of Jerusalem was vested in James, therefore he was its bishop; I do not see on what grounds we could refuse our assent, should it be asserted that all the twelve apostles were bishops of that Church, for it was at one time equally under their government. But not to enlarge unnecessarily, the function of an apostle differed widely from that of a bishop, and I therefore do not think that James, who was an apostle, was ever appointed to, or discharged, the episcopal office at Jerusalem. The government of the Church in that city, it rather appears to me, was placed in the hands of its presbyters, but so as that nothing of moment could be done without the advice and authority of James; the same sort of respectful deference being paid to his will as had formerly been manifested for that of the apostles at large. But although we deem those ancient writers to have committed an error, in pronouncing James to have been the first bishop of Jerusalem, it may without much difficulty be demonstrated that the Church of that city had a bishop sooner than any of the rest, and consequently that the episcopal dignity must have taken its rise there," &c.

If the unanimous testimony of Scripture and of the fathers can be set aside by such reasoning, which assumes as a postulate, that the witnesses are all in error, there remains no other guide to direct us in theological research than our own caprice or imagination.

Whitby, Cave, Lardner, and others, have asserted that James, the Lord's brother, was truly and strictly an apostle, being the same as James, the son of Alphæus, one of the twelve. Bishop Taylor, and I believe the great majority of the Protestant as well as Romanist divines, relying on the authority of Eusebius, consider him to have been a different person, and to have been elected bishop of Jerusalem, with the title of apostle.

Dr. Lardner's reasoning on the question, Whether St. James, the Lord's brother, was the same as James the son of Alphæus, one of the twelve, has left the point doubtful.

Jerome calls this James the thirteenth apostle.

The judicious Hooker was of opinion that the apostles were dispersed from Judæa about this time, and that James was now elected bishop or permanent apostle of Jerusalem. He would attribute the public setting apart of St. Paul to the apostolic office, to make up again the number of the twelve, for the gathering in of the nations abroad. He supposes, too, that Barnabas was appointed apostle instead of St. James, who was killed by Herod; and Dr. Hales has approved the supposition.

It is curious to observe that Dr. Lardner calls James, the president, or superintendent, carefully avoiding the word bishop: and in another passage (vol. i. p. 293.), he observes, "James abode in Jerusalem, as the apostle residentiary of that country." If he was president and apostle residentiary in Jerusalem, as the superintendent of the Church, which now consisted of many thousands and myriads of converts, it is difficult to imagine the reason why this learned anti-episcopalian should not have adopted the appellation of the fathers, and have called him bishop of the Church at Jerusalem. This, however, is by no means the only instance of disingenuousness on these subjects, on the part of Dr. Lardner. Neither is his amiable coadjutor, Dr. Doddridge, entirely free from censure in his mode of treating the questions of Church government¹.

NOTE 10.—PART X.

ON THE CONTINUED AGENCY OF ANGELS.

THE German commentators of the self-named liberal class endeavour to explain away every miracle recorded in the New Testament, by representing them as natural events, which have only been considered as miraculous by the misapprehending of the Hebraisms of the inspired writers. I have not thought it worth while to stop in my way through the New Testament paradise, to pick up these poisonous weeds. They are unknown to the English reader in general, and I trust will long remain so. The explanation, however, of Hezelius, which I find in Kuinoel, is so singular, that it may appear doubtful whether, in his eagerness to remove the opinion of a miraculous interference by an angel, he does not establish a still greater miracle. He thinks that a flash of lightning penetrated the prison in the night, and melted the chains of St. Peter, without injuring him. The apostle rose up, and saw the soldiers who guarded him struck prostrate to the ground, by the force of the lightning. He passed them, as if led by the flash of lightning, and escaped from the prison before he perceived that he had been liberated by the providence of God.

So completely, however, has the skeptical philosophy of the day pervaded society, that even among professed Christians, he would now be esteemed a visionary, who should venture to declare his belief in the most favorite doctrine of the ancient Church. The early fathers regarded the ministry of angels as a consoling and beautiful doctrine, and so much at that time was it held in veneration, that the founders of Christianity cautioned their early converts against permitting their reverence to degenerate into adoration. We now go to the opposite extreme, and seldom think of their existence; yet what is to be found in this belief, even if the Scriptures had not revealed it, which is contrary to our reason? We believe in our own existence, and in the existence of a God: is it utterly improbable, then, that between us, who are so inferior, and the Creator, who is so wonderful and incomprehensible, infinite gradations of beings should exist, some of whom are employed in executing the will of the Deity towards finite creatures? Does not God act even by human means in the visible government of the affairs of the earth?

ii. a work once highly popular, for the singular union of fervent piety, sober judgment, extensive reading, and good principles.—Archbishop Potter's Church Government, p. 91.—Mosheim On the Affairs of the Christians before Constantine, vol. i. p. 229, 230.—Lardner's Supplement to the Credibility, Works, 4to. vol. iii. p. 382, 393.—Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, book vii. sect. iv. p. 346, folio edition of 1723.—Hales's Anal. vol. ii. part ii.

what absurdity, then, can be discovered in the opinion that the spiritual nature of man should be under the guardianship of spiritual beings? This, in fact, was a doctrine universally received till it became perverted and degraded by vain and idle speculations,—till it became so encumbered with absurdities, that the belief itself was rejected. Some writers on this subject went so far as to imagine they could ascertain the orders of a hierarchy, and could even assert the numbers in each rank. Others changed the office and ministry of angels, investing them with independent control over the works of God, an opinion strongly and justly reprobated by the most eminent authorities*. And because in the original Hebrew that which executes the will of the Deity is sometimes called an "Angel," whether it be winds or storms, fire or air; many again have transformed the angels in the Old Testament into obedient elements, accomplishing the designs of Providence. According to which hypothesis, the aged patriarch must have prayed that the blessing of an element might descend on his grandchildren. The Messiah must have been created a little lower than the winds and the floods, who in like manner were commanded to worship him; and again, when the superiority of Christ is declared, the passage must be rendered,—“To which of the elements said he at any time, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool.” Leaving all such fantastic and unreasonable interpretations out of the question, let us turn to that interpretation of Scripture on this point, which has been acknowledged by all classes and divisions of Christians, from the time of the apostles to the present day. From the evidence of revelation, we have grounds for believing that angels are spirits, superior to mankind, some of whom have lost, while others have preserved, the state of happiness in which they were primarily created, and that these are now opposed to each other. With the precise cause of the fall of the evil angels we are not made acquainted. We know only that they retain the remembrance of their original condition; that they are powerful, though under restraint; that gradations of superiority and influence exist among them; that they acknowledge a superior head, and that they are destined to eternal punishment.

Of the good angels we learn, that they continue in their primeval dignity. They are endued with great power, and because they are employed in the constant execution of the decrees of Providence, they have received the name of messengers or angels. They are called the armies and the hosts of heaven; in innumerable companies they surround the throne of Deity; they are made partakers of his glory, and rejoice to fulfil his will.

Their office, as ministering angels to the sincere and accepted worshippers of our common God, is more fully and accurately related. Through the whole volume of revelation we read of the agency of superior beings in the affairs of mankind. They were stationed at the tree of life in Paradise. In Jacob's vision of the ladder, they are represented as ascending and descending upon earth. They appeared to the patriarchs, to Abraham, to Lot, to Jacob, and they were made alike the ministers both of the vengeance and mercy of God. They were intrusted with the destruction of the cities of the plain. “And the angel of the Lord went out, and smote in the camp of Sennacherib a hundred and fourscore and five thousand,” (2 Kings xix. 35.) God sent an angel unto Jerusalem to destroy it—who was seen between the earth and the heaven having a drawn sword in his hand, stretched out over Jerusalem. In the New Testament they announced the birth of Christ, and of his forerunner; they became visible to the shepherds, and proclaimed the glad tidings of salvation to the senseless world. They are interested for, and sympathize with man; for “there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth.” They were the watchful and anxious attendants of Christ in his human nature. They ministered to him after his triumph in the wilderness, and his agony in the garden. As they announced his birth, so, also, they proclaimed his resurrection, his ascension, and his future return to judgment. They were made the spiritual means of communication between God and man. They were the divine witnesses of the whole system of redemption. By an angel Joseph was warned to flee into Egypt, (Matt. ii. 13.) By an angel Cornelius was directed to the house of Peter, (Acts x. 3-22.) By an angel that Apostle was released from prison. And by the ministry of an angel, were signified to St. John those things that should be hereafter. In this last and mysterious revelation, the agency of superior beings is uniformly asserted, and they are represented as fulfilling the most solemn and important decrees of Omnipotence. They are represented as standing on the four corners of the earth, as having the seal of the living God, as offering on the golden altar the incense and prayers of the saints, as holding the key of the bottomless pit, and as executing the vengeance of God upon the visible creation, and upon all those who have not the seal of God upon their foreheads; all which, though metaphorical expressions, imply the probable agency of these invisible beings in the affairs of the world. And when time shall be no more, these holy beings who have sympathized with man here, and been the witnesses of his actions, and the infinite mercies of his Almighty Creator and Redeemer, will be the accusing or approving spectators of the sentence passed upon him in eternity; for our Saviour has expressly declared, that "whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man also confess before the angels of God. But he that denieth me before men shall be denied before the angels of God."

NOTE 11.—PART X.

SCHOETGEN has shown that the ancient Jews believed the angels sometimes assumed the form of a man, and has collected some curious instances to this effect.

The Gentiles, as well as the Jews, thought that the gods sometimes assumed the appearance of some particular individual, and spake, when thus disguised, with the same tone by which that individual would be recognized. This superstition is well described by Homer—

NOTE 12.—PART X.

ON THE QUESTION CONCERNING ST. PETER'S VISIT TO ROME, AND THE WRITING OF ST. MARK'S GOSPEL.

WE may be permitted to express our regret, that the evangelical narrative has not here given us the slightest allusion to the place where St. Peter secreted himself from his persecutors. The word in the original is of the most indefinite kind. Dr. Lardner is of opinion that it refers only to some one of the houses in Jerusalem, or an adjacent village or town, and that the Apostle soon returned to the city upon the death of Herod Agrippa, which took place at the end of the year. Some commentators have been of opinion that he went to Antioch, others, to Rome. Dr. Lardner observes, that there is no good foundation for either of these opinions. That there is any foundation for the former, I am not prepared to say. The interview between St. Peter and St. Paul at Antioch, which is mentioned Gal. ii. 11–16., occurred some time after this, and after the council at Jerusalem. That St. Peter took refuge at Rome appears to me the most probable.

The silence of Scripture leaves us to the evidence of the fathers. With respect to this conclusion, that St. Peter went to Rome; and the jealousy of Protestants on this point, because the Romanists would establish upon this fact, the alleged supremacy of St. Peter, Dr. Lardner justly remarks, it is not for our honor, or our interest, either as Christians or Protestants to deny the truth of events, ascertained by early and well-attested tradition. If others make an ill use of facts, we are not accountable for it. While it appears to me not improbable that he took refuge from the Herodian persecution with some of the friends of Cornelius, there is no evidence that he founded the Church at Rome, nor even addressed himself to the Gentiles in that city. He would have considered himself guilty of a violation of the law of God if he had now done so. It was with the utmost difficulty St. Peter could be convinced, even by a vision from above, that the kingdom of heaven was to be open to the proselyted Gentiles; much less can it be believed that he would preach at this period to the idolatrous citizens of Rome.

"The Church of Rome," says a learned prelate of our own day, "was established as a Christian society during St. Paul's first visit, by the communication of the spiritual gift, which he intimates. It is evident that no other of the apostles had any share in this first establishment but St. Paul; whatever may be said of St. Peter's episcopacy of twenty-five years. For the Epistle to the Romans appears to have been written not long before the apostle's first visit. And at that time his language to them certainly implies that no other apostle had been there before him: 'Yea, so have I strived to preach the Gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation'." (Rom. xv. 20.)

St. Peter had fulfilled the prediction of our Lord, that he should open the kingdom of heaven to the Gentiles, when he preached to Cornelius and his family. The Roman centurion had been now admitted into the Christian Church; he was probably one of those by whom prayer was made without ceasing for St. Peter's liberation, and we may justly conclude that he held this Apostle in the highest veneration. Though Cornelius had not the power to release St. Peter from prison (the Jews being very jealous of the interference of the Romans in all matters connected with religion), it is not unlikely that more effectual protection could be afforded by a Roman in a case of persecution, than by any of the suffering Church. It is certain that the Romans had great influence at this time; for we read that when Herod was enraged with the people of Tyre, their embassy made Blastus, the king's chamberlain, their friend. Blastus was a Roman. The Romans did not hesitate to engage in the service of the tributary kings and sovereigns dependent on the empire". It is not improbable, therefore, that the Apostle, when he went to another place from the house of the mother of Mark, would take refuge among some of the Gentile converts; and, as the indignation of Herod was so great, that he condemned the soldiers to death from whom Peter had escaped, it was but natural to apprehend that the Apostle would soon be condemned to a similar fate. None of the Jews would shelter him, as they took part with Herod against the infant Church. Under these circumstances, it appears not unlikely that the Gentile converts would provide for his effectual safety, by sending him among some of their own friends at Rome, who were cognizant in the real history of the extraordinary events that had taken place in Judæa. The same evidence which induces me to come to this conclusion, compels me to believe also, that St. Peter took with him to Rome the writer of the second Gospel, which bears so much internal as well as external evidence, that it was addressed to Roman converts. We read (Acts xii. 12.) that when St. Peter went from prison he proceeded to the house of Mary the mother of Mark. He staid there but a short time, and it is not, I think, improbable that St. Mark accompanied him, to aid him in case of danger.

It will, however, be necessary to examine the hypothesis of Dr. Lardner, on the other side of the question, that the apostles did not leave Judæa till after the apostolic council.

His first argument is derived from the fact that all the apostles were present at the council of Jerusalem: and he concludes that they could not have been to other countries before that time, from the total want of evidence on the subject.

It may, however, be answered, that no argument can be derived from the silence of the inspired or heathen writers. We acknowledge the apostles to have been present, in all probability, at the council of Jerusalem; the question is, whether they did not leave Jerusalem between the years 44, when the Herodian persecution was raging, and the year 49 or 50, when the council was held. Peter was well acquainted with the persecuting and cruel spirit of Herod—he had seen James the brother of John killed with the sword—he was himself apprehended and imprisoned, and while he remained in the city he continued exposed to the most imminent danger. Was it not, under these circumstances, more probable that he should absent himself from Jerusalem during the reign of this monarch, and that he did not return to his own country till his death, when Judæa was governed by the Roman procurators? Biscoe has well shown that the heathens protected the Christians in the exercise of their religion, against the fury of the Jews; and we read many things in the Acts of the Apostles which prove the same point.

Dr. Lardner then proceeds to observe, 1. "That it was fit and proper, and even expedient, that the apostles should stay a good while in Judæa, to assert and confirm the truth of Christ's resurrection, by teaching, and by miraculous works, and do their utmost to bring the Jewish people to faith in Jesus as the Christ.

2. "As this was fit, it is likely that they had received some command from Christ himself, or some direction from the Holy Ghost, to stay thus long in Judæa.

3. "There were considerations that would incline them to it, and induce them to do what was fit to be done, and was agreeable to the mind of Christ. One was the difficulty of preaching the Gospel in foreign countries. This would induce them to stay in Judæa, till the circumstances of things facilitated their farther progress, or called them to it. Another thing was their affection for the Jewish people, their countrymen, especially those of Judæa, with whom they had been brought up, and among whom they dwelt, together with a persuasion of the great value of the blessing of the Gospel.

"This last consideration, I apprehend, would induce them to labor in Judæa, with earnest desires and some hopes of bringing all, or, however, many, to faith in Jesus. This influenced Paul also to a great degree, and for a good while. Nor was he without hopes of persuading his brethren and countrymen to what appeared to himself very certain and very evident. So he says in his speech to the people at Jerusalem, Acts xxii. 17–20. He assures them, that whilst he was worshipping at Jerusalem, in the temple, he had a trance, or ecstasy: that he there saw Christ, who said to him, 'Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem; for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me.' Paul pleaded, that they must needs pay a regard to his testimony, who was well known to have been for some while very zealous in opposing his followers, and was now convinced and persuaded. But the Lord said unto him, 'Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles.' This trance, or vision, seems to have happened in the year 44, after that Paul had preached at Antioch with great success among the Gentiles. Nevertheless, he had an earnest desire to make one attempt more among the Jews of Judæa, where was the body of that people; and if they could have been persuaded, many abroad would follow their example. And it required an express and repeated order from Jesus Christ, in vision, to induce him to lay aside that design, and to proceed to preach to the Gentiles in remote parts."

* Wetstein in loc., and Kuinoel, In Lib. N. T. Hist. Comment. vol. iv. p. 419.

To all which it may be replied, 1st, That the apostles had now continued in Jerusalem till a Christian Church was established—the Gospel had been preached to the Jews, and confirmed by miracles and the most undeniable evidence; but the Jews persisted in the rejection of their Messiah.

2. To the second, The command of Christ to his apostles to continue at Jerusalem is not recorded: and even had it been given, it would prove only that the appointed time had expired.

3. The Herodian persecution prevented the apostles from following their own plans; and the Jews themselves, by their unrelenting bitterness, took away from them the power of accomplishing their first great object, that of offering salvation to and converting their own countrymen, and their very lives depended upon flight. They could find no difficulty in preaching the Gospel in other countries, because they were endued with the gift of tongues for this express purpose; in addition to which, they would have been admitted into the Jewish synagogues in every country.

The conversion of Cornelius proves that the predicted time for the admission of the Gentiles had arrived; the Church was established, and the Jews had beheld the apostolic miracles; they had been appealed to in vain, and there was now no necessity for the longer continuance of the apostles at Jerusalem, who were consequently instructed by a vision, that the time had come when they were to preach to the Gentiles.

Dr. Lardner's last argument is quite extraordinary. He believes that the apostles were under no necessity of leaving Jerusalem during the Herodian persecution, because they were under miraculous protection. He forgets that James, one of the twelve, had been killed already; and it seems to me, that St. Peter was miraculously released from prison, that he might escape the same fate, by following the example of the rest of his brethren, and seeking safety in flight.

This opinion is confirmed by the little evidence remaining to us in ecclesiastical history. The general conclusion to which we are led by the fathers is, that the apostles left Jerusalem twelve years after the ascension of our Lord. He ascended A. D. 29. The twelfth year therefore brings us to the beginning of the reign of Claudius; the very period when Herod Agrippa took possession of the kingdom of Judæa. He lost no time in giving proofs of his zealous Judaism, and we may believe that he would lose no time in demonstrating his sincerity, by renewing the persecution; in the course of which the apostles were obliged to leave Jerusalem.

Clement of Alexandria^x, about 194, quotes a work, entitled, The Preaching of St. Peter. "The Lord said to his apostles, If any Israelite will repent, and believe in God through my name, his sins shall be forgiven. After twelve years go ye out into all the world, that none may say, 'We have not heard.'"

Eusebius mentions that Apollonius (undoubtedly in part contemporary with Clement, and placed by Cave at the year 192—by Lardner at 211, as near the time of his writing against the Montanists) relates, as from tradition, that our Saviour commanded his apostles not to depart from Jerusalem for the space of twelve years. The same historian, in his Ecclesiastical History, writes, "Peter, by the direction of Providence, came to Rome in the reign of Claudius to contend with and overcome Simon Magus;" and, in his Chronicon, that after he had been at Antioch he went to Rome in the second year of Claudius, i. e. the year of Christ 44. Those who espouse this opinion, suppose the Gospel of St. Mark to be written about this time. The same opinion also is maintained at the end of the Arabic version, and of many ancient manuscripts of this Gospel, particularly one mentioned by Dr. Hammond, two referred to by Father Simon, and thirteen cited by Dr. Mill, by Theophylact also, and others of the Greek scholiasts.

Considering this supposition as correct, it by no means implies that St. Peter continued long at Rome, as the Romish Church assert. There is internal evidence to the contrary; for we find St. Paul does not salute him in his Epistle to the Romans—neither did he meet him on his first coming to Rome, in the beginning of the reign of Nero. St. Paul does not mention St. Peter in any of the Epistles he wrote from Rome; and in his Epistle to the Colossians, St. Peter's name is not mentioned among his coadjutors. In the work of Lactantius (or of L. Cæcilius, according to Le Clerc), it is said Peter came to Rome in the time of Nero, and made many converts, and formed a Church—an account which at once confutes the fable that he had been there twenty-five years as bishop of Rome, on which assertion the supremacy of the pope is founded.

The probable conclusion therefore is, that St. Peter took refuge at Rome, during the Herodian persecution, to which place he was accompanied by St. Mark, and after staying there some short time, Peter, like the rest of the apostles, superintended the Hebrew-Christian, and not the Gentile, Churches; travelling from place to place, till he returned to Jerusalem, to be present at the apostolic council.

That St. Peter was martyred at Rome (a circumstance which many Protestant writers have discredited, from the fear of giving countenance to the unfounded, and therefore absurd, doctrine of the pope's supremacy), has been asserted by Ignatius, Dionysius, Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, Caius, Origen, Cyprian, Lactantius, Eusebius, Athanasius, Ephraim, Epiphanius, Jerome, Chrysostom, and many others^y. The quotations from the works of each of whom may be seen in Lardner. It is impossible to resist evidence to this extent. Nor does the fact of St. Peter's martyrdom at Rome enforce upon us the doctrine attached to it by one division of the Christian Church.

We are now to inquire into the probability of St. Mark's accompanying the Apostle to Rome, and what evidence there is for his having written his Gospel about this time, at the request and for the use of the converts in that city. It will appear, I think, that the internal evidence arising from the Gospel itself, and from the concurrent testimony of the fathers of the Church, unite in affirming this to be the origin and object of his Gospel; although, as it will appear, it was not officially committed to the Churches in general, till he was settled at Alexandria, as the bishop of the Church in that city.

Michaelis has collected, in a very perspicuous manner, the different circumstances related of St. Mark in the New Testament. He observes, "It appears, from Acts xii. 11., that St. Mark's original name was John; the surname of Mark having probably been adopted by him when he left Judæa to go into foreign countries; a practice not unusual among the Jews of that age, who frequently assumed a name more familiar to the nations which they visited, than that by which they had been distinguished in their own country. That St. Mark wrote his Gospel in Rome, with the assistance and under the direction of St. Peter, agrees extremely well with the contents of the Gospel itself, and may serve likewise to explain several particulars, which at first sight appear extraordinary. For instance, where St. Peter is concerned in the narration, mention is sometimes made of circumstances which are not related by the other Evangelists, as at chap. i. 29-33., ix. 34., xi. 21., and xiv. 30. And on the contrary, the high commendations which Christ bestowed on St. Peter, as appears from Matt. xvi. 17-19., but which the Apostle, through modesty, would hardly have repeated, are wanting in St. Mark's Gospel. At chap. xiv. 47. St. Mark mentions neither the name of the Apostle, who cut off the ear of the high priest's servant, nor the circumstance of Christ's healing it. We know that this apostle was St. Peter, for his name is expressly mentioned by St. John; but an Evangelist, who wrote his Gospel at Rome during the life of St. Peter, would have exposed him to the danger of being accused by his adversaries, if he had openly related the fact. Had St. Mark written after the death of St. Peter, there would have been no necessity for this caution.

"Further, as St. Mark wrote for the immediate use of the Romans, he sometimes gives explanations which were necessary for foreigners, though not for the inhabitants of Palestine. For instance, chap. vii. 2., he explains the meaning of κοιναῖς χειρσὶ: and ver. 11. of κορβᾶν. In the same chapter, ver. 3, 4., he gives a description of some Jewish customs; and chap. xv. 42. he explains the meaning of παράσκευή. At chap. xv. 21. he mentions that Simon was the father of Alexander and Rufus, a circumstance not mentioned by the other Evangelists; but to St. Mark's readers the circumstance was interesting, because Rufus was at that time in Rome, as appears from Romans xvi. 13. See also Wetstein's notes to chap. vii. 26. xi. 22."

St. Mark has more Latin words than the other Evangelists; and these numerous Latinisms not only show that his Gospel was composed by a person who had lived among the Latins, but also that it was written beyond the confines of Judæa. That this Gospel was designed principally for Gentile believers (though we know that there were some Jewish converts in the Church at Rome) is further evident from the explanations introduced by the Evangelist, which would have been unnecessary, if he had written for Hebrew Christians exclusively. Thus, the first time the Jordan is mentioned, the appellation "river," is added to the name, Mark i. 5., and instead of the word "mammon," he uses the common term χορηαυα, "riches." Again, the word "Gehenna," which in our version is translated "hell," (ix. 43.) originally signified the valley of Hinnom, where infants had been sacrificed by fire to Moloch, and where a continual fire was afterwards maintained to consume the filth of Jerusalem; as this word could not have been understood by a foreigner, the Evangelist adds the words "fire that never shall be quenched," by way of explanation. These particularities corroborate the historical evidence above cited, that St. Mark designed his Gospel for the use of Gentile Christians.

Lastly, the manner in which St. Mark relates the life of our Saviour is an additional evidence that he wrote for Gentile Christians. His narrative is clear, exact, and concise, and his exordium is singular; for while the other Evangelists style our Saviour "the Son of Man," St. Mark announces him at once as "the Son of God," (i. 1.) an august title, the more likely to engage the attention of the Romans; omitting the genealogy of Christ, his miraculous conception, the massacre of the infants at Bethlehem, and other particulars, which could not be essentially important in the eyes of foreigners.

^y That St. Peter was certainly at Rome is fully proved by the learned Pearson, in his Dissertation, De Serie et Successione Primorum Romæ Episcoporum, Diss. i. cap. vii. "Romæ fuisse S. Petrum probatur veterum Testimoniis," p. 33. Cave, however, remarks upon the theory of his going to that metropolis upon the present occasion—"Quod vero de hoc Romam adventu somniant, gratis omnino dictum est. Altum de eo apud veteres silentium. Silet imprimis historia apostolica, quæ de hoc aliove adventu ne verbum habet," &c.—See Cave, Historia Literaria, vol. i. p. 8. Bishop Burgess quotes with approbation the opinion of Bishop Stillingfleet, which is founded on a passage in Lactantius, that St. Peter was never at Rome till the period of his martyrdom. Stillingfleet's Origines Britannicæ, fol. edit. p. 48.—Barrow On the Pope's Supremacy, folio edit. p. 83.

Many things seem to prove that St. Mark's Gospel was written, or dictated, by a spectator of the actions recorded.

Chap. i. 20. They left their father in the ship with the hired servants.

i. 29. The names of James and John, omitted by Matt. viii. 14., are mentioned.

i. 33. The crowd at the door. Compare Matt. viii. 16. and Luke iv. 40, 41.

i. 35. His disciples seeking Christ when he had risen to pray. See Luke iv. 42.

i. 45. The conduct of the leper after his cure. See Matt. viii. 4. and Luke v. 14, 15.

ii. 2. The cure of the paralytic. See Matt. ix. 1. Luke v. 18, 19.

Mr. Jones, in his work on the Canon, notices many circumstances omitted by St. Mark, which reflected honor on St. Peter. Compare Matt. xvi. 16-20. with Mark viii. 29, 30. Matt. xvii. 24-26. and Mark ix. 30-33. Luke xxii. 31, 32. John xiii. 6. and xviii. 10. compared with Mark xiv. 47. See, also, John xxi. 7, 15, 18, and 19.

Dr. Townson, too, has fully proved, from a variety of minute incidents not noticed by the other Evangelists, that St. Mark's Gospel must have been either written or dictated by an eyewitness.

Chap. iii. 5. Christ's looking round on the people. See Matt. xii. 10-13. Luke vi. 6-10.

iii. 17. The names omitted by the other Evangelists are mentioned.

iii. 21. This is peculiar to St. Mark.

iv. 26. Parable of the growing corn, so applicable to the call of the Gentiles, peculiar to St. Mark.

iv. 34. Compared with Matt. xiii. 31-34.

iv. 36. "Other little ships" with them.

iv. 38. "He was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow," are omitted by the others.

The particularities mentioned by St. Mark in his account of the Gadarene demoniacs, see Matt. viii. 28-34. Mark v. 1-19. Luke viii. 26-39.—The number of the swine—the mentioning of the very words which our Lord spake to the daughter of Jairus, "Talitha cumi," (chap. v. 41.)—the blind man casting away his garment, (chap. x. 50.)—the mentioning of the names of those who came to him privately: (chap. xiii. 3.) all which minutiae could have been known only to a spectator and hearer of our Lord's words and actions.

The Gospel of St. Mark contains much internal evidence that it was written at the time when the devout Gentiles were first admitted into the Church. In chap. vii. 14-23., the spirituality of the Law is compared with St. Peter's address to Cornelius.

Chap. vii. 24-30. The Syro-Phœnician woman received; a Greek having faith in Christ—so Cornelius was not a Jew, but accepted.

Chap. xii. 1-12. The parable of the vineyard, descriptive of the calling of the Gentiles; the event which had now taken place.

Chap. xiii. Prediction of the fate of the temple—the result of the rejection of the Jews.

In chap. xiv. 24. is the expression, "My blood of the new testament, which is shed for many;" which Dr. Lardner refers to the calling of the Gentiles.

Chap. iv. 30-32. The grain of mustard-seed, descriptive of the rapid progress of the Gospel which St. Mark had witnessed.

Chap. xvi. 15. "St. Mark," says Dr. Lardner, "evidently understood the extent of the apostolic mission."

Dr. Townson observes further, in confirmation of the opinion that St. Mark wrote for the Christians at Rome, "St. Mark having followed St. Matthew in saying φραγελλώσας, (Mark xv. 15.) then speaks of the prætorium: "And the soldiers led him away into the hall, called prætorium.—Ἀὐλῇ, and prætorium, as here used, were synonymous terms in Greek and Latin, and denote the palace of a governor or great man."—"This is certainly a better proof that he composed his Gospel at Rome, than that he composed it in Latin. 'For what translator,' as Dr. Mill justly asks, 'would have rendered the Latin word 'spiculator' (or speculator), by σπεκουλάτωρ, which would so easily have been expressed in proper Greek?' St. Mark attends to the Roman division of the day in relating our Lord's prophecy to St. Peter, (xiv. 30.) 'Verily, I say unto thee, that this day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice.'

"St. Mark, to explain the meaning of 'this day,' adds, 'even in this night;' as the prediction was delivered before midnight, but fulfilled, probably, between two and three in the morning, these being parts of one and the same day in Judæa, but not at Rome."

The testimony of the fathers confirms the internal evidence, that St. Mark wrote his Gospel at Rome, under the inspection of St. Peter; and that it was even dictated by that apostle, and might with great justice have been called, as it has actually been, the Gospel of St. Peter.

Eusebius, Histor. Eccles. lib. ii. c. 15, asserts that the Gospel of St. Mark was composed at Rome, in the reign of Claudius, at the request of the people in that city. He refers to Clement, Sixth Book of Institutions, as his authority.

Clement of Alexandria (194), says, that Peter's hearers at Rome entreated Mark, the follower of Peter, to leave a memorial with them of the doctrine which had been delivered to them by word of mouth, nor did they desist till they had prevailed with him^a.

Clement states that Mark's Gospel was written at Rome, at the request of the Christians there, who were hearers of Peter.

Tertullian observes (200), the Gospel of St. Mark may be considered as that of St. Peter, whose interpreter he was.

Origen, Peter dictated his Gospel to him.

Eusebius (315), Mark is said to have recorded Peter's relation of the acts of Jesus. And all things in Mark are said to be memoirs of Peter's discourses.

The synopsis attributed to Athanasius, fifth century, says, the Gospel of St. Mark was dictated by St. Peter at Rome.

Gregory Nazianzen—Mark wrote his Gospel for the Italians, or in Italy.

Ebedjesu—the second Evangelist is Mark, who preached (or wrote) in Latin, in the city of Rome.

Theophylact (1070), and Euthymius (1100),—the Gospel of St. Mark was written at Rome, ten years after Christ's ascension.

These testimonies seem to be sufficient to prove the early date of St. Mark's Gospel, and that it was probably written at Rome for the use of the proselyted Gentile converts, under the inspection of St. Peter.

There are two considerable objections to this early date of St. Mark's Gospel. One that he is said (Acts xii. 25.) to have gone to Antioch with Saul and Barnabas; the other, the allusion to the progress of the apostles, in the last verse of his Gospel. In reply to the first, it may be said, that it is probable he would leave Rome immediately on hearing of the death of Herod, and arrive there at the time when Saul and Barnabas were about to return to Antioch; which event is placed by Dr. Lardner at this period. It appears from the manner in which ver. 8. of chap. xvi. so abruptly terminates, and the evident commencement of a new summing up of the evidence, that some extraordinary interruption took place while St. Mark was composing his Gospel. The verse terminates with the words ἐφοβοῦντο γὰρ; and many critics (as I have already shown in the notes to the eighth part of this Arrangement) have, from the rapid transition to the subject of the following verse, impugned the authenticity of the remaining verses of St. Mark's Gospel. I am inclined to impute this abrupt ending of the eighth verse of the sixteenth chapter, and the subsequent introduction of the contents of ver. 9. to the circumstances I have just related.

In all probability St. Mark returned to Jerusalem after the death of Herod with his unfinished Gospel; that he afterwards accompanied Saul and Barnabas, on their return to Antioch, (Acts xv. 35-37.); and after having attended the latter on his journey, he was finally settled at Alexandria, where he founded a church of great note.

We are told by Jerome—Mark, at the desire of the brethren at Rome, wrote a short Gospel, according to what he had heard related by St. Peter. Taking with him the Gospel he had composed, Mark went to Egypt, and founded a Church at Alexandria. He died in the eighth year of Nero, and was succeeded at Alexandria by Anianus.

Chrysostom—Mark wrote his Gospel in Egypt, at the request of the believers there.

Eusebius also relates of St. Mark, that he went into Egypt, and first preached there the Gospel he had written, and planted there many Churches. And in another chapter he says, that in the eighth year of Nero, Anianus, the first bishop of Alexandria after Mark the apostle and evangelist, took upon him the care of that Church^b.

The accounts are so brief, that the exact period of his leaving Barnabas and residing at Alexandria cannot be ascertained. The last verse of St. Mark's Gospel, which contains an allusion to the progress of the Gospel, is supposed to be of a later date than the rest of the history, which has given rise to a doubt as to the authenticity of the last twelve verses; but if we suppose the Gospel was first published at Rome, and completed at Alexandria, and the last twelve verses added there, we can have no difficulty in accounting for this difference of date.

The conclusion to which Dr. Townson has arrived, after considering the evidence in favor of the early date of St. Mark's Gospel, does not materially differ from that which I have been now advocating. He supposes that St. Mark's Gospel was published in Italy; but that St. Mark came to Rome by himself, studied the state of the Church there, returned to Asia, and, in conjunction with St. Peter, drew up his Gospel for the benefit of the converts in that city. Dr. Townson has adopted this perplexed theory, to avoid the opinion that St. Peter came to Rome in the reign of Claudius. Lord Barrington assigns to St. Mark's Gospel the date I have now adopted.

After considering the whole evidence respecting the Gospel of St. Mark, I cannot but conclude that it was written at a much earlier date than has been generally assigned to it by Protestant writers. The Gospel of St. Matthew was written in the first persecution, when the tidings of salvation were preached to the Jews only. The Gospel of St. Mark was published during the second persecution of the Christian Church, when the devout Gentiles, such as Cornelius, were appealed to. Both were mercifully adapted to these two stages of the Church's progress. The Gospel of St. Luke was addressed to the Gentiles of Asia, after the first Neronian persecution; and that of St. John was the supplement to the rest, and completed and perfected the canon of the New Testament. Each was fitted to the condition of the Church at the time of their respective publication; and they now form unitedly one sublime and perfect system of truth, the immovable foundation of the temple of God.

NOTE 13.—PART X.

THE transpositions in the order of the sacred narrative which I have thought it advisable to make in this, the preceding, and the following sections, have been adopted from a consideration of the circumstances of the Christian Church at this period. The first persecution of the Church by the Sanhedrin was terminated by the conversion of St. Paul; the second persecution, which had now begun, was the work of Herod Agrippa, the great favorite of the Emperor Claudius. Dr. Lardner is of opinion that the previous repose of the Church continued only a year, or a little longer, and that the disturbances of the Church began in the year 41, when Herod was invested by Claudius with full power. He observes—"From the very beginning of his reign, especially from his arrival in Judæa, and during the remainder of it, the disciples must have been under many difficulties and discouragements." The Jews and their new sovereign, who was very rigid and punctual in his observances of the Mosaic Law, were alike disposed to harass the Christians, as an increasing heresy. The persecution, therefore, which had ceased for a time, would soon be openly renewed; and as James had been put to death, and Peter thrown into prison, I consider this (see note 11, Part X.) to have been the moment when the apostles for the first time left Judæa, and not, as Dr. Lardner supposes, about the year 49 or 50, after the apostolic council. Two circumstances related in the sacred narrative confirm me yet further in this opinion, and seem to justify the transposition I have here made. One is, that we read for the first time that prophets, who appear to have been next in order to the apostles, went down from Jerusalem to Antioch; the other is, that when Paul and Barnabas arrived at Jerusalem, in consequence of their mission from the Church at Antioch, after the prophets had foretold the famine, the Church sent their contributions to the elders, and not to the apostles, (chap. xi. 30.); and that St. Paul, in his account of his coming up to Jerusalem on this occasion, tells us that he found none of the apostles at Jerusalem but James, the Lord's brother, (Gal. i. 19.)—See Lardner's Supplement to the Credibility, chap. vi. on the time when the apostles left Judæa.

NOTE 14.—PART X.

ONE manuscript only, the Cambridge manuscript, reads here, "as we were together," from which it has been inferred, that St. Luke was now with St. Paul. This, however, is not sufficient authority to enable us to conclude against the general opinion of the Church, and the concurrent testimony of manuscripts, that this Evangelist certainly joined St. Paul till his arrival at Mysia, (Acts xvi. 7.)

This prophecy of Agabus resembled those of the ancient prophets, not merely in the certainty but in the manner of its fulfilment. It was accomplished in the first^d and second year of Claudius. A second famine^e was in the fourth year of Claudius, when Helena, queen of the Adiabeni, sent assistance to the Jews. A third famine^f was in the ninth year of Claudius. A fourth^g in the eleventh year.

The most severe of these happened between the fourth and the eighth years of Claudius, under the government of Cuspius Fadus, or under that of Tiberius Alexander, perhaps under both. There is some reason to imagine, that a famine was beginning to be feared in Syria, about the time of the death of Agrippa, the father, or the elder. St. Luke says that this prince, forming the design of making war upon the Tyrians and Sidonians, they sought a peace; which they wanted, "because they obtained their provisions from the king's country." These nations, who had the sea open, would have had no fear of a famine, if there had been plenty of provisions elsewhere.

NOTE 15.—PART X.

It is now that we first meet with the disputed word presbyter. It occurs in the last verse of Acts xi. The corn collected by the Church at Antioch, for the relief of the brethren in Jerusalem, was sent to the presbyters, or elders. The word τὸ πρεσβυτέριον occurs in the New Testament three times—in Luke xxii. 66. Acts xxii. 5. and 1 Tim. iv. 14. The signification of the word must be ascertained from the interpretation given to it in the time of the inspired writers. The term presbytery was applied to an united body of men, and the word presbyter was given to the members of which it was individually composed. In the first of these passages it refers to the Sanhedrin, and it is well translated by Dr. Campbell, “the national senate.” In the second it has the same meaning. In the third it is used by St. Paul to denote the collected body of the elders, or ministers, who assisted at the ordination of Timothy.

As the Jewish Sanhedrin, with their head, consulted for the benefit of the Jewish nation, so might the Christian presbyters, with their head, consult for the public welfare of the Christian Churches. The members of the Sanhedrin were not equal in authority to the nasi, neither were the presbyters of the New Testament, reasoning on the same analogy, equal in authority to him who was their nasi, or prince; that is, the apostle, or his successor. But the presbytery who governed the Christian Church at Jerusalem, and to whom St. Paul went, had no civil power; their authority was exclusively spiritual; and their head, or nasi, or prince, must, therefore, have possessed powers of a spiritual nature, superior to those which were possessed by the general body. And this appears to have been the case from the unanimous testimony of antiquity. The privilege of preaching, teaching, and many other things was common to all; the power of ordaining and deciding was reserved for one. Thus Timothy was ordained with the concurrence and sanction of the presbytery, or general body of ministers; but he was not ordained by them, but by St. Paul. This, then, explains the meaning of the word in the third passage, in which the word presbytery occurs, and enables us to ascertain with greater precision the import of the word presbyter in this passage, where it is used with reference to the officers of a Christian Church.

But we are enabled to learn the precise meaning of the word presbyter not only from the phrase “the presbytery,” but from its usual acceptation both among the Jews and Gentiles. It sometimes occurs in the usual sense of “older in years,” as contrasted with the word “younger,” 1 Tim. v. 1. Sometimes it denotes the elders or predecessors of the existing generation, who had exercised authority as teachers, or were remembered for their exertions, talents, or wisdom, (Matt. xv. 2. Mark vii. 3, 5. Heb. xi. 2.) It is a name of dignity, denoting the members of the Sanhedrin, the rulers of the synagogues, and leaders of Israel in general. It chiefly signifies those among the Jews, who in their several cities were the heads and chiefs of congregations assembled for religious worship; and from this use of the word it was adopted by the writers of the Acts and the Epistles, to describe those who were ordained to officiate in sacred things; to administer the sacraments, to instruct and rule and control their respective congregations, under the direction of a superior head, to whom they were responsible, and to execute every ecclesiastical duty except those few of a higher nature, which were reserved for the acknowledged superiors, by whom they had themselves been appointed to the exercise of their spiritual functions: their power was so great in these departments, and their office was so important, that they are honored with the epithet of bishop, or episcopus, which in subsequent ages was exclusively confined to those who imparted the presbyteral power.

Whitby, however, is of opinion that the elders here mentioned might not even be Christians, but the elders of the Jewish synagogues, or the πρωτοὶ τῶν Ἱεροσολυμιτῶν, the chief men of Jerusalem, to whom King Izates sent relief at the same time; or if they were Christians, they might still be the elders of the synagogues, the Christians then retaining the Jewish rites. To the first of these opinions it may be answered, that in ver. 29, we read that the relief which the Church at Antioch sent to Jerusalem, was intended for their own brethren. The second opinion is conjectural, but not probable. The elders of the synagogues who were converted, might have been admitted among the elders of the infant Church.

Whether the Christian Church was entirely constructed on the model of the Jewish synagogue, as Grotius asserts, will be considered in the notes to the next part of this Arrangement.

NOTE 17.—PART X.

ON THE TIME WHEN ST. PAUL WAS APPOINTED TO THE APOSTOLATE.

I REFER the vision seen by St. Paul in the temple, mentioned in Acts xxii. 17-21., and the commission he then received to preach to the Gentiles, to this period of his history, principally on the authority of Lord Barrington and Dr. Benson, who maintain also that this vision was the same as the ecstasy alluded to in 2 Cor. xii. 2., though Dr. Doddridge would rather refer this vision to St. Paul's first return to Jerusalem.

Dr. Lardner discusses at some length the question when St. Paul was made an apostle, and concludes that he was appointed to the apostolic office on his conversion: one of his principal arguments is, that he began to preach so soon after that event. That the ultimate object which our Saviour proposed to St. Paul was mentioned to him at his conversion is evident from his own narration, Acts xxvi. 17, 18. But it is equally certain that he did not exercise the apostolic functions till the Holy Ghost separated him for the work to which he had been called, and till he had been ordained by the laying on of hands.

With respect to Dr. Lardner's remark, that Paul was made an apostle, it is only necessary to observe, what, perhaps, the learned writer would not acknowledge that there were various duties attached to the various orders of ministers in the service of God. The deacons, evangelists, and elders, might preach as well as the apostles; but to the apostles only belonged the power of governing, and controlling, and superintending the Churches, the ordaining of elders, &c., which things St. Paul did not attempt to do, till he returned from Jerusalem to Antioch.

As the essay of Lord Barrington on this subject is not in the hands of many students of Scripture, I have added an abridgment of it. The learned writer defines an apostle to be one who was a chief and primary minister of the kingdom of Christ, who was commissioned by God to testify the great facts of Christianity, as far as he was personally acquainted with them; particularly that of the resurrection; and who was endued with superior courage in times of danger, and with extraordinary powers of working miracles, and imparting the Holy Ghost.

It is the object of this essay to fix the precise time when Paul received his commission, which Lord Barrington supposes to have been at his second visit to Jerusalem, when he saw Christ in a trance, A. D. 43. In support of the opinion that at his conversion Paul was not made an apostle, the noble author argues, after discussing the question whether St. Paul saw Christ personally at his conversion, and deciding it in the negative, that St. Paul only preached to Jews, or Proselytes of the Gate, before his second journey to Jerusalem, and was not till that time properly an apostle: he seems to have acted only as a prophet or teacher, having only received a prediction that "God had chosen him that he should know his will."

His preaching to the Jews does not prove his apostolic commission, for he was to be the apostle of the Gentiles; nor can this term (Gentiles) be applied to the Proselytes of the Gate. These were obliged to submit to all the Laws of Moses; and by Gentiles, in Scripture, are meant those who served false gods. They are described as those who are "carried away or led after dumb idols; without God, without hope, under the power of the wicked one." St. Paul is said to have "opened their eyes, and turned them from darkness to light, from the power of Satan unto God." This could not be applied to the Proselytes of the Gate, who had the knowledge of God's Law, and are said to be of clean hands, and a pure heart, &c.; and, indeed, the word used in Acts is always applied to idolatrous Gentiles, unless particularly restricted in sense by some other word. It seems that it was not known to the Church, nor indeed to the other apostles, that St. Paul had received a commission to preach to the Gentiles till his third journey to Jerusalem, of which they would probably have been informed, had that commission been given very long before; and he appeals to the being acknowledged as a fellow-apostle by his enemies. None of his Epistles were written till some time after the year 43, and till that period he neither preached or acted with any boldness. His journey to Arabia, immediately after his conversion, Lord Barrington explains thus—He merely preached to Christian Hebrews in an adjoining country to Judæa, who were protected by Aretas, king of the country, in opposition to Herod, with whom he was at war; and here it is not probable he ever preached to proselytes, for Cornelius and his family are said to be the first-fruits of the heathens (or proselytes), who were converted about the year 41, and St. Paul's journey to Arabia took place in A. D. 35.

The account St. Paul gives before Agrippa (Acts xxvi.) has been adduced as an argument that he was appointed an apostle at his conversion; but is it not more likely that he would give a brief and perhaps obscure relation of this event before the king, than that the two accounts of the circumstance (Acts ix. and xxii.) should be incorrect? and in both these places it seems to specify that no commission was received. If, indeed, the Gentiles were converted so early as has been generally supposed, they would have formed part of the Christian Church before Peter preached to the Proselytes of the Gate, which would destroy the wise order in which Christianity was spread—the order our Saviour had before preached—and agrees also to his prediction, as related in Acts i. 8, &c. first to the Jews of the Holy City, then in Judæa, then in Samaria, to the Proselytes, and lastly to the Gentiles. Again Paul says, that at first (after his conversion) he preached "the faith he once destroyed," and that afterwards he committed the Gospel he preached to the Gentiles. He did not change his name to Paul till ten years after his conversion, and he altered it then from a Jewish to a Roman name. He is always placed after Barnabas, till a short time after his second journey to Jerusalem, and the contrary from this period. Lastly, it is not probable that Christ gave him his commission at the time of his first journey to Jerusalem, for he says, himself, "When I was come again to Jerusalem," Acts xxii. 17.; and this may be better seen by comparing Acts ix. 26. and Gal. i. 18. with Acts xi. 29, 30. and xii. 25.

At Paul's second journey to Jerusalem, he received from Christ an apostolic commission. Lord Barrington says, we may be sure this was the first time Paul saw the Saviour, from the particular emphasis he lays on the vision, Acts xxii. 18. He speaks of this revelation to the Corinthians in his Second Epistle to them, which was written about the year 58, as having taken place fourteen years preceding, and seems to point out that he then received his commission as apostle of the Gentiles (2 Cor. xii.), which account agrees well with the prediction of Ananias. He speaks of it as a "high vision and revelation," something whereof he might boast and glory—a mystery now to be made manifest—a revelation of importance—Colos. i. 27. Eph. iii.) where it appears St. Paul thinks it the greatest of all his revelations.

Lord Barrington supposes that he had some view of the glory of heaven, for his encouragement in the difficulties he had to encounter, and makes a singular conjecture concerning the "thorn in the flesh," of which St. Paul speaks in his relation of his vision to the Corinthians, which he supposes to have been some bodily infirmity caused by the heavenly glory, which was too great for him to bear; as stammering, or a convulsive motion in the muscles of his face, which made him fear that the Gentiles, who paid great regard to eloquence and outward appearances, would despise him, as Moses was afraid of appearing before Pharaoh for the same reason. He therefore besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from him; but after he was assured that Christ's strength should be made perfect in his infirmities, he gloried in his weakness.

There were none of the apostles at Jerusalem at Paul's second journey there, probably that it might be manifest that he received his mission from no man; and of this circumstance he often particularly informs us, that he received his message from Christ alone^b.

NOTE 18.—PART X.

MR. FLEMING would place this passage after the account of the death of James, and in the interval between the committal and the deliverance of Peter from prison. Dr. Lardner, whose authority I follow, adheres to the present order of the sacred text, and argues that the commission of Barnabas and Saul was not given till after the death of Herodⁱ.

NOTE 1.—PART XI.

ON THE OCCASION OF ST. PAUL AND BARNABAS RECEIVING THEIR APPOINTMENT TO THE APOSTOLATE.

THE learned and judicious Hooker^a has conjectured that Barnabas and Saul were now set apart for their apostleship, to supply the vacancies in the original number, one having been killed by Herod, the other appointed bishop of Jerusalem. Dr. Hales^b approves this opinion. It is much to be regretted that the seventh book of the Ecclesiastical Polity is one of those which we cannot be certain received the last corrections of their author, or indeed were certainly written by him. The conjecture, however, is that of one who had carefully studied the Scripture narrative, and is by no means improbable.

As St. Paul and Barnabas had been already peculiarly set apart to their high office, we cannot attribute their authority to the prophets and teachers in the Church at Antioch, who here officiated by an especial command of God, through the Holy Spirit. St. Paul expressly declares that he was not an apostle by man.

^a Hooker's Eccles. Polity, lib. vii. sec. 4. p. 337.

^b Hales's Anal. of Chronol. vol. ii. pt. 2. p. 1083.

We are assured, too, in another passage of Scripture, that "without all doubt the less is blessed of the greater:" if St. Paul, therefore, had derived his commission as the apostle of the Gentiles from the Church at Antioch, the prophets who set him apart must have been either superior or equal to him. They were not superior, for the apostles were always ranked above any other class of ministers in the Christian Church—if they were equal, they must have been elevated themselves to the rank of apostles, as a learned divine has attempted to prove^c.

The apostles were, in one sense of the word, each of them apostles to the whole world: but inasmuch as each took his peculiar department, he might be called the apostle of that district or division of their Lord's vineyard. Thus we are assured that the twelve took each of them his province, and ecclesiastical history gives us the name of their several districts. It is not improbable that when the Holy Spirit had separated them for the apostolic office in general, that St. Paul and Barnabas consented to become the apostles of the Church at Antioch in particular. That Church had lately bestowed an honorable title upon the followers of Christ. It was the principal society which did not consist of merely Jewish converts, and as St. Paul was set apart as the apostle of the Gentiles, it does not appear unreasonable to suppose that he would be willing to add to his influence the sanction of this venerable Church. The Church of Christ was at this time truly catholic. It formed, as it ought ever to have done, and as it will again at the coming period of its promised prosperity, one great society. It was united through all its congregations under the authority of its superior pastors, who assembled in council to decide upon any matter in which all were interested. There was no supremacy either of St. Peter, or any other of the apostles, and no schism or heresy among its people. The condescending of St. Paul to become the apostle of the Church at Antioch, so far as it might be useful to the catholic Church to act with their sanction, does not imply that their authority was superior to his. His object may have been to obtain in those places which were under the influence of Antioch, a better or an easier introduction than he would have otherwise experienced. This consideration appears to solve that great difficulty which many have experienced, in reconciling the apostolic commission of St. Paul by the Holy Spirit, with his being set apart by ecclesiastical officers of an inferior description.

Among the prophets who were now in the Church at Antioch, we read of one Manaen.

^c Scott's Christian Life, part ii. ch. vii. p. 491, folio edit. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. c. 10. sec. 5. Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 685, and vol. i. 288-2008. ap. Biscoe On the Acts.

"There is an account in Josephus of one Manaen," says Dr. Biscoe, "an Essene, who foretold concerning Herod the Great, that he should be a king, whilst he was yet a boy at school: and when it actually came to pass that he was king, being sent for by Herod, and asked how long he should reign, whether ten years? he answered, Yes.—Twenty years? Yes; thirty years. Upon which Herod gave him his right hand, and from that time held in great esteem such as were of the sect of Essenes." Mr. Zachutus, a Jewish writer, says, that this Manaen was vice-president of the Sanhedrin under Hillel, and that Shammai succeeded him; that he went off into Herod's family and service with fourscore eminent men; that he uttered many prophecies, foretold to Herod when he was yet very young, that he should come to reign; and when he did reign, being sent for, foretold that he should reign above thirty years. The talmudists also say, "That Manaen went out, and Shammai succeeded him. But whither went Manaen? Abai says, he went into the service of the king, and with him went fourscore pair of disciples, clothed all in silk." It is very probable that a son of this Manaen, or some nephew, or other kinsman to whom he gave his name, was educated in the family of Herod the Great. The young Manaen might be of the same age, and have the same preceptors and tutors as had Herod Antipas, one of the sons of Herod the Great, and for that reason be said to be brought up with him in particular. This Herod Antipas was, after his father's death, tetrarch of Galilee, and is the person who put John the Baptist to death. Josephus says, of the first named Manaen, that he was reputed a man of an excellent life. The talmudists tell us, that when he left the vice-presidency of the Sanhedrin to go into Herod's service, he went into all manner of wickedness. May they not have fixed this infamy upon him from his having shown some mark of esteem for Christ and his followers? or from the younger Manaen's becoming a Christian?

NOTE 2.—PART XI.

SERGIUS PAULUS was the first convert of the idolatrous Gentiles. He was a magistrate; and, by his conversion and influence, the preaching of St. Paul would probably excite still greater attention. The conversion of a magistrate, as the first-fruits of the idolatrous world, may be intended to show unto us that the Divine Author of Christianity appeals in a more especial manner to those who are vested with authority and power, to embrace his religion, and to sanction and protect it to the utmost.

"It is observable here," says Bishop Marsh, "that the Evangelist Luke, relating these transactions of Paul in Cyprus, gives to Sergius Paulus, the Roman governor of that island, the Greek title of Ἀνθύπατος, which was applied only to those governors of provinces who were invested with proconsular dignity. And on the supposition that Cyprus was not a province of this description, it has been inferred, that the title given to Sergius Paulus in the Acts of the Apostles, was a title that did not properly belong to him.

"A passage, indeed, has been quoted from Dion Cassius, who, speaking of the governors of Cyprus, and some other Roman provinces, applies to them the same title which is applied to Sergius Paulus. But as Dion Cassius is speaking of several Roman provinces at the same time, one of which was certainly governed by a proconsul, it has been supposed that, for the sake of brevity, he used one term for all of them, whether it applied to all of them or not. That Cyprus, however, ought not to be excepted, and that the title which he employed, as well as St. Luke, really did belong to the Roman governors of Cyprus, appears from the inscription on a coin belonging to Cyprus itself, and struck in the very age in which Sergius Paulus was governor of that island. It was struck in the reign of Claudius Cæsar, whose head and name are on the face of it: and in the reign of Claudius Cæsar St. Paul visited Cyprus. It was a coin belonging to the people of that island, as appears from the word ΚΥΠΡΙΩΝ on the reverse; and, though not struck while Sergius Paulus himself was governor, it was struck, as appears from the inscription on the reverse, in the time of Proclus, who was next to Sergius Paulus in the government of that island. And on this coin the same title, Ἀνθυπάτος, is given to Proclus, which is given by St. Luke to Sergius Paulus^d. That Cyprus was a proconsulate, is also evident from an ancient inscription of Caligula's reign, (the predecessor of Claudius), in which Aquius Seura is called the proconsul of Cyprus^e.

NOTE 4.—PART XI.

IT is uncertain on what account the name of Paul is used by St. Luke through the remainder of his narrative instead of Saul. Some have supposed that Paul was the Roman name, given him from his birth, with his Jewish patronymic, Saul. Others, that it was a token of his humility; the word "Saul" meaning "beloved," or "desirable;" and "Paul" denoting "weak," or "little." Others, and it is the most general opinion, that the name Paul was assumed by the Apostle in memory of the conversion of the proconsul Sergius Paulus:—"A primo ecclesiæ spolio proconsule Sergio Paulo victoriæ suæ trophæa retulit, erexitque vexillum ut Paulo, ex Saulo vocaretur^f." Others, that it was assumed as a name more pleasing to the ears of his audiences among the Gentiles.

NOTE 5.—PART XI.

ON THE OFFICERS AND MODES OF WORSHIP IN THE SYNAGOGUES.

THE learned Mr. Biscoe^h observes, that St. Paul, as a Jewish doctor, or teacher, was privileged to teach in the synagogues. We cannot sufficiently admire the manner in which the providence of God ordained that every thing should contribute to the success of the new religion. The whole world was under one government, the protection of which ensured the common safety of the Jews and Christians under their own laws. When the Jews persecuted the Christians the Romans did not interfere, because they considered, at first, the Christians as a Jewish sect, and probably as very little better than criminals. The divisions between them must have been soon observed by the idolatrous Gentiles, and would naturally excite their curiosity and attention. The Jews had hitherto been united among themselves, and had met with no opposition from their own nation in the public profession of their religion, till the Christians proclaimed to them, and to the world, the advent of the long-promised Messiah—the abolition of the Mosaic Law, and the establishment of a more perfect dispensation, in which all mankind were alike interested. These novel and important truths, together with the miracle which the Apostle had so lately wrought, were sufficient to secure to him the regard and consideration of the heathen, and convince them at least of his superiority and power. For God "ordereth all things according to the counsel of his own will."

Lightfoot, Vitranga, Grotius, Selden, and many others, have endeavoured to prove from this, and other passages, that the ministers, and the modes of worship, in the primitive Christian Churches, were derived from, and were entirely assimilated to, the officers and services in the Jewish synagogues. As the first places of worship among the Christians were either the temple, the synagogues, or the ὑπερῶνα, or upper rooms, so frequently mentioned in the Acts, it is by no means improbable that many of their customs would be derived from their former faith and worship; but it cannot be proved that the Christian Church was the mere transcript of that which preceded it. We have abundant reason to believe, that the modes of worship among the early Christians were, in many respects, totally dissimilar to those of the synagogue.

The learned Joseph Medeⁱ, as I have shown above, has defended the opinion at great length, that there were churches, ἐκκλησίαι, properly so called, even in the apostolic age. He considers this word to mean churches, or places for worship, from its opposition to οἰκίαι, their own houses. See 1 Cor. xi. 22.

The ὑπερῶνον, or cœnaculum, on Mount Sion, where the apostles are said to have assembled when the cloven tongues descended upon them, was afterwards enclosed. When it is considered to what a great variety of purposes the "upper rooms," mentioned so often in the Acts of the Apostles, were applied, it appears that the opinion of Mede is most probably correct, that these were the places at first set apart for holy meetings; and, in process of time, as the multitude of believers increased, some wealthy or devout Christian gave his whole house or mansion, while he lived, if he could do so, or bequeathed it at his death, to the saints, to be set apart for religious uses. After this, as the Church increased, structures were built for regular worship.

Mede quotes a passage from Philo, to prove ⁱ Mede's Works, book ii. p. 319. Treatises concerning Churches; that is, appropriate places for Christian worship, both in and ever since the Apostles' times. See also p. 323, fol. edit. "Erant autem illa privata ὑπερῶνα, loca a Judæis semper sacris usibus destinata, saltem ex quo Daniel propheta ascendisse in cœnaculum ad orandum dicebatur: καὶ αἱ θυρίδες ἀνεῳγμέναι αὐτῷ ἐν τοῖς ὑπερῶναις κατέναυτι Ἱερουσαλὴμ. ut et Sara filia Raguelis dicitur descendisse ἐκ τοῦ ὑπερῶνου, ubi oraverat. Unde Judæi sapientes suos appellabant בני צלליה filios cœnaculi. In eo celebrabant Pascha, Marc. xiv. 15. Et ipse vobis demonstrabit, ἀνώγειον, cœnaculum grande stratum. In eo corpora mortuorum lavata prius reponabant, ut de Dorcade legimus, Act. ix. 37. Quam cum lavissent, posuerunt eam in cœnaculo. Unde et Petrum venientem dicuntur adduxisse in cœnaculum. Quare Apostoli ab ascensione Domini reversi Hierosolyma, ἀπέβησαν εἰς τὸ ὑπερῶνον, ubi erant perseverantes unanimiter in oratione et supplicatione, Act. i. 13."—Pearson. Lectiones in Acta Apostol. p. 31.

that the Essenes at Alexandria, who were probably the first Christians at that place, assembled for worship in sacred places, called Σευρεῖα. He reasons also from St. Paul's salutations to the Churches in the houses of various believers.

These remarks on the places where the early Christians met, will at least prove that there was nothing so peculiarly sacred in the synagogue, that they should confine themselves to its walls, or be fettered by its institutions.

The Jews were required to erect synagogues wherever ten men, free and of full age, בני חורין ונדרין, could assemble for worship, whether it was in the towns or villages: but in the city they were always required to be men of leisure, that is, of competence and respectability, עשרה בטלנים. Vitranga and Lightfoot differ on the qualifications of these ten men; but their opinions on this point do not affect the conclusion, that there is no custom similar to this in the Christian Church; for in the Gospel it is expressly declared, "Where two or three are met together in His name, He is there in the midst of them."

The consecration of the synagogues, it is true, was made by prayer—prayer also is used in the consecration of the Christian churches. But this resemblance is too general to entitle us to assert that the Christians, in consecrating their places of worship, paid exclusive regard to the service of the synagogue.

The accounts of the ancient churches given by Eusebius, further prove to us that the early Christians had regard to the model, or ground plan of the temple at Jerusalem, rather than to the synagogue. With the exception of the pulpit, which was common to both, the difference was remarkable. The synagogue was surrounded and filled with benches, all looking to the veil, which enclosed the ark, or chest, where the sacred books were deposited. The uppermost seats of the synagogues fronted the people, and on them were seated the rulers of the synagogue, the rabbis, and the principal men. The Christian churches, on the contrary, were divided into three parts. 1. The Narthex, or antitemple, where the penitents and catechumens stood; 2. The Naos, or temple, where the ^j Lightfoot supposes that these ten men were thus divided: Three were the ἀρχισυνάγωγοι, who had the principal management of the synagogue; one was the ἱερεὺς, the episcopus, or bishop of the synagogue; three were deacons, who managed the poor. The eighth he will not so confidently affirm, but he believes was the תורנמן, the interpreter. The ninth and tenth were united with another of the congregation, and were the triumvirate which governed the rest. But see on these points Vitranga, Archisynagogus, p. 22, &c. and Pettit's Observations, p. 25. "Moderatoribus Synagogorum, minus recte annumerantur, עשרה בטלנים decem otiosi, &c. tales autem non erant, nisi in uribus majoribus." Iken. Antiq. Hebraica, part i. cap. ix. De Synagogis, sec. 9.

communicants had their respective places ; and, 3. The Bema, or sanctuary, where the clergy stood to officiate^k. Should this description be correct, it demonstrates that the Christians rejected the innovation of the synagogues, and restored the purer temple model.

In the synagogues were laid up not only the sacred books, and the box for alms, but lights for burning, trumpets and horns for proclaiming fasts, Sabbaths, &c. None of which things were admitted into the Christian churches.

But while we assert that these customs were excluded, we cannot but acknowledge that there is a similarity in some instances, which perhaps could not be avoided, as the early worshippers of Christ had been so long under the jurisdiction of the Jewish discipline. But these customs must not be, as they too often are, mistaken for institutions ; for in many instances we find them condemned by the inspired writers. Thus St. James, chap. ii. 3. declaims against the precedence which was allowed to the rich, who probably took the upper seats which were granted to the Jewish rulers in the synagogue, &c. St. James was the apostle of the circumcision ; the places of worship, therefore, in his district, would be more likely than others to be conducted on the model of the synagogue.

The persons in the synagogue, who were invested with office and dignity, were first the ראש הכנסת, the ruler of the synagogue, the ἀρχισυναγωγός of the Gospels. There were several of these in one synagogue. They directed its internal economy^l, gave permission to strangers to preach, and were respectable for age or influence, and decided inferior causes.

These offices we find were all divided in the Christian Church. Its civil concerns were managed by the deacons, as is implied in the purposes for which they were originally set apart. So, likewise, no Christian minister could ever give another person permission to preach, unless he had been previously ordained to that office.

It is singular to observe how often Vitringa is compelled to acknowledge that his parallel between the ministers of the synagogue, and the first Christian ministers, entirely fails^m. The ruler of the synagogue wore a sudarium ;

^k Bingham's Eccles. Antiq. vol. iii. book viii. chap. 3.

^l ראש הכנסת על פיו נחתבין דברי הכנסת — "The ruler of the synagogue is he by whose voice the business of the synagogue is settled." R. Solomon, In Annot. ad Sotā, cap. vii. sec. 7. ap. Vitringa, Archisynagogus, p. 728.

^m "Ecclesia tamen Christiana primæva, hunc titulum synagogæ reliquit. Præpositos suos non vocavit ἀρχοντας τῆς ἐκκλησίας : sed potius presbyteros, episcopos, pastores, doctores ; idque ob hanc manifestam rationem, quia ecclesia novi fœderis nullam fert ἀρχήν, nullum imperium." — De Synag. Veteri, lib. iii. pars i. cap. 9. p. 728. "Præter hunc titulum, alius quidem quantum mihi constat, in scriptis N. T. non reperitur, qui directe ad præfecturam synagogæ respicit." — Vitringa, De Archisyn. ap. De Vitringa confesses that he is ignorant whether the Christian minister was ever known to wear it alsoⁿ. His attempts to prove its use in the Christian churches, seem to me to be quite unsuccessful. Again, the ruler of the synagogue was sometimes called the pastor of the congregation ; but he who in this capacity had the power of inflicting stripes, and other corporal punishments, was not exactly such a shepherd as Christ would desire to instruct his flock. The rulers of the synagogues were called by various names, expressive of various degrees of power and honor. They first answered Amen to the prayers—they appointed the reader of the Scriptures—the reciter of the prayers—permitted any stranger to preach, a privilege exceedingly useful to the apostles, and who were thus legally permitted to address the Jews before they spoke to the Gentiles. There were many in each congregation according to its magnitude ; they were equal, in the opinion of Vitringa, though not in the opinion of Grotius. In short, they seemed to have filled the various and opposite offices of churchwarden, parish clerk, and justice of the peace ; they were partly civil, partly ecclesiastical ; an union of characters unknown in the Christian church in any period of its history. Yet this is the officer whom Vitringa would assimilate to the principal minister in the Christian church, and Christian congregation. Instead of the divine and simple appointment of bishop, priest, and deacon, he would encumber the primitive Church with all the customs of degenerated Judaism, and surname them the institutions of Christianity : and all this is written in pure zeal for the presbyteral government, in opposition to that of episcopacy.

Another officer of the synagogue was the שליח ציבור, or angel, or messenger of the congregation. It was his duty to offer up prayers for the whole congregation. This name has been applied in the Revelations to the heads of the Churches in Asia. It has therefore been inferred by Lightfoot, who wished to assimilate the rites of the Christian Church to those of the synagogue, that the name and office of the bishop, or episcopus, were the same as those of the sheliach tziabor, which he identifies with the chazan. His remarks are fully confuted by Vitringa^o.

I have, however, shown that there is no analogy whatever between these and the Christian minister. Vitringa, De Synag. Vet. lib. iii. part viii. cap. 1. p. 614.

ⁿ "Episcopi vero an in primis ecclesiis pro ἀρχισυναγωγόν, more sudaria agitarint, ego equidem fateor me ignorare," &c. For the meaning of the phrase sudaria agitarint, I must refer the reader to the treatise itself.

The שלח ציבור, says a learned Hebraist, was,—

1. To be an example and an instructor.
2. To begin the prayers.
3. To recite the prayers before the ark, in which the Law was placed in the synagogue.
4. He recited some peculiar prayers.
5. Read the Law.
6. Ordered what was to be done in public worship.
7. After service, directed the priest when to bless the people.
8. And, if the priest was absent, he blessed them himself.
9. Blew the trumpet at the beginning of the new year.
10. Scattered ashes on the fast days.

A loud and clear voice—integrity of life—devotion and earnestness—a large family—suitable age—were required^p.

The חזן, chazan, is generally supposed to have been of inferior rank; the same as the ὑπηρέτης, who took the book from the reader; as we are told was done in the case of our Lord, when he preached for the first time in the synagogue of Nazareth. He was an attendant only, and does not appear to have been at all analogous to the Christian minister.

The פרוש, who took charge of the poor, &c. have been already noticed.

The next description of officers in the service of the synagogue, were the זקנים, or elders. We will yet further inquire what is meant by this word among the Jews, and then what was denoted by its synonym πρεσβύτεροι, among the Christians. It will, I think, appear that there is not sufficient analogy between them to warrant a conclusion that one was a counterpart to the other. Both were distinguished by the same name, as both were considered entitled to deference from their age, authority, rank, and piety. They were so named, because they were supposed to possess the influence of age^q. Their offices, however, were in all respects dissimilar.

The word זקנים, or presbyter, or elders, among the Jews, was alike used to describe their learned men, the members of the Sanhedrin and their literary men. And as education was universal, and a certain proficiency in their sacred literature was deemed essential to all men of respectability, it may be considered as a word applicable to eminent men in general, who were not distinguished by some more particular title. The title was likewise extended to those, who for their acknowledged superiority and piety, were known by the name of החכמים, or “the wise men.” It also denoted the powerful men, Matt. xxvi. 3., or the men of influence and authority^r.

From this general meaning of the word the Sanhedrin was called the Presbytery, Acts xxii. 5. Age was peculiarly honored among the ancient Jews^s: and the word which expressed seniors, or elders, was consequently used as an appellation of dignity.

Such were the significations of the word “elder” among the ancient Jews: we shall see that the word was never used in this very extensive sense to denote those persons who were set apart for the service of the primitive Church. The Christian elders were persons appointed to fulfil certain specific duties, of a very different kind and nature. They were prophets, evangelists, teachers, interpreters of tongues; they had been endued, for the most part, with that great diversity of spiritual gifts, which must have fitted them for the infinitely higher duties than the Jewish elders ever fulfilled, even if they had not been further dedicated to the service of Christ by the laying on of the hands of the apostles. As the word presbyter designated the most honorable class among the Jews, it was transferred to the Christians, as the most significant and appropriate appellation for pious, holy, and gifted men. Their offices were different; their names the same.

One custom among Christians is more evidently derived from the synagogue. The Jews ordained elders by a triumvirate, or by three elders; with imposition of hands, prayer, and fasting. In the same manner, three bishops are necessary to consecrate a bishop; a circumstance which seems to confirm the opinion, that the episcopal polity was established in large towns. Every synagogue was required to have its consistory of twenty-three or twenty-four elders. But a synagogue was to be built wherever only ten men of leisure could be found to form a congregation. Some synagogues therefore would not be able to supply the consistory. It appears not improbable, therefore, that the consistory would be established in the principal synagogue of a city, and the smaller synagogues refer their civil and ecclesiastical causes to this tribunal. The apostles followed this plan, and ordained in every city those who might ordain others.

As the Christian presbyters were endued with miraculous powers, with the gift of tongues and of healing, with the spirit of prophecy, &c., it would be absurd to imagine that they were to form a council in every Church, as assistant lay counsellors to the officiating minister or presbyter. Dr. Hammond's hypothesis is more probable than this. He thinks "that the apostles ordained only the two orders of bishop and deacon; of whom the bishop was placed in every city, with power to ordain presbyters under him, as occasion required." When we remember the wonderful gifts with which the early converts were honored—the exceeding dignity attached to the word presbyter—and the rapid increase of converts in the first three centuries, which the Holy Spirit would have foreseen and provided for, it cannot appear impossible, but rather probable, that the apostles ordained both bishops and presbyters, although the distinct and strict meaning of these words was not originally attached to them.

The apostles, for instance, set apart Timothy and Titus, with power to ordain elders; that is, with powers which were granted exclusively to bishops; but it does not appear that this appellation was assigned to either of these eminent disciples. The persons to whom the power of ordaining was committed, did not themselves assume any title, but were indiscriminately called presbyters, bishops, evangelists, or disciples. Their office, however, was eminently superior to those to whom the power of ordaining had not been committed; and in the following age, after the death of the apostles, they were distinguished by the peculiar appellation of bishop, as the power and authority of the apostles seemed to devolve upon them. At this time an evident distinction was made between bishop and presbyter; and here we clearly trace the three orders of the Christian ministry; first in the apostles—bishops, or presbyters, and deacons—and, after the death of the apostles, in bishops, presbyters, and deacons. And as these three orders were so evidently set apart by the Holy Spirit of God for the service of the Christian Church, it is advisable to look for the origin of the Christian priesthood from God, and not from man. It was appointed by the delegated ambassadors of Christ, and not from the customs of the synagogue.

The subject is too extensive to be further discussed in a note. The reader who has leisure is referred to the laborious and learned volumes of Vitranga, Lightfoot, and Grotius. It is, however, well worthy the attention of the theological student.

NOTE 6.—PART IX.

THIS oration of St. Paul, the last he addressed peculiarly to the former objects of his patriotic affection, is most worthy the attention of the sons of Israel at present. Nothing can be added to the arguments which the apostles have addressed in their reported sermons and their invaluable epistles, to their beloved countrymen: and their doctrines seem to be all comprised in this address of St. Paul. He reminds them of the former mercies of God to the family of Abraham, and the prediction that their Messiah should be descended from David; and asserts that this Messiah was Jesus of Nazareth. He appeals to the well-known fact of the resurrection of Christ from the dead, as the principal evidence of the truth of his declaration, and concludes with enforcing that one important truth, in which the whole human race are so immediately interested, that forgiveness of sins is to be proclaimed through Him alone; and that Christ alone can justify the Christian, not only from those offences, from which they were typically purified by the ceremonial Law, but from those sins also for which that Law had made no provision. For we have now the comfortable hope that all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven to men, through the mercy and intercession of Christ, on the condition of sincere repentance, amendment of life, and faith in the great atonement.

NOTE 7.—PART XI.

THE word in the original ought rather to have been rendered, for forty years "he carried them in his arms, in the wilderness, as a nurse." It is used in a similar sense in the Alexandrian septuagint version, Deut. i. 31., ἐτροφοφόρησαι σε Κύριος, ὡς εἴ τις τροφοφορήσαι ἄνθρωπος τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ. "The LORD thy God bare thee, as a man doth bear his son," is the translation in the authorized version. For ἐτροποφόρησεν, the common reading which our translators have rendered "He bare their manners," Griesbach would insert ἐτροφοφόρησεν, as the undoubted reading. He is supported by the authority of Pfafflus, Casaubon, Hammond, Mill, Matthai, Ernesti, Rosenmüller, and Valckenaer. Ap. Kuinoel, In Lib. Hist. N. T. Comment. vol. iv. p. 445. See, however, Whitby in loc., who does not consider the alteration necessary; and interprets the words in the present Greek Vulgate, in the same manner as if Griesbach's reading had been adopted. He quotes Origen as explaining ἐτροποφόρησεν, by ἀναδέξασθαι σὲ πρὸς τὸ ἀσθενεῖς, "to accommodate himself to the infirmities of children."

NOTE 8.—PART XI.

THE Apostle seems here to contradict the account in 1 Kings vi. 1. "And it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month Zif, which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the LORD."

Sir Norton Knatchbull, in his Annotations upon difficult Texts, has considered the various solutions proposed by learned men of the difficulty before us; and concludes, that the words of the Apostle should not be understood as meaning how long God gave them judges, but when he gave them; and therefore proposes that the first words of this verse, Καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα ὡς ἔτεσι τετρακοσίοις καὶ πενήκοντα, should be referred to the words going before, ver. 17., that is, to the time when the God of the children of Israel chose their fathers.

Now this time, wherein God may properly be said to have chosen their fathers, about four hundred and fifty years before he gave them judges, is to be computed from the birth of Isaac, in whom God may properly be said to have chosen their fathers; for God, who had chosen Abraham out of all the people of the earth, chose Isaac at this time out of the children of Abraham, in whose family the covenant was to rest. To make this computation evident, let us observe, that from the birth of Isaac to the birth of Jacob are sixty years; from thence to their going into Egypt, one hundred and thirty; from thence to the Exodus, two hundred and ten; from thence to their entrance into Canaan, forty; from that to the division of the land (about which time it is probable they began to settle their government by judges), seven years; which sums make four hundred and forty-seven, viz. $60+130+210+40+7=447$. And should this be reckoned from the year before the birth of Isaac, when God established his covenant between himself and Abraham, and all his seed after him, Gen. xvii. 19., at which time God properly chose their fathers, then there will be four hundred and forty-eight years, which brings it to within two years of the four hundred and fifty; which is sufficiently exact to bring it within the Apostle's ὡς, "about," or "nearly."

Some have made the period four hundred and fifty-two years; which, though two years more than the Apostle's round number, is still sufficiently reconcilable with his qualifying particle ὡς, "about." And, it may be added, that the most correct writers often express a sum totally, but not exactly.

Calmet has paraphrased these passages nearly to the same sense; the text may be thus connected, ver. 19. And having destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot, about one hundred and fifty years after. And afterwards he gave them judges, to the time of Samuel the prophet. The paraphrase of Calmet is the following:—"The God of this people of Israel chose our fathers in the person of Abraham; he promised him the land of Canaan, and four hundred and fifty years after this promise, and the birth of Isaac, who was the son and heir of the promise, he put them in possession of that land, which he had promised so long before."

Lightfoot remarks on this passage:—"Amongst the many things that are offered upon this difficulty, I would choose this; that in this number are reckoned the years of the judges, and the years of those tyrants that oppressed Israel, computing them disjunctly and singly: which, at first sight, any one would think ought to be so reckoned, but that 1 Kings vi. 1. gives a check to a too large computation. "The years of the judges and tyrants, thus distinguished, answer the sum exactly:—

The Judges.	The Tyrants.
Othniel.... 40	Chushan..... 8
Ehud..... 80	Eglon..... 18
Deborah... 40	Sisera..... 20
Gideon.... 40	Midian..... 7
Abimelech.. 3	Ammon..... 18
Tola..... 23	The Philistines 40
Jair..... 22	—
Jephthah... 6	In all.. 111
Ibsan..... 7	—
Elon..... 10
Abdon..... 8
Samson ... 20
Eli..... 40
In all.. 339

So that reckoning three hundred and thirty-nine, and one hundred and eleven together, the sum amounts exactly to four hundred and fifty." vol. ii. p. 689. fol. ed.

NOTE 9.—PART XI.

THE construction of this verse is difficult. The word ἡγούμενοι should be taken with τοῦτον, and ἀγροῦσαντες, with τὰς πόλεις. In which case it would run thus—They that dwell at Jerusalem, in condemning Him, not having known the voices of the prophets, which are read every Sabbath day, have fulfilled (the prophecies). But see more on the passage in Knatchbull, Hammond, and the references and discussion in Kuinoel, In Lib. Hist. N. T. Comment. vol. iv. p. 455.

NOTE 10.—PART XI.

THE sure mercies of David are everlasting life, of which the resurrection was a pledge,

* Hebrew and Talmudical Exerc. on the Acts, Lightfoot, vol. viii. p. 466. See Dr. A. Clarke in loc.—Whitby—Doddridge—Bowyer's Crit. Conj. and particularly the Critici Sacri on 1 Kings vi. 18.

and the blessings of the redemption of Christ an earnest, even in this world. The expression τὰ ὅσια, "holy," or "just things," is the word used by the LXX in Isa. lv. 3. and in other places, for the word חַסְדִּים, "mercies." The covenant which God established with David, 2 Sam. vii. 11, 12., which is explained by Ps. lxxxix. 3, 4, 28, 29, 36., implies that the house of David should never be extinct. It should endure as the days of heaven, and as the sun, to all generations. As far as relates to this earth, his family has long been extinct; the prophecy must therefore receive another interpretation.

NOTE 11.—PART XI.

IN this verse there is a great number of various readings; instead of "when the Jews were going out of the synagogue," several manuscripts of great repute, with all the Syriac, the Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, and Italian, read, "As they were going out, they entreated that these words should be preached unto them in the course of the week," or the next Sabbath, so that, according to this well-accredited reading, the words ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς τῶν Ἰουδαίων, are left out in the first clause, αὐτῶν being put in their place, and τὰ ἔθνη, "the Gentiles," is wholly omitted in the second clause. The most eminent critics approve of this reading; indeed, it stands on such authority, as to render it almost indubitable. Of the αὐτῶν, "them," which is substituted for the first clause, Professor White says, lectio indubie genuina; this reading is undoubtedly genuine—and of the τὰ ἔθνη εἰς, he says, certissime delenda; they should certainly be expunged. We are therefore to understand the words thus: that "as they were going out," on the breaking up of the assembly, some of them desired that they might have these doctrines preached to them on the ensuing week, or Sabbath.

NOTE 12.—PART XI.

ON THE SYSTEMS OF CALVIN AND ARMINIUS.

"As many as were ordained to eternal life believed." The word τεταγμένοι, here rendered by our translators "ordained," has been more accurately interpreted by Dr. Hammond "disposed." The word properly signifies to marshal (as for a fight), to constitute, order, appoint, &c. See the very learned note of Dr. Hammond in loc. Mr. Scott defends the common translation. Dr. Doddridge selects the word "determined," or "resolved," to obtain eternal life. Mede translates the word as denoting the Proselytes of the Gate. Limboreh and Maius (apud Elsner, Critici Sacri, vol. xiii. p. 621), would render it "predestined" or "preordained." Elsner would interpret it by "destined," or, "appointed before."

Sir Norton Knatchbull would connect the words εἰς ζωὴν with the verb, not the participle, and read the passage ἐπιστευσαν, ὅσοι ᾗσαν τεταγμένοι, εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, "and as many as were collected together believed in everlasting life." רַב, which is translated by the LXX, συνάγω, is rendered by others τάτιομαι, as Exod. xxix. 33. This interpretation, Kuinoel justly observes, is unwarranted and unsupported by authority; neither is ζωὴν αἰώνιον ever used to denote the Christian doctrine; nor πιστεύειν εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, to become a Christian.

It is certainly time that the great question which once absorbed all other points of theology, the Aaron's rod of divinity, should be considered in its true light. Prone to extremes, we seem determined to avoid one error by flying to another. The horror with which the Calvinist and Arminian regarded each other, about the time of the Synod of Dort, however ludicrous, in some measure still continues to prevail in existing Christian societies. Both parties are agreed in the same principles, or premises, both err in their conclusions. Both acknowledge that the future must be known to the Deity, and that man must have sufficient possession of the powers of his will to make him an accountable being. If God foresees all things, he must foreknow the eventual destinies of men—further than this we cannot penetrate; the difficulties that crowd upon us are utterly inexplicable if we permit ourselves to speculate on the subject. We can only arrive at some few very general conclusions, and there we must rest. We may be assured that every man who is admitted into the visible Church on earth will be hereafter received into a future state of happiness, unless he wilfully renders himself unfit for it. No man will be condemned to misery because God has decreed it. The truth is, that we call upon our reason to comprehend God, and we are soon bewildered. Our guide is revelation. Our plan of studying that revelation must be to believe in the facts recorded, and make those facts the interpreters of the doctrines. We have had Calvinistic systems, and Arminian systems, deduced by forcing passages from their context, and by the most violent perversions of the simplest texts, of which the peculiar primary meaning has never once been regarded. The Scripture is appealed to with confidence by both the Pelagian and the Calvinist, and both are confuted from the same book. The formularies of the Church of England are appealed to with equal confidence by both classes of religionists; and nothing, perhaps, can more fully prove the Scriptural nature of its services, than the same result to both of these contending parties.

All who are received into heaven are elected and predestinated, as it were, by the foreknowledge of God, to that end; and all are received into heaven who accept the Gospel of Christ; all are enabled to accept it by the same plan of mercy which proposed the system of redemption to mankind. The Gospel is offered to all; the same grace is promised to all. Those who resist its influences gradually quench the Divine Spirit, while those who are led by it, to them is imparted grace upon grace. Thus the salvation of man proceeds from God, who is the Author of it, and who in his infinite mercy vouchsafes the assistance of his Holy Spirit, and appeals to him by every motive which can affect the will or influence the heart. The atonement of Christ is the condition of our acceptance, and the Spirit of God is the means of our acceptance; working in us a complete change of nature, subduing the flesh with its affections and lusts, till the old man or the inferior nature dies in us, and all things become new, Christ living in us, (Gal. ii. 20.) Thus neither the Calvinist nor the Pelagian can claim Scriptural authority in favor of their tenets, without admitting the deductions of his opponent. Both are right in their premises, both are wrong in their conclusions; because both exclude a great part of truth to favor a preconceived hypothesis.

NOTE 13.—PART XI.

It is difficult to ascertain what this language or dialect might have been. Jablonski, who has written a very learned treatise on the subject, reprinted in the thirteenth volume of the Critici Sacri, and more lately in the first number of the new edition of Stephens's Thesaurus, endeavours to prove that it was a Greek dialect, in great measure derived from the Assyrian, and mingled with Syriac. Guhlingius (ap. Kuinoel) wishes to show that it was originally derived from the Greek: but by intermingling with the surrounding nations, the language, in the course of time, and by negligence, became corrupted. Grotius thinks it was the same as that of the Cappadocians.—See the treatise of Jablonski, and Kuinoel, In Lib. N. T. Historicis Comment. vol. iv. p. 482.

NOTE 14.—PART XI.

THE various particulars of this remarkable narrative; the opinions of the ancients on the incarnations of their gods; the reason why Barnabas was considered as Jupiter, and Paul as Mercury; the opinion of Chrysostom on the vehement and effectual manner in which the apostles repressed the intended homage of these people, &c., are discussed at length in two treatises of the Critici Sacri, vol. xiii. by Christoph. Frederic. Boerner and Jo. Jacob. Pfizer, to which the reader is referred.

NOTE 15.—PART XI.

It is probable that the Jews persuaded the people that the apostles were magicians.

The account which Mr. Faber has given in his valuable treatise On the Origin of Idolatry, of the rise of the superstition here alluded to, is confirmed by all the researches I have been able to make.

NOTE 16.—PART XI.

THE original is χειροτονήσαντες δὲ αὐτοῖς πρεσβυτέρους κατ' ἐκκλησίαν. The word χειροτονέω, literally interpreted, signifies "to stretch forth the hand;" and it was used to denote the action by which the ancient Greeks, in their military councils, expressed their approbation or disapprobation. Thus we read in Xenophon, Anab. lib. iii. 3, 22, καὶ οὕτω δοκεῖ ταῦτα ἀνατείνειν τὴν χεῖρα. Ἀνέτεινον ἅπαντες—From this signification of the word it was afterwards used, as in this passage, in the derived sense, "to appoint, constitute, or ordain."—See Dr. Hammond's learned and conclusive note on this subject. Hesychius, ap. Schleusner, renders the word in this sense χειροτονεῖν καθιστᾶν. ψηφίσειν: and Suidas interprets χειροτονήσαντες, by the synonym ἐκλεξάμενοι. See also Wetstein, N. T. tom. ii. p. 198.

NOTE 17.—PART XI.

THIS verse is not to be read parenthetically, but as a continuation of the declaration of St. Paul and Barnabas—"They declared what great things God had done to them; but (said they) there have risen up some of the sect of the Pharisees who have professed their faith in Jesus," &c. Beza was probably the first who observed this; and his ancient manuscript gives a hint of it. Nothing, says Markland (ap. Bowyer) is more certain. At the end of verse 4, after μετ' αὐτῶν, put only a comma.

NOTE 18.—PART XI.

ON THE TIME OF THE COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM.

IN Gal. ii. 11, 12, &c. we read that Peter was reproved by Paul for consenting, at the instigation of the Judaizing converts, to press upon the Gentiles the observance of the ceremonial Law.

Doddridge would place this occurrence after the present council of Jerusalem; Dr. Hales, relying on the ingenious remark of Basnage, before that event. Peter (says Basnage) would in all probability have opposed every attempt to establish the works of the Law among the idolatrous Gentiles, if the present apostolic decree had been then enacted. In this point of view the speech of Peter on this occasion may be considered as a noble retraction of his former conduct. It is probable that St. Peter came to Antioch from Rome, Antioch being peculiarly under Roman protection. The general tradition is, that St. Peter was bishop of Antioch seven years.

The efforts of the false brethren (Gal. ii. 4.) who endeavoured to persuade the faithful of the Gentiles, that unless they were circumcised they could not be saved, occasioned the council of Jerusalem, to which St. Paul and Barnabas were sent. (Gal. ii. 1.) Titus accompanied them. (Gal. ii. 1.) We have reason for thinking that they took him with them in the room of John, surnamed Mark (Acts xiii. 13.), whom they had left in Pamphylia.

This third voyage of St. Paul to Jerusalem (Acts xv. 4.) is placed about the forty-ninth year of Christ, and ninth of Claudius; it being evidently the voyage of which the Apostle speaks (Gal. ii. 1.), "fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem." The epocha of fourteen years being dated from his conversion.

This "fundamental date," as Dr. Hales very justly calls it, has been adopted by Petavius, Pearson, Barrington, Lardner, Paley, Michaelis, Hales, and the great majority of commentators. All of whom unite in referring the apostolic council to the year 49.

It has, however, been much disputed, upon the grounds of the ambiguity of the original expression,—ἐπειτα διὰ δεκατεσσάρων ἔτων πάλιν ἀνέβην εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα, Gal. ii. 1.

It has been contended that these "fourteen years" are rather to be counted from Paul's visit to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, A.D. 35+3=A.D. 38 (Gal. i. 18.), which would give the date of the council, A.D. 38+14=A. D. 52, three years later. And this has been adopted by Jerome, Usher, and others, and A. D. 51, by the Bible Chronology.

But it is more natural to refer them to the fundamental date of his conversion; especially as another ἐπειτα intervenes (Gal. i. 21.), to break the connexion with the first visit to Jerusalem, (Gal. i. 18.)

Lardner observes, that the expression διὰ, signifies "about," or "during," and that the fourteen years are current, not complete. If so, the date of the council should be A.D. 35+13=A.D. 48, which, perhaps, is rather more correct.

But Paley doubts whether the visit to Jerusalem might not have been different from that at the time of the council, from the following differences in the circumstances of both. (Horæ Paulinæ, p. 195–207.)

1. Titus is mentioned as accompanying Paul and Barnabas, in the Epistle, but not in the Acts.

But Titus is plainly included in the definite expression of their attendants, and "certain other of them," (Acts xv. 2.) The name of Titus is nowhere found in the Acts.

2. Paul is said to have gone up to Jerusalem by revelation (Gal. ii. 2.), whereas he is represented as deputed by the Church of Antioch in the Acts.

Both these accounts are consistent; thus Peter was sent for by Cornelius, but the Holy Spirit directed him to go with the messengers, (Acts x. 20.)

3. Paul communicated his Gospel to the Gentiles, "privately to them which were of reputation," or the pillars of the Church, Peter, James, and John (Gal. ii. 2–9.), for which there seemed to be no occasion, since this formed the subject of his public mission, (Acts xv. 4.)

But Paul's particular mission, as an extraordinary apostle to the remote Gentiles, Acts xxii. 21. (μακρὰν εξαποστειλῶ), would have been offensive to the mother Church in general. The public avowal of it afterwards, at Jerusalem, occasioned great offence to the Jewish zealots, and much persecution to the Apostle, (Acts xxii. 22., &c. and xxvi. 21.)

4. The last and chief difficulty is, that in the Epistle no notice is taken of the deliberation and decree of the council of Jerusalem, which formed the business for the sake of which they were sent thither from Antioch.

But Paley himself has furnished satisfactory answers to this:—

1. It was not agreeable to St. Paul's manner to defer much to the authority of the apostles, with the chief of whom he reckoned himself equal; as receiving his commission not from man, but immediately from Christ himself, (Gal. i. 1.)

2. The authority of the council of Jerusalem would have little weight with the Gentile Galatians. He, therefore, argues the point with them upon principle.

3. The decree did not go the length of the Epistle, for the latter abrogated the Mosaic institution, even to the Jews themselves, in the case of justification by faith.—See Hales's Anal. of Chron. vol. ii. part ii. p. 1110.

NOTE 19.—PART XI.

THIS quotation seems to be taken from the LXX's version of Amos ix. 11, 12., which reads,

"the residue of אֶדְוֹם," or "Edom," which latter word is used to this day by the Jews, as a convertible term with אֶרֶץ, to express the pagan, heathen, or Gentile world. Many references to prove this point might be selected from the Jewish prayers which are now used in their synagogues.

NOTE 20.—PART XI.

ON THE APOSTOLIC DECREE RESPECTING BLOOD, &c.

To eat things offered to idols was a Gentile rite". To eat the flesh of animals, without pouring off the blood, and to partake of the blood, were also common observances". The expression, πρωτόν γεύας, alludes to the manner in which the Gentiles prepared their food. They were accustomed either to enclose the carcase of the lamb, or animal, in an oven, or vessel, and dress it in its own vapor or steam; or otherwise so to kill it, that the blood should not be shed, but remain in it. They were sometimes (Cic. pro Muræna) accustomed to kill fowls by suffocation.

With respect to the last command, it is evident that offences of this kind were regarded as of no consequence among the heathen. I interpret the word πορνεύειν, with our translators of the Bible, not thinking it worth while to consider here Michaelis's criticism on the passage.

The writer who has paid more attention to this subject during the last century than any other, is Lord Barrington, who supposes that the decree was made for the Proselytes of the Gate alone: that is, as we have already observed, for those Gentiles by birth, who quitted the heathen idolatry, but did not fully embrace the Jewish religion; and who, on account of their forsaking paganism, and abstaining from the four things here mentioned, were permitted to dwell in Palestine, and had several civil privileges allowed them, with liberty to join in all acts of worship in use before the Law, on condition only that they conformed to the laws of society, and those laws here enjoined.

In the fourth essay of the Miscellanea Sacra, Lord Barrington endeavours to prove that the decree was not binding upon any but Christians, who had been Proselytes of the Gate, and to them only, while the Jewish polity lasted; and therefore it abridges no other Gentile Christians of the liberty which the Gospel intended to give.

By things offered to idols, which are prohibited in the first article, he understands any meat or drink offered to an image or idol, but especially such as had been offered in the idol's temple.

By blood is meant the blood separated from the flesh, which was generally done with the greater beasts, and either drunk by itself, or mixed with other liquors, or flour, or spice, &c.

By the third proposition is understood creatures strangled or suffocated, with design to keep the blood in them, in order to be eaten; which was generally done in fowls, birds, and game: and I imagine every animal was understood to be strangled, which was not slain in such a manner as to have its blood "poured out," (Levit. xvii. 13.)

And by the last article Lord Barrington understands uncleanness of every kind, the abominations practised by the heathen in their worship to their idols.

That these things are forbidden to the Proselytes of the Gate will appear from the 17th and 18th chapters of Leviticus.

The address of the letter is not to all Gentiles indiscriminately, but to the Gentiles which are turned unto God in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia.

The direction would probably have included the Gentiles also in Pamphylia, Pisidia, &c. had they not been brethren of another sort, and that the decree did not concern them. St. Paul delivered the decree to the Churches in Lystra and Derbe, to be kept by them: but though it was intended as a general rule for Proselytes of the Gate, wherever they might happen to be scattered abroad, yet it was only addressed to the brethren in Syria and Cilicia. But Lord Barrington supposes that there is a transposition, and that the 5th and 6th verses of the 16th chapter should be added to the end of the 15th; being thus read, the order of narration will appear more proper. However, even if this is not the case, and the decree were addressed to all the Gentiles, it is extraordinary that it was not carried farther on to Rome, Greece, &c.

Why are these things forbidden, he observes, more than eating swine's flesh, or other unclean things, but because they were forbidden to the Proselytes of the Gate? even the order of the decree is the same as the prohibition in Leviticus, and it is not the order in which they are mentioned by St. James. Why forbid to the Gentile converts at Antioch what was allowed to the Corinthians? (1 Cor. x. 25, 27, 31. vii. 10, 28.) Thus it is evident that all Gentile Christians are not bound to observe the decree, and therefore it is not probable that it should be more necessary for the Gentiles of Antioch than those of Corinth.

As Christ's kingdom is not of this world, his doctrine and laws make no difference in civil regulations. He that is subject to heathen powers must be so still. He that is married must not seek to be loosed. Christian parents must love heathen children. Christian children must obey heathen parents, &c. Also (1 Cor. vii. 18, 20.) the principal character of the Christian religion is an entire freedom to comply with all customs in which there is no moral turpitude. In this the decree agrees, for it is only a list of abstinences that were enjoined on Proselytes of the Gate, in virtue of the obedience they owed to the civil law of Palestine.

St. Paul, so far from enjoining these abstinences to the idolatrous Gentiles, expressly declares that nothing is unclean of itself (Rom. xiv. 14, 20. Tit. i. 15. 1 Cor. x. 25, 27.); and no where, in any Epistle to the idolatrous Gentiles, does he insist upon or even mention the decree: indeed, his argument (Gal. v. 2.) expressly forbids a compliance with the Jewish customs. His reasoning is, that if a Gentile considered circumcision to be necessary to salvation, he laid a weight upon an obedience to the Law of Moses, which was in effect renouncing the mediation of Christ, and seeking to be justified by an observance of that Law by which "no flesh living could be justified." A Jew might be circumcised, and obey all the Laws of Moses, and yet not renounce Christianity; indeed, St. Paul bids the Jews continue Jews; that is, obey the laws of their country as the laws of their country, but not seek justification from an observance of them. If this hypothesis be true, the authority of this decree only lasted as a civil regulation, while the Jewish polity lasted, and therefore the advice founded upon it must cease with the existence of the Jewish nation, and, indeed, never could have been addressed to the idolatrous Gentiles.

Origen (continues Lord Barrington) was of opinion that the four prohibitions contained in the decree were particularly addressed to Proselytes of the Gate, though he imagined the decree itself to be addressed to all Christians.

The reason why these things were forbidden to the Proselytes of the Gate was, that they were at that time the chief enticements to and concomitants of idolatry. And as renouncing idolatry was the only reason why any one should desire to become a proselyte, and the only reason the Jews should grant it (as an idolator being guilty of high treason under a theocracy was not to be suffered to live), Moses expressly forbid those things which accompanied idolatry, and were likely to tempt them to a commission of the crime.

That the decree only related to the Proselytes of the Gate is attempted to be proved by many other considerations, to which the reader is referred.

Lord Barrington further considers the Church at Antioch to have been at first designed by God, in his Providence, and continued all along as a Church made up of Proselytes of the Gate, to prepare Paul and Barnabas for preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles; and the Jewish Christians for receiving the news of whole churches being composed of those who had been idolatrous Gentiles; and to be in some sort, if I may so express it, the mother Church of the idolatrous Gentiles, as Jerusalem was of the Jews. For as the apostles and apostolic men were sent from the Church at Jerusalem to convert Jews, Samaritans, and Proselytes of the Gate, to which, afterwards, they returned to give an account of their success; so were the Apostles Barnabas and Saul sent on their first peregrination by the Church at Antioch, to convert the idolatrous Gentiles to the faith (Acts xiii. 2, 3, 5.), and return thither at the end of it, and "rehearse all that God had done with them." (Acts xiv. 26, 27.) Moreover it is to be observed, that Paul set out from Antioch on his second and third peregrination (Acts xv. 22.), and perhaps Barnabas and Mark did so likewise, (Acts xv. 39.) It is also highly probable, that after his first imprisonment at Rome, when he went up to Jerusalem, he might from thence go again to Antioch, as his custom was every other time he went up to Jerusalem after his becoming an apostle; in which case we have grounds for inferring that he set out again from that place on his fifth journey which he undertook as we learn from other passages of Scripture; though St. Luke does not carry the history of St. Paul so far.

Before having written this note, from the unassisted study of Scripture, I had come to the same conclusion, in opposition to those who would refer the Apostle's journeyings from Jerusalem. Antioch was a city extremely well suited to these designs of Providence. It was situated in Syria, a country that was thought by the Jews to be of a sort of middle nature, between the holiness they ascribed to Palestine, and the pollution of other countries; and like the Proselytes of the Gate, being neither holy nor profane, it became consequently a region fit for a great Church of the Proselytes of the Gate converted to the faith. If this should be allowed, it accounts for the rise of the question—For it does not seem probable that Jews should require heathen Gentiles, who had never dwelt or sojourned in Palestine, to be bound by Moses' Law—which they considered as obligatory only on themselves, or on those who would become Jews. And, indeed, I have some doubt whether at any time the zealots insisted on the necessity of the idolatrous Gentiles observing the Laws of Moses, as they did in relation to the Proselytes of the Gate. This hypothesis agrees with Peter's argument, which is entirely taken from the case of Cornelius, from which he deduces that as the Holy Ghost was given to this devout proselyte, on the observance only of these four precepts, and not of any of the other Laws of Moses; in like manner the same conditions, and no others, should be required of the Proselytes of the Gate, who had been converted to Christianity at Antioch. There was a famous Jewish university at Antioch, and we learn both from Josephus^x, and the Roman laws^y, that it was full of Jews, and of Proselytes of the Gate, who were always numerous where there were many Jews, and comprehended generally most of the well-disposed Gentiles, who did not go entirely over to the Jewish religion. The Proselytes of the Gate at Antioch had been first converted to Christianity by the men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who were among those dispersed at the first persecution that ensued upon Stephen's martyrdom, and are called Grecians, which should be rather rendered Gentiles, reading Ἕλληνας, and not Ἑλληνιστίς. And that they were devout Gentiles is further evident from the phrase, that, on the preaching of the men of Cyprus and Cyrene, they are said "to turn unto the Lord," they having been turned unto God already.

However correct and ingenious this system of Lord Barrington may be, and the opinion of the majority of commentators, who justly suppose that the abstaining from the four things was made to conciliate the Jews to their newly-adopted brethren of the Gentiles; it appears to me highly probable that a more spiritual meaning also may have been intended in the prohibition. It may be that the Apostle had a higher object in view, by instituting these four laws for their Gentile converts, and that these enactments contain a complete summary of Christian doctrine and practice.

The prohibition against idolatry does not seem to me to have been designed merely to forbid the offering of idolatrous worship to images of wood and stone; but to condemn also the indulgence of those vices which were sanctioned by the heathens, who had appointed a god or a goddess as the presiding patron of every vice.

The prohibition to eat the blood of the animal that was permitted to be used for food, might have been designed not only against luxury, as Delaney imagines; nor to prevent certain idolatrous practices, as Spencer and Young have represented. It is well known, that the blood of the animal that was to be offered in sacrifice, and afterwards eaten by the worshipper, was poured out at the altar; so was it necessary that he who would approach to God with acceptance, must sacrifice the inferior and animal nature, and offer unto God a spiritual homage. The blood aptly typified also that Divine Sacrifice, whose blood was poured out, and who gave his life as a sacrifice for many; and thus the meaning of the prohibition to abstain from blood would be, "Remember Him who shed his blood for you; and die unto the world, with its affections and lusts, drawing near to God with a pure and contrite heart."

The abstaining from things strangled might have had a similar meaning. In these the blood was not poured out, and the sacrifice could not be accepted. This still declared, that without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin—that the sacrifice of flesh is required of all of us that we may become new creatures.

The last command to abstain from impurity requires no observation.

I am confirmed in this view of the meaning of the apostolic decree, by the consideration that all the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic Law had a spiritual as well as a typical signification. They were designed to keep the Jews as a distinct people, and to serve as a wall or partition between the Gentiles and themselves; but they all afforded, likewise, a moral instruction, and thus became the school-master to bring them to the Christ, who was to come: in the same way these enactments might have been formed to enforce the remembrance of that Messiah who had now appeared, and was exalted to the right hand of God.

It cannot be necessary to stop here to refute the conjecture of Bentley, that instead of πορνεύειν in this passage, we should read χοιρεύειν, as this emendation is unsupported by the authority of any manuscript. Neither does the interpretation of the word πορνεία, by Michaelis, who refers it to flesh offered to idols, and sold in the shambles, appear worthy of farther notice.

Dr. Delaney has endeavoured to prove that the prohibition to eat blood is still binding upon the Churches of Christ; and Dr. A. Clarke has embraced his opinion. I cannot say their reasoning appears to be conclusive. The arguments of Dr. Hammond, Dean Graves, and others, appear much more supported—that the prohibition has ceased upon this principle, that laws are no longer binding, when the reasons for their enactment cease to exist. If at some future day, when it shall please God to bring about the accomplishment of his prophecies, and receive the Jews into his Church again, the eating of blood and of things strangled shall prove a stumblingblock to the converts, it will then, perhaps, and not before that time, become the duty of Christians to obey the decree of the apostolic council.

Grotius^z asserts that the converts were bound to abstain from blood, because it was so ordained to all the sons of Noah. He quotes from Tertullian, that the Emperor Leo considered it unwholesome, and prohibited it by an edict. He further argues, that the observance of a command so easy was not liable to the charge of superstition, and that the eating blood made men fierce and savage.

He then endeavours to prove that the Christians were not commanded to abstain from blood, merely lest the Jews should be offended, which he would prove from the fact, that the converts abstained from blood, where no Jews were present, a circumstance which rests upon the authority of Eusebius and Tertullian. Grotius proceeds to demonstrate this point from the apostolical constitutions.

Dorschæus replies to these assertions, that the precepts of Noah obliged only the Proselytes of the Gate—that it is even doubtful if these precepts are other than a rabbinical tradition—it is doubtful if all the precepts of Adam and Noah were binding on mankind in general. He asserts, it is not true that Christ took nothing from the precepts of Adam and Noah, and only added to them new precepts. He then invalidates the authority of Tertullian, and the Emperor Leo; and in reply to the two last observes, that the facility of obedience is no criterion of the reasonableness of a command, and ridicules the opinion that eating blood in a state prepared by cookery can be injurious.

Dorschæus then attempts to show that it was by no means an universal opinion among Christians, that they were to abstain from blood, and refuses to depend on arguments drawn exclusively from the apostolical constitutions.

Witsius has shown, in his discussion on the council at Jerusalem, that the more reflecting Jews believed that the pious among the heathen might be saved without circumcision. And he observes, that the discussion at the council of Jerusalem does not weaken the claim of the apostles to inspiration. They were unanimous, but it was necessary to satisfy the consciences of their converts.

NOTE 21.—PART XI.

ON THE SPIRITUAL GIFTS, TITLES, AND OFFICES, IN THE CHURCH OF ANTIOCH.

THE Part of this Arrangement of the New Testament, which we have now concluded, contains an account of the first preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles by St. Paul, who was miraculously elected from his brethren for that particular purpose. In the former stages of the infant Church, we have hitherto found that an authority was exercised by one instructor over another, and that the higher order possessed powers which were not enjoyed by the lower. The Gentile Churches were principally founded by the Apostle St. Paul; and the question therefore respecting the constitution of these Churches divides itself into several branches, first, whether any or what control was exercised by the Apostle himself over the Churches in general under his jurisdiction; and, secondly, whether there are any proofs that he delegated to others the powers he had himself exerted. These points appear to be at once decided by two passages of Scripture, the one in Acts xiv. 23., where we read that the apostles Barnabas and Saul ordained them elders in every Church; and the other in Titus i. 5., where St. Paul tells Titus—"I left thee in Crete, that thou shouldest ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee;" and he then proceeds to descant on the necessary qualifications of him, on whom the honor of ordination should be conferred.

Treatise in Revelation examined with Candor.—Young's Religion designed to prevent Superstition, 2 vols. 8vo.—Barrington's Miscellanea Sacra.—Witsius, De Vita Pauli Melctem. Leidens. cap. iv. sect. iv. and vi.

The Church at this time was one society, and it was subject throughout to the superintendence of the apostles.

The apostles at Jerusalem till this time took care to superintend all the converts: they commissioned Barnabas to go as far as Antioch, where the greatest number of proselytes was assembled. He obeyed, and visited the several Churches as far as Antioch, and confirmed the converts in their faith. The account of his mission is so briefly related, that we are informed only in the most general terms of the manner in which he exerted his authority. But this instance proves that the apostles possessed the right of superintendence over the Churches out of Judæa, as well as those in their own country, or they could have had no authority to send one of their number to the Church of Antioch.

The title "Prophets," which is given in this passage to Judas and Silas, and is applied to a class of teachers inferior to the apostles, naturally leads us to inquire concerning the nature of the gifts that were imparted to the Church at this time, as well as the consequent gradations in the ministry which those gifts were intended to produce.

Even in the bestowment of these holy gifts an order and distinction was observed, which clearly points out a distinct gradation of rank in ecclesiastical government. We will begin with the apostles, who were distinguished above all the others by the most excellent gifts and powers: next to whom were placed the prophets, who were inspired men, foretold future events, and were also preachers of the Gospel: while others, from the portion of grace they had received, necessarily were considered of subordinate rank.

There is ever an harmonious uniformity in the plans of Providence enforcing the same divine truths.

"As at the first settling of the Church of Israel in the wilderness," says the deeply-learned Lightfoot, "so it was in the first settling of the Gospel. The first fathers of the Sanhedrin in the wilderness were endued with divine gifts, such as we are speaking of; but when that generation was expired, those that were to succeed in that function and employment were such as were qualified for it by education, study, and parts acquired. So was it with this first age of the Gospel and the ages succeeding. At the first dispersing of the Gospel, it was absolutely needful that the first planters should be furnished with such extraordinary gifts, or else it was not possible it should be planted, as may appear by a plain instance—Paul comes to a place where the Gospel had never come: he stays a month or two and begets a Church; and then he is to go his way and to leave them. Who now in this Church is fit to be their minister? they being all alike but very children in the Gospel: but Paul is directed by the Holy Ghost to lay his hands upon such and such of them; and that bestows upon them the gift of tongues and prophesying; and now they are able to be ministers, and to teach the congregation. But after that generation, when the Gospel was settled in all the world, and committed to writing, and written to be read and studied, then was study of the Scriptures the way to enable men to unfold the Scriptures, and fit them to be ministers to instruct others; and revelations and inspirations neither needful nor safe to be looked after, nor hopeful to be attained unto. And this was the reason why Paul, coming but newly out of Ephesus and Crete, when he could have ordained and qualified ministers with abilities by the imposition of his hands, would not do it, but left Timothy and Titus to ordain, though they could not bestow these gifts; because he knew the way that the Lord had appointed ministers thenceforward to be enabled for the ministry, not by extraordinary infusions of the Spirit, but by serious study of the Scriptures; not by a miraculous but by an ordinary ordination."

1. The apostles, then, were expressly chosen and appointed by our Lord himself, John xvii. 18. xx. 21. Acts i. 24, 25.

2. They had all seen Christ in the flesh, αὐτόπται (Acts i. 8.), and so became witnesses of his resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 5, 7.

3. They were personally instructed by our Lord, Luke xxiv. 45. John xx. 22. Acts ix. 4, &c.

4. They were infallible in their teaching, John xiv. 26. and xvi. 13. Luke xii. 11, 12. Matt. x. 19, 20.

5. They were the common instructors of the world, Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark xvi. 15.

6. They had the power of imparting to others the gifts of the Holy Spirit, Acts vi. 6. and viii. 15, 17.

7. They were endowed with miraculous powers, Matt. x. 1. Acts iii. 6.

8. They had miraculous power to punish offenders, Acts v. 8, 9.

9. Their wonderful success in their ministry was miraculous, Acts xi. 14, &c.

In all these respects St. Paul was equal to either of the apostles.

1. He was called by Christ himself, Gal. i. 1.

2. He saw Christ, 1 Cor. ix. 1.

3. Was taught by Christ, Gal. i. 12.

4. Was infallible, 2 Cor. xiii. 3. 1 Thess. ii 13. and iv. 8.

5. Teacher of the world, Acts xiv. 27. 1 Tim. ii. 7.

6. Imparted the Spirit, Acts xix. 6. 1 Tim. iv. 14.

7. Miraculous powers, Acts xix. 11, 12. and xxii. 9.

8. Power to inflict punishment, 2 Cor. x. 8. Acts xiii. 11.

9. And no apostle was more successful in his ministry, Acts xxvi. 20, 22. 1 Thess. i. 5, &c. Rom. xv. 17–19.

It is exceedingly difficult to define with accuracy the precise powers of the miraculous gifts, and the exact titles of the ministers who were severally endowed with them, and the functions which they individually performed in the Church. Grotius, Vitranga, Lightfoot, and many others of the most learned, have discussed the subject, and have come to different conclusions. The principal theologian of later days, who has written on this part of the sacred narrative, is Lord Barrington, with whom Dr. Hales, with the exception of some trifling differences of opinion, is generally agreed.

The former has arranged the gifts of the Spirit, the offices of those persons on whom they were confirmed, and their different titles, in the following manner:—

T A B L E.

1 Cor. xii. ver. 8, 9, 10. To one is given	Ver. 28. The possessors of which he re- spectively appointed	Ver. 29, 30. They are repeated with some variation, are all

9. Ἑρμηνεία γλωσσῶν, the interpretation of tongues.

^a That λόγος σοφίας signifies the knowledge that was the peculiar gift of an apostle, see the second Essay in the Miscellanea Sacra.

^b That λόγος γνώσεως signifies the knowledge peculiar to the highest rank of prophets, see the second Essay.

^c By πίστις, Mr. Locke here understands such a full persuasion of the truths which the teacher taught, as enabled him to speak with the assurance and authority that became a teacher or a doctor, (Locke in loc.); and that faith stands for a firm persuasion or assurance may be seen in many other places; see 1 Cor. xiii. 2. Matt. xvii. 20. Mark iv. 40. Luke xvii. 6. Rom. xiv. 22, 23. James v. 15.

^d Gifts of healing, ver. 30., may signify the gifts that were beneficial to men's bodies, as teaching was to their minds; and might, perhaps, be exercised on the illuminating prayer of faith. The reason of the gift of healing being given may have been—1. That it had been sometimes given to prophets under the Old Testament. 2. That it was beneficial. 3. That it was necessary to cure the distemper inflicted by the power of the apostles in the exercise of discipline in the Church.

^e Working of miracles being distinguished here from the gifts of healing, may signify something that implies a greater power; as raising the dead; laying storms; turning water into wine; feeding multitudes with a small quantity of provisions, &c. These two gifts are evidently transposed in the three lists.

^f By προφητεία here may be understood, that lower sort of prophecy, of which St. Paul chiefly treats (1 Cor. xiv.), and which Lord Barrington considers as branched out into lower revelations, exhorting, praying, and singing in the Spirit. Though I apprehend the same word, namely, προφητεία, Rom. xii. 6. and Eph. iv. 11., means the higher sort of prophecy, as it stands there before the gift of teaching; whereas here it is placed after it.

^g As prophecy takes in lower revelations, exhortation, praying, and singing in the Spirit; so, perhaps, διακρίσεις πνευμάτων may signify the particular gift which those had who were most able to judge, whether those several performances proceeded from the Spirit or no; see 1 Cor. xiv. 29. where the Apostle says, "Let the prophets speak, two or three at a time, and let the others judge," (or discern), διακρίνεται. Where judging, or discerning, follows prophesying, as διακρίσεις πνευμάτων follows προφητεία here; see also 1 Cor. ii. 15. where the spiritual man is said to judge, or discern, even the things revealed by the higher prophets.

^h Ἀντιλήψεις in the second list (helps) may answer to prophecy; inasmuch as those who had the gift of lower prophecy were the persons that chiefly assisted, or helped the Christians in the public devotions.

ⁱ Κυβερνήσεις stands here, as I suppose, for discerners, or triers of spirits.

^k Perhaps the apostle makes γένη γλωσσῶν, in the second list, answer both to tongues and to the interpretation of tongues in the first.

^l And perhaps γλώσσαις λαλοῦντες, in the third list, may comprehend prophecy, discernment of spirits, and the gift of tongues in the first list; inasmuch as these were generally the subjects those spoke of who had the gift of tongues. For we may always observe, throughout the history of the Acts, that those who had the gift of tongues prophesied, or spoke, the wonderful things of God, or magnified God: and St. Paul, in the fourteenth chapter, seems to intimate, that at least many of those who had the gift of tongues, could prophesy, in the sense I have explained it; because he bids them prophesy rather than use the gift of tongues. St. Mark uses the gift of tongues even in something a larger sense than this; and puts it for all the illumination which was ever uttered by the gift of tongues (Mark xvi. 17.), as is plain from his not mentioning any other gift of illumination there. St. Paul places this gift last, except the interpretation of tongues, because it was of the least use and benefit in the Church, 1 Cor. xiv. 19–23., and in order to beat down the folly of the Corinthians, who prided themselves so extravagantly in it.

Dr. Hales objects, in this arrangement of Lord Barrington, to the supposition that “helps” answer to “prophecy,” and “governments” to “discerning of spirits.”

Bishop Horsley has classed the gifts of the Spirit nearly in the same manner as Lord Barrington. He thus contrasts the nine gifts described in ver. 8-10. with the ecclesiastical offices enumerated here:—

GIFTS.		OFFICES.

2. The word of knowledgeProphets	{	i. e. expounders of the Scriptures of the Old Testament.

7. Discerning of spiritsGovernments, κυβερνήσεις
8. Tongues	{	Gifted with tongues in various ways.
9. Interpretation of tongues

The fourth and fifth gifts—miracles and healing—seem, he observes, to have changed places in the 9th and 10th verses. Miracles, it seems, must take place as the genus, and healing must rank below it as the species. Accordingly in ver. 28. miracles or powers are mentioned before healings, with this slight alteration, the list of gifts in ver. 8-10. seem to answer exactly to the list of offices in ver. 28.

Dr. Doddridge and others, in consequence of the difficulty which has been experienced in the attempt to classify these gifts, have been of opinion that the same persons might have possessed many of them, and sustained several of these characters, which were not stated, distinct offices, and might be called “helpers,” in reference to their great dexterity and readiness to help those in distress; and “governments,” in regard to that genius for business, sagacity in judging the circumstances of affairs, and natural authority in the councils and resolutions of societies, which rendered them fit to preside on such occasions.

This opinion is in some measure defended by Mr. Morgan, who has made the subjoined arrangement of the holy gifts, titles, and offices.

The writers in the Critici Sacri are very unsatisfactory on this subject. Though Lord Barrington appears to have given the best explanation, much light will be thrown on the meaning of the various gifts, if we endeavour to ascertain from the Septuagint, the received signification of the words which are used to express them. This version was generally adopted during the apostolic age, and must have been well known by the persons to whom St. Paul addressed the Epistle in which these gifts are enumerated.

The miraculous gifts enumerated by St. Paul are all described (I Cor. xii. 7.) by one term, ἡ φανέρωσις τοῦ πνεύματος. The word φανέρωσις is not found in the LXX, but in Jer. xl. 6. of the division in the Oxford edition of the Septuagint, which corresponds to chap. xxxiii. ver. 6. of the authorized English translation, and the Hebrew, we meet with the word from which φανέρωσις is derived; וְגִלֵּיתִי לָהֶם, which is the literal rendering of “I will reveal unto them.” Our translators have rendered the word “The manifestation of the Spirit.” I cannot but believe that the full meaning of the whole passage is, “That to him who has been favored with the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, in whatever degree they may have been imparted, the power is also granted of manifesting to others the nature and extent of those gifts.”

The whole clause of this passage in Jeremiah is: וְגִלֵּיתִי לָהֶם עֵתָּה שְׁלוֹם וְאֵמֶת which our translators have literally and justly rendered—“I will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth.” In which they are supported by the authority of the Septuagint; which, however, does not in all instances give the accurate meaning of the Hebrew. Dr. Blayney rejects the literal interpretation, and translates the passage "I will also grant their prayer for peace and truth." He defends this rendering by observing, "עָרַר signifies to pray in a devout, fervent manner. Hence עֵרֶר may well be construed a devout and fervent prayer; and to manifest to any one his petition seems to be the granting of it." The learned author should have been fully warranted in thus interpreting the phrase עָרַרְתִּי נְלִיתִי, "to grant a prayer." It is not sufficient, in endeavouring to ascertain the meaning of a passage in Scripture, to inquire what may be the possible sense; but what is first the literal, and then the secondary meaning. If we render the word עָרַר by "fervent prayer," instead of "abundance," we are still unwarranted in rendering the word נְלִיתִי "I will grant," which is unsupported by any authority. Even if we adopt its usual primary meaning "I will reveal," and translate the rest of the passage as Dr. Blayney proposes, we shall obtain only a probable signification. The prophet is predicting the future prosperity of Jerusalem, and its temporal recovery of wealth and prosperity. From this prediction he passes, as is usual, to a more spiritual promise, and prophesies the full manifestation of their devout prayer for peace and truth in the latter days. Peace and truth were spiritual blessings, of which the restoration of the Jews from their captivity was highly typical and illustrative. Neither is it improbable that the apostle alluded to this prediction when he used the word quæritus, which is only found twice in the New Testament, in the Epistles to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xii. 7. 2 Cor. iv. 2. I cannot, however, remember any authority for thus rendering the word עָרַר. Buxtorf supports the sense given by our translators, who, it should ever be remembered by the proposers of new meanings, were among the most eminent Hebrew scholars of a very learned age.

The gifts which are thus represented as bestowed for the common benefit are first arranged under three general heads, (1 Cor. xii. 4-6.) and are then divided into nine particulars. The three general heads are—διαφέσεις	{	χαρισμάτων διακονιών ἐρεσσημάτων	{	differences or diversities	{	of	{	gifts administrations operations	{	but the	{	same Spirit. same Lord. same God.

-----------	---	--	---	----------------------------------	---	----	---	--	---	---------	---	---

Διαφέσεις is only used in the New Testament in this passage. It frequently occurs in the Septuagint in the same sense in which our translators have rendered it. It corresponds with the Hebrew word כְּחֻלְקָה 1 Par. xxiv. 1. and xxvi. 1, 12, 19. "The divisions," or "classes," which would be possibly a better word to express the meaning of the apostle than either "differences" or "diversities."

The word χάρισμα does not occur in the Septuagint. It is, however, derived from χαριτόδομα, which is frequently used. Its evident meaning is a spiritual gift, or endowment of the mind, which could not be mistaken for the natural or cultivated talent of the teacher, upon whom it was conferred.—See Rom. i. 11. 2 Cor. i. 11.

Διακονία does not occur in the Septuagint, but it is found in 1 Maccabees, xi. 58., where it is used to describe the service or furniture which Antiochus sent to Jonathan the high priest, for the service of the temple, in addition to the golden vessels—ἀπέστειλεν αὐτῷ χρυσάμια καὶ διακονίας. Schleusner quotes from Athenæus, lib. v. t. ii. p. 342, a passage in which διακονία is used to denote the instruments which are in daily use.

In the New Testament the word is repeatedly used to describe the general office or ministry consigned by our Lord to the apostles and teachers of the Church, (Acts i. 17. xx. 24. xxi. 18. Rom. xi. 13.) The services they were commanded to perform were the appointed means of grace, for the perpetual and common service of the Church.

Ἐρέσσημα is not to be found in the Old Testament, but in the Apocrypha only, Ecclus. xvi. 16. see Compl. It is derived from ἐρεσγέω, and is well translated by Macknight, "In-workings." It is used but twice in the New Testament. Is it not possible, as these in-workings are ascribed to God the Father, that they may mean both those ordinary influences which proceed from the Holy Spirit of God, by which we alone can become the children of God, and say, "Abba, Father," and the right efforts of reasoning and the natural powers of the mind, which God, as the Creator, has implanted in all human beings? They appear to be different from the χαρίσματα of the Spirit, and to be distinguished from them.

It will be observed that the various gifts which build up the Christian Church, though they are all called the gifts of the Spirit, are ascribed in their arrangement by St. Paul, to the three Persons of the Holy Trinity. This is done, however, in such a manner, that the character under which each has been revealed to mankind is carefully preserved. The Father is the Creator of man; to him is assigned the internal, natural energy or operations which he originally implanted in the human creation, or creature, and upon which, and with which the Spirit of God acts. The Son of God is the Redeemer; to him are ascribed the ministrations or offices which himself established as the appointed means of grace. The Spirit of God is the Sanctifier; to him are assigned the gifts which produce holiness within, and convince the world of the truth of the Gospel, of righteousness, and judgment. And all these are rightly said to be the gifts of the Spirit, as it is the Spirit of God alone, which, by its sacred office, overrules and changes the natural energies of will, understanding, and all the powers of mind which God has given us, and which makes all the means of grace appointed by Christ effectual; and by pouring into the soul of man its own purifying, consoling, peaceful influences, makes us spiritually fit to become for ever the companions of superior beings.

From this general classification of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, or of the Holy Trinity, we proceed to the particulars.

The first is λόγος σοφίας, which seems to have been peculiar to the apostles. The word σοφία is repeatedly used in the LXX. It corresponds to בִּינָה, Prov. ii. 3. and iii. 5. understanding—to דַּעַת, knowledge, Prov. i. 7. and to חִכְמָה, wisdom, Isa. xi. 2. where σοφία is described as one of those gifts of the Spirit which should rest upon Christ. In the enumeration in the passage in Isaiah, are three words, which in various other passages of the LXX are rendered by σοφία, חִכְמָה, בִּינָה, דַּעַת, and which are in this place respectively rendered by the LXX, σοφία, σύρεσις, and γνώσις. This circumstance might appear, at first sight, to destroy the validity of any argument as to the meaning of the word σοφίας from the LXX, if we did not take into consideration the difficulty which the Septuagint translators unavoidably found in discovering a variety of phrases to express the synonymous terms in the Hebrew.

Some further light may be thrown upon the meaning of the word σοφία, in this passage, if we consider the use of the word חִכְמָה, to which it corresponds in Isa. xi. 2., in the description of the Sephiroth of the Jewish Cabbala¹. The learned Vitranga is of opinion, that the Sephiroth was an emblematical description of the Messiah. Whether this hypothesis be tenable, we cannot now stop to inquire. The first of the ten Sephiroth was the כֶּתֶר, or crown, which was placed on the head of the personage, whom Vitranga has represented as the emblem of the Messiah. The two next were חִכְמָה and בִּינָה, wisdom and prudence or knowledge.

The word σοφία is likewise used in the Apocryphal book of The Wisdom of Solomon, to express, as Schleusner conjectures, the art of governing: in which sense it is peculiarly applicable to the apostles. Πρὸς ὑμᾶς οὖν, ὦ τύραννοι, οἱ λόγοι μου, ἵνα μάθητε σοφίαν—"Unto you, O rulers! my words are addressed, that ye may learn wisdom." As the word is used in these various significations, each of them so peculiarly applicable to the powers and gifts with which the apostles were endued, we may conclude that each sense was intended to be combined by the apostle in the passage before us. "The word of wisdom," therefore, would imply all supernatural intelligence, and the highest endowments of mind, by whatever name they may be distinguished; together with the skill, talent, and power of governing, as wise men, the Churches they had already planted.

The next gift of the Spirit is γνώσις. This is a gift inferior to wisdom^m. It corresponds to דַּעַת. As it was the gift possessed by the prophets of the New Testament, it must denote the knowledge of future events; and, as they were teachers also, it probably included the learning that was usually acquired by industry, the experience given by time, age, and long intercourse with the world, and other talents, demanded by the circumstances of difficulty or danger in which they were placed. Lord Barington supposes that these prophets were likewise apostles. It does not appear that his proofs are decisive.

The third gift of the Spirit is πίστις, faith, and it was that which was imparted to the διδάσκαλοι, or teachers. The word πίστις is too well known to require explanation. In the New Testament it is variously used to denote conviction, firm belief, or unfeigned assent to the truth of Revelation. It denotes also the profession of religion, 1 Cor. ii. 5. and xv. 14. 2 Pet. i. 5, &c. and the mass or collected body of truths and doctrines taught by the apostles, Acts vi. 7, &c. 2 Tim. ii. 18. and iii. 8. Titus i. 4. 2 Pet. i. 1. Jude 3.

All these we may justly assign to the first teachers of Christianity, who were neither honored with the apostolic nor prophetic gifts. They would all firmly believe, profess, and practise the doctrines and the duties of their new religion. The διδάσκαλοι were not endowed with the same degree of inspiration as the prophets.

Πίστις, in the LXX, corresponds to the word

¹ Lib. i. cap. cxi. p. 151. 3. "כֶּתֶר coronam sequuntur ordine חִכְמָה et בִּינָה sapientia et intelligentia, quas ad caput referendas esse, res ipsa loquitur. Observ. Sacr. lib. i. cap. x. vol. i. p. 128, &c.* See also Burnet's Archæologia Philos. p. 48.

אמן; see Deut. xxxii. 20. where it is rendered "faith" by our translators. The primary meaning of the word אמן, is steadiness, or firmness, constancy and stability. God is called in Isa. lxx. 16. אלהי אמן, "The God of truth," or "faithfulness."

Another meaning is given to the word אמן, in Nehem. ix. 38ⁿ, where it seems to signify "a sure or firm treaty." The Septuagint translate the phrase δυστιθέμεθα πίστιν. Our translators render the word אמן, adjectively. Their version of the passage is, "we make a sure covenant." In the book of Ecclesiasticus (chap. i. 33. and xl. 12, &c.) we meet with πίστις, in the same sense in which it is used in the New Testament. In these senses the word may be considered applicable to the passage before us. It was necessary that the teachers of the new religion should have "stability and constancy," as well as belief and purity; neither was it less necessary that they should enter into covenant with God, in consideration of the fulfilment of his promises in Christ; as the legislator of Israel had done, when he had recapitulated the mercies of God to himself, his people, and their common ancestors.

The fourth of these sacred gifts requires no discussion: the gift of healing was the power of curing diseases; the most common, though at the same time not the least wonderful of these mighty powers. Some confusion has been occasioned by the word δυνάμεις, which is used in two different senses, in verses 28 and 29. But on referring to the Septuagint, it will be seen that the word is there used in the same manner. It corresponds to כח, strength, power, &c. 1 Paral. xxix. 2. 2 Par. xxii. 9. and Esther ii. 18. to עֲבָד, a servant. The persons invited by the king of Persia to his banquet, mentioned in this passage, were the great officers of his court, his higher and confidential servants. The officers of the Christian Church were peculiarly honored, and received the same appellation which designated the companions of a sovereign.

The fifth is evidently transposed in the three lists. The word ἐνέργησα does not occur in the LXX, though it is found in Ecclus. xvi. 16. as we have observed. It seems to refer to the highest possible enlargement of the natural faculties, by which the teachers of Christianity were enabled to perform wonderful cures. They were supernaturally instructed, perhaps, to anticipate the knowledge and discoveries of a future age; and to effect, likewise, wonderful healings of disease, by an agency superior to any efforts of medical science, past, present, or future.

In the next division of the miraculous gifts,

" In Arias Montanus' Bible, in the Septuagint, and in our own Bibles, this passage is chap. ix. ver. 38. But in Bagster's small Hebrew Bibles it is Nehem. x. ver. 1.

"prophecy," προφητεία, and "the discerning of spirits," are classed together with Ἀντιλήψεις, "helps," and Κυβερνήσεις, "governments;" which titles are equivalent, according to the arrangement in the third list, with Γλώσσαις λαλῶντες, "speakers of tongues." This division, as we may judge from the order which has hitherto proceeded regularly from the apostles to the lower gradations of the ministry, and the inferior gifts imparted to them, ought to signify something inferior to the gifts and titles which have been already enumerated. If we may, as we propose, fix the meaning of these much-controverted words from the LXX, we shall find this opinion most singularly confirmed. The word προφητεία is used in the LXX for the Hebrew חזון, "vision," or "ecstasy," 2 Paral. xxxii. 32. Dan. xi. 14., which was a lower degree of inspiration than that which was given to Moses, who talked with the Divine Leader of Israel "face to face;" and consequently lower than was imparted to the apostles, who were honored in the same manner by the Sacred Oracle himself. Lord Barrington's opinion, therefore, though derived from other considerations, that a lower degree of prophecy is here understood, appears to be correct; as is, likewise, his additional remark, that in the word prophecy must be included the gift of teaching. As a necessary consequence, or as the inseparable attendant of this gift, was the power of discerning of spirits; which was the talent or faculty of discerning both the truth and certainty of what was spoken by other prophets, and likewise of ascertaining the thoughts and secrets of the hearts of those who might enter the Christian assemblies, and consequently of knowing the precise mode of teaching which his circumstances might demand.

The persons who possessed these lesser gifts of prophecy, and knowledge of the thoughts of men, are called ἀντιλήψεις, and κυβερνήσεις. The first of which answers to עֲזָרָה, "help," Ps. xxi. 19. (ap. LXX) and xxii. 19. of the English version.

"The word κυβερνήσεις," says Lightfoot, "is used by the LXX to translate תַּחְבִּלִּית (Prov. i. 5. xi. 14. xx. 18. and xxiv. 6.), which word imports not the act, but the ability to govern; and the words ἀντιλήψεις and κυβερνήσεις, in 1 Cor. xii. 28, 29, 30., imply helps to interpret the languages and sense of those who spake with tongues".

"Alter Revelationis internæ modus est,—quo vigilantes rapiuntur in ecstasin, cessante ad tempus usu sensoriorum exteriorum, dum a spiritu divino, aut Angelo Dei jussu imaginationi exhibentur et alte infiguntur imagines quædam, sive figuræ rerum mysticæ et propheticæ; aut Deus ipse, vel angelus, verba veluti cum iis faciens, eos de præsentibus aut futuris edocet. Hæc specie Deus se præcipue prophetis, certe illustrioribus, manifestum fecit, diciturque ea stylo Scripturæ V. T. חֲזוֹן visio ἀποκάλυψις."—Vitranga, Obserr. Sacra, lib. vii. cap. ii. p. 7.

^p Life of Lightfoot, by Strype. The Assembly

The speaking with tongues was the gift more commonly imparted than any other, as we read in the narrative of the conversion of Cornelius and his household. It was, therefore, of inferior estimation to those which were more rare. This consideration harmonizes with the rest of this perplexing division both of the miraculous gifts, and of those on whom they were conferred. The speakers with tongues were the assistants to the higher ministers, and were often of inferior degree; they possessed the ability to govern, and were thus prepared for the higher offices in the Church; they received the lower gift of prophecy, and the discerning of spirits.

The last of these miraculous gifts requires no discussion. It appears to refer to a further division of a still lower and inferior miraculous endowment. The converts who were baptized with Cornelius spake with tongues. I should conclude, from this division of the miraculous gifts, not that every convert was able to speak every known language, but only a certain number: and, with respect to the interpreters here mentioned, we may conclude that they were persons who repeated to some of the people, in their own language, those addresses of the apostles which were spoken to another portion of the congregation, in their native tongue. As the Jews were every where dispersed, the congregations of the primitive Christians must have generally consisted of the Israelites who spake the Aramaic or Syriac dialects, and of the natives of the countries where they sojourned. In commercial towns there would be frequently assemblies, composed of strangers from the most opposite quarters of the world, to whom these divisions of the miraculous gifts would be the most convincing of all arguments.

Whatever might have been the nature of the miraculous gifts which were imparted by the Spirit of God to the first teachers of the Gospel, it is certain they were all subject to the apostles, and the apostles to each other, in council. Their powers were not derived from the people, though they were imparted for the instruction of the poorest, and meanest, and most despised among them. They were accountable to God and to his apostles. The caprice of the multitude was not their rule of action: and while they sedulously labored for the common benefit, they never derived their doctrines from those whom they were ordained to superintend and teach; nor did they allow their separate congregations to dictate to them as to the doctrines they were to inculcate.

The flocks did not then choose their shepherds; the children did not ordain their spiritual fathers. Free from all inferior motives, unambitious of honor and popularity, careless of wealth, undaunted by persecution, unsubdued by danger and difficulty, the first teachers of the Gospel regarded with equal affection the favor or the hatred of the rich and poor. Bold, zealous, firm, and holy, their lips preserved knowledge, and the people learned the Law from their mouth. Happy is that Church whose clergy are thus devoted to the service of the people committed to their charge—who are faithful in the discharge of their sacred duties, “not with eyeservice, as men pleasers, but with singleness of heart, as unto God.”

Such were the gifts, titles, and offices, by which the Christian Church was now united. It formed, at this time, wherever it was dispersed, one large society. The persons who presided over it (and no society can exist without some order or form of government), derived their authority not from the people, but from God. These divinely-appointed heads, in the process of time, ordained fit persons, who were generally known to and approved by the people, among whom they lived, to the office of teacher. If these teachers deviated from the form of sound words and the apostolic doctrine, they were responsible to the authority which had empowered and commissioned them to teach: and the apostles themselves, as in the instance of St. Peter, were controlled by their equals in power. Christ was the invisible Head of the Church, and the supremacy of Peter, or of Rome, was unknown; all was rightly and efficiently organized for the building up, in this evil world, the outward and visible Church of Christ, by which the invisible and the spiritual Church, as in the days of Noah, might be conducted safely to the kingdom of Christ and God. Wicked and inconsistent Christians, as we learn from the Epistles, were members of the visible Church even in the apostolic age—it is so at present. God alone can separate the good from the bad at the last. It is our duty, while we are in the body, to continue to build up the visible Church; to establish and to insist upon external religion, the means of grace, the right administration of the sacraments, the purity, honor, and independence of the Christian priesthood; and to maintain, “in spite of scorn,” its scriptural government in the world. Thus, by obedience to the example of the apostles of God, we may bring many millions of our forsaken brethren of mankind from among every nation under heaven, within the visible Church on earth, and lead them, by the power of the Spirit of God, to the spiritual Church above⁹.

NOTE 1.—PART XII.

THE principal reason which prompted St. Paul to commence his second apostolical journey at this time, was probably his learning that the Churches in the provinces were divided in opinion; and that the harmony of the infant Church was disturbed on account of the controversies on the subject of conformity to the Mosaic Law. They were anxious to ascertain, πῶς ἔχουσιν, quomodo se habeant, ac constantes sint in profitenda doctrina.

NOTE 2.—PART XII.

THEIR dispute about John Mark, is a proof of human infirmity, which cannot be justified, though it admits of extenuation. There was some breach of charity between them; on one side it may be said that Paul's zeal carried him too far, and on the other that Barnabas was too indulgent to his kinsman—ὁ Παῦλος ἐζήτει τὸ δίκαιον, ὁ Βαρνάβας τὸ φιλόανθρωπον. This rupture, however, did not end in hatred, as appears from the manner in which Barnabas is mentioned by Paul in his Epistles. Barnabas went to Cyprus, and Paul into Syria and Cilicia.—Witsius, Meletem. Leidens. de Vitâ Pauli, cap. iv. sect. 15.

NOTE 3.—PART XII.

IT is probable that St. Paul went from Cilicia to Crete, and having preached there, left Titus to complete his work, and to ordain elders.—See Witsius, Meletem. Leidens. de Vitâ Pauli, cap. v.

THE fourth and fifth verses of chap. xvi. are added to the end of chap. xv. on the authority of Lord Barrington, whose opinion is advocated by Dr. Paley and Dr. Clarke.—See Miscellanea Sacra, Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, and Dr. Clarke's Commentary.

NOTE 5.—PART XII.

IN order to judge rightly of Paul's conduct in this affair, which some have censured (as they do other things in Christianity), because they did not understand it, we must recollect that he always openly avowed, "That the Gentiles were free from the yoke of the Mosaic ceremonies, and that the Jews were not to expect salvation by them:" and he also taught, that they were not in conscience obliged to observe them at all, except in cases where an omission of them would give offence. But because his enemies represented him as teaching people to despise the Law of Moses, and even as blaspheming it, he therefore took some opportunities of conforming to it publicly himself, to show how far he was from condemning it as evil; an extravagance into which some Christian heretics early ran. And though, when the Jewish zealots would have imposed upon him, to compel Titus, who was a Greek, to be circumcised, even while he was at Jerusalem, he resolutely refused it (Gal. ii. 3-5.), yet here he voluntarily persuaded Timothy to submit to that rite, knowing the omission of it in him, who was a Jew by the mother's side, would have given offence; and being the more desirous to obviate any prejudices against this excellent youth, whose early acquaintance with the Scriptures of the Old Testament (2 Tim. iii. 15.) might render him peculiarly capable of preaching in the synagogues with advantage; which, had he been uncircumcised, would not have been permitted. Grotius observes, "This was probably the beginning of Luke's acquaintance with Timothy, though Paul knew him long before."—See Doddridge's Family Expositor, in loc.

NOTE 6.—PART XII.

MUCH service would be rendered to the world by any student who would write a history of Samothrace. This island was the earliest European seat of the ancient idolatry which over-spread Europe from India, Canaan, and Egypt. Mr. Faber has prepared the way for the successful prosecution of all researches of this nature. I have not the means of ascertaining what progress has been made of late years in those branches of knowledge, which were so successfully cultivated by Sir William Jones, and various members of the society over which he presided. It is, however, to be hoped, that great additions will eventually be made to our present information on the early history of the world, from the Sanscrit records.

NOTE 7.—PART XII.

“THIS passage,” says Mr. Horne, “has greatly exercised the ingenuity of critics and commentators. It may, more correctly, be thus rendered:—Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia, or of Macedonia Prima; and this is an instance of minute accuracy which shows that the author of the Acts of the Apostles actually lived and wrote at that time. The province of Macedonia, it is well known, had undergone various changes, and had been divided into various portions, and particularly four, while under the Roman government. There are extant many medals of the first province, or Macedonia Prima, mostly of silver, with the inscription, MAKEΔONΩΝ ΠΡΩΤΗΣ, or, the first part of Macedonia, which confirms the accuracy of Luke, and at the same time shows his attention to the minutest particulars. It is further worthy of remark, that the historian terms Philippi a colony. By using the word κωλονία (which was originally a Latin word, colonia), instead of the corresponding Greek word αποικία, he plainly intimates that it was a Roman colony, which the twenty-first verse plainly proves it to have been. And though the critics were for a long time puzzled to find any express mention of it as such, yet some coins have been discovered, in which it is recorded under this character, particularly one, which explicitly states that Julius Cæsar himself bestowed the dignity and privilege of a colony on the city of Philippi, which were afterwards confirmed and augmented by Augustus.”—Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures, vol. i. p. 227.

NOTE 8.—PART XII.

ON THE NATURE OF THE SPIRIT OF DIVINATION
IN THE PYTHONESS.

I HAVE already observed upon the folly of making our present experience the criterion of truth. The age in which we live is undoubtedly, for the most part, by God’s mercy, delivered from the terrible spectacle of human beings evidently possessed by evil spirits. But evil still exists amongst us, although in a less avowed and terrible form, and it still but too frequently and too effectually withdraws our hearts from the service of our Maker.

If it appeared to me to be warranted by the sacred text, I would willingly interpret this passage with Michaelis, Heinrich, Kuinoel, Benson, and many others, and believe that the damsel at Philippi was either an impostor, a ventriloquist, insane, diseased with melancholy, or overpowered with her own fancies; but I cannot render the plain language of St. Luke in any but the literal manner. My reason shall always submit to Scripture; and I cannot wrest the words of this Scripture to any other meaning than the usual one, that an evil spirit had influence over the mind and body of this person, enabling her to utter oracular responses.

The priestess of Apollo at Delphos, when placed on the tripod, uttered confused words and phrases, among strange contortions and gesticulations. Her words were interpreted by the priests, and were considered prophetic. The damsel at Philippi, when agitated by the evil spirit, by which she was possessed, was probably much convulsed, uttered her oracular responses with various contortions and gesticulations. It was either on account of this parallel between her actions, appearance, and language, and those of the Pythian priestess, that she is here said to have the spirit of Python; or because the evil spirit by which she was actuated was of the same nature and power as that which prompted the priestess of the pagan deity. The damsel at Philippi is generally supposed to have been one of the ἐγγαστριμύθοι—that is, she spoke from the inside, as a ventriloquist, in the same manner as the priestess of Apollo spoke from the tripod.

Biscoe has reasoned with much justice on the question, Whether this narrative proves that an evil spirit possessed this damsel or not? He sufficiently shows that it cannot be considered as a trick on the part of the girl, or that the apostles discovered the imposture, and reprovèd the deceiver.

“Supposing this woman’s speaking inwardly,” he observes, “as from her belly or breast, were a trick of her own acquiring, and no ways owing to any demon or spirit that spake from within her, how could St. Paul’s saying those words, ‘I command thee to come out of her,’ discover the trick, reveal the secret, and convince the by-standers that she was a mere impostor, and had no spirit of divination within her: would it not rather convince them, that, in his opinion, she had such a spirit within her? But let us suppose, what is not so much as hinted in the text, that St. Paul spent much time in preaching to the people, and showing them that this woman, by a particular formation of the organ of speech, and by long practice, had gained a habit of speaking so as no one should see her lips move, and the voice should seem to come from her breast; I am yet at a loss to know how this could deprive her masters of their gain: for surely this would go but a little way towards convincing the people, that she could not really predict things future. Her reputation was established; there was a general belief that she did foretell things, and a great concourse of people after her to make inquiry into their future fortunes. It is expressly said, that ‘she brought her masters much gain by soothsaying.’ The showing that it was possible for her, by long practice, to attain the art of speaking inwardly, would no ways dissuade persons from following her, so long as they retained a notion that she really prophesied. We will advance, therefore, one step further, and suppose that St. Paul not only discovered her 'trick' of speaking inwardly, but that he also argued against her being a diviner or prophetess, and plainly laid before them, that she usually made her answers in ambiguous and general terms; that they much oftener proved false than true; and that it was owing to mere accident, if at any time there seemed to be truth in what she had said. If we judge of the experience we have of mankind, we cannot reasonably suppose that these arguments should immediately prevail with all the by-standers, or indeed any considerable part of them, to lay aside the opinion they had entertained of this woman's gift. However, we will suppose that all the by-standers were at once convinced of the truth and weight of the Apostle's argument. Would they immediately be able to spread the same persuasion among all the inhabitants of Philippi? And if all Philippi had believed her an impostor, might not her masters have sent her to another city, where, by the practice of the same arts, she might still have brought them much gain. The plain truth therefore is, St. Paul prevented her future prophesying; or, if the word 'trick' pleases better, he wholly disabled her from doing the 'trick' any more. He cast out the spirit which spake within her, so that she was heard no more to speak as from her belly or breast. Her masters soon perceived that she was no longer inspired or possessed, that she could now utter no more divinations or prophecies; and therefore, all hopes of their gains from her, whether in Philippi, or any other city, were wholly gone."

After all, it is a dispute among learned men, whether she did speak inwardly, as from her belly or breast^a. They say the words do not necessarily imply this meaning, but only in general, that she was possessed of a spirit of divination or foretelling things to come. And they urge, that when she followed St. Paul, and said, "These men are the servants of the Most High God, which show unto us the way of salvation," she spake out with a loud and distinct voice. If this were the case, what "trick" had the woman, that St. Paul could discover to the people? Vid. Wolfii Cur. in loc.

Another thing, which demonstrates the absurdity of this interpretation, is the rage of the multitude against St. Paul. For no sooner had the masters of the girl accused him and Silas to the magistrates, but, it is said, "that the multitude rose up together against them," v. 22. Had he, as this interpretation supposes him to have done, convinced the whole city of Philippi that this maid-servant was an impostor, and could foretell things future no more than any other person, no doubt they would have taken part with St. Paul, and not with the masters of the girl. They would have thought themselves obliged to him for having discovered the cheat, and preventing their future expense in needless and fruitless applications to one who could only amuse and deceive them, but not foretell any thing future. If they were incensed against any person, it is natural to suppose it should have been against the girl and her masters, for having imposed upon them, and tricked them out of their money. But that they should take part with the masters of this impostor against the person who had discovered the fraud, is so contrary to all the experience we have of mankind, that it is a demonstration of the absurdity of this comment. On the other hand, if we take the story in the plain and literal sense, how natural is it, that the multitude of the city should side with the masters, as being fully persuaded that it was not only a great piece of injustice done to them by the Apostle, but a public injury of a very heinous nature; as they had hereby lost what they esteemed an oracle, to which they might apply upon all urgent and doubtful occasions! Nor is there any the least hint in the text of a change in the multitude, as though they had been first for St. Paul, and afterwards, by some secret management, brought over to side with the masters.

We may justly, therefore, conclude with the majority of commentators, and the concurrent testimony of the Church, that this also was a demoniacal possession, and being so, that it afforded another instance of the influence the evil spirit maintained over mankind, till the power and mercy of the Saviour delivered us from the bondage and tyranny of the destroyer.

The object of the evil spirit, in bearing testimony to the truth of the Apostle's preaching, is well explained by a modern commentator. "The evil spirit," he observes, "well knew that the Jewish Law abhorred all magic, incantations, magical rites, and dealings with familiar spirits; he therefore bore what was in itself a true testimony to the apostles, that by it he might destroy their credit, and ruin their usefulness. The Jews, by this testimony, would be led at once to believe that the apostles were in compact with these demons; and that the miracles they wrought were done by the agency of these wicked spirits; and that the whole was the effect of magic; and this of course would harden their hearts against the preaching of the Gospel. The Gentiles again, when they

^a Probabilis tamen est sententia Delingii Obs. Sac. part ii. p. 201. Wolfii curis ad h. l. Walchius observet—"Feminam illam ἐγγαστροφύθου numero non esse adscribendam, cum Lucas v. 17. verba distincte prolata ei tribuat, cum eam secutam esse dicat Paulum ejusque comites, atque adeo per id significet eam per plateas et cursitando vaticinatam esse: ἐγγαστροφύθου vero vel insidentes cuidam loco, vel prostrati in terra oracula sua ediderint."—V. saw that their own demon bore testimony to the apostles, would naturally consider that the whole was one system; that they had nothing to learn, nothing to correct; and thus the preaching of the apostles must be useless to them. In this situation, nothing could have saved the credit of the apostles, but their dispossessing this woman of her familiar spirit; and that in the most incontestable manner: for, what could have saved the credit of Moses and Aaron, when the magicians of Egypt turned their rods into serpents, had not Aaron's devoured theirs? And what could have saved the credit of these apostles, but the casting out of this spirit of divination, with which, otherwise, both Jews and Gentiles would have believed them incompetent^b?"

NOTE 9.—PART XII.

THIS passage is generally quoted as one of those which prove the identity of the service of the primitive Church with that of the synagogue. In the instance of reading the Scriptures in both, the parallel certainly exists. This subject, however, having been already in some measure considered, I shall merely observe, in this place, that we never read that any one of the primitive churches had such an officer as the Archisynagogus, or were governed by the ten, the twenty-three, &c., neither were the primitive churches built by the side of rivers; and many other points of dissimilarity might be shown.

Some writers, indeed, have gone to the opposite extreme, and derived the principal customs which prevailed among the early Christians from the heathen institutions established among them. The fact seems to be, that as the Jewish synagogues were necessarily the first places of worship, very many useful customs were derived from the Jewish synagogue-service: and, as the number of the Gentile converts increased from the heathen worship, some customs might be derived from them also. The Churches, in things indifferent, were left to their own discretion: there was, however, a general similarity of worship, as well as an unity of faith, among all the primitive Churches. As at the Reformation, our church-service was not formed upon the model of the service of the Romish Church, yet our Reformers wisely retained whatever was useful; so were many customs of the synagogues preserved. The worship of God was placed upon a right foundation: there was neither a servile deference paid to antiquity, neither was there any capricious, or useless, or jealous removal of ancient customs, merely because they were established.

NOTE 10.—PART XII.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO THE EPISTLES, AND ON THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

REVELATION is the language of heaven spoken by the lips of men; and no where through the volume of Scripture do we more legibly read its characters of light, than in the portion to which we have now arrived—the Epistles of St. Paul. It is here that the discoveries are made which complete the perfection of the Christian dispensation. The preaching of Christ was past—the generation of witnesses who heard him speak “as man never spake,” was rapidly dying away; the reign of the Holy Spirit had begun, and the divine teaching was recalled to the minds of the Evangelists, and the deepest mysteries of God were imparted to the apostles. In the Gospels we read what Christ in his humiliation declared on earth—in the Epistles are recorded what Christ on his throne of glory spake through the Spirit from heaven. Why should it excite our surprise, therefore, that all those who passionately long, or serenely hope, for their eventual attainment of the promises of God, should be so much attached to this portion of their holy Revelation; when others again, of a different character, who seem unable to appreciate their sublime excellencies, would altogether exclude them, as abounding with observations and directions which were primarily of a temporary nature only, and consequently, as they assert, irrelevant to the Christians of the present age? On this principle nearly the whole of our Scriptures may be rejected as useless; for all the sacred books, either wholly, or in part, were first written to answer some temporary object, however profitable they may have been for instruction, reproof, and doctrine to the catholic Church for ever. Man is the same in all countries. However his customs and habits may differ, the same principle of evil within him every where prevails—as the body is the same in one nation as in another, though the manner of his clothing and the ornaments of his dress may vary. It is to the principle within, “to the inner man,” that the Scripture is addressed; and if, therefore, we meet, either in the Old or New Testament, with any passages which refer to customs that are now obsolete, we may consider the appeal of inspiration as directed to the motives of action; and we shall then find that all Scripture is of universal application, and is written for our instruction in righteousness. It proceeds from the Father of spirits, and is by him revealed to the spirit of man within him.

Here it is that we are presented with a picture of the heart of man, and of the human nature with which we are born into the world, so faithful, that when we look within us, we acknowledge its justice with indignation, with sorrow, or remorse; yet so vivid, so animated in its coloring—its impression so powerful, that we never cease to remember the terrible portrait of ourselves which is drawn by the inspired pencil. Here it is that the supernatural energy of inspiration triumphs. We may call in to our aid the flatteries of our self-love, and arm ourselves with speculations on the dignity of human nature, and the infinite, uncovenanted mercy of God—We may palliate vice, and endeavour to satisfy ourselves that the natural or animal man may become a participator of a spiritual existence without change or repentance, or divine influence: if, however, we contemplate the likeness of ourselves as the character of the heart is drawn in these divine compositions, we shall deeply feel the absolute necessity of the same Spirit of God, which inspired these holy writers, to cleanse the thoughts of our hearts within us, that we may perfectly love and worthily magnify Him. Here it is that we read in a clearer and fuller manner, than in any other part of the Sacred Volume, the mysteries of the world to come—the nature of our future existence—the recesses of the human heart—the majesty of the Son of God—the intimate union which may be formed, while we are still on earth, between the human soul and God its Creator—and the unspeakable consolations which Christianity alone can afford us in the prospect of death, and the hour of our most painful sufferings. It would be easy to detail these at great length: each of them appeals to the heart, as the Angel Jehovah, when he followed our first parents in the recesses of the garden, and exclaimed, “Where art thou?” In the devotional parts of St. Paul’s Epistles, a voice from heaven, as the trumpet of the archangel, seems to appeal to the reader, “Where art thou? what are thy employments? to what world art thou going?”

The errors which distracted the Church in the apostolic age, are the same in principle as those which have always flourished, and which are abundantly prevalent in our own day. Even now the advocates of natural religion, and the assertors of human reason, like the Gnostics of the apostolic age, embarrass themselves and their readers with vain philosophy, and crude speculations on the existence of God, the nature of the soul, the origin of the world, or the eternity of matter. Antichristian metaphysicians still deserve the censure of “profane and vain babblings.” The Greek, the Oriental, and Jewish philosophy, united all their jargon to oppose a system of spiritual religion, which did not, and could not, amalgamate with their metaphysical theories; and every deistical dream which has been since invented is uniformly opposed to the same object. Revelation is the only guide to the reason of man; when its bright light is obscured or disregarded, man must always stumble on the dark mountains of error.

Did the Gnostics “forbid to marry, and command to abstain from meats?” The Apostle, in condemning them, passes his censure upon those corrupters of Christianity, who still in the Church of Rome inculcate the same doctrines. Did any profess to consider Christ as inferior to the Father? The Apostle is more especially urgent upon this fundamental point to enforce on the Church: That the Christ who took upon him our nature, is over all God blessed for ever. Did others maintain that Christ came into the world not to expiate the sins of man, or to appease the wrath of an offended Deity, but only to communicate to the human race the long-lost knowledge of the Supreme Being? The Epistle to the Hebrews satisfied the ancient Church of the folly, absurdity, and wickedness of this wilful blindness, and condemns, in language which modern courtesy would shrink from as illiberal and bigotted, the presumption of the German speculatist, and the blasphemy of the half-reasoning Unitarian. All metaphysical inventions which clash with the common-sense opinions which have originated in Scripture respecting God, the soul, and the compound nature of man, the origin, continuance, and eventual conquest of evil, are alike condemned by the inspired Epistles.

Among the various errors of the apostolic age, which are censured in their different compositions, we meet with no traces of that fatal error which has been reserved only for modern presumption: we find no denial of the miraculous evidences upon which Christianity is founded, or of the facts which it records, as the basis of the doctrines it enforces. This effort of the enemy of the Church was reserved for the present critical and enlightened age, in which that reasoner is considered the most wise, who departs farthest from the only true wisdom; and who, bewildered in the clouds and mists of error, “puts darkness for light, and light for darkness.”

If we turn to those subjects in which man may imagine himself to be more personally interested, as an immortal being, to the discoveries which it has pleased the Spirit of God to make to us by his apostles concerning the Saviour of the world, we might transcribe at great length the lofty titles and magnificent descriptions with which the inspired language of the apostles describes Him, “who is the brightness of his Father’s glory, and the express image of his person"—"the exact impression of his manner of existence"—"the image of the invisible God, in whom dwelleth the fulness of the Deity"—"who is highly exalted"—"at whose name all created things shall bow, whether in heaven or in earth; visible or invisible"—"the object of the worship of angels"—"the Judge of the world." He is here described as "The One who was before all things:" as "the manifested Saviour, from the creation to the judgment."

In these Epistles we are confirmed in the belief of our own resurrection—in the assurance that "this corruptible must put on incorruption." They corroborate the events related in the Gospels, and are the most decisive evidences we can possess of the rapid increase of Christianity. In them we hear, as it were, the angel of God declare, that "time shall be no more." We see the Saviour of the world resign his mediatorial kingdom to his Father, that God may be all in all—the harvest of the Church gathered in—the eternity that is past united to the eternity that is to come, and man made partaker of a heavenly and glorious immortality.

With respect to the crime of dividing or disturbing the Churches, the apostolic Epistles every where abound with the most explicit injunctions on this point—"I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment: for it hath been declared unto me, of you, my brethren, that there are contentions among you. Submit to those that have the rule over you, for they watch for your souls, as those that must give an account;" with many other passages to the same purpose.

Still farther: there are various portions of the Epistles, which incontrovertibly relate to our own times, and to times yet to arrive: those portions, namely, which are predictive. Of this description are the Epistle of St. Jude; a part of the Second Epistle of St. Peter; of St. Paul's Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, and of both his Epistles to Timothy; and of the Epistles of St. John. It is needless to name other passages, or to enlarge on those prophecies which have been specified; for who will deny them to pertain to the faith and the practice of the present age?

We must not, however, regard the Epistles as communications of religious doctrines not disclosed before: as displaying the perfection of a system, of which merely the rude elements had been indicated in the writings of the four Evangelists. The object of the Gospels seems supposed to be almost exclusively this:—to prove, by a genuine narrative of miraculous facts, that Jesus Christ was the promised Redeemer: and thus to lay ground for the belief of the doctrinal truths, which he should afterwards reveal by the Holy Ghost in the Epistles.

"Is this opinion," says a learned modern^c, "consistent with antecedent probability? Does it appear a natural expectation, that our blessed Redeemer 'in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,' to whom the 'Holy Ghost was given without measure,' should restrict within such scanty limits his personal communications of divine truths to his disciples; that he should thus restrict such communications to his apostles during the whole period of his public ministry, before his crucifixion and after his resurrection? Is this opinion easily reconcilable with the declarations of the inspired writers, that, while our Lord 'dwelt among them, they beheld his glory, as the glory of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth' (John i. 14.), and that 'after his passion he was seen of them forty days, speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God?' " (Acts i. 3.)

To bring the point in debate to the speediest issue, we will inquire, what are the new articles, what is the new article, of faith revealed for the first time in any one of the Epistles? What are the articles of faith, what is the solitary article, on which any one of the Epistles throws such additional light, as in any degree to warrant an assertion, even with any ordinary benefit of hyperbole, that the Epistle imparts a religious doctrine not previously and clearly revealed in the Gospels, nor in the antecedent Scriptures of the Old Testament, which are continually receiving in the Gospels the plainest and the strongest sanction of our Lord?

Is it the doctrine of the unity of God? A claim will not be advanced as to that article.

Is it the doctrine of the union of three Divine Persons in one Godhead? Has the Old Testament, then, maintained silence on that article of faith? Have the Gospels maintained silence? I mean not to multiply testimonies. But is there no passage in the writings of Isaiah, which styles the predicted Saviour "the Mighty God," "God with us?" is there no passage in the Gospels which avers, that "In the beginning was the Word," that "the Word was with God," that "the Word was God?" Is there no passage in which our Lord affirms concerning himself, "Before Abraham was, I am;" "I and my Father are one?" Does no Gospel pronounce blasphemy against the Holy Ghost unpardonable; or unite that Divine Spirit with the Father and the Son as the God to whom we are dedicated in baptism?

Is it the agency of our Lord in creating the universe? The first chapter of St. John's Gospel answers the question.

^c See Gisborne's First Sermon on the Epistle to the Colossians, p. 13, &c.

Is it the propitiatory sacrifice of our Saviour? Have our copies, then, of the Old Testament lost the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah? Do our copies of the Gospels no longer speak of "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world?" of "the good Shepherd who came to lay down his life for the sheep," "to give his life a ransom for many?" of one who "came down from heaven to give his flesh for the life of the world?"

Is it the universality of the offer of redemption? If the references in the preceding paragraph have not rendered an answer superfluous; does no Gospel instruct us that Christ "was lifted up" on the cross, "that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life?" Is there no Gospel still recording his final command to his apostles to "go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature? Is there no Gospel still recording his accompanying assurance—"He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved?"

Is it our Lord's exaltation in his human nature to glory? He replies, by his Evangelists, "I ascend to my Father;"—"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth."

Is the deficient article, the corruption of human nature? Not while the Old Testament emphatically records, that after the fall, the sons of Adam were born in his image—no longer that of God. Not while it records the declarations of the Most High, before the deluge and after it, that "the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth;" or his averment by the lips of Jeremiah, that "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." Not while the fifteenth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, or the seventh chapter of that of St. Mark, retains the catalogue of sins pronounced by our Saviour to be the offspring of the heart. Not while St. John's Gospel produces his words: "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me:"—"without me ye can do nothing."

Is it the necessity of the entire renewal of the heart by the Holy Spirit? Not if the third chapter of St. John's Gospel be part of the canon of Scripture.

Is it justification by faith in the blood of Christ? Not while the corruption of human nature, and the necessity of a complete renewal of the heart by the Holy Spirit, are doctrines of the Old Testament and of the Gospels. Not while the Old Testament continues to exhibit the example of the father of the faithful, who "believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness;" who "saw by faith the day of Christ, and rejoiced to see it." Not while the Almighty proclaims by the Prophet Habakkuk, that "the just shall live by his faith." Not while the passages already noticed respecting the atoning sacrifice of the Son of God, and the consequences of believing in Him, shall be found in the Old Testament and the Gospels.

Is it the resurrection of the dead, the final judgment, the glory of heaven, the damnation of hell? On each of these points the Gospels are acknowledged to speak with decisive clearness.

Can it be necessary to pursue the inquiry further? There is yet a topic, the omission of which would expose me to the charge of keeping out of sight the example, held, in the estimation of many pious men, to be the most adverse to my present argument. By certain of our brethren, the Calvinistic tenets are deemed to be signally developed in parts of the Epistles. And it is natural that persons regarding those tenets, not merely as religious verities, but as the basis of Christian comfort and of Christian usefulness, should be led to think and to speak of the Epistles as containing the previously undisplayed perfection of Christianity. A deliberate, and, as I would humbly hope, an honest comparison of "spiritual things with spiritual" (1 Cor. ii. 13.), has not discovered to me Calvinistic tenets in any part of the Sacred Volume. But our brethren, who have formed an opposite conclusion concerning the divine plan of redemption, may be the more easily induced to an exact appreciation of the Epistles, when they recollect that there are various passages in the Old Testament and in the Gospels which the Calvinistic divines consider as satisfactory proofs of their own system.

"I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit, when He, the Spirit of truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth," (John xvi. 12, 13.) This address of our Lord to his apostles is commonly alledged in support of the assertion, that additional doctrines were to be propounded in the Epistles. That such cannot be the meaning of the passage, the preceding inquiry as to the several articles of Christian belief has proved. If the Epistles do not contain any new article of faith, to new articles our Saviour did not allude. Nor in the articles of faith stated in the Epistles does there appear to be any point, which would be offensive to the known prepossessions and inclinations of the disciples. To what particulars, then, did our Saviour allude? To truths not indeed new, for the Scriptures of the Old Testament had announced them, for repeatedly had he inculcated them himself; truths which, like his predictions of his own sufferings, and death, and resurrection, the apostles had frequently heard from him, and still disbelieved; truths in the highest degree offensive to their prejudices and their desires: that Christ was to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, no less than the glory of the people of Israel: that the peculiar privileges of the Jews were at an end: that the Samaritan, the Greek, and the Barbarian, were to stand on a level with the Israelite in the Christian Church, in the grace of the Gospel, in the kingdom of God. Allusion appears also to be intended to other very unexpected and unwelcome facts ; that Christ did not purpose to en-throne himself in worldly sovereignty, and to constitute his apostles the great men of the earth : that it was not His will to restore at that time the kingdom to Israel.

On the subject of the former class of particulars the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles proves how great was the need of the instructive interposition of the Holy Ghost ; and with what energy the instruction was imparted. When the persecution, commencing with the death of Stephen, scattered the Christians from Judæa as far as Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Antioch, they “went every where preaching the word to none (however, as it is emphatically added) but unto the Jews only,” (Acts viii. 1, 4. and xi. 19.) When the Ethiopian was to be converted, it was the Spirit that said unto Philip, “Go near, and join thyself to this chariot,” (Acts viii. 29.) When the messengers of Cornelius came for Peter, “the Spirit said unto him, ‘Go with them, doubting nothing: for I have sent them,’” (Acts x. 20.) The language of Peter to Cornelius was that of a man recently overruled and enlightened. “God hath showed me that I should not call any man common or unclean.”—“Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation, he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him,” (Acts x. 28, 34, 35.) On his return to Jerusalem, when the Jewish converts reproved him for having associated with the household of a Gentile, how did he vindicate himself? “The Spirit bade me go with them.”—“What was I, that I could withstand God?” (Acts xi. 12, 17.) When the hearers confessed the decisiveness of the authority, their expressions of submission were equally those of surprise: “Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life,” (Acts xi. 18.) With respect to the speedy restoration of the kingdom to Israel, an event connected in the minds of the apostles with an earthly sovereignty on the part of Christ, and with earthly aggrandizement on their own; though they pressed our Lord on the point to the very time of his ascension, and then received from Him a reply, which, while it denied precise information, left them in suspense, (Acts i. 6, 7.): yet after the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, we hear no more of the expectation. On the contrary, we hear the Holy Ghost negating it by the inspired writings of the apostles. St. James, in his concluding chapter, apparently alludes to the impending destruction of Jerusalem. St. Paul anticipates the downfall, when he describes the Jews as “filling up their sins;” and the wrath of God as “coming upon them to the uttermost.” (1 Thess. ii. 16.) And the same Apostle, when led by his argument to dilate on their approaching dispersion and their subsequent restoration, treats of the two events in a manner which implies, that it was by a long interval that they were to be separated, (Rom. xi.)

The post, then, which the Epistles occupy in the sacred depository of Revelation is not that of communications of new doctrines. They fill their station as additional records, as inspired corroborations, as argumentative concentrations, as instructive expositions, of truths already revealed—of commandments already promulgated. In some few instances a new circumstance, collateral to an established doctrine, is added: as when St. Paul, in applying to the consolation of the Thessalonians the future resurrection of their departed friends, subjoins the intelligence, that the dead in Christ shall rise first to meet the Lord in the air, before the generation alive at the coming of our Saviour shall exchange mortal life for immortality. In the explication of moral precepts, the Epistles frequently enter into large and highly beneficial details. And as one of their principal objects at the time of their publication was to settle controversial dissensions, to refute heresies, and to expose perversions of scriptural truth, they in consequence abound in discussions illustrating the nature and the scope of sound doctrine; and guarding it against the false and mischievous interpretations of the ignorant, of the subtle, of the unholy. So he who rejects one portion of Scripture rejects all, for “all Scripture is given by inspiration of God.”

The New Testament contains twenty-one Epistles, which are generally divided into two classes, those of St. Paul, and the Catholic Epistles. The latter are seven in number, and consist of the letters of St. James, Peter, John, and Jude; these, as their title implies, were addressed to Christians in general. The remaining fourteen were written by the Great Apostle of the Gentiles; and they have been religiously preserved and enrolled from the earliest periods among the number of the Sacred Writings. It has been a matter of doubt, whether St. Paul be the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews; but there are so many forcible reasons for attributing it to this Apostle, at least the matter of it, that its authenticity seems to be fully substantiated. With respect to the other thirteen, they are incontestably acknowledged as St. Paul’s.

It is true they have been rejected by various ancient heretics, by the Cerinthians^d, and particularly by the Ebionites, who looked upon this Apostle as an apostate and forsaker of the Law; but this is not surprising, as they were the disciples of some false teachers, who maintained the necessity of the ceremonial Law. Marcion^e received only ten epistles of St. Paul, and destroyed many passages of them that overturned his impiety. The Gnostics rejected the two Epistles to Timothy^f, because the Apostle evidently alluded to these teachers in these words—“That they had erred concerning the faith,” (1 Tim. vi. 20, 21.) But although each of these heretics have rejected the Epistles of St. Paul, either wholly or in part, they have not ventured to deny that they were his; so that their testimony is united to that of the whole Church, in attributing them to this Apostle. Moreover the same style, the same doctrine, the same spirit, though they have been written after the space of fifteen or sixteen years, are throughout perceivable.

Antiquity has made mention of some other works attributed to St. Paul. Eusebius speaks of a book entitled, The Acts of St. Paul, which in one place he ranks among the doubtful^g Scriptures, and in another among the supposed^h Scriptures. There was likewise an Epistle to the Laodiceans, which was in existence in St. Jerome's time, and which he affirms to be rejected by every oneⁱ. Marcion had one of them of the same title; but there is no doubt but that was the Epistle to the Ephesians, which was inscribed to the Laodiceans, in his Apostolic, that is to say, in his Collection of St. Paul's Epistles. There has also been brought from Asia, in these^j latter ages, a Letter from the Church of Corinth to St. Paul, and an Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians. But the Armenians, through whom these two compositions have come down to us^k, acknowledge themselves that they are apocryphal. There are also the Epistles of St. Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to St. Paul, which St. Jerome^l, contrary to his usual discrimination, seems willing to receive, although they are generally deemed spurious, and are without any marks of veracity. Eusebius was either not acquainted with them, or it is imagined did not consider them as worthy of mention. But with respect to the Epistles of St. Paul^m, the same historian testifies, that they were universally acknowledged to be the work of that Apostle.

The Epistles of St. Paul are addressed to some Churches or to some individuals with the view of instruction and edification, as Providence furnished the occasion or the subjects. They record the doctrine the apostles preached; the first heresies that arose in the Church; the decision of various questions proposed to St. Paul; some prophecies relative to future events; excellent precepts of morality; a sublime system of divinity; the government of the apostolic Church; the progress of the Gospel throughout the world; the gifts that the Holy Ghost infused on its ministers, or rather on the faithful; lastly, fine examples of zeal, courage, patience, disinterestedness, humility, charity, hope, and faith. It must also be remarked, that the Epistles of St. Paul, as Dr. Paley has proved at large, serve to authenticate the history of the Acts, as the history of the Acts in their turn corroborate the Epistles; which is of no trifling consequence in establishing the veracity and authority of these sacred writings.

The excellent Epistles of St. Paul have been preserved for us with great integrity, as may be seen by comparing the ancient versions, and the quotations of the old fathers, with the original text. The several readings or variations that have been collected from different manuscripts, are not by any means so numerous as those that are found in the manuscripts of the Gospels; which perhaps may be attributed to the copyists, who having in mind the expressions of a different Evangelist, might easily refer them to that which they were transcribing. They seem indeed to have done it sometimes designedly, in order to clear one passage by another. This has less frequently happened in St. Paul's Epistles; and among these various readings that remain, we dare assert, that there are none of them that can do any injury, either to the authenticity of those divine writings, or to the apostolic doctrine which they inculcate.

These Epistles have been long ranked in the order in which they at present stand. Epiphaniusⁿ, who censures Marcion for having overturned this order, informs us that in his time the Epistle to the Romans was the first in all the authentic copies. He remarks only, that the Epistle to Philemon, which was the last in most of the manuscripts, was placed the thirteenth in some others; and that in some the Epistle to the Hebrews was the tenth, and preceded the Epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. It is certain that the Epistles are not chronologically arranged°. The Epistle to the Galatians appears to have been the first written of them all: the Epistle to the Romans the eighth or ninth. The latter has probably been placed first, either on account of the preëminence of the city of Rome, or on account of the excellency of the Epistle itself, which has always been looked upon as St. Paul's masterpiece, and the most polished of the apostolic monuments.

It is not known what order this heretic pursued, for he placed the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians after the Epistle to the Romans, though they are certainly more ancient.

The Epistles were spread by slow degrees from one Church to another. St. Paul commands the Colossians (Coloss. iv. 16.) to send to the Laodiceans what he wrote to them, in order to be there read in the Church, and to cause to be read in theirs those they should receive from Laodicea. There is no doubt but that the Churches of the metropolitan cities sent authentic copies of the letters addressed to them from the apostles, to others of their province. Hence these letters passed to Churches more remote. The Christians, who diligently sought after those of the martyrs, did not assuredly neglect those of the apostles. It is evident, from the letter that Polycarp wrote to the Philippians, that they asked him for those of St. Ignatius. "I send you," says Polycarp, "the letters that Ignatius has written to me, and in general all those that I have, as you have commanded me". He means the letters that Polycarp, who was at Smyrna in Asia, might have collected, either from the apostles, or from the disciples of the apostles; for he adds, "that they might be of use in strengthening them in patience and faith."

With respect to the time in which the Epistles of St. Paul began to be dispersed, it is very difficult to mark it precisely, since there are very few complete records of that time remaining. Clement of Rome, who was contemporary with the Apostle, has written a letter to the Church of Corinth, which is preserved, in which he speaks of the first Epistle of St. Paul to the same Church. "Receive," says he, "the Epistle of the happy Apostle St. Paul, what he has written to you at the time that you were only beginning to receive the Gospel". He afterwards mentions the divisions with which the Apostle reproaches the Corinthians on account of Cephas, Apollos, and himself. There are, moreover, in this letter of St. Clement, some quotations, or manifest imitations of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which prove, doubtless, that he had seen that Epistle.

St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, and a disciple of the apostles, has written more letters, which Eusebius^s mentions, and of which, in these later ages, we have found the MSS., which do not appear to have been at all altered'. Writing to the Ephesians, he tells them, "You are the companions" of the faith of Paul, who has been sanctified, who has suffered martyrdom, who has obtained the highest happiness, and who, throughout his Epistle, makes honorable mention" of you in Jesus Christ." There is also another letter of St. Polycarp, the disciple of St. John, where he quotes this remarkable passage of 1 Cor. vi. 2. "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world"?" There are moreover in it some instructions for the deacons and deaconesses, evidently copied from those which St. Paul gave to Timothy and Titus respecting those persons. In general, Polycarp speaks of St. Paul's Epistles to the Churches that knew God, at a time^x when there was not as yet any Christian Church at Smyrna. This is what he sends to the Philippians respecting the Apostle, "Neither I, nor any of my equals, were able to obtain the knowledge of the happy and glorious Apostle Paul who has been aforetime among you, those who lived then have seen him in person; who has taught you the clear and true doctrine most exactly; and who being absent wrote some letters to you, all which can now edify you in the faith, if you attentively consider them." These testimonies evince the Epistles of St. Paul to have been propagated at the period here spoken of. There is also a very decisive proof that they were dispersed before this period, as St. Peter, writing to the faithful Jews who were scattered through Asia Minor, speaks to them not only of the Epistles that the Apostle had addressed to the Churches of Asia, but even of those that he had written to others^y, as of works that were known, and which they might then peruse. It is likewise evident, in reading these compositions of the first ages of Christianity, that the Epistles of the apostles were communicated immediately to the neighbouring Churches by those who had received them, and passed slowly to the Churches more remote. Eusebius has observed^z, that Papias, bishop of Jerusalem, has quoted the earliest Epistles of St. Peter and St. John. Polycarp refers often to the first Epistle of St. Peter. Each of them was in Asia. There are, however, no evident quotations from the Epistle to the Romans, which having been sent into the west, passed very late into the east, and therefore could not have been so early recognised.

The eloquence of St. Paul does not consist in the style only. It consists in the sublimity of thoughts, in the force of reasoning, in the admirable use he makes of the Scriptures, in the boldness and brilliancy of expression, in the justness of images, and in the multiplicity and beauty of figures. He is animated, cogent, rapid, compact; frequently abrupt; often led away from his subject by an accidental word or expression, and returning to it again without the usual forms of connection: in other places he is pathetic, affecting, moving, and ever displaying that tender love and unction of the Holy Spirit, with which he was affected. He knew how to unite authority with complacency, and all the meekness of the Apostle St. John, with the severity of the Baptist; but, as has been remarked, his style is in many places extremely negligent^a. St. Jerome speaks on this point with great freedom^b; he gives him, nevertheless, in other respects, the greatest praise; as well as Eusebius^c, who does not hesitate to declare that St. Paul has surpassed all the other apostles, both in thought and expression. His excessive zeal leads him into many particularities. He abounds in broken sentences, and the most constrained metaphors, which occasion many and repeated difficulties. To account for his own declaration of himself, that when he should be rude and as an idiot with respect to speech, he was not with respect to knowledge^d, it must be remembered that he ular to mean the Epistle to the Hebrews in the 15th verse; for though it were addressed to the Hebrews of Judæa, it related, in general, to all the faithful of that nation. He speaks in the 16th verse of some other Epistles of St. Paul—"In all his Epistles," &c.

^d 2 Cor. xi. 6. Indeed, St. Jerome observes on was born in the city of Tarsus^e, where the Greek language was not very pure, and that the Hebrew, or Syriac language, being as familiar to him as the Greek, his style was consequently less polished; and is frequently mixed with Hebraisms, which render it a little harsh. He makes use also of some Greek particles in a sense we may term Hebraic, on which account they have not always determinate significations.

Many of the illustrations of St. Paul are traceable to his private life and circumstances. Tarsus, where he was born, was one of the most celebrated places of exercise then in Asia; and, as Dr. Powell observes, apud Bowyer, p. 432, there is no matter from which the Apostle borrows his words and images more than from the public exercises. He frequently considers the life of a Christian as a race, a wrestling, or a boxing; the reward which good men expect hereafter, he calls the prize, the victor's crown; and when he exhorts his disciples to the practice of virtue, he does it usually in the very same terms in which he would have encouraged the combatants. From the Apostle's country we descend to his family, and here we find another source of his figurative expressions. His parents being Roman citizens, words or sentiments, derived from the laws of Rome, would easily creep into their conversation. No wonder then that their son sometimes uses forms of speech peculiar to the Roman lawyers, and applies many of the rules of adoption, manumission, and testaments, to illustrate the counsels of God in our redemption. Nor are there wanting in St. Paul's style some marks of his occupation. To a man employed in making tents, the ideas of making camps, arms, armor, warfare, military pay, would be familiar; and he introduces these and their concomitants so frequently, that his language seems to be such as might rather have been expected from a soldier, than from one who lived in quiet times, and was a preacher of the Gospel of peace. When we consider these things, with the others that have been already mentioned, there will remain nothing that is peculiar in St. Paul's manner of writing, of which the origin may not easily be discovered.

He pursues an idea that presents itself, and leaves for a moment the main one to return to it again afterwards. With this, there are frequent ellipses, or words understood, which must be supplied either by what has preceded, or by what follows. In the parallel which he draws, in the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, between Adam, the author of sin and condemnation, and Jesus Christ, the Author of justification and life, his style is so concise and so elliptic, that a mere literal translation, without any supplement, would be not only barbarous but unintelligible. It is the same in the fourteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, where the turn and the construction of the original is obliged to be changed, and some words added in italics (that the reader may be able to distinguish what does not belong to the text), before the Apostle's meaning can be properly understood.

The subjects of which he treats add also to the obscurity of the Epistles of St. Paul. He discusses things which were only known at his time, and he answers some objections, which he sometimes only mentions. All this, however, is no reason why the meaning of St. Paul may not be sufficiently clear in every essential point. The only thing necessary, is to find out whether every interpretation that can be given to the words is true in the end, and agrees with the doctrine of Christianity. The obscurity again that is met with in these Epistles arises, very often, from commentators, who press some words too far, which they lay as foundations on which they build ill-founded systems, because they do not pay sufficient attention to the design of the author, and to the general system of religion, which ought to serve as a light to clear up dark passages.

St. Paul had been brought up in the school of Gamaliel, and had been instructed in all the learning of the Jewish theology. This was the knowledge in highest esteem among the nation. "We reckon as wise among us," says Josephus^f, "those only who have acquired so thorough a knowledge of our Laws, and the Holy Writings, as to be capable of explaining them; which is a circumstance so rare, that scarcely two or three have succeeded in it, and deserved that honor." This knowledge, however, is what St. Paul has termed Judaism, in which he testifies himself, that he had made very great progress, Gal. i. 14. Hence it is that so many more vestiges of this theology are visible in his writings, than in those of the other apostles; and that many of his arguments against the Jews are drawn from their own books^g, and from their own expositions of Scripture.

His quotations from the Old Testament are, for the most part, taken from the Septuagint version. This version was received by the Jews, who were called Hellenists, and who were dispersed among the Greeks, speaking their language. It is to these Jews, and the Gentiles who had embraced the Gospel, that St. Paul has written all his Epistles, except the Epistle to the Hebrews. But besides the quotations from Scripture, there are some others that, according to the testimony of the ancients, are taken from some apocryphal book of the Jews. The apostles having a "spirit of discrimination," had the power of separating the true from the false, that was to be met with in those books, and they quoted them without mentioning the books themselves. However, we may here make use of a very wise observation of St. Jerome^h, that it is by no means necessary to refer always to those apocryphal books, in order to find out St. Paul's allegations; that it cannot be found in the same terms in the canonical books, because in quoting Scripture he sometimes unites many passages together, without distinguishing what is taken from one prophet from that which is taken from another, and because he rather relates the sense than the words. His interpretation of the Old Testament is most commonly mystical, and what St. Jerome calls sensus reconditi, hidden meanings. The Jews, who studied the Holy Scriptures, were persuaded that beside the sense that naturally presented itself to the understanding, there was a concealed sense, a spiritual sense, which was the principal object of their study. They were consequently very much infatuated with allegories, in which they were imitated in a dangerous degree by some of the Christian teachers and fathers. This method of explaining the Scriptures being authorized, the Apostle has made use of it under the divine direction. The Jews could apply only to their Sacred Books their own particular and ordinary knowledge, whereas the apostles had received the spirit of prophecy, that is to say, the gift of explaining the ancient oracles, and they trusted their interpretations less to reason, than to a demonstration of spirit and power. They had the key of those sacred sayings, those "hidden mysteries," whose mystical senses, however vague and uncertain before, were made valid in the mouths of the apostles, on account of the gifts of prophecy and miracles.

We must discriminate in the passages which St. Paul quotes from the Old Testament, between those that are only allusions and applications, and those which are mentioned as oracles, which serve as proofs. Thus, when the Apostle applies to Gospel justification, what Moses has said respecting the Law, "Say not in your hearts, or in yourselves, Who shall ascend to heaven?" it cannot be imagined that this is a prophecy, of which he discovers the profound and concealed sense. It is a mere application of what has been said of the Law, to the Gospel: but a very beautiful and just application. The same may be observed of these words of the nineteenth Psalm, "Their words are gone out to the ends of the earth," which were said of the stars, and which St. Paul applies to the ministers of the Gospel.

From the internal evidence afforded by the Epistle itself—from the general testimony of antiquity—and the arguments both of Michaelis and Macknight, I am induced to place this Epistle to the Galatians before the others; and assign the year 49 or 50 as its date. Semler quotes and approves the opinion of another German writer, that the Epistle was written before the council of Jerusalem. I have not been able to procure the work to which he alludes, neither can I discover sufficient arguments to confirm his opinion.

Various opinions have been entertained by the learned, as to the date of this Epistle. Theodoret thought it one of those epistles which the Apostle wrote during his first confinement at Rome, in which he is followed by Lightfoot and others. But seeing in the other epistles which the Apostle wrote during his first confinement, he hath often mentioned his bonds, but hath not said a word concerning them in this, the opinion of Theodoret cannot be admitted; because there is nothing said in the Epistle to the Galatians of St. Paul's having been in Galatia more than once. L'Enfant and Beausobre think it was written during his long abode at Corinth, mentioned Acts xviii. 11., and between his first and second journey into Galatia.

This opinion Lardner espouses, and assigns the year 52 as the date of this Epistle. The author of the Miscellanea Sacra, who is followed by Benson, supposes it to have been written from Corinth. Capel, Witsius, and Wall, say it was written at Ephesus, after Paul had been a second time in Galatia. See Acts xviii. 23. and xix. 1. Fabricius thought it was written from Corinth during the Apostle's second abode there, and not long after he wrote his Epistle to the Romans. This likewise was the opinion of Grotius.

Mill places it after the Epistle to the Romans, but supposes it to have been written from Troas, while the Apostle was on his way to Jerusalem with the collections; to which he fancies the Apostle refers, Gal. ii. 10., and that the brethren who joined him in writing to the Galatians (i. 2.) were those mentioned Acts xiii. 1. Beza, in his note on Gal. i. 2., gives it as his opinion, that the brethren who joined St. Paul in his letter to the Galatians, were the eldership of the Church at Antioch, and that it was written in that city, in the interval between Paul and Barnabas's return from Paul's first apostolical journey, and their going up to Jerusalem to consult the apostles and elders concerning the circumcision of the Gentiles. Tertullian, as Grotius informs us in his Preface to the Galatians, reckoned this one of Paul's first epistles. Macknight's opinion is, that St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch, after the council of Jerusalem, and before Paul and Silas undertook the journey in which they delivered to the Gentile Churches the decrees of the council, as related Acts xvi. 4. To this date of the Epistle he is led by the following circumstances:—the earnestness with which St. Paul established his apostleship in the first and second chapters of this Epistle, and the things which he advanced for that purpose show that the Judaizers, who urged the Galatians to receive circumcision, denied his apostleship; and, in support of their denial, alleged that he was made an apostle only by the Church at Antioch, and that he had received all his knowledge of the Gospel from the apostles. This the Judaizers might allege with some plausibility, before Paul's apostleship was recognised at Jerusalem. But after Peter, James, and John, in the time of the council, gave him the right hand of fellowship, as an apostle of equal authority with themselves, and agreed that he should go among the Gentiles, and they among the Jews, his apostleship would be called in question no longer in any Church, than while the brethren of that Church were ignorant of what had happened at Jerusalem.

We may therefore believe, that immediately after the council, the Apostle would write his Epistle to the Galatians, in which he not only gave them an account of his having been acknowledged by the three chief apostles, but related many other particulars, by which his apostleship was raised beyond all doubt.

This argument, however, does not prove that the Epistle was necessarily written, as the learned author supposes, at Antioch, though it might be written not long after the council.

Macknight's second reason is taken from the inscription of the Epistle, in which it is said, that all the brethren who were with St. Paul joined him in writing it. For as the only view which any of the brethren could join the Apostle in writing to the Galatians, was to attest the facts which he advanced in the first and second chapters, for proving his apostleship, the brethren who joined him in writing it must have been such as knew the truth of these facts. Wherefore they could be neither the brethren of Corinth, nor of Ephesus, nor of Rome, nor of Troas, nor of any other Gentile city, where this Epistle has been dated, except Antioch. As little could they be the brethren who accompanied the Apostle in his travels among the Gentiles, as Hammond conjectures. For none of them, except Silas, had any notice of the facts advanced in this Epistle, but what they received from the Apostle himself; so that their testimony was, in reality, the Apostle's own testimony. The only brethren who could bear effectual testimony to these things were those who lived in Judæa and its neighbourhood, particularly the brethren of Antioch, who, by their intercourse with those of Jerusalem, must have known what happened to St. Paul there, as fully as they knew what happened to him in their own city, where he had resided often and long. I therefore have no doubt that the Epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch, and that the brethren who joined St. Paul in writing it, were the brethren there, whose testimony merited the highest credit. For, among them were various prophets and teachers, whose names are mentioned, Acts xiii. 1., with others of respectable characters, whose place of residence, early conversion, eminent station in the Church, and intercourse with the brethren in Jerusalem, gave them an opportunity of knowing St. Paul's manner of life before his conversion. His being made an apostle by Christ himself—his being acknowledged as an apostle by his brethren in Jerusalem—his teaching uniformly that men are saved by faith, without obedience to the Law of Moses—his having strenuously maintained that doctrine in the hearing of the Church at Antioch—his having publicly reproved St. Peter for seeming to depart from it, by refusing to eat with the converted Gentiles; and that on being reproved by St. Paul, St. Peter acknowledged his misconduct, by making no reply. All these things the brethren of Antioch could attest, as matters which they knew and believed; so that, with the greatest propriety, they joined the Apostle in writing the letter wherein they are asserted.

Dr. Macknight, however, has omitted to observe that the circumstances of St. Paul's conversion, preaching, and call to the apostleship, were known to all the brethren, whether of Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, or any other place; and therefore the testimony of any who were well acquainted with these facts would be sufficiently satisfactory to the Galatian converts. It is not necessary therefore to suppose that the brethren who are mentioned in the inscription of the Epistle, must have been of Antioch.

Dr. Macknight's third argument for the early date is derived from the omission by St. Paul of his usual command, that the persons to whom he wrote should "remember the poor." This is evidently an unsafe mode of reasoning.

When the Apostle wrote his Epistle to the Galatians, he had heard of the defection of some of them from the true doctrine of the Gospel. This defection he represents as having happened soon after they were converted, Gal. i. 6. "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from Him who called you into the grace of Christ." But if the Epistle to the Galatians was written either from Rome, during the Apostle's first confinement there; or from Corinth, during his eighteen months' abode in that city; or from Ephesus, where he abode three years; or from Troas, in his way to Jerusalem with the collections, the defection of the Galatians must have happened a considerable time after their conversion, on the supposition that they were first called when Paul and Barnabas went into their country from Lycaonia. Wherefore if the Apostle's expression, "I marvel that ye are so soon removed," is proper, the Epistle to the Galatians could not be written later than the interval between the council of Jerusalem and the Apostle's second journey into the Gentile countries with Silas, when they delivered to the Churches the decrees of the council.

These arguments seem to prove, that the Epistle to the Galatians was written soon after the council of Jerusalem: the exact time seems, however, to be more satisfactorily ascertained by Michaelis, who has assigned it to some part of this second apostolical journey, before St. Paul came to Berea, where the brethren appear to have left him. St. Paul's first visit to the Galatians was not long after the council which had been held in Jerusalem, as appears from Acts xvi. 4, 5, 6. "And as they (namely, Paul and Silas) went through the cities, they delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem. And so were the Churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily. Now, when they had gone throughout Phrygia, and the region of Galatia, and were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia," &c. From this passage we see that St. Paul preached the Gospel in Galatia; for the prohibition was confined to the Roman proconsular province of Asia, to which Galatia is here opposed. This is further confirmed by Acts xviii. 23., where St. Luke relates, that St. Paul again visited Galatia, strengthening his disciples, so that converts must have been made on his first visit. Now let us follow St. Paul on his first journey from Galatia to Berea, in Macedonia, where he seems to have arrived in the same year, and we shall be convinced that he wrote his Epistle to the Galatians upon this journey.

When he left the Galatians he was accompanied by several brethren, namely, by Silas (or Silvanus), Acts xv. 40. by Timothy, chap. xvi. 3., and perhaps by others. This circumstance is particularly to be noted. They travelled through Mysia to Troas, ver. 8., where St. Paul had a remarkable dream, which induced him to go into Macedonia. Before he left Troas, St. Luke was added to St. Paul's other companions, and in their company he travelled to Philippi, ver. 11, 12., where he preached the Gospel, ver. 13-40., and thence to Thessalonica, chap. xvii. 1-9.; here some of the brethren appear to have left St. Paul, and he travelled with Silas alone to Berea, ver. 19.

ⁱ Macknight's Preface to the Galatians, vol. iii. p. 84, &c.—Marsh's Michaelis, vol. iv. p. 9. chap. xi.—Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. part ii. p. 1117.

When he was no longer in safety here, he left Galatia, Silas remaining, and went to Athens, so that when he arrived in that city, none of the brethren were with him, in whose company he had travelled from Galatia.

Now St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians is written not only in his own name, but in the name of all the brethren who were with him. Who, then, were these brethren? Were they known or unknown to the Galatians? St. Paul would hardly have written to them in the name of the brethren who were with him, without determining who those brethren were, unless they had been the same who attended when he left Galatia, and who therefore were known to the Galatians without any farther description.

Consequently this Epistle must have been written before St. Paul separated from these brethren, that is, before he left Thessalonica. "Whether it was written in this city, or before he arrived there, I will not," says Michaelis, "attempt to determine; but it certainly was written during the interval which elapsed between St. Paul's departure from Galatia, and his departure from Thessalonica."

Again, St. Paul, in the two first chapters, gives the Galatians a general review of his life and conduct from his conversion, to the apostolic council in Jerusalem, and at the farthest to his return to Antioch. Here he breaks off his narrative. It is probable, therefore, that from that time to the time of his writing to the Galatians, nothing remarkable had happened except their conversion. Lastly the supposition that St. Paul wrote to the Galatians at the period which I have assigned, accounts more easily than any other for St. Paul's mentioning to the Galatians, that he had not obliged Titus to undergo the rite of circumcision, namely, because he had obliged Timothy to submit to it immediately before his first visit to the Galatians; and St. Paul's adversaries had appealed, perhaps, to this, in support of their doctrine, that the Levitical Law should be retained.

"The particular year of the Christian æra," continues Michaelis, "in which the Epistle to the Galatians was written, it is difficult to determine with precision; though we are especially interested in the date of this Epistle, because it appears from chap. iv. 10., that the Galatians were on the point of celebrating the Jewish sabbatical year, and in that of their seduction by the Jewish zealots, of leaving their lands uncultivated for a whole year, though the Law of Moses on this article could not possibly extend to Galatia."

"What Michaelis conjectured," says Dr. Hales, "but was not able to establish, from the discordant systems of chronology in his time, may be now proved. The first year of our Lord's public ministry, A. D. 28, was a sabbatical year, and also a jubilee." Therefore A. D. 49, which was $3 \times 7 = 21$ years after, was also a sabbatical year. It is more probable, however, that the Epistle was not written during the sabbatical year itself, in which Paul attended the council of Jerusalem, (Acts xv. 2.) but rather the year after, A. D. 50, during the Apostle's circuit through the Churches of Syria and Cilicia, to confirm them in the faith, and to communicate to them the apostolical decree, (Acts xv. 36-41. and xvi. 4.) and to this year I have assigned it.

To understand the design of this Epistle, we must take into consideration certain opinions which were prevalent in the apostolic age.

The Jews believed that God demanded implicit obedience to the Law of Moses—that this obedience would justify them, or place them, with respect to God, in the same situation in which they would have been, if they had not transgressed; and it had the power of obtaining for them also eternal life. They thought that man was not so fallen, but that he was of himself able to obey the Law, and thus fulfil the conditions on which eternal life was promised. These opinions were so blended in the minds of the Jews with undoubted truths, that it would have been difficult to have answered them satisfactorily, unless by divine inspiration. The Apostle, however, proves by irrefragable arguments, both here, in his Epistle to the Galatians, and in his Epistle to the Romans—that the justification of man could not be accomplished by his own obedience. It was utterly impossible that man could fully and satisfactorily obey the demands of a law, which was designed rather to convince men of sin, and enforce upon them the conviction that something more was necessary to obtain the favor of God, and that the ceremonies of their Levitical Law were only typical of some better and more perfect salvation: the Law was as a servant, leading them as children from the painfulness and bondage of school, to the glorious liberty of the sons of God and heirs of heaven.

In opposition to this Judaizing heresy, St. Paul addresses the Galatians, and endeavours to convince them, by a masterly train of argument, that the doctrine of salvation by faith alone is the doctrine of Scripture. After having established his apostolical commission against the attacks of the false teachers, he asserts, that as the Law has no power to give life, it is useless to compel the Gentiles, or the Christian converts, to conform to the full observance of the ceremonial Law. He assures them no flesh can be justified by the Law, but by the faith of Christ Jesus, for if righteousness come by the Law, then Christ shall be dead in vain; and he proves the superiority of the new covenant, by referring to those gifts they had received from the Holy Spirit since their admission into the Christian dispensation.

He further assures them, that the Christian covenant was founded on the promise given to Abraham and to his seed, which was made and confirmed by God in Christ, four hundred and thirty years before the Law; therefore it was not possible that the Law should disannul or make the promise of a redeeming Saviour of Isaac's line of none effect. If, then, the Gospel was preached before unto Abraham, and we through him (and not through the Law are to be blessed), we must inquire into that faith which rendered this eminent father acceptable in the sight of his Almighty Creator. "He believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness." Christ himself declares, that Abraham saw his day afar off, and was glad—like the holy martyrs of the Christian dispensation, the faithful Abraham was called to give an evidence of his integrity, by the most painful of all human sacrifices—he was required not indeed to offer up himself, but his son, his only son, the beloved companion of his age, in whom all the blessings and promises of God were to be fulfilled, and from whom the Saviour of the world was to be born—without any revelation as to the manner in which this apparently contradictory command could be made to agree with the former important predictions. His faith was "the substance of things hoped for—the evidence of things not seen." He understood the promise conveyed in those gracious words—"In thee shall all nations be blessed." He knew that the same Almighty Being who gave life could restore it; and in this faith he acted; he took the knife, and in the full assurance of faith, the father prepared to become the slayer of his only son, "accounting," as the Apostle tells us, "that God was able to raise him up even from the dead," (Heb. xi. 19.) Abraham was justified by his faith, and by works was his faith made perfect; and if we would become his children, we must give the same evidence of our sincerity and faith. We must declare our faith by our works.

Macknight remarks on this subject, referring to the Epistle of St. James, that faith and works are inseparably connected as cause and effect; that faith, as the cause, necessarily produces good works as its effect, and that good works must flow from faith, as their principle; that neither of them, separately, is the means of our justification, but that, when joined, they become effectual for that end. Wherefore, when in Scripture we are said to be "justified by faith," it is a faith accompanied by good works. On the other hand, when we are said to be justified by works, it is works "proceeding from faith." Therefore, in this Epistle, St. Paul must be considered as arguing against the possibility of salvation or justification by works of the Law, while he enforces, by the example of Abraham, the necessity of good works on the principle of a well-grounded or justifying faith on the Son of God. This doctrine of justification, however, has been infinitely discussed and controverted—many depreciating good works in favor of faith alone; but this error frequently arises through want of a proper consideration of the Apostle's arguments. It is dangerous, so far as it checks exertions, and insidiously draws men from those outward forms which are the landmarks of religion. Under the pretence of encouraging, it destroys internal religion; by representing it as a system of pious feelings, which are independent of those outward ordinances which were ordained by Christ himself. The whole system of revelation corroborates the view here taken of "justification by faith." It is illustrated by all the eminent characters of the Old Testament, and is confirmed in the New, by the parables and actions of our Lord himself.

It will excite surprise among those who are interested in theological studies, that I have made little or no use of the labors of two writers, who of late years have paid great attention to these Epistles—Mr. Belsham, and Dr. Semler of Halle. My reasons shall be briefly given:—

I am unwilling to occupy the time of the reader with difficulties and objections, which are not generally known, merely to refute them. Both these theologians have deviated so widely from the beaten track, that the Christianity which they have deduced from the Inspired Writings bears no similarity to that which is received, and has ever been received, by the Christian Church. The Protestant Churches have been long divided upon the question of Church government; the Church of Rome, and the Protestants in general, have been divided concerning several articles of faith and discipline; but all these have hitherto maintained, and I trust will long maintain, the doctrines of the Atonement and Divinity of Christ; the Inspiration of Scripture, and its freedom from error. Both of these writers deny the whole of these fundamental truths. Semler considers the New Testament as any other uninspired book, and expresses his surprise that we should pay regard to the Jewish mythology, which abounds in it; and Mr. Belsham reproves St. Paul for false and incorrect reasoning. It is not my wish to direct attention to these works; one quotation from each, which I now subjoin, will sufficiently justify me in saying, that as the principles upon which we proceed are so diametrically opposite, it will be better to reserve for another opportunity the discussion of the good or evil to be found in their labors.

NOTE 11.—PART XII.

ON ST. PAUL'S SILENCE RESPECTING THE APOSTOLIC DECREE.

THAT is, as St. Chrysostom observes, "by setting up that Law which I allow God has abolished;" for if, as the Apostle argues, the Jewish Law can give salvation, then Christ is the minister of sin, as encouraging us to seek justification through him; or, as the preceding verse (17,) may be read without an interrogation—"If we be sinners in seeking to be justified by Christ, then Christ is the minister of sin." God forbid. But as a Christian I am dead to the Jewish or ceremonial Law, and I live by the faith of the Son of God, who gave himself for me.—See also Pyle's Paraphrase, vol. ii. p. 14.

"As the professed design of the Epistle was to establish the exemption of the Gentile converts from the Law of Moses, and as the apostolic decree pronounced and confirmed that exemption, it may seem extraordinary," says Dr. Paley, "that no notice whatever is taken of that determination by St. Paul on the present occasion, nor any appeal made to its authority. Much, however, of the weight of this objection, which applies also to some other of the Apostle's Epistles, is removed by the following reflections:—1. It was not St. Paul's manner, nor agreeable to it, to resort or defer much to the authority of the other apostles, especially whilst he was insisting, as he does generally throughout this Epistle insist, upon his own original inspiration. He who could speak of the very chiefest of the apostles in such terms as the following—'Of those who seemed to be somewhat (whatsoever they were it maketh no matter to me), God accepteth no man's person, for they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me'—he, I say, was not likely to support himself by their decision. 2. The Epistle argues the point upon principle; and it is not perhaps more to be wondered at, that in such an argument St. Paul should not cite the apostolic decree, than it would be that, in a discourse designed to prove the moral and religious duty of observing the Sabbath, the writer should not quote the thirteenth canon. 3. The decree did not go the length of the position maintained in the Epistle; the decree only declares that the apostles and elders at Jerusalem did not impose the observance of the Mosaic Law upon the Gentile converts, as a condition of their being admitted into the Christian Church. One Epistle argues that the Mosaic institution itself was at an end, as to all effects upon a future state, even with respect to the Jews themselves. 4. They whose error St. Paul combated, were not persons who submitted to the Jewish law because it was imposed by the authority, or because it was made part of the law of the Christian Church; but they were persons who, having already become Christians, afterwards voluntarily took upon themselves the observance of the Mosaic code under a notion of attaining thereby to a greater perfection. This, I think, is precisely the opinion which St. Paul opposes in this Epistle. Many of his expressions apply exactly to it—'Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect in the flesh?' (chap. iii. 3.) 'Tell me, ye that desire to be under the Law, ye do not hear the Law?' (chap. iv. 21.) 'How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?' (chap. iv. 9.) It cannot be thought extraordinary that St. Paul should resist this opinion with earnestness; for it both changed the character of the Christian dispensation, and derogated expressly from the completeness of that redemption, which Jesus Christ had wrought for those that believed in him. But it was to no purpose to alledge to such persons the decision at Jerusalem, for that only showed they were not bound to these observances by any law of the Christian Church. Nevertheless they imagined there was an efficacy in these observances, a merit, a recommendation to favor, a ground for acceptance with God, for those who complied with them. This was a situation of thought to which the tenor of the decree did not apply. Accordingly St. Paul's address to the Galatians, which throughout is adapted to this situation, runs in a strain widely different from the language of the decree—'Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the Law,' (chap. v. 4.), whosoever places his dependence upon any merit he may apprehend to be in legal observances. The decree had said nothing like this; therefore it would have been useless to have produced the decree, in an argument of which this was the burden. In like manner as contending with an anchorite, who should insist upon the severe holiness of a recluse, ascetic life, and the value of such mortifications in the sight of God, it would be to no purpose to prove that the laws of the Church did not require these vows, or even to prove that they expressly left every Christian to his liberty. This would avail little towards abating his estimation of their merit, or towards settling the point in controversy."

NOTE 12.—PART XII.

WE are all justified by a religious faith in the promises of God, like that of faithful Abraham, producing good works; and not by the rigid observances of all the rites of a typical law, which exacted an undeviating conformity, under the penalty of death, which it had not the power to redeem. Had the Jewish dispensation continued, the Gentiles could not have been united with the Jews, as the children of promise, but must have remained with them the children of law, and of bondage.

NOTE 13.—PART XII.

LORD BARRINGTON, in an ingenious dissertation on this much-discussed passage, supposes the word Christ here signifies “anointed,” as it does in Ps. cv. 15. “Touch not mine anointed,” (rendered Χριστοῦς, according to the LXX), and Heb. xi. 26. That the seed, or the one seed, Gal. vi. 16., signifies all those of the works of the law, and of faith, who are made one by being anointed with one Spirit, or by being baptized into one Spirit, as the one Spirit of the one Lord (Mediator), and of one God, even the Father. But the covenant, or the promises that God made to Abraham, he made to his seed, (Gen. xiii. 16., xvii. 7, 8., and xxii. 18.), then it cannot be two seeds; for, says he, that one seed is Christ, or the two different sorts of people, Jews and Gentiles, considered as one, being anointed with the same spirit, and therefore the promises and blessings belong to the Gentiles, who are of the one seed of faith, and have by it received the Spirit, as well as the Jews. If then it should be asked, why was the law added? St. Paul answers, it was added to show the Israelites the punishment due to transgression, that they, seeing themselves so manifestly concluded under sin, by the frequent breaches of the numerous laws they were under, which were often followed by death, might be led by the Law to the Gospel, which promised them righteousness and life. But this law was only added till that one seed should come, to whom the promise of life and blessedness is made; which one seed is composed of a body of Jews and Gentiles, by one faith in one God, through one Lord, and by one Spirit. The believing Jews receiving the Spirit first after Christ’s ascension, and afterwards the Gentiles, both idolatrous and devout. “Now,” argues the Apostle, “the law was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator,” (v. 19.), Moses. But still, says he, the law could not vacate the promise made to Abraham, and his seed: because Moses (as Mr. Locke first showed us) was only the mediator at the giving of the Law at Sinai, therefore only one of the parties concurred to that of Abraham’s covenant, which was between God and Abraham, and his one seed of faith in God’s promises; therefore the covenant of works entered into with Moses, and the carnal seed of Abraham, could in no way disannul the covenant of promise made unto Abraham, and his spiritual seed of all nations. If then we are one (seed) in Christ Jesus; that is, by faith in God, through Christ Jesus, then are we Abraham’s (one) seed, to whom the promise was made, (Gen. xii. 3.) as explained Gen. xvii. 7, 8. and confirmed xxii. 18., and (consequently) heirs according to that promise. If it should be objected against the sense I have given to the word Christ, (ver. 16, 17.) viz. anointed, the seed anointed by the Spirit; I answer, that it is not an uncommon thing to find St. Paul keep his term and vary his sense. But I must observe, that it is not likely that he has done so in this chapter. He here varies his term, and his sense together; for there are very good copies that give us other readings in these verses; ver. 13. some copies read κύριος, ver. 24. Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, ver. 27. some copies read as ver. 24., and ver. 29. is read with the same addition. “I prefer,” says Lord Barrington, “these readings to Stephens’s, which our translators followed; because I find, that whenever St. Paul designed to denote Christ’s person by the name Christ, in every other verse of this chapter, he adds Jesus to it; an addition that he does not always make elsewhere; as if he designed to reserve the word Χριστὸς, to denote this one seed anointed by the Spirit, whether Jews or Gentiles; and so added Jesus to Christ every where else in the chapter to prevent mistakes.”

“Mediator non est unius partis sed duarum, earumque dissidentium. Cum igitur Moses Mediatorem ageret inter Deum et populum, hoc ipso testatur—esse dissidium inter duas istas partes. Deus autem unus est. Isque semper idem, semper sibi constans. Dissidium igitur illud non Dei, sed hominis, mutationi deputandum est.”—Jac. Capellus, ap. Cradock, Apost. Harmony, p. 148.

NOTE 14.—PART XII.

IN the extracts from Photius, at the end of the fifth volume of Wolfius, Curæ Philologicæ, p. 737, is a curious illustration of this passage—ἐρδύμα δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἄγιον λέγεται τῶν πιστῶν, οὐκ ὡς ἱμάτιον, ἀλλ’ ὡς ἐρδύεται σιδήρος τὸ πῦρ. οὐκ ἔξωθεν περιβαλλόμενος, ἀλλ’ ὅλος δι’ ὅλου· οὕτω γὰρ, &c., and it is very certain that if we, by the assistance of the grace of God, can ever be said to put on the Spirit—to put on Christ—to be clothed with the Spirit, &c. it can only be then, when the whole man is so imbued with a desire to fear God, and to love and serve him, that the inferior or animal nature shall be conformed into that more spiritual nature, to which we are commanded to aspire.

NOTE 15.—PART XII.

By a very ingenious conjecture, which has been already alluded to, Michaelis reckons, that these years (Gal. iv. 10.) meant Jewish sabbatical years; and that the Galatians were then on the point of keeping such a year, by leaving their lands uncultivated; though the Mosaical Law, designed for the Holy Land, certainly did not extend to Galatia. But the year A. D. 49, the year of the first apostolic council held at Jerusalem, on the question, Whether the Gentile Church was bound to observe the Law of Moses? he suspected was a sabbatical year, and the same in which the Epistle itself was written.—Marsh's Michaelis, Introduct. vol. iv. p. 11. NOTE 17.—PART XII.

"MANY," says Bishop Marsh, "have endeavoured to prove, that the Mosaic history is mere allegory, by appealing to this passage. Since an allegory is a picture of the imagination, or a fictitious narrative, they conclude that St. Paul himself has warranted, by his own declaration, that mode of allegorical interpretation, which they themselves apply to the subversion of Scripture history."

If the pretext, which infidelity thus derives from the words of our authorized version, had been afforded also by the words of the original, we might have found it difficult to reply. But as soon as we have recourse to the words of the original, the fallacy of the appeal is visible at once. If St. Paul himself had been quoted, instead of the translators of St. Paul, it would have instantly appeared, that the Apostle did not apply, as is supposed by English readers, the title of allegory to any portion of the Mosaic history. The word Ἀλληγορία has never been used by St. Paul, in any one instance, throughout all his Epistles, nor indeed does it occur any where in the Greek Testament, nor even in the Greek version of the Old Testament. At the place in question, St. Paul did not pronounce the history itself an allegory, he declared only that it was allegorized. His own words are Ἀτινά ἐστιν ἀλληγορούμενα, which have a very different meaning from the interpretation of them in our authorized version.—On the subject of this passage see Schoetgen. Hor. Hebr. vol. i. p. 747. Vitringa, Obser. Sacrae, vol. i. lib. i. cap. 18. p. 215.

NOTE 18.—PART XII.

ON ST. PAUL'S PLAN OF PREACHING.

THE wisdom of St. Paul's conduct, in varying his manner of address, according to the persons to whom he spoke, and the circumstances in which he was placed, renders him the model by which every minister of God, and particularly every one who assumes the arduous office of a missionary, should form his own plans of action. When he spoke to the Jews, he reasoned with them from their own Scriptures, referring them to the Law and the Prophets; when he pleaded before Agrippa, he availed himself of the king's inward convictions (which St. Paul, as a discernor of spirits, discovered), as well as his known acquirements in the Jewish Law.

But the wisdom of the Apostle's conduct will be further conspicuous by a review of the circumstances in which he found himself at Athens.

In ver. 16. we read—"His spirit was stirred within him." The original may mean rather, "He was vehemently agitated, on beholding the idolatry of the Athenians." He did not, however, proceed rashly and unadvisedly. He made use only of all the opportunities which lawfully presented themselves. He began (ver. 17.) by endeavouring to attract the attention of the Athenians in the most gradual manner, first, by his usual custom of appealing to the Jews; then, by conversing with those devout persons, or Proselytes of Righteousness, who frequented the synagogue, and worshipped Jehovah, yet would not comply with the whole Mosaic ritual. And having thus in some measure made himself known, he proceeded to the public places of resort; where he was well assured he should meet with many persons, who, on seeing that he was a stranger, would question him on various subjects, according to their usual custom.

"The market-place" (ver. 17.) is an expression which ought rather to have been rendered "the Forum," or "Agora." Of these there were many at Athens, but the two most celebrated were the Old Forum in the Ceramicus, which extended both within and without the town on one side, and the New Forum, which was out of the Ceramicus, in the place which was called Eretria. It is probable that the Evangelist refers here to the latter. There was no forum, except these, which was called "the Forum," as some epithet was always given to the others, to distinguish them from each other. We learn from Strabo that in the time of Augustus, that forum which was called "The Forum," was removed from the Ceramicus to Eretria, and it was there that the greatest assemblage of persons was always collected. We read, too, in the next verse, that while St. Paul was thus conversing in the forum, certain of the Stoics and Epicureans encountered him. The forum Eretria was opposite the porch in which the Stoics held their disputations.

The conversations of St. Paul having now attracted attention, some of the more distinguished philosophers of the Stoics and Epicureans were induced to question him. The Epicureans were Atheists. According to them the world was made by chance, out of materials which had existed from eternity. Acknowledging, from complaisance, the gods, who were publicly worshipped, they excluded them from any concern in human affairs; and affirmed, that regardless of the prayers and actions of men, they contented themselves with the enjoyment of indolent felicity. They pronounced pleasure to be the chief good, and the business of a wise man to consist in devising the means of spending life in ease and tranquillity. All genuine motives to the practice of virtue, and all just ideas of virtue itself, were banished from the philosophy of the Epicureans; which made self-love the sole spring of our actions, and gave loose reins to the sensual appetites.

The system of the Stoics was of a different character; they believed the existence of God, his government of the universe, and the subsistence of the soul after the death of the body. But they confounded the Deity with his own works, and supposed him to be the soul of the world. If on the subject of Providence they expressed many just and sublime sentiments, they connected with it the doctrine of fate, or of an inexplicable necessity, the immutable decrees of which, God, as well as man, was compelled to obey. Their notions respecting the soul were very different from the Christian doctrine of immortality; for they imagined, that in the future state it would lose all separate consciousness, and be resolved into the Divine Essence. Unlike the herd of Epicureans, they placed the happiness of man in the practice of virtue, and inculcated a comparatively pure and exalted morality; but the praise to which this part of their system entitled them was forfeited by a spirit of pride, strained to the most audacious impiety.

Can we be surprised that among such men the stranger Hebrew, one of a despised people, whose personal appearance is supposed to have been by no means in his favor, who ventured in his conversation to differ from the decisions of the gay and the proud, should be treated with contempt? The word σπερμολόγος (babbler), by which they expressed their bitter ridicule, is very expressive. It is said that the term σπερμολόγος was originally applied to a bird that picks up seeds in the highway; it was then used of mean persons, that were used to pick up the refuse of things that had been brought to market; then it came figuratively to denote those who retailed the sayings of other men. The Apostle, we may suppose, was gradually led, from his conversing and questioning, to more lengthened discussion, for it is said he preached to them Jesus and the resurrection.

Many indeed have been of opinion that St. Paul was taken by violence to the court of Areopagus, and compelled to plead his cause before the assembled members, to whom appeal was made in all matters of religion; and capital punishment was inflicted upon all who, upon their private authority, introduced the worship of new gods. There does not, however, appear to be sufficient proof in support of this opinion. It seems more probable, that the philosophers, who crowded round him, removed him for their own convenience to an eminence on the Mars' Hill; as a higher part of the city, where the principal persons who would interest themselves in any novel philosophical discussion, might assemble, and listen without interruption. Through the whole of the narrative there is no appearance of a trial. We read neither of accusers nor judges; nor does St. Paul argue as if he was defending himself against any charge^k.

Amidst this assemblage of philosophers, disputers, senators, statesmen, and rhetoricians, stood the despised and insulted stranger; surrounded by the professed lovers of pleasure on one side, and the proud supporters of the perfectibility of human reason and wisdom on the other. St. Paul, without the smallest compromise of his personal dignity, or the least ^k Bishop Pearce, and the majority of commentators, support the general opinion, that St. Paul was taken violently (so they render the word ἐπιλαβόμενοι, (Acts xvii. 19) see Luke xxiii. 26. and Acts ix. 27.) to the court of Areopagus, as a teacher of strange gods, to be there tried as a criminal. Bishop Warburton, and Kuinoel, whose work is before me, and whose reasoning I have adopted, espouse the contrary opinion. It has been said that there is so little appearance of a defence in St. Paul's address, because he was not permitted to conclude, being interrupted when he had merely finished his introduction. It seems to me on the contrary, that the Apostle was permitted to conclude, as the address is complete, as we now receive it. Markland observes on the words ἐπιλαβόμενοι τε αὐτοῦ, not with violence or fear (μετὰ βίας, ver. 26.), but, in a friendly manner; probably ἐπιλαβόμενοι τῆς χειρὸς, as being desirous to hear what he had to say. This further appears from the language ἔλαβον, they conducted him, not ἔλκον, they dragged him, though this is not certain; and from δυνάμεθα γινῶναι, may we know?—Markland ap. Bowyer's Critical Conjectures, p. 164.

departure from the purity of his faith, endeavours to conciliate the good will of his assembled hearers, by commencing at the points on which they are all united.

By taking advantage of the professed ignorance of the Athenians, he shields himself from the power of that law which considers the introduction of a new God into the state as a capital offence, and avails himself of that acknowledgment to declare the nature and attributes of that God, who was already sanctioned by the state, although confessedly unknown.

He offends no prejudice, makes no violent opposition—he keeps back all that was difficult or mysterious in his own beloved and holy faith, till those who heard him might be able to bear it. He appealed to them from their own principles and practice, however deficient the former, or corrupt the latter. He united at once zeal, judgment, faithfulness, and discretion. He declared the unknown God, whom the Athenians ignorantly worshipped, to be the great Creator of the world, in whom, and by whom, all things were made, and exist. From the visible proofs of his Providence in his government of the world, he leads them to the consideration of his spiritual nature; and thus condemns the idolatrous worship of the Athenians, while he gradually unfolds to his philosophical audience, the important truths of their accountableness and immortality, which were demonstrated by the fact of Christ's resurrection from the dead. The same mode of reasoning is to be observed in all St. Paul's Epistles. With the Jews, he constantly alludes to some acknowledged principles of their belief, and endeavours to overcome their prejudices against Christianity, by explaining to them the spiritual intention of their own Law; and by referring them to the declarations of their own prophets. With the Gentiles, on the contrary, he begins by asserting those simple and evident truths which must be acknowledged by all; and having once established the existence and attributes of a God, and the necessity of a moral conduct, he gradually reveals those great and important doctrines which are the very basis of Christianity. In all the pursuits of life, in all the acquirements of science, there must be some progressive initiation, some previous introduction. Is it, then, to be believed, that the highest attainments to which human intellect and human wisdom can aspire, the knowledge, both of God, and of the immortal accountable spirit, requires no such elementary preparation? Our Saviour has set the question at rest, by beautifully inculcating this system of instruction, and the gradual development of his Gospel in his parable of the man who should cast seed into the ground; in which we read, as in the usual course of vegetation, the seed of the word of God must first produce "the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." This system of revelation has been adopted throughout the whole economy of Providence¹, from the fall of Adam till the present day; it was acted upon by the apostles, and unless it be persisted in, the great work of evangelizing the world can never be so effectually, consistently, or advantageously carried on, and must consequently fall short of our highest and fondest hopes or expectations.

The conduct of St. Paul at Athens is a model for the missionary to foreign lands. He proves to us that whatever be the zeal, the talents, the piety, the disinterestedness, of a minister of Christ, sobriety, prudence, and discretion must direct all his actions if he would succeed in his holy warfare. The Apostle obtained the victory at Athens by the blessing of God upon these humbler means. He succeeded by reasoning with the Athenians on their own principles, and thereby directed his successors in the vineyard to proceed on a similar plan of action.

Does the self-devoted missionary hazard his life among the learned and intelligent idolators of Hindostan! would it not be possible to demonstrate to the Brahmin that the facts which are recorded in the first books of Scripture, are probably the foundation of his religion; and that the corruptions of those truths may be severally traced to various periods of a comparatively late date? Might it not be shown that their belief in the incarnations of Krishna, for instance, originated in the general expectation of the one incarnate God, who has now appeared among men, and established a pure faith? Could not the imagined atonements of their self-inflicted tortures be traced to the perversion of the great truth, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission," but that a greater and more perfect dispensation now prevails?

The Buddhist believes in the doctrine of an incarnate spiritual being: could not this truth be gradually explained without offence, and the true Incarnate be pointed out?

The Mahomedan acknowledges that Christ is a great prophet: on this confession could not another be grafted, and the infatuated follower of Mahomet be led to acknowledge the divine nature of the Son of Man?

The grossest idolator believes in his superiority to the brutes: could not even this conviction be made the means of imparting to him the great doctrines of his accountableness and immortality?

It is, however, an easy task to sit at home and form plans for the conduct of the noble-minded servants of God who have hazarded their lives unto death, and met the spiritual wickedness of the world in its own high places. Hannibal smiled with contempt when the theoretical tactician lectured on the art of war. We who remain in our homes in Europe may be called the pretorian bands of Christianity. The missionary, like the legionary soldier, goes forth to the defence of the frontier, to combat with the barbarian enemy. Peace be with the ministers of God, and may the days of the kingdom of universal righteousness come! But the Scripture is the common charter, and it prescribes system, discipline, and regulation to the best, as well as conquest over the worst, feelings. The cause of missions would no longer be the source of misapprehension among many, if in the teaching of the missionary, they were all united in doing good in the appointed way. Happy too would it be for mankind, if every Christian society could be bound together, as one holy family, by one law of union—if they were subject to the same accountableness and discipline, as the best security against their own infirmities, and the errors as well as the vices of the world^m.

NOTE 19.—PART XII.

ON THE ALTAR AT ATHENS, AND THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

WHETHER this altar at Athens was raised, as some have told us, to the unknown God, whom the philosophic Athenians invoked in the time of a pestilence, after they had uselessly paid their adorations to all the greater and lesser deities of their pantheon; or whether it was raised to Pan, whom they had hitherto neglected, or to the God of the Jews, whom the Athenians thus described from the manner in which the Jews spoke of Jehovah, as unutterable and incomprehensible—is equally uncertain.

Diogenes Laertius thus accounts for the erection of this and other altars, bearing the same inscription—"The Athenians being afflicted with pestilence, invited Epimenides to lustrate their city. The method adopted by him was to carry several sheep to the Areopagus, whence they were left to wander as they pleased, under the observation of persons sent to attend them. As each sheep lay down it was sacrificed on the spot to the propitious God. By this ceremony it is said the city was relieved; but as it was still unknown what deity was propitious, an altar was erected to the unknown God, on every spot where a sheep had been sacrificedⁿ." Some have maintained that the inscription ought to be translated: "To a God unknown." Athens at this time was filled with idols; and Pausanias asserts it to have contained more than all the rest of Greece. Witsius supposes that the Athenians had obtained some obscure notions of the God of the Jews through the medium of commerce.

^m See on this note the Dissertation, De Gestis Pauli, in Urbe Atheniensium, ap. Critici Sacri, vol. xiii. p. 661. &c. and the next to it on the same subject by J. Ludov. Schlosser, and Kuinoel, who refers to Meursii Diss. de Ceramico gemino, sect. xvi. and Potter's Antiquities. I may remark here, that it is with great satisfaction that I have observed the very high rank which the English theologians seem to bear among the continental divines. Every where among the references of Kuinoel, Wolfius, Carpozovius, Walchius, Michaelis, and others, whose names do not immediately occur to me, I have observed the respect paid to our theological writers.

The doctrine of the existence of one God the Creator of the world, is the foundation of all religion: it is the immutable and solid foundation upon which the whole structure of faith must be raised. The disputes of the last century respecting matter and spirit seem to have restored much of the quibbling of the ancient schools of philosophy.

A Creator, without a creation—a king, without subjects—a God, without an object either of his wisdom or his benevolence, his love or his power—a Δημιουργός ἄνευ τῶν δημιουργημάτων, and a Παντοκράτωρ ἄνευ τῶν κρατουμένων—is certainly a mystery which overwhelms the faculties of man. But the opposite difficulty, that this beautiful frame of the visible creation is eternal, and therefore self-existent; and by unavoidable consequence, independent of a Deity, is much more incomprehensible. Ignorant as we undoubtedly are, and limited as are the powers of our reason, the weakest understanding can discover the infinitely greater probability that this magnificent and beautiful world should have been created by some wise and powerful God; rather than its suns and stars should have kindled their own lamps, or the flower have formed its own fragrance, and every proof of design visible throughout the universe, should be an effect without a first and adequate cause. If we deny the true origin of the world, that it was produced from nothing by the sovereign will of an omnipotent Being, we are reduced to the necessity of embracing one of the following hypotheses^o, each of which are alike repugnant to reason and revelation.

Either the world must have existed from eternity as it now is, or matter is eternal, though not in its present form, and the Deity has merely reduced it to order, and fashioned the creation from preëxistent substance. The great argument upon which this hypothesis rests, is the celebrated axiom, Ex nihilo nihil fit. The difficulties involved by this hypothesis ⁿ See Horne's Critical Introduct. vol. i. p. 241; but on the subject of the altar erected at Athens to the unknown God, see Wolfius, Cura Philolog. in loc. Witsius, Melctem. Leidens. De Vit. Pauli, p. 84. Whitby, and the references in Kuinoel, where the quotations from Lucian, Philostratus, Diogenes Laertius, and Jerome, who all mention this altar, are collected.

^o Stillingfleet's Origines Sacrae, b. iii. chap. 2 sect. 2. p. 266. fol. edit.

are greater than those of the other. The Deity thus introduced, as forming the visible universe from this eternal collection of matter, is limited in his power by something which is independent of himself. Either the Deity must or must not be omnipotent; if he is omnipotent, preëxistent matter is not necessary to the formation of his worlds; if he is not omnipotent, he must be subject to, and inferior to that which he cannot control; and the intelligence which can frame a world, is indebted to inert masses of which it is composed. His power must be infinite, to enable him to govern, and at the same time it is not infinite, for he is dependent upon matter, and cannot execute his will.

If matter be eternal, it must be unproduced, and therefore of necessary existence: it must have caused itself, and be possessed therefore of infinite power: it compels God to be subject to its laws, instead of receiving its laws from God, with many other absurdities.

Another hypothesis which presents itself to our choice is, that the world arose from a fortuitous concourse of atoms; an idea which appears to me as absurd as to suppose, that many thousand alphabets might be fashioned by chance into an Iliad; yet this would be easier than that they should form one limb of an animal, or one blade of grass.

If these hypotheses will not please, the last is perhaps more plausible, that the universe originated from the eternal laws of motion and matter. Such are the inconsistencies to which men are compelled to have recourse, when they forsake the fountain of living waters, and hew out to themselves the broken cisterns of false philosophy and science. If there are laws to matter, who is the lawgiver? As every house is builded by some man, so He who built all things is God: this is the only rational conclusion of Scripture and common sense, which have never yet been at variance.

Setting aside, therefore, all ideas of the eternity of matter, whether in its present or in any other state, we receive the lesser difficulty—that God reigned alone supreme before the borders of the world stood, or the innumerable company of angels were gathered together.

The Christian, then, who believes that a period has been when the Omnipotent alone existed, will not shrink from the questions of the boldest inquirer^p. He will not shrink from the question—"If the world were made by a Deity, why was it not made by him sooner? or, since it was unmade, why did He make it at all? Cur mundi ædificator repente extiterit innumera-bilia ante sæcula dormierit?" "How came this builder and architect of the world, to start up on a sudden, after he had slept for infinite ages, and bethink himself of making a world? Was something wanting to his happiness? Was he completely happy without this new world? Then, 'wanting nothing,' he made superfluous things?"

To these, and all such questions, we may answer—Although God was perfectly happy in himself, he created the world from his overflowing goodness, that other beings, from the archangel to the lowest scale of created life, might be happy likewise. He created all things for his own glory, and of that glory the happiness of sentient beings is permitted to form a part; if they had not been created, the sum of happiness would have been diminished. To the question, "If God's goodness were the cause of his making the world, why was it not made sooner?" we might with equal propriety inquire, Why was not the world an eternal emanation from an eternal cause? why was it not self-existent? As far as our faculties can comprehend God, we shall find that there is as great an impossibility that the world should be eternal, as that two and two should make five. If it was created, it must have had a beginning. Time, which is well defined by Locke to be only a measured portion of eternity, began at the commencement of the world; before which there was no sooner or later, which are indeed but terms to express the succession of ideas in the minds of finite beings. With the Deity is neither change, contingency, nor succession. To him the world was equally present, whether made or unmade. Space is the theatre, and eternity the duration of his agency in the universe; neither may we comprehend if any other causes may influence the divine will, than those which have been revealed to us. In this stage of our existence we are enabled to discover, both from revelation and reason, that the visible world was commanded to exist, and it existed. The curiosity of presumption which proposes the inquiry, for what reason the world was not created a millenary earlier or later, cannot be satisfied with any answers of speculative philosophy.

When, however, we have established the certainty of the creation of the world, we are taught that the world itself is one great delusion, that matter does not exist.

"The existence of bodies," says Berkeley, "out of the mind, perceiving them is not only impossible, and a contradiction in terms, but were it possible, and even real, it were impossible we should ever know it." Or, in other words, when I am not in London, London does not exist. Religion, affection, law, duty, science, and all the arts of life, are founded on facts; but of the certainty that any one single fact has taken place, which the mind has not perceived, we have no demonstration, and consequently our belief in their reality may be erroneous.

"Thus the wisdom of philosophy is set in opposition to the common sense of mankind. Philosophy pretends to demonstrate that there can be no material world; that every object is merely a sensation in the mind, or an image of those sensations in the memory, and imagination; having, like pain and joy, no existence, unless thought of. Common sense can conceive no otherwise of this opinion than a kind of metaphysical lunacy, and concludes that too much learning is apt to make men mad*," &c. It is, indeed, with some difficulty that men of sober judgment, unsophisticated by the delusions of these grave absurdities, can believe that men of talent and learning have been thus misled.

The arguments by which the system of Berkeley is defended are to be found in Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind; Beattie On the Immutability of Truth; the Philosophical Essays of Dugald Stewart, with the Notes and Illustrations, p. 548, 549, 1st edit. 4to. and the Appendix to part second of Doddridge's Lectures, edited by Kippis. The subject is too extensive to be entered upon largely in this place. I shall content myself with mentioning the quibble upon which the whole controversy hinges.

"All our knowledge," says Berkeley, "is gained by the senses: but by the senses, we have knowledge of nothing, but our sensations: but our sensations are qualities of the mind, and have no resemblance therefore to any thing inanimate."

This system confounds two things, which are entirely distinct from each other; sensation and perception. Extension, figure, motion, are ideas of sensation, or they are not. If they are sensations only, Berkeley cannot be refuted, though he may be rejected; if they are, however, ideas, accompanying sensations, as Hutcheson describes them, and Reid asserts, the ideal system is the dream of a visionary.

The word properties is generally used to express with greater accuracy the idea we may form of the creation of the world from nothing. "Matter," says Locke, "is the adherence of certain qualities in some unknown substratum." The idea of this imagined substratum is now exploded. If we define matter to be the adherence of properties, we may understand in what manner a visible creation might be formed, where no material substance had hitherto existed. God commanded this union of properties to take place. Extension, solidity, and motion, were combined with color, variety, and order. As modern chymistry can dissolve water into its component airs, and the hardest substances into gases invisible to the human eye, and by other processes can change that which was before invisible to the eye, and imperceptible to the touch, into hard, solid¹, and tangible bodies; so, to compare great things with small, it is easily conceivable that Omnipotence might call every object of our senses to life, without previous material, as the chymist presents to the two senses of sight and touch an object hitherto imperceptible to both. As a rustic could not comprehend how the man of science could perform this apparent miracle, neither can the most studious researches of the learned penetrate the veil which conceals the wisdom of Omnipotence. There is however some slight analogy between the manner in which the limited skill of an educated man can astonish an ignorant mind, and that incomprehensible wisdom, before which the genius of Newton, and the sagacity of Aristotle, are more inferior than the prattlings of an infant to the sublimest efforts of these lofty intellects".

NOTE 20.—PART XII.

BISHOP BARRINGTON suggests that this quotation might have been made, with a slight variation, from the beautiful hymn of Cleanthes to the Supreme Being, and not, as is generally supposed, from Aratus. He refers to H. Steph. Poesis Philosoph. p. 49, and Fabricii Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 397. See also Cudworth's Intellect. System, vol. i. 4to. edit. (Birch's), p. 432. The passage is from the fourth line—

Κυδίστ' ἀθανάτων, πολυνόημε, παγκρατές αἰεὶ
Ζεὺς, φύσεως ἀρχὴν γὰρ νόμον μετὰ πάντα κυβερνῶν
Χαῖρε. Σὲ γὰρ πᾶσι θεῖσι θνητοῖσι προσευδῶν.
Ἐξ σοῦ γὰρ γένος ἵσταμεν, ἔχου μίμημα λαχόντες
Μοῦνον, ὅσα ζῶει τε καὶ ἔρπει θνήσκει ἐπὶ γαῖαν.

Duport, the once celebrated Greek professor, who translated the Psalms into Greek verse, has translated this hymn into very elegant Latin verse. I subjoin his version of the above lines.

"Magne Pater Divum, cui nomina multa, sed una Omnipotens semper virtus, tu Jupiter autor dwelt in Rome. However it may be, St. Paul came to Corinth about the year 51: and the proconsulship of Gallio^z, before whom the Apostle appeared, agrees with this period.

NOTE 21.—PART XII.

SUETONIUS has made mention^v of this banishment, without taking notice of the time of it. Neither Tacitus, Josephus, nor Dionysius say any thing of it. It is certain Claudius was not partial to the Jews; he would have driven (Dion. lib. 60. p. 667.) them out in the beginning of his reign, had he not been in fear of a disturbance, for they were very numerous. The edicts which he at first made in their favor, were the effect of his esteem and gratitude to Agrippa. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. c. 4.) We cannot perceive, by any means, that they excited any troubles in Rome during the reign of Claudius. There were some under the government of Cumanus, in Judæa^w, and, if it were on that account that Claudius banished them, this expulsion will have been about the year 51. If they were banished at the time the astrologers were, (S^{t.} Calvisi ad An. Pearson Annal. Paul. p. 12.) it will have been in 52. But was it not, perhaps, to appease^x the Roman citizens, oppressed by an extreme famine in Rome^y in the year 51? Under similar circumstances, the emperors obliged every foreigner to leave Rome. If this conjecture be true, we shall see the reason why neither Josephus nor Tacitus have mentioned this expulsion of the Jews. There was nothing that fixed any stigma upon them, since it was common to all other foreigners who

NOTE 22.—PART XII.

THE present reading of this passage in the Greek vulgate, is συνέλεγε τοῦ πνεύματι. Griesbach admits into the text, instead of τοῦ πνεύματι, τοῦ λόγου, on the authority of the Alexandrian and other MSS. The passage, therefore, with this reading, may mean, "He was affected with the report which Silas and Timothy had brought to him from Macedonia." The Vulgate translates it, instabat verbo, "pressed, or urged the word." The late Dr. Gosset would read λόγου, with Griesbach, and translate the passage with Krebsius—magnâ orationis vi disputabat. Bishop Pearce would paraphrase the passage thus:—"And when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, Paul set himself together with them, wholly to the word; i. e. he was fully employed now that he had their assistance in preaching the Gospel (called word, in chap. iv. 4. xvi. 6. 32. and xvii. 11.)" St. Luke seems to have intended to express here something relating to St. Paul, which was the consequence of the coming of Silas and Timotheus. We may therefore regard both these interpretations as correct. He pressed, or urged the word, after the arrival of Silas and Timothy, to the Jews in his preaching; and in his great anxiety on their account, he enforced it in his Epistle to the Thessalonians.

^v "Judæos Impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit."—Sueton. in Claudio, c. 26. If Suetonius here understood our Lord Jesus Christ, he has committed a very gross error; but if he understood any chief of the Jews, whom he named Chrestus, it is a person entirely unknown to the historians.

^w Cumanus succeeded Tiberius Alexander at the time of the death of Herod, king of Calchis. This prince died the eighth of Claudius. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 3. or the Wars of the Jews, lib. ii. c. 11. The troubles in Judæa must have happened in 50 or 51. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xxii. c. 5. But it is very hard to attribute this expulsion of the Jews to the troubles of Judæa. Josephus and Tacitus, who mention the disturbances, would have said what was the punishment of them. Tacit. Annal. lib. xii. c. 54. Moreover, Claudius, who punished Cumanus who sacrificed the tribune Celer to the Jews, would he have banished them from Rome for a matter which was of service to them?

^x This is the opinion of H. de Valois. Auct. in Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. 2. 28. Augustus, says this author, had done the same, and his successors very often made use of the same practice, when Rome was afflicted with a famine.

^y There was an excessive famine at Rome in the year 51, insomuch that the people being very much pressed, Claudius could scarcely save himself in his palace.

NOTE 23.—PART XII.

SILAS and Timothy, with St. Paul, had preached the Gospel to the Jews at Thessalonica, in the synagogues of that place, (Acts xvii. 2-4.) They were interrupted in this work, and compelled to leave the city, by the persecution there raised against them; they then proceeded to Berea, whither they were followed by the same unbelieving Jews. St. Paul then went to Athens, but Silas and Timothy remained at Berea, till they received orders from Paul to follow him to that city, (Acts xvii. 15.) Timothy, we learn (1 Thess. iii. 2.) was then immediately despatched to Thessalonica, and it is most probable Silas accompanied him, as they generally were commissioned two and two, ^z Art. xviii. v. 12. Claudius banished Seneca, the brother of Gallio. He recalled Seneca as soon as he married Agrippina, which was in the ninth year of his reign. Tacitus, Ann. lib. xii. c. 8. It is very probable, indeed, that this was not till after Gallio was proconsul of Achaia, Pears. Ann. p. 13.

according to the first appointment of our Lord. It is not, however, expressly asserted how Silas was employed at this time; they both rejoined Paul at Corinth, (Acts xviii. 5.), and it is natural to suppose they there gave him a full account of their labors: when, as we read (Acts xviii. 5.) "he was pressed in spirit;" or, as it may be read, "he was deeply affected with the account brought to him by his coadjutors," which, from the nature of the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, and the previous occurrence which occasioned St. Paul's separation from them, it appears probable, related to the unceasing persecutions to which the Thessalonians were exposed. Under the influence of this impression, I believe the Apostle to have composed this Epistle. That it was written from Corinth, during his present residence, in the year 51, or soon after, may be considered as almost the unanimous opinion of commentators; although the particular occasion is disputed. The general object of the Epistle is certainly to confirm the Thessalonians in their faith, by enforcing the evidences of the Christian religion, while he opposes some opinions held by the heathens.

The immediate design of St. Paul in writing this Epistle, seems to have been to supply the converts with arguments against the reasonings of the philosophers and men of learning, who might have endeavoured, as mere theoretical speculatists have uniformly done, to argue against facts, by suggesting their improbability—or have called the doctrines of Christianity foolishness—its precepts severe—its discipline superstition. The exceeding utility of this Epistle to the preachers of Christianity is particularly evident. In all his Epistles, or, as they may be called, his written sermons, he uniformly enforces Christian morality, upon Christian principles; but in this Epistle he enters into the evidences on which these principles were founded.

In the Greek Vulgate, the present reading of Acts xvii. 4. is τῶν σεβομένων Ἑλλήνων πολὺ πλῆθος, which is rendered by our translators "Of the devout Greeks, a great multitude." The Codex Alex. and Codex Bezae, with some others, read τῶν σεβομένων καὶ Ἑλλήνων, which Dr. Paley would render—"those who worshipped the true God, and of the Greeks"—that is, of those who had been previously heathens, (1 Thess. i. 9.) He would infer, from the passage thus translated, that the Church at Thessalonica consisted of some few Jews, many who worshipped the one true God, and many of the heathens, and of the chief women. It was highly necessary therefore that St. Paul, under these circumstances, should strengthen the faith of these his converts, who had "turned to God from idols," by every possible argument and encouragement.

NOTE 24.—PART XII.

THE HOLY SCRIPTURES INTENDED FOR ALL.

ST. PAUL addresses himself to the whole Church in many of his Epistles—in those to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians; but here he does it in a most solemn and peculiar manner—adjuring them "by the Lord, that it should be read to all the holy brethren." From this deviation from his usual manner, it is conjectured that the Apostle might have had some cause of suspicion. It is possible that at this time the Scriptures were prohibited from the people at large, and that the adjuration of the Apostle was directed to the "mystery of iniquity which then began to work." (See 2d Epist. chap. ii.)

In the Romish Church, the Scriptures are, in general, withheld from the people; or suffered to be read under such restrictions, and with such notes, as totally subvert the sense of those passages on which this Church endeavours to build her unscriptural pretensions. It is generally allowed that the Vulgate version is the most favorable to these pretensions; and yet even that version the rulers of the Church dare not trust in the hands of any of their people, even under their general ecclesiastical restrictions, without their counteracting notes and comments. Surely truth has nothing to fear from the Bible. When the Romish Church permits the free use of this book she may be stripped, indeed, of some of her appendages, but she will lose nothing but her dross and tin, and become, what the original Church at Rome was, "beloved of God, called to be saints," and have her faith once more "spoken of throughout the whole world," Rom. i. 7, 8. She has in her own hands the means of her own restoration; and a genuine Protestant will wish, not her destruction, but her reformation: if she consent not to be reformed, her total destruction is inevitable.

It is evident, from this passage, that the Epistles of St. Paul were not designed merely for the teachers of the Churches. The Spirit of God, which gave the Scriptures of the Old Testament for the common benefit of the Jewish Church, was now completing the New Testament for the use of all mankind. Wherever, therefore, the doctrines of Christianity are to be inculcated, the Scriptures are to be in the possession of the people. Their perusal is one means of grace. In this opinion all descriptions of Protestants are united. It is curious to observe the manner in which opposite errors meet. The Romish Church prohibits the universal perusal of the Scriptures, and the learned Semler, the Unitarian theologian, has argued that the Epistles were not designed for the people at large^a.

There has been, it is true, of late years, much discussion respecting the manner in which the Scriptures ought to be distributed. That the common people, however, should receive them, and read and study them, is the opinion of all Protestants. One class of religionists would distribute them in every way possible, whenever an opportunity presents itself; and would unite for that purpose every description of persons, whatever be their theological opinions, as in any other charitable labor. Another class, however, have decided that in all our attempts to do good, regard must be paid to the means, as well as to the end; and that the indiscriminate union, for religious purposes, of the maintainers of every opposite opinion, sanctions error. The only controversy, therefore, between Protestants is—not whether the people should read the Scriptures, but by whom they should be given to the people.

NOTE 25.—PART XII.

THE Second Epistle to the Thessalonians is generally supposed to have been written by St. Paul a few months after the former. It is dated from the same place, Corinth; and Silvanus and Titus are both mentioned in the introduction. It was most probably written a little before, or a little after, the insurrection of the Jews at Corinth, when St. Paul was dragged before Gallio (Acts xviii. 12.), as the Apostle, in 2 Thess. iii. 2., seems either to apprehend, or anticipate this violence, or else prays to be delivered from these unreasonable and unbelieving persecutors. It has been already shown, that the majority of the Church of Thessalonica had been converted from among the idolatrous Gentiles, and that the First Epistle was addressed to those who had been so, and had become Christians. It seems no less evident, that the present Epistle was sent to the same persons, from the various allusions it contains to the First Epistle.

St. Paul having been informed that some expressions in his First Epistle had been either perverted or misunderstood by the Thessalonians, (see 1 Thess. iv. 15, 17. and v. 4, 6.), who supposed the end of the world and the coming of Christ to be at hand, immediately addresses them for the purpose of refuting this error; which, while resting on apostolical authority, would be alike injurious to his Christian converts, and to the continued propagation of the Gospel. Grotius would rather refer this Epistle to the year of our Lord 38, in the second year of the reign of Caligula; but his arguments are overthrown by the fact that Silvanus and Timothy, who joined with St. Paul in the introduction to this Epistle, were not converts to the Christian faith till long after the death of Caligula; and Timothy was but a youth (1 Tim. iv. 12.) when St. Paul wrote his First Epistle to him, in the year of Christ 57, or 58, and of Nero 4; and seems to have been converted by St. Paul and Barnabas, in the year of Christ 46, and of Claudius 6; and not to have become the companion of Paul till about four years after; at which time Silvanus also became his fellow-laborer. The same learned divine has also endeavoured to prove that this was not the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, their order being inverted—but on this point he is sufficiently refuted by its own internal evidence.

^a “Communis fuit doctrina, sed non fuit in omnium manibus epistolarum aut librorum aliorum exemplum: doctrina tradebatur a presbyteris, qui doctrinæ auctoritatem derivabant ex his libris, quos ab apostolo alii atque alii acceperant. Itaque recte quidem epistolæ dicuntur destinari ecclesiæ seu ecclesiis, sed intelligitur doctrina, quam presbyteri, et doctores ex libris, vel epistolis apostolorum hauriunt; et Christianis, per partes commodas, impertiunt. Manserunt igitur omnes libri sacri in manibus clericorum, seu ministrorum; quidam tradebantur lectoribus; alii presbyteris et episcopis tantum patebant. Quod vel istis narrationibus de traditoribus confirmatur; nemo ex laicis unquam traditor fuit, quia esse non potuit: nec enim libros sacros manibus suis ipse unquam usurpavit.”—Semler, Prolegomena ad Galatas, p. 29.

NOTE 26.—PART XII.

IN the former Epistle (1 Thess. i. 3, 6–10. ii. 14. and iv. 9, 10.) the Apostle thanks God for the beginnings of their faith, love, and patience—in this and the following verses he mentions their increase. In 1 Thess. i. 9. he speaks of their ready reception of the Gospel. St. Paul and his fellow-laborers now glory in them.

NOTE 27.—PART XII.

DR. MACKNIGHT has very satisfactorily proved, against Grotius, Locke, and others, in his Preface to this Epistle, that St. Paul and the other apostles did not expect the day of judgment in their own age.

NOTE 28.—PART XII.

POPERY THE PREDICTED APOSTACY.

WHEN the religious opinions of a large body of the community have become the subject of frequent discussion in the legislature of a country, the judgment which the theological student may either form or express, concerning those opinions, will unavoidably appear to connect itself with the political discussions of the day. In considering this passage of Scripture, and in adopting that interpretation which Benson and various other Protestant commentators have given of St. Paul's prophecy of the apostacy from the purity of the Church, and of the power of the Man of Sin, I have no wish to obtrude my opinion on the political question, whether the state would be justified in granting legislative privileges to a certain class of subjects; I confine myself to the religious or theological part of the question, as all Protestants ought in some measure to consider it, and cautiously avoid any further allusion to the political part of the subject.

The rapid increase of the grossest superstitions of popery within the last half century has rendered it an imperious duty on all who are convinced of its fatal tendency, to examine its pretensions, and expose their danger and fallacy. This system of error has extended so widely among mankind—it has prevailed so many centuries—its characteristics are so opposite to those which distinguished the Church of Jerusalem, the perfect model of a Church (as Churches ought to be established among every nation), that we may justly suppose the Spirit of prophecy, which instructed his servants the apostles in the things that were to take place in his Church till the second advent, would have related to them the principal features of this chief corruption of Christianity. Many passages are to be found which, in the opinion of the Protestant divines, and before them of the early opponents of the corruptions of the Church of Rome, fully and satisfactorily confirm this opinion. The objectors to the Protestant interpretation of the passages in question affirm, that they are merely descriptive of the various sects and heresies which disgraced the Church of Christ in the days of the apostles. But this solution would by no means set the controversy at rest. Even if we suppose that the Apostle did not prophesy the rise and progress of the Church of Rome, but merely of various sects of Gnostics, &c., his condemnation of the practices and opinions of those sects would be still our warning against similar customs and errors wherever they prevail. If, for instance, St. Paul, in his Epistle to Timothy, censures those teachers in a Church who forbid to marry; the Gnostics, or other heretics, who taught this absurdity, are not more certainly condemned on this account than the Church of Rome, which still enforces the same unrequired austerity: and the same mode of reasoning is applicable to various false doctrines, which need not at present be enumerated.

It is not, however, against particular errors only, that we may thus anticipate the denunciations of the Spirit of prophecy. As the ancient "dark idolatries of alienated Judah" were described and condemned as systems of delusion and falsehood; so also has the same Spirit of prophecy described the mass of errors which characterize the corrupt and seducing superstitions of the unaltered and unalterable Church of Rome. One of the principal passages which delineates this church, is this second chapter of the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, which has been amply discussed by Dr. Benson. This laborious writer has examined, with true liberality and candor, the various interpretations of this chapter, and concludes with embracing the general opinion of the Protestant writers, that the Church of Rome is described and condemned by the Spirit of prophecy, in the language of St. Paul. As the subject in the present, and indeed in every age, till the second coming of Christ, is of so much importance to all Christians, I shall freely subjoin a few of the principal topics of his admirable dissertation, with their corroboration from other authors.

He begins with examining the various interpretations which have been given of this prophecy. Grotius would persuade us that Caius Caligula, the Roman emperor, was here predicted; whereas this Epistle was written about twelve years after his time.

Dr. Hammond would refer it to Simon Magus and the Gnostics; but the former had already appeared, and was therefore already revealed. Others suppose it foretells the persecution of the Christians by the unbelieving Jews, before the destruction of Jerusalem. But as the other parts of the prophecy do not agree with this interpretation; the unbelieving Jews never having been united under one head, or leader, or never having been able to exalt themselves even to imperial dignity, much more above "all that is called God, sitting in the temple of God, showing himself to be God;" this explanation entirely fails.

Dr. Whitby, and some others, would have the unbelieving Jews who revolted from the Romans, and the Jewish converts who apostatized from the Jewish to the Christian religion, to be here signified. Whereas it is evident that one sort of apostacy is only here mentioned—an apostacy from the true religion—as the word ἀποστασία implies in other parts of Scripture. The Apostle confines himself to this point, and intimates that this apostacy would be carried on and supported by pretended miracles, and all the deceit of unrighteousness, and it would prevail among those persons "who believed not the truth," but preferred a lie, and "had pleasure in unrighteousness."

The unbelieving Jews could not have apostatized from the Christian religion, because they had never embraced it—Mahomet never professed the Christian religion, he therefore could not be called an apostate. This prediction, however, has been considered as relating to him, as he was the cause of the apostacy of many Christians, and his religion was partly built upon the ruin and corruption of Christianity; on which account he is said by some "to sit in the temple of God." It is likewise stated that Mahomet was also a man of sin—a prophet—(and in allusion to the prophecy of St. John, which is considered the same as that of St. Paul,) that Constantinople, the residence of the Grand Turk, his successor, stands upon seven hills. To this it is answered, that Rome also stands upon seven hills—and that Constantinople is not the city which in St. John's time reigned over the kings of the earth; whereas these two marks are both united in St. John's prophetic description of the spiritual Babylon. (Rev. xvii. 9. xviii. 2.) The man of sin was also "to come after the working of Satan, with all powers, and signs, and lying wonders." That is, with open and great pretensions to miracles, whereas few miracles are ascribed to Mahomet, which are entirely renounced by their learned men; and Mahomet, in his Koran, lays no claim to the power of working miracles.

The writers in the communion of the Church of Rome would refer this prophecy to the reformation from popery, to the falling away of the Protestants from the Church of Rome; whereas it does not appear that there was a Christian Church at Rome, when St. Paul wrote his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, nor are the Protestants united under one common and visible head upon earth; nor do they pretend to establish their doctrine by miracles.

As we have rejected these interpretations, the next thing is to point out the Apostle's meaning; and I think it may be said, that no prophecy could be more exactly accomplished than this has been in the bishop of Rome, and his adherents. This apostacy is plainly of a religious nature, and has been predicted by Daniel in the old dispensation, by St. Paul in the new, and by St. John in the Revelation, (chap. xvii. 1.) In the original it is distinguished as the apostacy; the article being added to give it strength, on which account it is supposed to allude to some previous prophecy, and that St. Paul referred to the prediction of Daniel (chap. vii. 25. and xi. 36.) is clear, as he has adopted the same ideas and expressions. The article is also placed before "the man of sin," (or, as it may be rendered, "the lawless one,") to give it a similar emphasis. This phrase may relate either to a single man, or a succession of men; but as it was used in Daniel in relation to the latter, there are good grounds for considering it in the same sense here. The comparison between these two prophecies of Daniel and St. Paul is well given by Macknight in the following passages.

2 Thess. ii. 3, 4. "And that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition. Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

Dan. vii. 21, 25. "And the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them."—"And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High."

Dan. xi. 36. "And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods."

Dan. viii. 25. "He shall also stand up against the Prince of princes."

2 Thess. ii. 7, 8. "Only he who now letteth, will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked be revealed."

Dan. vii. 8. "I considered the horns, and behold there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots."

1 Tim. iv. 1, 3. "Giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils."—"Forbidding to marry."

Dan. vii. 25. "And he shall think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand." See Dan. viii. 24.

Dan. xi. 38. "In his state he shall honor the God of forces" (Mauzzin), gods who are protectors, that is, tutelary angels and saints.

Dan. xi. 37. "Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women."

2 Thess. ii. 8. "Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming."

Dan. vii. 11. "I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake: I beheld, even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame."

Ver. 26. "And they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy it to the end."

Dan. viii. 25. "He shall be broken without hand."

It will be now necessary to examine the particular clauses of this extraordinary prediction. The Apostle first foretells, that, before the coming of the Lord, there will be a falling away, or an apostacy. And, accordingly, we find the members of the Church of Rome, instead of relying on one Mediator between God and man, have substituted the doctrine of demons, that is, of the spirits of men, who have departed this life; and, not considering the atonement and intercession of Christ all-sufficient, they make to themselves other mediators and other advocates—invoking the Virgin Mary and the saints, more frequently than God himself. They have succeeded Rome in the seat of empire, and have also apostatized to her imagery and idolatry. When the grand apos-tacy had arrived at its height, then was to be revealed one who should be deservedly called the man of sin, on account of his wickedness, and the son of perdition, because of the great and terrible punishment which should eventually be inflicted on him.

The man of sin began accordingly to be revealed as soon as the Roman emperors and the heathen magistrates lost their power. As soon as Constantine became a Christian, the power of heathen Rome was restrained, and the Christians ceased to be persecuted; then it was that “the man of sin” gradually exalted himself; then it was that the worship of saints and angels was introduced, robbing God of the honor due to his name. Celibacy was recommended by feigned visions of angels, and certain kinds of meats prohibited; miraculous cures were attributed to the bones and relics of the martyrs; and departed spirits returned to earth, in order to prescribe particular forms and ceremonies, for the relief or mitigation of their sufferings in purgatory. By these decrees, and by these artifices, “the man of sin” was first revealed.

The Apostle continues by describing him as opposing, and exalting himself above, all that is called God; sitting in the temple of God. The word θεός, used here without an article (in opposition to ὁ Θεός, the supreme Deity), signifies a god, a name given in Scripture to princes and magistrates (Ps. lxxxii. 6.), and particularly to the Roman emperors, whose title in the time of the Apostle was σεβαστὸς, and who are here signified by σέβασμα, as God is by the word Θεός. If, then, we thus interpret the word, St. Paul here declares that “the man of sin” would exalt himself above all the great of the earth, and even above the imperial dignity. And in this point of view, all history bears record of the signal fulfilment of this prophecy. The bishop of Rome has been styled a god, who ought not to be called to an account; the supreme deity upon earth, by whom princes reign, and upon whom the right of kings depends. The bishop of Rome has dethroned princes, absolved subjects from their allegiance, and made emperors his vassals; treading upon the neck of one king, and kicking off the imperial crown of another with his foot. He sits also in the temple of God, showing himself that he is god. The temple of God is here supposed to signify the Christian Church, as it is not probable it referred to the temple of Jerusalem, whose approaching destruction was known to the Apostle. By this prophetic intimation we are taught to expect that “the man of sin” would profess himself a Christian; and we consequently find that the bishop of Rome exalted himself above all other bishops, and centred in himself all ecclesiastical authority and influence, claiming infallibility, and anathematizing all those who did not fall into his unprincipled plans and intrigues; till at last he succeeded in establishing a spiritual and civil tyranny over the whole Christian world.

The obstacle that impeded the revealing of “the man of sin” is generally supposed by the ancient fathers to be the Roman empire. (See also Rev. xiii. and xvii.) The cautious manner in which the Apostle hints at it, avoiding even the mention of the restraining power in writing, although he had previously declared it to the Thessalonians, strengthens this suggestion. And it is a remarkable circumstance, that so much was this the general opinion of the primitive Christians, that they were accustomed to pray for the continuance of the Roman empire, being well convinced that the moment the Roman empire was dissolved, “the man of sin” would be revealed. That this part of the prophecy was not misunderstood is clear from the event; for, in proportion as the power of the empire decreased, the power of the Church increased, till at last “the man of sin” was fully revealed. The Roman empire, the obstructing power, began to be “taken out of the way,” when the barbarous nations made their first incursions; after which the western empire was divided into the ten kingdoms, prefigured in Daniel’s vision as the ten horns of the fourth beast, when the bishop of Rome made himself its sovereign, and became at the same time the predicted little horn which had “the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things.” In process of time he obtained possession of three of the divided kingdoms of the western empire; fulfilling the prophecy of the little horn plucking up by the roots three of the horns of Daniel’s fourth beast; and he assumed the title of the Vicar of Christ, and pretended that Christ had transferred to him all his divine authority. But unlike his holy Master, he called down fire from heaven on all who ventured to differ from or oppose him; and by his cruel and bloody persecutions, he wore out the saints of the Most High, and was drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus, (Rev. xvii. 6.) He assumed uncontrollable and supreme power, inventing new ceremonies and conditions of salvation, opening the gates of heaven, and shutting them at his pleasure, according to his own avarice and caprice, or to the wealth and relative situation of the suppliant, “making the word of God of none effect by their traditions.” The coming of “the man of sin,” or the lawless one, is “after the working (or energy) of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness.” This prediction is abundantly fulfilled by the records of every age, which fully prove the many pretences to miracles made by the Church of Rome. This Church, indeed, from its earliest infancy, has been supported by feigned miracles and visions, impostures and artifices of various kinds. Even in our own day the miracles of the Church of Rome have revived. The mystery of iniquity, we read 2 Thess. ii. 7., began to show itself in the Apostle's time; idolatry was stealing into the Church, (1 Cor. x. 14.), and a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, (Colos. ii. 18.), adulterating the word of God, (2 Cor. ii. 17. iv. 2.), a vain observation of festivals, and distinctions of meat, (Gal. iv. 10. 1 Cor. viii. 8.) with many other innovations and corruptions. May we not add to these beginnings, that system of ignorance which was essential to the success of the Romish superstitions and observances, which induced the necessity of keeping the Scriptures from the common people; and had not St. Paul suspected that this Epistle would not have been read to all the Church of Thessalonica, is it probable he would have commanded it to have been done in so solemn a manner? We, who have lived to see the wonderful accomplishment of this prophecy, by the concurrent testimony of history, must consider it as another evidence of the truth of Revelation, and one safeguard against the attacks and innovations of popery. It is the fashion, indeed, of the present day, to make loud boasts of liberality and candor, and to suppose that the Church of Rome is too enlightened to retain any longer the former persecuting spirit, or more irrational dogmas. A great change is said to have taken place—But in what is the Church of Rome changed? Has it abated any one of its lofty pretensions to infallibility, miracle, or the possession of exclusive truth? Has any council been called to repeal one objectionable dogma of their religious faith? Has any bull from their spiritual father commanded them to prefer their allegiance to their sovereign, as Christian subjects, to their imaginary duty to the Roman pontiff? Are the poor allowed the free use of the Scripture? Are they allowed to read and to meditate on the Word of Life? The members of the Church of Rome are still kept in the same darkness, still bound by the same spiritual tyranny, and actuated, even at the present day, by the same mad, cruel, and ferocious fanaticism. They declare their Church unalterable, and are themselves unaltered.

The causes which first compelled our ancestors to preserve their liberties and religion by vigilant jealousy of the members of the Church of Rome, exist in their original force—The Papist remains the same—the Protestant alone is changed, and has become, it is to be feared, too lukewarm and too indifferent. Under the well-meant disguise of universal charity and toleration, he welcomes the enemy to the citadel with bows and smiles. He feels himself enlightened, and supposes the Papist is equally so. He forgets that infallibility or unchangeableness is the very foundation of the creed of the Romanists, precluding thereby all possibility of reformation. The errors of the Church of Rome are not merely to be attributed to the darkness and superstitions of any particular age, but are interwoven with the very frame-work of this corrupt religion. Unless the pages of history are written in vain, and the experience of the past is to direct us no longer, the statesmen of a Protestant country are required to preserve to the present generation, and to hand down unimpaired to our posterity, that code of laws which secures to the majority of the people of England a pure religion and well-defined liberties; and provides also for a succession of rulers who shall maintain the same, so long as it shall please God to continue the power, the splendor, or even the existence of the monarchy.

NOTE 29.—PART XII.

In his First Epistle to the Thessalonians, chap. iv. 11, 12., St. Paul had exhorted some disorderly Christians not to be unruly and slothful. He here enlarges on the subject, and reproves them more sharply, as not having attended to his former admonitions. Some understand by "the tradition which they had received," the example of St. Paul and his companions. Perhaps he had both these arguments in view; in either case the reading remains the same.

NOTE 30.—PART XII.

THIS verse appears to corroborate the idea already hinted at in chap. ii. ver. 2. which seems to intimate that the Thessalonians had been led to misinterpret St. Paul's Epistle by some spurious writing, as he here teaches them how to distinguish his genuine Epistles from those which might be forged. Had there been no letters of this description, tokens of authenticity would have been unnecessary.

NOTE 31.—PART XII.

FROM the accounts of Roman authors, Gallio appears to have been a man eminent for his talents and literary attainments; and his character is represented in the most amiable light. His conduct on this occasion deserves a mixture of applause and censure: his liberal turn of mind was evinced in his refusal to punish a man for his religious opinions only, and his willingness to permit the Jews to think as they pleased, and settle their disputes among themselves. We must, however, reprobate the contemptuous indifference with which he treated matters of such stupendous moment. Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, appears to have been favorably disposed towards Paul. On this account, perhaps, the Jews incited the Greeks to beat him. Some, however, suppose, that this Sosthenes was one of the most clamorous among the Jews for the punishment of Paul, and that the Greeks, standing round the tribunal inflicted this punishment on the ringleader, as the most effectual way of quelling the tumult. Gallio was to blame for permitting this violation of the laws immediately under his own eyes.—See Witsius, Meletem. Leidens. cap. vii. sect. iv. &c.

NOTE 32.—PART XII.

ON THE DATE OF THE EPISTLE TO TITUS.

THE Epistle to Titus is placed thus early in the arrangement of the apostolic letters, on the united authority of Dr. Hales and Michaelis. The arguments of these eminent theologians appear to be strengthened by the consideration that there is no allusion to St. Paul's sufferings or approaching death—to his age or imprisonment: all of which things are frequently mentioned in these Epistles which we have more decided reason for referring to a late period of the Apostle's life. The verbal harmony between this Epistle and that to Timothy may be accounted for from the circumstance, that they were both written on similar occasions, and for the same purposes.—Compare 1 Tim. i. 1–3. with Titus i. 4, 5.; 1 Tim. i. 4. with Tit. i. 14.; 1 Tim. iv. 12. with Tit. ii. 7–15.; and 1 Tim. iii. 2–4. with Tit. i. 6–8.

Titus was a Greek, and one of Paul's early converts, who attended him and Barnabas to the first council of Jerusalem, A. D. 49, and afterwards on his ensuing circuit. (Gal. ii. 1–3. Acts xv. 2.)

During St. Paul's stay at Corinth for a year and a half, the first time, about A. D. 51, and A. D. 52, it is most likely that he made a voyage to the island of Crete, in order to preach the Gospel there; and took with him Titus as an assistant, whom he left behind him to regulate the concerns of that Church. (Tit. i. 5.) Shortly after his return, probably to Corinth, he wrote this letter of instructions to Titus, how to conduct himself in his episcopal office, with directions to come back to him at Nicopolis, where he meant to winter. (Tit. iii. 12.) The superscription supposes that this was Nicopolis, a city of Macedonia, but this is certainly a mistake, for by this is meant, Nicopolis on the river Nessus, in Thrace, built by the Emperor Trajan, after this period. Further, St. Paul, when he wrote, was just returned from a voyage, therefore the city must have been not far from the sea; hence it could not have been Nicopolis ad Hæmum, or ad Istrum, though so imagined by Theophylact: still less the Nicopolis in Armenia, or any other in the middle of Asia Minor. Neither might it be the Nicopolis in Egypt, near Alexandria. His residence in that case would have been probably in Alexandria itself. The most celebrated city of this name lay in Epirus, opposite the promontory of Actium, and was built by Augustus, on his victory over Antony. This appears to be the Nicopolis here intended.

The Acts are, indeed, equally silent on St. Paul's visit to Nicopolis; and many have supposed that both events took place after the close of that history; but the time between his first and second imprisonment at Rome scarcely admits of it.

It is certain that St. Paul made many voyages before the close of the history of the Acts, when Luke was not with him, and which he has not recorded, as 2 Cor. xi. 26., an Epistle written soon after his departure from Ephesus, (Acts xx. 1.) It is probable that this Epistle to Titus was written before that Second Epistle to the Corinthians.

St. Paul spent a year and a half at Corinth, (Acts xviii. 11.) and three years at Ephesus. If we are hence to suppose, that four years and a half were devoted to those two cities alone, the assertion (2 Cor. xi. 25.) is irreconcilable with St. Luke's narrative. But that the Apostle did make an excursion during this interval, and returned to Corinth, appears from 2 Cor. xii. 14. xiii. 1. where he terms "the third time," what we usually call his second visit. If, then, St. Paul's voyage to Crete was from Corinth, the Nicopolis, where he passed the winter, and expected Titus, was certainly that in Epirus. It is true, that in returning from Crete, Epirus lay out of his way; but he might have been driven there by a storm; and perhaps suffered one of the three shipwrecks he has mentioned. In this case he would have passed the winter in that city, and "preached the Gospel," as he says (Rom. xv. 19.) "round about unto Illyricum," previous to his coming to Corinth the second time, when he wrote the Epistle to the Romans.

That Apollos took part in the conversion of the Cretans agrees with this hypothesis, for Apollos appears to have come from Ephesus to Corinth, before St. Paul left that city. (Acts xviii. 24. and xix. 1.) It is most probable, therefore, that St. Paul's voyage to Crete, his stay in Nicopolis, and his Epistle to Titus, all belonged to this period. The two other opinions, and the objections to them, may be seen in Michaelis.

"This opinion of Michaelis," says Dr. Hales, "is much more probable than the period assigned by Lardner, namely, during Paul's second visit to Greece; or the latest, by Paley (following the Bible chronology), during Paul's third visit, between the time of his leaving Rome the first time, until his return and martyrdom there.

For the second circuit is described so particularly in the Acts, that there does not seem to be time or place for this voyage, and wintering at Nicopolis, and still less in the last circuit, as we may collect from the incidental account of it in the Second Epistle to Timothy, written by Paul during his second imprisonment at Rome, shortly before his death."

Hence there is no date so controverted as that of this Epistle, according to the different hypotheses of St. Paul's voyage to Crete. Michaelis reckons, that "in the chronological arrangement of St. Paul's Epistles, it should be placed between the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians (A. D. 52.), and the First Epistle to the Corinthians, (A. D. 57.) Accordingly it is here dated about the autumn of A. D. 53, supposing that Paul adhered to his intention of wintering that year at Nicopolis, whence he might have visited the regions of Epirus, Dalmatia, &c. bordering on Illyricum, which he notices, Rom. xv. 19. They are unnoticed in the Acts, and may therefore best be assigned to this early part of Paul's ministry, when there is full room for them."

Lardner dates this Epistle A. D. 56; Barrington, A. D. 57; Whitby, Pearson, Paley, and the Bible Chronology, A. D. 65.

Lardner, as usual, states his opinion with diffidence—"It appears to me," he observes, "very probable, that at this time Paul was in Illyricum and Crete; but I cannot digest the order of his journeys, since St. Luke has not related them."—(Vol. vi. p. 287.) And Michaelis has well described the gradual change of his opinion from the received till the last, in which he rested. "In the first edition of the Introduction," he observes, "I described the Epistle to Titus as written after St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome. In the second edition I wavered in this opinion. When I published the third edition, I thought it highly probable that the Epistle was written long before St. Paul's voyage as a prisoner to Italy (when he only touched at Crete, and the centurion rejected the advice of wintering there, Acts xxvii. 7–12.) and at present (in the fourth edition, 1780,) I have no doubt that this Epistle was written long before St. Paul's voyage as a prisoner, to Italy." Vol. iv. p. 32, Marsh's Translation.

Paley, in his Horæ Paulinæ, gives the following hypothetic route, as he terms it, of the Apostle's last journey.

"If we may be allowed to suppose that St. Paul, after his liberation at Rome, sailed into Asia, taking Crete in his way, and that from Asia and from Ephesus, the capital of that country, he proceeded into Macedonia, and crossing this peninsula, in his progress, came into the neighbourhood of Nicopolis, we have a route which falls in with every thing. It executes the intention expressed by the Apostle of visiting Colosse Philemon, ver. 22.) and Philippi (Phil. ii. 24.)

as soon as he should be set at liberty at Rome. It allows him to leave 'Titus at Crete,' (Tit. i. 5.), and 'Timothy at Ephesus, as he went into Macedonia,' (1 Tim. i. 3.), and to write to both not long after, from the peninsula of Greece, and probably the neighbourhood of Nicopolis; thus bringing together the dates of these two letters, and thereby accounting for that affinity between them, both in subject and language, which our remarks have pointed out."

"It is really a pity," says Dr. Hales, "that so simple and consistent an hypothesis throughout, including a great number of independent circumstances without contradiction, should be destitute of solid foundation."

The Second Epistle to Timothy (which Paley acknowledges was written during Paul's second imprisonment), in the last chapter, completely overturns his hypothesis.

1. There is no notice taken there of any voyage by sea to Asia: but not to rest on this negative argument, let us trace the actual route through Corinth, Troas, and Miletus, and probably through Colosse and Philippi.

2. Titus could not, then, be left in Crete, for he was actually in Dalmatia, near Illyricum, (2 Tim. iv. 10.)

3. Timothy was not left at Ephesus, because the Apostle did not visit Ephesus; he sailed by it on his last journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 16.), though he stopped at Miletus, in its neighbourhood, and there told the presbyters of Ephesus, whom he sent for, that they should see his face no more, which afflicted them with great grief, (Acts xx. 17–38.) Paley supposes that the Apostle said this rather despondingly, than by the Spirit, (p. 326.) But we can see no good reason for the contrary; for what inducement could he have to revisit a city where he had been already so ill treated and persecuted, only to provoke fresh persecution? When he was forced to quit Ephesus, in the uproar raised by the shrine-makers of Diana, (Acts xix. 25–40.), he seems to have taken a last farewell of them there (ἀσπασόμενος), Acts xx. 1.

Paul, it is true, left Trophimus sick at Miletus, the last time, (2 Tim. iv. 20.) But why should he communicate this intelligence, if Timothy was now at Ephesus, in that neighbourhood, especially as Trophimus was an Ephesian (Acts xxi. 29.), and must have had intercourse with his friends there? But Timothy was not at Ephesus, he was rather in the northern part of Asia, in Pontus, perhaps with Aquila and Priscilla, (2 Tim. iv. 19.) who were of that country, (Acts xviii. 2.) And from Pontus, Timothy's route to Corinth, where Paul left Erastus, (2 Tim. iv. 20.), lay directly through Troas, whence he was commissioned to bring with him the letter-case or trunk, the books, and especially the parchments, which the Apostle had left behind him there, (2 Tim. iv. 13.)

4. Nicopolis, near Actium, was quite out of the route to Rome from Corinth, therefore the Apostle did not visit it, and certainly had not time to winter there on his last journey.

5. The resemblance between the Epistles to Titus and Timothy, which Paley, indeed, has ingeniously and skilfully traced, does not require that they should be written about the same time. It may naturally be ascribed to the sameness of their situations and circumstances in the discharge of their respective episcopal functions^b.

NOTE 33.—PART XII.

IN this Epistle to Titus, a complete and perfect rule for the formation and government of Christian Churches is laid down. A Christian teacher goes into a country with which he has no natural alliance, and by authority delegated to him by an inspired apostle, he is appointed to ordain a class of men for the public service of the Church. "The less is blessed of the greater." As Titus set apart the elders of the Cretan Churches, we infer that elders are to be set apart for the service of other Churches, and by a similar authority. If Scripture is given to us for use and instruction, we are required to be guided by its directions. If, however, as we are sometimes told, the circumstances of mankind are such in the present day, that Scriptural precedents are to direct us no longer, we declare one part, at least, of Scripture to be useless; and that part, too, which the primitive Church, and, after it, Christians in all ages, have esteemed most valuable.

NOTE 34.—PART XII.

THIS is the same person who is mentioned in the Epistle to the Ephesians, chap. vi. ver. 21., and in that to the Colossians, chap. iv. ver. 7.

NOTE 35.—PART XII.

IT is uncertain whether St. Luke here refers to St. Paul or Aquila. Witsius supposes the vow to relate to Aquila, as being more zealous of the Jewish rites and ceremonies than St. Paul, who refused to consider the Mosaic Law as any longer binding. Others, however, would rather interpret it of St. Paul; and impute to him the observance of a vow from prudential motives that the Jews might not consider him as the enemy of the Law of Moses. Witsius observes, that it is absurd to suppose the Apostle would bind himself by that yoke, which he was so anxious to break away from the neck of others; but that he made certain compliances with the legal ritual, to avoid giving offence to the more ignorant or prejudiced among his countrymen. See Acts xxi. 26. This also was the opinion of Calvin.

Many commentators understand this vow to be that of the Nazarite. To the objection that the Nazarite was compelled to shave his hair at the door of the tabernacle, when the Israelites were in the wilderness, and in the temple when they had taken possession of Canaan (Numb. vi. 18.), Grotius replies, that these laws, as well as many others respecting sacrifices, were not binding upon the Jews out of Canaan. The testimony of Maimonides is quoted to prove this point. Yet the difficulty in question seemed so great to Salmasius, that he endeavoured to show that the vow could not have been that of the Nazarite; but that either St. Paul or Aquila had made a vow that they would not shave the head till they had arrived at Cenchrea. This, however, is very improbable; it was useless in itself, and not required by existing circumstances.

A very curious interpretation of the passage is given by the learned Petit. He would refer the words "for he had a vow," not to the previous cutting off of the hair, but to a previous vow which the Apostle had before made, which was now the cause of his proceeding to Jerusalem. He supposes that St. Paul, while he resided among the Corinthians, let his hair grow: long hair being much valued among the Greeks. But when he was about to return to Jerusalem, he cut off his hair, and prepared himself for his own country. Among the Greeks he had become a Greek, and among the Jews he showed himself a Jew, 1 Cor. ix., that he might by all means win them to Christ^c.

The vow, by others, is supposed to have been the same as that mentioned by Josephus. Berenice, he tells us, went to Jerusalem to perform her vows to God. For it was the custom with those who had labored under any disease, or had met with difficulties and afflictions, to pass thirty days in prayer before they sacrificed their victims; during which they abstained from wine, women, and shaving the hair. The custom prevailed among the heathen, of offering the hair to the gods after any great calamity^d.

NOTE 36.—PART XII.

It does not seem necessary to make any observations on the condition of the Christian Church at this period. The very fact of St. Paul's journeying from Church to Church, and province to province, to superintend the converts, implies the only truth which it is at all necessary to prove; that the ministers or elders of the Churches were ordained, and the Churches themselves directed and ruled, by a power which was superior to that of the stationary teachers. If the rulers of the Church of Christ had been as anxious and as clamorous for truth, during the last three centuries, as they have been for liberty, liberality, toleration, or any other popular cry, the worshippers of Christ would have been more united against the ancient superstition which preceded, and the unscriptural innovations which followed, the Reformation. Toleration and candor are the second class of Christian blessings. Truth and union are the first. That Church and nation alone are happy in which they flourish together.

NOTE 1.—PART XIII.

IN one of the early numbers of the Quarterly Review is a very curious article, in which an attempt is made to prove the identity of the Apollos of the Acts, with Apollonius of Tyanea.

NOTE 2.—PART XIII.

THE publicity with which the apostles preached the new religion is justly considered a decisive proof of their conviction of its truth. They uniformly appealed to those audiences who were most capable of examining the evidences of Christianity, and were at the same time prejudiced against its doctrines.

Even after the crucifixion of our Lord, the apostles and believers went to the temple, the most public place, and in the most public manner taught and worked miracles. Jerusalem, the seat of the doctors, the judges of religion, was the first place in which, by the command of their Lord, the disciples preached Christ crucified. They were therefore not afraid to have their cause tried by the most rigid test of Scripture, and in the very spot too where that Scripture was best understood.

When the same apostles carried this Gospel to heathen countries, did they go to the villages among the less informed, or comparatively ignorant Greeks, in order to form a party, and protect themselves by the favor of the multitude? They went to Cæsarea, to Antioch, to Thessalonica, to Athens, to Corinth, to Ephesus, to the very places where learning flourished most, where sciences were best cultivated; where imposture was most likely to be detected, and where the secular power existed in the most despotic manner, and could at once have crushed them, if they could have been proved to be impostors, or if they had not been under the immediate protection of Heaven; for it is evident that these holy men feared no rational investigation of their doctrines.

They preached Christ crucified, where it was the most solemn interest of the Jews to disprove their doctrine, that they might exculpate themselves from the murder of Jesus Christ. They preached the same Christ, and the vanity of idolatry, where idolatry existed in the plenitude of its power; and where all its interests required it to make the most desperate and formidable stand against those innovators. See Dr. Clarke's note.

NOTE 3.—PART XIII.

THEY had not heard of the miraculous descent of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost.

NOTE 4.—PART XIII.

LIGHTFOOT was of opinion, that the school in which St. Paul preached was a Beth Midrash, in which the Jews were instructed. Rosenmüller, on the contrary, with whom Kuinoel agrees, supposes this to be improbable, as St. Paul had been ejected from the synagogue on account of the Jews; and those who attended him would, consequently, have separated themselves from the Jewish assemblies, into a place set apart from them. Suidas mentions a sophist of the name of Tyrannus—σοφιστὴς—περὶ στύσεων καὶ διαυρέσεως λόγου βιβλία δέκα. Whether this was the person referred to in the Acts is uncertain.

NOTE 5.—PART XIII.

THE study of magic was prosecuted with so much zeal at Ephesus, that Ephesian incantations were proverbial; and the “Ephesian letters” were certain words, which were believed to have sovereign efficacy in charms and invocations. About this time magic, although forbidden by the Mosaic Law, was held in much esteem among the Jews, who excused themselves for its practice by ascribing the books they retained on this subject to their King Solomon. “The vagabond Jews” here mentioned had, in all probability, been long engaged in the pursuit of magical rites and incantations; but finding that the name of Jesus possessed power infinitely superior to any they could command, they attempted a trial of its efficacy in the present instance, using it as a substitute for their usual forms of exorcism. The result clearly proved the vanity of magic, and demonstrated beyond a doubt, that the miracles of the Gospel were perfectly independent of that unholy science, and were performed by a power which demons, while they trembled, acknowledged and obeyed. It served to convince the Ephesians of the truth of that Gospel which was attested by the manifest power of God, evidently working with the apostles. It brought magic into contempt in its strongest hold—the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified, and the people gave the best proofs of their contrition by burning their curious volumes, see ver. 19. As the miracles of Moses baffled the pretensions of the Egyptian magicians, the same Holy Spirit, “from whom no secrets are hid,” enabled the apostles to conquer the deceivers of their own age.

The Ephesian characters, or letters, appear to have been amulets inscribed with strange or barbarous words. They were worn about the person for the purpose of curing diseases, expelling demons, and preserving from evils of different kinds. The books brought together on this occasion were such as taught the science, manner of formation, use, &c. of these charms.

Suidas, under Ἐφέσια γράμματα, “Ephesian letters,” gives us the following account:—“Certain obscure incantations.—When Milesius and Ephesius wrestled at the Olympic games, Milesius could not prevail, because his antagonist had the Ephesian letters bound to his heels; when this was discovered, and the letters taken away, it is reported that Milesius threw him thirty times.”

The information given by Hesychius is still more curious:—“The Ephesian letters, or characters, were formerly six, but certain deceivers added others afterwards; and their names, according to report, were these: Askion, Kataskion, Lix, Tetrax, Damnameneus, and Aisian. It is evident that askian signifies darkness; kataskian, light; lix, the earth; tetrax, the year; damnameneus, the sun; and aisian, truth. These are holy and sacred things.” The same account may be seen in Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. v. cap. 8. where he attempts to give the etymology of these different terms. These words served, no doubt, as the keys to different spells and incantations; and were used in order to the attainment of a great variety of ends. The abraxàs of the Basilidians, in the second century, were formed on the basis of the Ephesian letters; for those instruments of incantation are inscribed with a number of words and characters equally as unintelligible as the above, and in many cases more so.—See Dr. Clarke’s Comment. in loc. and Kuinoel.

NOTE 6.—PART XIII.

THE date of this Epistle is ascertained from the Epistle itself. St. Paul, on leaving Corinth, as we have already seen, proceeded to Asia, and visited Ephesus, Jerusalem, and Antioch. Leaving this metropolis of the converted Gentiles, he passed through Galatia and Phrygia, and returned to Ephesus, where he remained three years. During the latter part of that time, St. Paul wrote this Epistle to the Corinthians, as we learn from the internal evidence of 1 Cor. xvi. 8., where we read, “I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost”—and that it was written at the preceding Passover, is further certain from the expression, (1 Cor. v. 7.) “Ye are unleavened,” that is, “ye are now celebrating the feast of unleavened bread.” St. Paul left Ephesus, A. D. 57, in which year, therefore, this Epistle must have been written. The subscription of the Epistle purports to have been written at Philippi, but as this assertion is at variance with the Apostle’s words, it cannot be correct. Michaelis would explain the discrepancy by interpreting the word διέρχουμαι (xvi. 5.) to mean, “I am now travelling through,” instead of “my route is through Macedonia,” which it evidently means^a. Corinth itself was a place of considerable trade and opulence, containing a great variety of people—its inhabitants were naturally quick and ingenious, and it abounded in philosophers and orators, who boasted of their human learning and accomplishments. It was the residence also of many Jews, as we find in Acts xviii. 4., and to them St. Paul first addressed himself; but finding their opposition to the Gospel unremitting, he turns to the Gentiles (Acts xviii. 6.), of whom the Church was principally composed. On St. Paul's departure from Corinth, he was succeeded by Apollos, who preached the Gospel with great success, (Acts xviii. 24-28.), to whom also may be added Aquila and Sosthenes. (Acts xviii. 3. 1 Cor. i. 1.) False teachers, however, soon arising, the peace of the Church was disturbed, and great disorders ensued. Some Gentile converts set themselves up for teachers, confounding the Christian doctrine with their own philosophical speculations, and, out of respect to the oratory of Apollos, called themselves his disciples. On the other hand, some of the Jewish converts contended strenuously for the observance of the Mosaic ceremonies, and styled themselves the followers of Cephas, that is, St. Peter, the apostle of the circumcision; while many of the native Corinthian converts still continued addicted to that uncleanness and lasciviousness which had been common to them in their heathen state. Two factions were raised in the Church, and the Apostle was called upon to fight against Jewish superstition, heathen licentiousness, and all the sophistry of human learning, which were alike leagued against him, derogating from his authority.

On hearing of the lamentable state of his newly-established Church, it appears that the Apostle sent Timothy and Erastus to the Corinthians, as his messengers and fellow-laborers in the Gospel, intending shortly to visit them himself (Acts xix. 22.); but before he could accomplish this, he received messengers from Corinth, with a letter from the Church, requesting his advice and directions on various subjects, which had been the occasion of so many animosities and divisions among them (1 Cor. vii. 1, 16, 17.), and on which those who remained steadfast to him were anxious to obtain his opinion. This Epistle appears to have been written in answer to these applications—St. Paul vindicates his apostolic character from the aspersions of the opposing parties, for the satisfaction of those converts who still adhered to him—he endeavours to lessen the influence of the false teachers, by pointing out their errors and licentious conduct—he applies suitable remedies to the various disorders and abuses which had so abundantly crept into the Church, and he gives satisfactory answers to all those points on which he had been consulted.

NOTE 7.—PART XIII.

ON THE ERRONEOUS TRANSLATION OF VER. 9.

MANY have concluded, from this passage, that the Epistle of St. Paul, in which this precept was contained, has perished. A little attention however to the passage will place the whole matter in a very different point of view.

In the first place we must remark, that the words which are here translated “in an Epistle,” ought, without any doubt, to be rendered, “in the,” or “in this Epistle,” such being the sense of the article in the original. Accordingly we find in the beginning of the chapter the very precept in question: “It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you.” As, therefore, the company of such offenders, “like a little leaven, would leaven the whole lump,” the Apostle commands them “to purge out therefore the old leaven,” i. e. those fornicators whose society would corrupt and defile them. Lest, however, they should so far mistake the command, as to withdraw themselves entirely from the world, the Apostle explains himself, and informs them that his injunction does not extend to fornicators among the heathen, for with such, in the ordinary intercourse of life, they must associate, but that it applies only to their Christian brethren.

“9 I wrote to you in an Epistle not to company with fornicators.

“10 Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or idolators, for then must ye needs go out of the world.

“11 But now have I written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolator, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner—with such an one no not to eat.”

As an additional proof of an error in the translation, we are to observe, that the identical word which in the ninth verse is translated “I wrote,” in the eleventh verse is translated, “I have written.” Let the latter tense be adopted, as it ought to be, in both verses, and with the addition of the demonstrative article, the sense of the passage will be perfectly clear, without having recourse to the improbable supposition of any previous epistle. The following paraphrase of the verses in question, which very nearly coincides with that of Mr. Jones, may, perhaps, be thought satisfactory.

“9 I have written to you, a little above, (ver. 2.), in this letter, that you should separate yourselves from those who are fornicators, and because you may be in danger of being polluted by them, that you should purge them out from among you, as the old leaven, (ver. 5, 6.)

“10 Do not, however, mistake me: I do not mean that you should separate from such among the heathen as are fornicators, extortioners, or idolators: for if you were to do so, you might as well go out of the world.

“11 But this is the meaning of what I have written to you; that you should not hold any communication, nor admit to the supper of the Lord, any among your Christian brethren, who are offenders in these points.”

There are many passages indeed in this Epistle which lead us to think that it was the first communication of the Apostle to the Corinthians, since his departure from them. In the beginning both of the second and of the fifteenth chapters, he recalls their attention to his residence among them, and to what he then said and did, as if he had sent them nothing, which might either have refreshed their faith, or renewed their obligations. Now as in the Second Epistle, he refers perpetually to the first, we might fairly suppose that in this Epistle, which we now call the first, he would have referred also, in a manner equally decisive, to his former one, if any such had ever existed. Such a reference, indeed, would have been especially necessary, as, if we suppose a former epistle, we must also suppose that the offence, against which he forewarned them, had been subsequently repeated; he would not, therefore, have failed to have charged them with direct disobedience to his positive command. So far, however, from this being the case, it appears from the very expressions which he uses, that he had but recently heard of the offence. This circumstance of itself militates against the supposition of any previous epistle; for if the crime had prevailed to such a degree, as to have already required the interference of the Apostle, he would not have written the second time, as if he had but just heard of the accusation from common report, "It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you." Besides, the very words in which he passes his judgment of excommunication against the offender (ver. 3, 4, 5.), lead us to believe that it was now passed for the first time. The supposition, therefore, of a lost epistle is groundless; nor do the words of the Apostle, when fairly examined, lead to any such conclusion^b.

NOTE 8.—PART XIII.

ON THE PLENARY AND PERPETUAL INSPIRATION
OF ST. PAUL.

It has been said, by many very respectable divines, that St. Paul did not consider himself to have been always inspired, but that he has distinguished between those parts of his Epistles which were dictated by the Spirit of God, and those that were not. This is the only chapter in any of his Epistles where this may at first sight appear to be so; a little attention, however, will show that the notion is founded on a total misconception of the meaning of the Apostle; who, so far from denying his plenary inspiration, vindicates its existence to the very utmost.

The Corinthians, it appears, had written to the Apostle to know his opinion, first, concerning marriage and the duties of the married state, with reference perhaps to the peculiar circumstances of the Church under its impending troubles. To this inquiry the Apostle in substance replies, that a state of celibacy was good, but that as the power of continency was not universal, it was better for those who felt so disposed, to enter into the marriage state, and for those who were already married to live together. "But," says he, "I speak this by permission, and not of commandment," ver. 6. The sense of which words is clearly this, that the Gospel gave no command either with respect to marriage, or to an abstinence from it—but that it permitted every man to act as from his own self-experience he might think to be best. The commandment then, and the permission, have reference not to the writing of the Apostle, but to the conduct of the Corinthians.

The next point, on which the Corinthians had consulted him, related to the preservation of the marriage bond among those Christians who were already married. "Unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord; Let not the wife depart from her husband," &c. ver. 10. Here, then, there was no latitude of permission, but a positive command from Christ himself, in whose code of morality this preservation of the marriage bond formed a very new and striking feature. To Christ himself therefore he refers, who, Matt. v. 32., had most decisively forbidden all divorces excepting in the case of adultery. The Corinthians knew the command of the Lord too well to need that it should be either reiterated or reinforced by himself; nor was it any disparagement of his apostolical power to appeal to the words of his heavenly Master.

The third point on which they had consulted him was this—whether the marriage of a believer and an unbeliever ought to be dissolved. This being a new case, he writes upon it at some length. "To the rest speak I, not the Lord, if any brother hath a wife that believeth not," &c. ver. 12. As therefore this was an extraordinary circumstance, respecting which Christ had not left any command, St. Paul proceeds to supply the deficiency, and gives a very decisive opinion, that no separation ought to take place on the part of the believer. So far indeed is he from undervaluing his power, that in the full persuasion and consciousness of his inspired authority, he concludes, "And so ordain I in all the Churches," ver. 17.

The fourth point, upon which they had consulted him, respects those who had never yet been married. Upon this point he thus commences his decision: "Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord; yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy to be faithful," ver. 25. As then Christ had left no command upon the point, the Apostle proceeds to decide the matter upon his own authority. But how does he decide it? Not as an ordinary man,—but as “one who had obtained mercy to be faithful.” The word which is translated “faithful,” signifies in this, as in various other places, “worthy of confidence or credit.” The same term, both in the original and in the translation, is applied to God himself, 1 Cor. i. 9. “God is faithful.” Again we find, Tit. i. 9. “The faithful word,” i. e. the Gospel. In 1 Tim. i. 12. we find the word peculiarly applied to the inspired ministry, “I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry.” When therefore, St. Paul speaks of his having “obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful,” he asserts the grace and authority of an inspired minister and apostle, and as such he pronounces his solemn determination and judgment.

Such a judgment was not his own private opinion and decree, but it was the determination of a mind divinely assisted and inspired. This the Apostle again asserts, in the words with which the subject is concluded. “She is happier, if she so abide, after my judgment, and I think also that I have the Spirit of God.” These latter words, which many have imagined to imply a doubt or hesitation in the mind of St. Paul respecting his inspiration, are, if rightly understood, the strongest affirmation of it. Some have considered the doubt as an ironical expression, with a view to put his adversaries to shame. But in reality he has expressed no doubt or hesitation at all. The misconception has arisen from the double meaning of the English word “think;” which ordinarily expresses a degree of uncertainty in the mind of the speaker, with respect to the fact in question. Whereas the word, in the original, signifies “I am of opinion,” or “I profess,” implying thereby a very high degree of confidence and self-persuasion. This language, therefore, so far from impeaching his inspiration, is even stronger than if it were only a simple affirmation of the fact. It is an asseveration upon the credit of his own personal knowledge and assurance.

Before we dismiss this chapter from our consideration, we may remark two other circumstances, which are both of importance with respect to our present inquiry. First, that when St. Paul says, “To the rest speak I, not the Lord,” he refers to Christ personally, and to his ministry upon earth. The influence of the Holy Spirit is in these words neither mentioned nor alluded to. There is no distinction, therefore, drawn between Paul when inspired, and Paul when uninspired; nor is it asserted that in the one case he spoke with the Spirit, and in the other without it. The distinction is this—that in the one case there existed a direct command of Christ, but that in the other there did not. The inspiration of the Apostle, then, is not the point in question. We may remark, secondly, that in this chapter, as indeed in other places, the term “I speak,” is applied by St. Paul to his writing. This is a strong argument, if any indeed were wanting, for considering his preaching and his writings as armed with the same authority, and as dictated by the same Spirit.

From this chapter, therefore, we may conclude that St. Paul unequivocally asserts his plenary and perpetual inspiration, that he entertains no doubt, nor admits any qualification, either as to its influence or its extent. He claims it every where, and that claim, as Christians, we must admit^c.

NOTE 9.—PART XIII.

THIS passage has frequently been considered as one principal support of the Socinian opinions. This mistake has arisen from not carefully attending to the Apostle’s argument. He is speaking of the many nonentities whom the heathen worship, and then adds, in contradiction, “To us there is but one God, the Father (or producing generating cause), of whom are all things.” Here he contrasts their theism with the Gentile polytheism—but many of the wiser heathens had attained so far towards the truth, and therefore he adds, (to distinguish betwixt the Christian and philosophic theist,) “and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things;” that is, (“by whom God made the worlds, or by whom he gave the ministry of reconciliation,)” “and we by him;” that is, by him we are that in which we differ from other men, purified and sanctified. The passage has not the least reference, one way or another, to the question of Unitarianism, and is only tantamount to the commencement of the creed, “I believe in God the Father, &c. and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord.”

NOTE 10.—PART XIII.

MR. LOCKE observes on this passage—“What the meaning of these words is, I confess I do not understand.” The generality of commentators, after Mede and Heinsius, suppose the word “power” to signify “veil”—either from the Hebrew כֶּכֶל, root כָּוַר—or to distinguish them from the unmarried—or as an acknowledgment of their husband’s authority.—See Mr. Slade’s excellent work on the Epistles, where the criticisms of Michaelis, Whitby, and others, are well summed up.

NOTE 11.—PART XIII.

BENZELIUS (as quoted by Macknight in loc.) thinks that in this allegory the foot signifies the common people in the Church; the hand the presidents; the eyes the teachers; and the ears the learners. The Apostle affirms, (continues Macknight,) that the eye and the head, the two principal members of the body, need the service of the inferior members (ver. 21, &c.) to teach such as hold the most honorable offices of the Church, not to despise those who are placed in the lowest stations. For, as in the body, the hands need the direction of the eye, and the eye the assistance of the hands, so in the Church they who follow the active occupations of life, need the direction of the teachers; and, on the other hand, the teachers need the support of the active members.

Were we to interpret this part of the allegory strictly, so as by "the head" to understand Christ, it would be equally true of him in quality of head of the Church, as it is of the head of the natural body, that he could not say to any of his members, "I have no need of thee." All the members of the Church are necessary to render it complete, and fit it for supporting itself; not excepting such members as are unsound. For by censuring them, and cutting them off, the sincere are powerfully instructed, corrected, and strengthened.—Macknight on the First of Corinthians in loc.

NOTE 13.—PART XIII.

BRIEF ACCOUNT OF TIMOTHY, AND OF THE FIRST EPISTLE TO HIM.

PAUL and Barnabas, in the course of their first apostolic journey among the Gentiles, came to Lystra, a city of Lycaonia, where they preached the Gospel for some time, and, though persecuted, with considerable success.—(See Acts xiv. 5, 6.) It is very likely that they here converted to the Christian faith a Jewess, named Lois, with her daughter Eunice, who had married a Gentile, by whom she had Timothy, and whose father was probably at this time dead; the grandmother, daughter, and son, living together.—(Compare Acts xvi. 1-3. with 2 Tim. i. 5.) It is also probable that Timothy was the only child; and it appears that he had been brought up in the fear of God, and carefully instructed in the Jewish religion, by means of the Holy Scriptures.—(Compare 2 Tim. i. 5. with 2 Tim. iii. 15.)

When the Apostle came from Antioch, in Syria, the second time, to Lystra, he found Timothy a member of the Church, and so highly reputed and warmly recommended by the Church in that place, that St. Paul took him to be his companion in his travels, Acts xvi. 1-3. From which passage we learn, that although Timothy had been educated in the Jewish faith, he had not been circumcised, because his father, who was a Gentile, would not permit it. When the Apostle had determined to take him with him, he found it expedient to use that precaution; not from any supposition that circumcision was necessary to salvation, but because of the Jews, who would neither have heard him nor the Apostle, had not this been done; they would not have received the Gospel from Timothy, because he was a heathen; and they would have considered the Apostle in the same light because he associated with such.

Timothy had a special call of God to the work of an evangelist, which the elders of the Church at Lystra knowing, set him solemnly apart to the work, by the imposition of hands, (1 Tim. iv. 14.) And they were particularly led to this, by several prophetic declarations relative to him, by which his divine call was most clearly ascertained.—(See 1 Tim. i. 18. and iv. 14.) After this appointment by the elders, the Apostle himself laid his hands on him; not perhaps for the purpose of his evangelical designation, but that he might receive those extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit, so necessary, in those primitive times, to demonstrate the truth of the Gospel, (see 2 Tim. i. 6, 7.) Yet it is not probable that Timothy had two ordinations; one by the elders of Lystra, and another by the Apostle; as it is most probable that St. Paul acted with that πρεσβυτεριον, or eldership, mentioned 1 Tim. iv. 14., among whom, in the imposition of hands, he would undoubtedly act as chief.

Timothy, thus prepared to be the Apostle's fellow-laborer in the Gospel, accompanied him and Silas, when they visited the Churches of Phrygia, and delivered to them the decrees of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, freeing the Gentiles from the Law of Moses, as a term of salvation. Having gone through these countries, they at length came to Troas, where St. Luke joined them, as appears from the phrascology of his history, Acts xvi. 10, 11, &c. In Troas a vision appeared to St. Paul, directing them to go into Macedonia. Loosing therefore from Troas, they all passed over to Neapolis, and from thence went to Philippi, where they converted many, and planted a Christian Church. From Philippi they went to Thessalonica, leaving St. Luke at Philippi, as appears from his changing the phraseology of his history at verse 40. We may therefore suppose that, at their departing, they committed the converted at Philippi to the care of St. Luke. In Thessalonica they were opposed by the unbelieving Jews, and obliged to flee to Berea, whither the Jews from Thessalonica followed them. To elude their rage, St. Paul, who was most obnoxious to them, departed from Berea by night, to go to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy at Berea. At Athens Timothy came to the Apostle, and gave him such an account of the afflicted state of the Thessalonian converts, as induced him to send Timothy back to comfort them. After that, St. Paul preached at Athens; but with so little success, that he judged it proper to leave Athens, and go forward to Corinth, where Silas and Timothy came to him, and assisted in converting the Corinthians. And when he left Corinth, they accompanied him, first to Ephesus, then to Jerusalem, and after that to Antioch, in Syria. Having spent some time in Antioch, St. Paul set out with Timothy on his third apostolical journey; in which, after visiting all the Churches of Galatia and Phrygia, in the order in which they had been planted, they came to Ephesus the second time, and there abode for a considerable period. In short, from the moment Timothy first joined the Apostle, as his assistant, he never left him, except when sent by him on some special errand. And by his affection, fidelity, and zeal, he so recommended himself to all the disciples, and acquired such authority over them, that St. Paul inserted his name in the inscription of several of the letters which he wrote to the Churches, to show that their doctrine was one and the same. The Apostle expressed his esteem and affection for Timothy still more conspicuously, by writing to him those excellent letters in the canon which bear his name; and which have been of the greatest use to the ministers of Christ ever since their publication, by directing them to discharge all the duties of their function in a proper manner.

The date of this Epistle has been a subject of much controversy, some assigning it to the year 56, 57, or 58, which is the common opinion; and others to 64 or 65. I have adopted, with Dr. Doddridge, the hypothesis which seems to have prevailed most generally, that it was written about the year of our Lord 57 or 58, when St. Paul had lately quitted Ephesus on account of the tumult raised there by Demetrius, and was gone into Macedonia, Acts xx. 1. This is the opinion of many learned critics, ancient and modern, particularly of Athanasius, Theodoret, Baronius, Ludovic, Capellus, Blondel, Hammond, Grotius, Salmasius, Lightfoot, Benson, Lord Barrington, Michaelis, and others. On the other hand, Bishop Pearson, and after him Rosenmüller, Macknight, Paley, Bishop Tomline, &c. endeavoured to prove, that it could not be written till the year 64 or 65, between the first and second imprisonment of St. Paul at Rome; and L'Enfant, without any hesitation, embraces this hypothesis. It is universally allowed that St. Paul must have written this First Epistle to Timothy at some journey which he made from Ephesus to Macedonia, having in the meantime left Timothy behind him at Ephesus; for he expressly says to Timothy (1 Tim. i. 3.), "I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia." Bishop Pearson, accordingly, in order to prove that the date of this Epistle was as late as he supposes, having observed that we read only of three journeys of St. Paul through Macedonia (viz. Acts xvi. 9, 10. and xx. 1, 3.), endeavours to show that it could not be written in any of these, and must consequently have been written in some fourth journey, not mentioned in the history, which he supposes was about the year 65, after St. Paul was released from his imprisonment at Rome. That it was not written at the first or third of these journeys is readily allowed, and it appears from the whole series of the context in both places; but it is the second that is generally contended for. The Bishop supposes that the Epistle was not written at this second journey, because it appears from Acts xix. 22., that St. Paul did not leave Timothy then at Ephesus, having sent him before into Macedonia, and appointed him to meet him at Corinth. (See 1 Cor. iv. 17. and xvi. 10.) To this it is answered, that though St. Paul did not indeed send Timothy from Ephesus, yet, as we are told that St. Paul made some stay there after that (Acts xix. 22.), Timothy might be returned before the tumult, and so the Apostle might, notwithstanding, leave him behind at Ephesus, when he himself set out for Macedonia. (For, it should be observed that he changed his scheme; and, before he went to Corinth, where he had appointed Timothy to meet him, he spent some time in Macedonia; from whence he wrote his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, in company with Timothy, who came to him in his return from Corinth, and continued with him while he remained in these parts.) Now that Timothy returned to Ephesus before the Apostle departed will indeed appear very probable, if (as Mr. Boyse argues from Acts xx. 1. compared with xix. 8, 10.) St. Paul spent three years at Ephesus and in the neighbouring parts, and sent Timothy away nine months before the tumult: which would leave him time enough to perform his commission, and return to Ephesus before the Apostle had left it. (See Family Expos. vol. iii. sect. 43, note, p. 189.) To which it may be added that it appears from 1 Cor. xvi. 10, 11., which Epistle was written from Ephesus, that St. Paul expected Timothy, after his journey to Macedonia and Corinth, would return to him at that city.

The Bishop further objects to the Epistle's being written at this second journey, mentioned

Acts xx. 1., that when the Apostle set out he proposed to go into Macedonia, and to visit the Churches there and in Greece; which must necessarily take up a considerable time; whereas, in his Epistle to Timothy, he speaks of his intention to return very soon, (1 Tim. iii. 14. and iv. 13.) But it is natural to suppose that some unforeseen accident might detain him longer than he designed, and being disappointed of some assistance he expected from Macedonia, he might afterwards send for Timothy to come to him; who, as the passage by sea might be accomplished in a few days, might arrive at Macedonia before the Apostle wrote his Second Epistle to the Corinthians.

The Bishop further argues, that it appears from the Epistle to Titus, as well as from some passages in his Epistle to the Philippians and to Philemon, that St. Paul actually made another journey into those parts after his imprisonment at Rome; in which journey he left Titus behind him at Crete, which lay in his way from Rome, (Tit. i. 5.) Now it must be allowed the Bishop, that the supposition that Salmasius makes is not at all likely, that St. Paul touched at Crete when he was going from Achaia to Macedonia, for then he carried a collection with him (1 Cor. xvi. 1, 5. Acts xxiv. 17.), and therefore it was not probable he would go so much out of his way; and when he was about to sail into Syria, and heard that snares were laid for him (Acts xx. 3.), it is not to be supposed he would go into the mouth of them, or that he would take up his time in preaching at Crete, when he was in haste to be at Jerusalem (Acts xx. 16.), or that he would winter at Nicopolis (Tit. iii. 12.) when winter was passed, and he desired to be at Jerusalem before the Passover. But then it had been observed, that perhaps the Epistle to Titus might be among the first St. Paul wrote, and his voyage to Crete one of the many events before his going up to the council at Jerusalem, which, in his history of the Acts, St. Luke, not being in company with him when they occurred, had entirely passed over, and of which there are notwithstanding some traces in St. Paul's Epistle, particularly 2 Cor. ii. and Rom. xv. 19; or if it be allowed that the Epistle to Titus was written by St. Paul after his first imprisonment, it will not follow from thence, that the First Epistle to Timothy must have been written at the same time. This is a brief account of the arguments for Bishop Pearson's hypothesis, that this Epistle was written about the year 65, with their respective answers.

In favor, however, of the later date assigned to this Epistle, it has been farther observed, that Timothy was left in Crete, to oppose the following errors:—

1. "Fables" invented by the Jewish doctors, to recommend the observance of the Law of Moses, as necessary to salvation. 2. Uncertain

"genealogies," by which individuals endeavoured to trace their descent from Abraham, in the persuasion that they would be saved, merely because they had Abraham for their father. 3. Intricate "questions," and strifes about some words in the Law; perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, who reckoned that which produced most gain to be the best kind of godliness. And 4. "Oppositions of science falsely so called." And these errors, it is said, had not taken place in the Ephesian Church before the Apostle's departure; for, in his charge to the Ephesian elders at Miletus, he foretold that the false teachers were to enter in among them after his departing, (Acts xx. 29, 30.) "I know that after my departing, shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves, shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them." The same thing, it is said, appears from the two Epistles which the Apostle wrote to the Corinthians, the one from Ephesus, before the riot of Demetrius, the other from Macedonia, after that event; and, from the Epistle which he wrote to the Ephesians themselves, from Rome, during his confinement there. For in none of these letters is there any notice taken of the above-mentioned errors, as subsisting among the Ephesians at the time they were written, which cannot be accounted for, on the supposition that they were prevalent in Ephesus when the Apostle went into Macedonia after the riot. It is inferred, therefore, that the First Epistle to Timothy, in which the Apostle desired him to abide in Ephesus, for the purpose of opposing the Judaizers and their errors, could not have been written either from Troas or from Macedonia after the riot; but it must have been written some time after the Apostle's release from confinement in Rome; when no doubt he visited the Church at Ephesus and found the Judaizing teachers there busily employed in spreading their pernicious errors. But it may be answered, that it is not certain what errors were alluded to in Acts xx. 29, 30.; and the errors alluded to in 1 Tim. i. every where prevailed.

Again, in the First Epistle it is said, the same persons, doctrines, and practices, are reprobated which are condemned in the second. Compare 1 Tim. iv. 1–6. with 2 Tim. iii. 1–5.; and 1 Tim. vi. 20. with 2 Tim. ii. 16.; and 1 Tim. vi. 4. with 2 Tim. ii. 14. The same commands, instructions, and encouragements are given to Timothy in the First Epistle as in the Second. Compare 1 Tim. vi. 13, 14. with 2 Tim. iv. 1–5. The same remedies for the corruptions which had taken place among the Ephesians are prescribed in the First Epistle, as in the Second. Compare 1 Tim. iv. 14–16. with 2 Tim. i. 6, 7.; and, as in the Second Epistle, so in the First, every thing is addressed to Timothy, as superintendent both of the teachers and of the laity, in the Church at Ephesus; all which imply, that the state of things among the Ephesians was the same when the two Epistles were written: consequently, that the First Epistle was written only a few months before the Second, and not long before the Apostle's death. It is answered, that the Church at Ephesus might require a repetition of the same remonstrances, though many years elapsed between the sending of the two Epistles.

To the late date of this First Epistle there are three objections, which appear to me to be decisive:—

1. It is thought that, if the First Epistle to Timothy was written after the Apostle's release, he could not with any propriety have said to Timothy (chap. iv. 12.), "Let no man despise thy youth." In reply to which it is said, that Servius Tullius, in classing the Roman people, as Aulus Gellius relates (lib. x. c. 28.), divided their age into three periods; childhood, he limited to the age of seventeen; youth, from that to forty-six; and old age, from that to the end of life. Now, supposing Timothy to have been eighteen years old, A. D. 50, when he became Paul's assistant, he would be no more than 32, A. D. 64, two years after the Apostle's release, when it is supposed this Epistle was written. Wherefore, being then in the period of life which, by the Greeks, as well as the Romans, was considered as "youth," the Apostle with propriety might say to him, "Let no man despise thy youth." It is not, however, probable, that St. Paul alluded to the artificial distinctions of the Roman law, instead of the actual age of Timothy.

2. When the Apostle touched at Miletus, in his voyage to Jerusalem with the collections, the Church at Ephesus had a number of elders, that is, of bishops and deacons, who came to him at Miletus (Acts xx. 17.), what occasion was there, in an Epistle written after the Apostle's release, to give Timothy directions concerning the ordination of bishops and deacons, in a Church where there were so many elders already? It is answered, the elders who came to the Apostle at Miletus, in the year 58, may have been too few for the Church at Ephesus, in her increased state, in the year 65. Besides, false teachers had then entered, to oppose whom more bishops and deacons might be needed than were necessary in the year 58, not to mention that some of the first elders having died, others were wanted to supply their places. Of this, however, there is no scriptural proof, and the positive assertion of the Epistle is needlessly set aside.

Dr. Paley defends the later date, from the superscription of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, which is spurious, from the apparently short interval between St. Paul's leaving Ephesus, to go into Macedonia, and the writing the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, in the beginning of which Timothy is joined with St. Paul; to which it may be answered, that Timothy might have left Ephesus for a short time only, and soon returned. He endeavours to overcome the insuperable difficulty in the opinion that the Epistle was written so late, that it necessarily implies that St. Paul visited Ephesus after his liberation at Rome, which appears contrary to what he said to the Ephesian Church, that they should see his face no more. Dr. Paley finds only some presumptive evidences, that the Apostle must have visited Ephesus; the Epistles to the Philippians and to Philemon were written while the Apostle was a prisoner at Rome; to the former he says, "I trust in the Lord, that I also myself shall come shortly;" and to the latter, who was a Colossian, he gives this direction, "But withal, prepare me also a lodging, for I trust that, through your prayers, I shall be given unto you." An inspection of the map will show us, that Colosse was a city of Asia Minor, lying eastward, and at no great distance from Ephesus: Philippi was on the other, i. e. the western side of the Ægean Sea. Now, if the Apostle executed his purpose, and came to Philemon at Colosse, soon after his liberation, it cannot be supposed, says Dr. Paley, that he would omit to visit Ephesus, which lay so near it, and where he had spent three years of his ministry. As he was also under a promise to visit the Church at Philippi shortly, if he passed from Colosse to Philippi, he could hardly avoid taking Ephesus in his way.

Arguments of this theoretical nature ought to weigh but little, when they defend a proposition which seems opposed to the plain and literal meaning of Scripture. When St. Paul told the elders of Ephesus, that they should "see his face no more," it was so solemnly announced, that it may be considered as spoken by the Spirit of prophecy, with which he was gifted.

Macknight has argued at great length that St. Paul spoke his strong persuasion only. Dr. Paley, in adopting the same hypothesis, does not, however, mention his name. Nothing can be asserted positively upon this subject. I have preferred the early date for this reason, that the allusion to the youth of Timothy—the fact that Timothy was directed to ordain elders, whom St. Paul afterwards met—and the solemn declaration, that he should see their face no more, appear to be so plainly decisive, that I can admit no theoretical arguments to overthrow what seems to me the unforced deduction from Scripture, that the Epistle was written after St. Paul went from Ephesus, and left Timothy there, when he went into Macedonia. There is no mention of St. Paul's going from Ephesus to Macedonia but once, and that is in the passage after which I have inserted this Epistle, after the riot of Demetrius, (Acts xx. 1.) This was the consideration which induced Theodoret, among the ancients, and among the moderns, Estius, Baronius, Capellus, Grotius, Lightfoot, Salmasius, Hammond, Witsius, Lardner, Pearson, and others, to support the opinion, that the Apostle speaks of that journey in his First Epistle to Timothy.—See Horne, Clarke, Paley, Macknight, Lardner, and Doddridge.

Michaelis has endeavoured to prove that this Epistle was principally written against the Essenes, or Therapeutæ. His references do not appear to support his hypothesis. These people, even if they sometimes came into towns, could not have been there in sufficient numbers to endanger the faith of the Christian communities. We have at least no proof of this fact. Josephus indeed asserts, that they were numerous in every city; but their principal habitation being in the deserts, it is improbable that those who entered the towns should have deviated still further from their customs, and have become the active partisans of Judaism, which the false teachers are represented to be; they were no doubt included among the various false teachers whom St. Paul condemned; but they were not the exclusive objects of his censure.—See Michaelis, vol. iv. c. xv. sect. i. ii. iii. p. 75.

NOTE 14.—PART XIII.

THE priests under the Law were required to be without bodily infirmities (Lev. xxi. 17, &c.), typical of that spiritual purity which was the essential qualification of the ministers of the Christian dispensation.

NOTE 15.—PART XIII.

HE did not, however, go there immediately; he passed through Macedonia (ver. 1.), in which he informs us (2 Cor. vii. 5–7.), that he suffered much, both from believers and infidels; but was greatly comforted by the arrival of Titus, who gave him a very flattering account of the prosperous state of the Church at Corinth. A short time after this, being still in Macedonia, he sent Titus back to Corinth (2 Cor. viii. 16, 17.), and forwarded by him the Second Epistle, which he wrote to that Church, as Theodoret and others suppose. Some time after he visited Corinth himself, according to his promise (1 Cor. xvi. 5.); this was his third voyage to that city, (2 Cor. xii. 14. and xiii. 1.)

NOTE 16.—PART XIII.

ON THE DATE OF THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

THE Second Epistle to the Corinthians was occasioned by the accounts which the Apostle had received after the reception of the First. This is fully proved by the internal evidence. It was written soon after the arrival of Titus from Corinth, who communicated to the Apostle the submission and good disposition of that Church. He had the satisfaction of learning, that, in conformity to the directions contained in his First Epistle, the incestuous person had been excommunicated (2 Cor. ii. 5–11. and vii. 11.), and that many were anxious for his return, and were zealous in the vindication of his office against those who had calumniated him, (chap. vii. 7–11.) The faction, however, headed by their false teacher, still continued their corrupt practices, and endeavoured, as much as possible, to undermine the Apostle's authority and influence. To understand the force of this Epistle, it will be necessary to bear in mind the opposite characters to whom it was written. To those Christian converts, who had shown a ready obedience to his former letter, and who remained steadfast in his doctrine, St. Paul addresses himself, in this his Second Epistle, in terms of commendation and encouragement; while, on the other hand, he attacks, in order to weaken, the faction which the false teacher still continued to form against him. He confutes the objections and revilings of his opponents with the most masterly reasonings; exposing them to contempt and threatening them with punishment. This distinction between the two prevailing parties at Corinth is evidently referred to in 2 Cor. i. 14. and chap. ii. 5., and reconciles the otherwise apparent inconsistencies of this Epistle, in which he vindicates himself with more boldness, and reproves his adversaries with more severity than in the first which he addressed to them.

The Second Epistle to the Corinthians is generally supposed to have been written about a year after the former; and this seems to be supported by the words (chap. ix. 2.), "Achaia was ready a year ago;" for the Apostle, having given instructions for that collection to which he refers in these words at the close of the preceding Epistle, they would not have had the forwardness there mentioned, till a year had elapsed, as the Apostle had purposed to stay at Ephesus till Pentecost (1 Cor. xvi. 8.); and he staid some time in Asia, after his purpose to leave Ephesus, and go to Macedonia, (Acts xix. 21, 22.), and yet making here his apology for not wintering in Corinth, as he thought to do (1 Cor. xvi. 6.), this Epistle must have been written after the winter; and consequently, when a new year was begun. "It therefore," says Dr. Whitby, "seems to have been composed after his second coming to Macedonia, mentioned Acts xx. 3. For, 1. It was written after he had been at Troas, and had left that place to return to Macedonia: now that was at his second going thither; (see chap. ii. 12.) 2. It was written when Timothy was with him: now, when he left Ephesus to go into Macedonia, Timothy went not with him, but was sent before him, (Acts xix. 22.); but at his second going through Macedonia, Timothy was with him, (Acts xx. 4.) 3. He speaks of some Macedonians, who were likely to accompany him, chap. ix. 4.) Now, at his second going from Macedonia, there accompanied him Aristarchus, Secundus, and Gaius, of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia, (Acts xx. 4.) 4. The postscript says, that this Epistle was written from Philippi, where St. Paul was till the days of unleavened bread, (Acts xx. 6.); it therefore seems to have been sent from thence to them by Titus and some other person, not long before St. Paul's coming to them; which he speaks of as instant (2 Cor. xiii. 1.), and that which he was now ready to do, (2 Cor. xii. 14. According to Dr. Lightfoot, he did so in his journey from Philippi to Troas, he sailing about from Philippi to Corinth, to make good his promise, whilst the rest that were with him (Acts xx. 4.) went directly to Troas, and there waited for him."

"The opening of this Epistle," Dr. Paley remarks, "exhibits a connexion with the history of the Acts, which alone may satisfy us that the Epistle was written by St. Paul, and by St. Paul in the situation in which the history places him. Let it be remembered, that in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts, St. Paul is represented as driven away from Ephesus, or as leaving Ephesus, in consequence of an uproar in that city, excited by some interested adversaries of the new religion. 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians.' And after the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed, for to go into Macedonia. When he was arrived in Macedonia, he wrote the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, which is now before us, and he begins his Epistle in this wise: 'Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God'—'For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, inasmuch that we despaired even of life; but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God, which raiseth the dead: who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us.' Nothing could be more expressive of the circumstances in which the history describes St. Paul to have been, at the time when the Epistle purports to be written; or rather, nothing could be more expressive of the sensations arising from these circumstances, than this passage. It is the calm recollection of a mind emerged from the confusion of instant danger. It is that devotion and solemnity of thought which follows a recent deliverance. There is just enough of particularity in the passage to show that it is to be referred to the tumult at Ephesus. 'We would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia.' And there is nothing more; no mention of Demetrius, of the seizure of St. Paul's friends, of the interference of the town clerk, of the occasion or nature of the danger which St. Paul had escaped, or even of the city where it happened; in a word, no recital from which a suspicion could be conceived, either that the author of the Epistle had made use of the narrative in the Acts, or, on the other hand, that he had sketched the outline, which the narrative in the Acts only filled up. That the forger of an Epistle, under the name of St. Paul, should borrow circumstances from a history of St. Paul then extant, or that the author of a history of St. Paul should gather materials from letters bearing St. Paul's name, may be credited: but I cannot believe that any forger whatever should fall upon an expedient so refined, as to exhibit sentiments adapted to a situation, and to leave his readers to seek out that situation from the history; still less that the author of a history should go about to frame facts and circumstances fitted to supply the sentiments which he found in the letter.—See Paley, Horne, Macknight, Dr. A. Clarke, Whitby, and Bishop Tomline.

NOTE 17.—PART XIII.

In this passage, the Mystics imagined that St. Paul was drawing the parallel between two different kinds of interpretation. Construing, therefore, "litera," in the Latin Vulgate, by "literal interpretation," and "spiritus," by "spiritual interpretation," they inferred that the Apostle had condemned the former, and recommended the exclusive employment of the latter. Now the Apostle, according to his own words, was drawing a parallel of a totally different description; a parallel, which had no concern whatever with interpretation. He was drawing a parallel between the Law of Moses, and the Gospel of Christ. The former does not, the latter does, afford the means of salvation. This, and this only, is what St. Paul meant, when he said, "that the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." It is true, that he applied the term Γράμμα to the former, and the term Πνεῦμα to the latter. But he added explanations of these terms, which remove all ambiguity; the Law of Moses he called Γράμμα, as Διαζωτία ἐν γράμμασιν, or as being Διαζωτία ἐρρετυπωμένη ἐν λίθοις: the Gospel of Christ he called Πνεῦμα, as being Διαζωτία τοῦ Πνεύματος ἐν δόξῃ. Now, as these explanations are not only Greek explanations, but Greek explanations of Greek terms, they are absolutely incapable of being transfused into any version. They can be understood only with reference to the words of the original. It is therefore impossible that any one who expounds this passage from the words of a translation, should expound it in the sense of the author. But as the Mystics, like other members of the Church of Rome, expounded from an authorized version, they fell into an error, which a knowledge of the original would have prevented. They fell into the error, of supposing that literal or grammatical exposition not only might be, but ought to be discarded; and hence they acquired such a contempt for every thing not spiritual or allegorical, that the plain and literal meaning of a passage was regarded as a sort of husk or chaff, fit only for the carnally-minded, and not suited to the taste of the godly^d.

NOTE 18.—PART XIII.

THE original word in this passage κατοπτιζόμενοι, in the opinion of Locke, Macknight, and others, should be rather translated “reflecting as a mirror,” instead of “beholding as in a glass.” Both meanings may be united. The mirrors of the ancients were made of polished steel, and reflected therefore upon the countenances of those who looked upon them a luminous effulgence, or glory. The Apostle beheld as in the mirror of the Scriptures the glory of Christ, and this glory shone upon the face of the Apostle. Moses veiled the glory which had shone upon his face. The Apostle, on the contrary, would not veil his face; but by contemplating more and more the glory of Christ, endeavoured to diffuse the knowledge of that glory to the world.

The superiority of the Law of Christ to that of Moses, is admirably shown by Whitby, in his notes to this chapter.

The glory appearing on Mount Sinai made the people afraid of death, saying, “Let not God speak to us again lest we die,” Exod. xx. 19. Deut. xviii. 16. And thus they received “the spirit of bondage again to fear,” Rom. viii. 15.; whilst we have given to us “the spirit of power and of love, and of a sound mind;” 2 Tim. i. 7.; “and the spirit of adoption whereby we cry, Abba, Father!” and to this difference the Epistle to the Hebrews alludes, chap. xii. 18–24.

Moses, with all his glory, was only the minister of the Law, written on tables of stone: the apostles are ministers of the Gospel, written on the hearts of believers. Moses gave the Jews only the letter that killeth; the apostles gave the Gospel, which is accompanied with the Spirit that gives life.

The glory which Moses received at the giving of the Law did more and more diminish, because his Law was to vanish away; but the glory which is received from Christ is an increasing glory; the doctrine and the Divine influence remaining for ever; and as the Law was veiled under types and shadows, the Gospel was delivered with great plainness and perspicuity.

Again, the Jews only saw the shining of the face of Moses through a veil; but we behold the glory of the Gospel of Christ in the person of Christ, our Lawgiver, with open face.

They saw through a veil, which prevented the reflection, or shining of it, upon them; and so this glory shone only on the face of Moses, but not at all upon the people. Whereas the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ, shines as in a mirror, which reflects the image upon Christian believers, so that they are transformed into the same image, deriving the glorious gifts and graces of the Spirit with the Gospel from Christ the Lord and distributor of them, (1 Cor. xii. 5.); and so the glory which He had from the Father, He has given to his genuine followers, (John xvii. 22.) It is, therefore, rather with true Christians, as it was with Moses himself, concerning whom God speaks thus: “With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude (τὴν δόξαν Κυρίου, the glory of the Lord) shall he behold,” (Num. xii. 8.) For as he saw the glory of God apparently, so we with open face behold the glory of the Lord; as he, by seeing of this glory, was changed into the same likeness, and his face shone, or was δεδοξασμένη, “made glorious;” so we, beholding the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. iv. 6.) are changed into the same glory. But though this may in some measure be enlarged to the Church in general, in which these gifts were exercised, I think it chiefly, and more eminently, refers to the apostles, mentioned ver. 12.

NOTE 19.—PART XIII.

THE expressions used by the Apostle in this passage are all Jewish, and should be interpreted according to their use of them. Schoetgen has entered largely into the argument here employed by the Apostle, and brought forth much useful information.

He observes, first, that the Hebrew word עָבַד, which answers to the apostle’s ἐπερδύσασθαι, “to be clothed,” signifies “to be surrounded, covered, or invested with any thing.” So, “to be clothed with the uncircumcision,” signifies “to be uncircumcised.”—Jalkut Rubeni, f. 163. 2.

^d See Bishop Marsh’s Lectures, part iii. p. 107. Camb. 1813.

We read in the book Zohar, on the word (Exod. xxiv. 18.) "Moses went into the midst of the cloud, and gat him up into the mount." He went into the midst of the cloud, as if one put on a garment: so he was clothed with the cloud, ראהלבש בלבושא הכי נמי אהלבש; and in Zohar Levit. fol. 29. col. 114. "The righteous are in the terrestrial paradise, where their souls are clothed with lucid crowns," מתלבשין בעטרין רנהווא.

2d. The word בית, "house," in Hebrew, often denotes "a case," or "clothing." So in the Targum of Onkelos, בית אפי, "the house of the face," is a veil; and so בית אצבעים, "the house of the fingers," and בית יד, "the house of the hand," signify gloves; בית רגלי, "the house of the feet," shoes, &c. Therefore, ολυτρισιον περιδύσασθαι, "to be clothed on with a house," may signify any particular qualities of the soul; what we, following the very same form of speech, call a habit; i. e. a coat or vestment. So we say the man has got a habit of vice, a habit of virtue, a habit of swearing, of humility, &c.

3d. The Jews attribute garments to the soul, both in this and the other world: and as they hold that all human souls preëxist, they say that, previously to their being appointed to bodies, they have a covering which answers the same end to them, before they come into life, as their bodies do afterwards. And they state that the design of God, in sending souls into the world, is, that they may get themselves a garment by the study of the Law, and good works.

By this garment of the soul they mean also the image of God, or being made holy; the image which Adam and all his posterity have lost, and of which being now deprived, they may be said to be naked. They assign also certain vehicles to separate spirits, and believe that, upon the death of the body, the angel of death takes off the garments of this mortal life, and puts on the garments of paradise.—See the dissertation in Schoetgen. Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 692–702; and Clark in loc.

NOTE 20.—PART XIII.

THIS expression, "unequally yoked together," evidently alludes to the ceremonial law of the Jews (Deut. xxii. 10. and Levit. xix. 19.), which prohibited their ploughing with an ox and an ass together, and gives its full and spiritual interpretation. See also ver. 16. where the promise given to the Israelites (Levit. xxvi. 11, 12.) was now realized by the Spirit of God dwelling in them by his miraculous gifts. In ver. 17. the spiritual signification of the law of the clean and unclean animals (Levit. xi. 25.) is again clearly revealed. God ordained this distinction between meats and animals, for the purpose of inculcating a mental sanctification and purity; separating his chosen people from the company of heathens and idolators, and any thing that defileth.

NOTE 21.—PART XIII.

ON THE MEANING OF THE WORDS TPITON TOYTO EPXOMAI.

"Do not these words import," says Dr. Paley, "that the writer had been at Corinth twice before? Yet, if they import this, they overset every congruity we have been endeavouring to establish. The Acts of the Apostles record only two journeys of St. Paul to Corinth. We have all along supposed, what every mark of time, except this expression, indicates, that the Epistle was written between the first and second of these journeys. If St. Paul had been already twice at Corinth, this supposition must be given up; and every argument, or observation, which depends upon it, falls to the ground. Again, the Acts of the Apostles not only record no more than two journeys of St. Paul to Corinth, but do not allow us to suppose that more than two such journeys could be made or intended by him within the period which the history comprises: for, from his first journey into Greece to his first imprisonment at Rome, with which the history concludes, the Apostle's time is accounted for. If, therefore, the Epistle were written after the second journey to Corinth, and upon the view and expectation of a third, it must have been written after his first imprisonment at Rome, i. e. after the time to which the history extends. When I first read over this Epistle, with the particular view of comparing it with the history, which I chose to do without consulting any commentary whatever, I own that I felt myself confounded by the text. It appeared to contradict the opinion which I had been led, by a great variety of circumstances, to form, concerning the date and occasion of the Epistle. At length, however, it occurred to my thoughts to inquire, whether the passage did necessarily imply that St. Paul had been at Corinth twice; or whether, when he says, 'This is the third time I am coming to you,' he might mean only that this was the third time that he was ready, that he was prepared, that he intended, to set out upon his journey to Corinth. I recollected that he had once before this purposed to visit Corinth, and had been disappointed in his purpose; which disappointment forms the subject of much apology and protestation in the first and second chapters of the Epistle. Now, if the journey in which he had been disappointed was reckoned by him one of the times in which 'he was coming to them,' then the present would be the third time, i. e. of his being ready and prepared to come; although he had been actually at Corinth only once before. This conjecture being taken up, a farther examination of the passage and the Epistle produced proofs which placed it beyond doubt. 'This is the third time I am coming to you.' In the verse following these words he adds, 'I told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present the second time; and being absent, now I write to them which heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that, if I come again, I will not spare.' In this verse the Apostle is declaring beforehand what he would do in his intended visit: his expression, therefore, 'as if I were present the second time,' relates to that visit. But, if his future visit would only make him present among them a second time, it follows that he had been already there but once. Again, in the fifteenth verse of the first chapter, he tells them, 'In this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit.' Why a second, and not a third benefit? why δευτέραν, and not, τρίτην χάριν, if the τρίτον ἐρχομαι, in the thirteenth chapter, meant a third visit? for, though the visit in the first chapter be that visit in which he was disappointed, yet, as it is evident from the Epistle, that he had never been at Corinth from the time of the disappointment to the time of writing the Epistle, it follows, that if it were only a second visit in which he was disappointed then, it could only be a visit which he proposed now. But the text, which I think is decisive of the question, if any question remain upon the subject, is the fourteenth verse of the twelfth chapter; 'Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you;' Ἰδοὺ, τρίτον ἐτοίμως ἔχω ἐλθεῖν. It is very clear that the τρίτον ἐτοίμως ἔχω ἐλθεῖν of the twelfth chapter, and the τρίτον τοῦτο ἐρχομαι of the thirteenth chapter, are equivalent expressions, were intended to convey the same meaning, and to relate to the same journey. The comparison of these phrases gives us St. Paul's own explanation of his own words; and it is that very explanation which we are contending for, viz. that τρίτον τοῦτο ἐρχομαι does not mean that, 'he was coming a third time,' but that, 'this was the third time he was in readiness to come,' τρίτον ἐτοίμως ἔχω. Upon the whole, the matter is sufficiently certain; nor do I propose it as a new interpretation of the text which contains the difficulty, for the same was given by Grotius long ago, but I thought it the clearest way of explaining the subject, to describe the manner in which the difficulty, the solution, and the proofs of that solution, successively presented themselves to my inquiries. Now, in historical researches, a reconciled inconsistency becomes a positive argument. First, because an impostor generally guards against the appearance of inconsistency; and secondly, because when apparent inconsistencies are found, it is seldom that any thing but truth renders them capable of reconciliation. The existence of the difficulty proves the want or absence of that caution, which usually accompanies the consciousness of fraud; and the solution proves, that it is not the collusion of fortuitous propositions which we have to deal with, but that a thread of truth winds through the whole, which preserves every circumstance in its place." NOTE 22.—PART XIII.

ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

THIS Epistle is supposed by some to have obtained the first place among the apostolical writings, on account of the excellency of its doctrines; and by others, on account of the preëminence of the city to which it was addressed. Various years have been assigned for its date. The most probable is that supported by Bishop Tomline, Lardner, Lord Barrington, and Benson, who refer it to 58. Its internal evidence satisfactorily proves that it was written at Corinth, at the time the Apostle was preparing to take the contributions of the churches to Jerusalem, (Rom. xv. 25–27.) He also mentions to the Romans the name of the man with whom he lodged at the time he wrote to them at Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23.), as well as that of Erastus, the chamberlain of that city, (2 Tim. iv. 20.) We find it was dictated by St. Paul in the Greek language to his amanuensis Tertius (Rom. xvi. 22.), and was forwarded to the Church at Rome by Phebe, a deaconess of Cenchrea, which was a port at Corinth, (Rom. xvi. 1.)

It is uncertain at what time the Church of Rome was planted. On the day of Pentecost there were "strangers of Rome, Jews and Proselytes," among the witnesses of the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost. It is probable, indeed we may say certain, that these persons would, on their return to Rome, relate both to the Jews, and to those of the Gentiles with whom they were acquainted, the wonderful events which had taken place. There were many thousands of Jews at Rome at this time. Josephus informs us (Antiq. Jud. lib. xviii. c. 12.), that their number amounted to eight thousand; and Dio Cassius (lib. xxxvii. c. 17.), that they had obtained the privilege of living there according to their own laws. There was also a continued intercourse between the Jews who remained in their own country and the Jews of the provinces. The tribute money to the temple was regularly paid by the latter, and the messengers, or apostles of the Sanhedrin, were as regularly sent from the former. The events which occupied the public attention of the Jewish nation, the memory of the miracles of Christ, his crucifixion, and asserted resurrection, with the subsequent firmness and working of miracles by his former followers, would have become familiar to a large proportion of the Jews and proselytes at Rome, and the manner in which the faith of the Romans is represented (Rom. i. 8.), as being celebrated over the whole world, as well as the mention of the various eminent members of the Church of Rome, prove to us also that the Gospel of Christ had been fully established among them, though it is uncertain by what means.

I have endeavoured to show in a former note the probability that St. Peter visited Rome about the time of the Herodian persecution, after he had escaped by miracle from his prison; and that he was attended by St. Mark. Many arguments concur also to prove that this Evangelist wrote his Gospel under the inspection of St. Peter, for the use of the newly-converted proselytes of the Romans. An opinion prevailed very generally among the Jews, that the Holy Land was to be the exclusive scene of the great events which should attend the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. Of all the apostles, St. Peter appears to have been most devotedly attached to the peculiar sentiments of his own people. It was with difficulty he could persuade himself, even when a vision from heaven commanded him to go to a Gentile, that it was his duty to visit Cornelius. Though he had preached the Gospel to the Samaritans at Lydda, and in the provinces of Judæa, the thought does not seem to have occurred to him, that the Gospel was to be preached out of Judæa to the Gentile nations. For these reasons I think we are justified in concluding, that, though he might have taken refuge in Rome, he did not preach there to the people, nor establish a Church. There certainly appears to be sufficient reason to believe that he went to Rome, but there is no proof whatever that he had at this time, at least, attempted to plant a Church. If he had done so, he would doubtless have imparted the gifts of the Holy Spirit, as he had already done when he went down to confirm the Samaritans, after the preaching of Philip: but St. Paul tells the Romans, that he longed to see them, that he might impart unto them some spiritual gift. That St. Peter had not planted the Church of Rome, is implied also in Rom. xv. 20., that St. Paul wished to confine his ministry to those places which had not been visited by other apostles. He wished, however, to see Rome, and we may conclude therefore that St. Peter had not established the Church in that city.

The design of this much-controverted Epistle is fully laid down in the sixteenth verse of the first chapter, in which the Apostle affirms the perfect efficacy of the Gospel to salvation, both to the Jew and Gentile. At the time the Epistle was written, the great controversy of the Church originated from an erroneous interpretation of the promise of God made to Abraham. The Jews supposed obedience to the moral Law of Moses, with the atonement and purifications of their ceremonial law, were a sufficient atonement and justification; and, as the chosen seed of Abraham, they considered themselves alone entitled to be heirs of the promises of God, and the benefits of the kingdom of the Messiah. These exclusive claims rendered them unwilling to receive the Gospel which maintained the inefficacy of their own Law, admitted the Gentiles to the same privileges with themselves, and declared that faith in the promises of God without circumcision was the condition of salvation. The object of the Apostle throughout the Epistle is evidently to confute these deep-rooted prejudices, and to convince the Jews that the Gospel of Christ, and not the Law of Moses, was the appointed means of salvation. These contests between the Jews and Christians were carried to such a height at Rome, that the contending parties were banished in the eleventh year of Claudius from the city, (Acts xviii. 2.) Among these were Aquila and Priscilla, who, coming to Corinth about the time that St. Paul first visited that place, and being of the same occupation with him, received him into their house. There is reason to suppose, therefore, that they made St. Paul acquainted with the disordered state of the Church at Rome, and that he addressed this Epistle to the Romans as soon as the Church was again reëstablished in that city, during his second visit to Corinth.

The Christians at Rome were divided into three classes,—the native Jews who resided there, and in all probability first preached the Gospel to their countrymen; the proselytes to the Jewish religion; and the idolatrous Gentiles, who had been converted to the faith of Christianity.

The unbelieving Romans, who were great admirers of the philosophy of the Greeks, considered the light of nature as a sufficient guide in all matters of religion. Many converted Jews joined the unbelieving Jews in affirming that the Law of Moses was more efficacious than the Gospel of Christ; while the Gentile converts, rejoicing in their freedom from the bondage of the Law, regarded their Jewish brethren as superstitious and bigoted: and to these various parties the Epistle seems to be addressed, as well as to the Church itself; to the Jew first, and then the Gentile.

Dr. Paley, with his usual perspicuity, has shown that the principal object of the argumentative part of the Epistle, is "to place the Gentile convert upon a parity of situation with the Jewish, in respect of his religious condition, and his rank in the Divine favor. The Epistle supports this point by a variety of arguments, such as that no man of either description was justified by the works of the Law, for this plain reason, that no man had performed them; and it became therefore necessary to appoint another medium, or condition of justification, in which new medium the Jewish peculiarity was merged and lost; that Abraham's own justification was antecedent to the Law, and independent of it; that the Jewish converts were to consider the Law as now dead, and themselves as married to another; that what the Law in truth could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God had done by sending his Son; that God had rejected the unbelieving Jews, and had substituted in their place a society of believers in Christ, collected indifferently from Jews and Gentiles." Therefore, in an Epistle directed to Roman believers, the point to be endeavoured after by St. Paul was, to reconcile the Jewish converts to the opinion that the Gentiles were admitted by God to a parity of religious situation with themselves, and that, without their being obliged to keep the Law of Moses. This Epistle, though directed to the Roman Church in general, is in truth a Jew writing to Jews: accordingly, as often as his argument leads him to say any thing derogatory from the Jewish institution, he constantly follows it by a softening clause. Having (chap. ii. 28, 29.) pronounced that "he is not a Jew which is one outwardly in the flesh; neither is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh," he adds immediately, "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there in circumcision? Much every way." Having in the third chapter, verse 28., brought his argument to this formal conclusion, "that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the Law," he presently subjoins (ver. 31.), "Do we then make void the Law through faith? God forbid! Yea, we establish the Law."

In the seventh chapter, when, in verse 6., he had advanced the bold assertion, that "now we are delivered from the Law, that being dead wherein we were held," in the next verse he comes in with this healing question, "What shall we say then? Is the Law sin? God forbid! Nay, I had not known sin but by the Law." Having in the following words more than insinuated the inefficacy of the Jewish Law (chap. viii. 3.), "for what the Law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh," after a digression indeed, but that sort of a digression which he could never resist, a rapturous contemplation of his Christian hope, and which occupies the latter part of this chapter; we find in the next, as if sensible that he had said something that would give offence, returning to his Jewish brethren in terms of the warmest affection and respect: "I say the truth in Christ, I lie not (my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost,) that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart; for I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the Law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came." When in the thirty-first and thirty-second verses of the ninth chapter, he represented to the Jews the error of even the best of their nation, by telling them that "Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, had not attained to the law of righteousness, because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the Law, for they stumbled at that stumbling-stone;" he takes care to annex to this declaration these conciliating expressions: "Brethren, my heart's desire, and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved; for I bear them record, that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." Lastly, having (chap. x. 20, 21.), by the application of a passage in Isaiah, insinuated the most ungrateful of all propositions to a Jewish ear, the rejection of the Jewish nation, as God's peculiar people, he hastens, as it were to qualify the intelligence of their fall by this interesting exposition: "I say, then, hath God cast away his people (i. e. wholly and entirely)? God forbid! for I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew;" and follows this thought throughout the whole of the eleventh chapter, in a series of reflections calculated to soothe the Jewish converts, as well as to procure from their Gentile brethren respect to the Jewish institutions.

We must be careful not to confine our views of St. Paul's argument in this Epistle to the narrow limits within which Taylor of Norwich, the Socinian writers in general, and the presumptuous reasoners of this school, have endeavoured to do. These men have rejected the very foundations of the Apostle's argument, the doctrines upon which Christianity rests, and without which the Scriptures are devoid of meaning,—the doctrines of the atonement of Christ, and the fall of man. Sander, indeed, still further degrades the Apostle's argument, by the supposition that St. Paul wished to substitute Christianity merely as a purer and more intelligible system of morals than the Law of Moses, but less burdensome, tedious, and unattractive.

Dr. Taylor's system is well described by the present Archbishop of Dublin to be a mere adaptation of Scripture phrases. The general principle of his theory is, that God, having rejected the Jews, has admitted all who believe in Christ into the same relation to himself which the Israelites once held; and the peculiar terms which he used to describe the condition and privileges of the Jews were used in the New Testament to describe the state and privileges of the Christian converts: whereas the terms, which are used in the Old Testament to describe the privileges of the Jews are to be interpreted with reference to their peculiar situation as the subjects of the visible theocracy. The same terms, when used in the Gospel, refer to the spiritual advantages conferred on Christians by the new covenant. The Law was the shadow or emblem; the Gospel is the accomplishment of the designs of God; and the same terms, when applied to the two covenants, will consequently have a different meaning. Dr. Taylor degrades the Christian, and elevates the Jewish scheme, by making, as an excellent critic has observed, "the Law the enduring dispensation, and the Gospel a mere dependency upon it."

In an excellent work by Mr. Mendham, entitled Clavis Apostolica, the argument of Dr. Taylor is well analyzed and refuted. I have not room here to enter into a large variety of curious and difficult matter, arising from the comments of various learned writers on this Epistle. The opinions of Bishop Bull on the defect of grace to the Jew under the Mosaic dispensation, the precise ideas which the Jews formed of the effects of their Law in procuring or assisting their justification, and many others require examination; and their more ample discussion would well repay the labor of the theological student. With respect to the analysis of this Epistle, which is now submitted to the reader, I may be permitted to say that it is the result of an anxious examination of the labors of my learned and respected tutor, Mr. Young, Doddridge, Scarlet, Dr. Taylor, and his followers, Mr. Belsham, Mr. Scott, and Whitby; and to the works of these writers, as well as to the Quarterly Review of Mr. Belsham On the Epistles, No. 59, I must refer the reader. The commentators and the various writers on this Epistle have exhausted the language of eulogy on its structure, argument, and language. Nothing need be added to these well-deserved praises. The Epistle is indeed a masterpiece of beautiful reasoning, surpassing all human wisdom; it evidently bears the stamp of divine inspiration; it enforces, in an irresistible manner, all the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, gradually unfolding, from the fall of our first parents, the great mysteries of redemption, and fully displaying the wisdom and goodness of God in his dispensations towards man. Every argument that the ingenuity of man could devise against the Gospel system, the Apostle himself advances in the person of the unbelieving Jew, and answers in the most satisfactory and convincing manner. Guided by divine inspiration, he has happily anticipated and removed every doubt and difficulty that can be raised to the truths of Revelation; he has communicated to man the hidden counsels of God; and, by a long and convincing train of argument, has fully demonstrated that the Gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation, and that there is no other means under heaven by which men can be saved.

NOTE 23.—PART XIII.

HAVING demonstrated that all mankind were subjected to sin and death by the sin of one man, the Apostle interrupts the analogy he is about to draw between Adam and Christ, for the purpose of establishing the doctrine of original sin. The Apostle proves this point, by affirming that death reigned from Adam to Moses, that is, before the promulgation of the Levitical law; that it reigned over those, who, not having received any promulgated law threatening temporal death, were not capable of sinning after the manner of Adam's transgression; that it was passed upon all, consequently upon infants and idiots, to whom sin could not be imputed, as they were without the power of comprehending the knowledge of law; therefore all mankind were necessarily subjected to death, not only for their own actual sin, but for the original sin and transgression of their first parents. St. Paul appears particularly desirous to prove this point, as it affords a strong additional argument for the claims of the Gentiles; "For if (as Mr. Young observes) the effects of Adam's transgression extended to all universally; surely we shall not dare to limit the effects of Christ's merits to a part of mankind only." Notes to the Sermon on Original Sin, p. 255. From the fall itself, sentence of death was passed on all mankind through the transgression of Adam; and the free gift of justification and life was restored through Christ. The plan of our redemption was coeval with, or rather was decreed before, the transgression of our first parents, and, like the evil which was then introduced, it extends to all, promoting the superior happiness of man, and the glory of God. By these irresistible arguments the Apostle still endeavoured to enforce on the minds of the Jews, that salvation was not confined to their Church and only obtained by the Mosaic Law, but that it was equally offered to all nations, through the obedience and righteousness of Jesus Christ.

NOTE 24.—PART XIII.

HERE the comparison of the Apostle is naturally preserved—the Greek word ἀπόβια signities the daily pay of a Roman soldier. The Greek word χαρίσμου, translated in this passage "a free gift," Estius thinks (as mentioned by Macknight) may be rendered "a donative," which the Roman generals voluntarily bestowed on their soldiers, as a mark of favor. Eternal death being the natural consequence or reward of sin—Eternal life not the natural reward of righteousness, but the free gift of God through Christ. The word ἐλευθερωθέντες, v. 18, denotes the act of giving liberty to a slave, called by the Romans emancipation.

NOTE 25.—PART XIII.

ONE of the objections of the opponents of Christianity may be removed, by considering the account of this miracle at Troas. It has been frequently said that the Evangelists published their Gospels some years after the events they relate had taken place; and if their narratives had been written at the time, or immediately after, their histories would have been more credible. The proof they require is afforded in this passage, and in the remainder of the book of the Acts. St. Luke speaks of himself as the companion of St. Paul. He was an eyewitness of the miraculous events he has recorded, and he wrote and published them in Asia, immediately after he had left St. Paul, among the very persons in whose presence this miracle had been wrought. St. Luke was probably present among the congregation when Eutychus was raised to life; an event which took place at Troas in 58. He heard the prophecy of Agabus, at Cæsarea, in the same year; he saw the miracle at Melita, two years after, in the year 60; he was with St. Paul during his two years' imprisonment at Rome, and he published his Gospel immediately after, in the year 63, in Asia. He could not have completed his narrative sooner. No avoidable delay whatever appears to have elapsed; the earliest possible invitation to the objectors and enemies of Christianity was made; and neither Jew nor Gentile, in spite of their prejudices or hatred against the Gospel, ventured to assert that the miracles he recorded were not true, or that the narrative itself was a forgery.

See, for the time of the publication of St. Luke's Gospel, Dr. Lardner's Supplement to his Credibility, vol. iii. p. 187, 188; and Horne.

NOTE 26.—PART XIII.

Two things are observable in this passage. The power or control of one Christian teacher over others is distinctly mentioned; and the general body of Christians over whom the several presbyters presided in their separate congregations, is called by the collective term "the Church." We infer, therefore, that the power over the Church at Ephesus did not rest with St. Peter, as the universal bishop; and, that several congregations unitedly form one Church, and this Church, as represented by its elders, submitted to the authority and influence of a teacher, who did not hold the pastoral charge over one congregation. Such are the precedents for church government given us in Scripture; and as the laws of God or man continue to possess their authority so long as the necessity continues which caused their first enactment; and the necessity of a government over the various societies of Christians in different nations is still great and evident, I am unable to discover on what account the precedents of Scripture, which are the laws of Christ and his apostles, are to be rejected at present. Some parts of Scripture direct our conduct as individuals; but God is the Lord of kingdoms, societies, and churches, as well as of individuals; and the happiness of communities, as well as of individuals, would as certainly be preserved by their obedience to the laws of our Saviour.

Dr. Hammond was of opinion that the apostles first appointed in every church bishops and deacons only, and that the bishops were to ordain presbyters for the several congregations, as might be required. This opinion, however, does not appear to be well founded. It is controverted by Whitby, and ridiculed by Scott. It must be observed here, that the persons for whom St. Paul sent to Miletus, are called, in verse 17., "elders," πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας; and in verse 28., "overseers," or "bishops," ἐμᾶς—ἐπίσκοπους: from whence it has been very naturally inferred, that the name bishop originally signified the same as presbyter. This cannot indeed be doubted; but all inferences deduced therefrom, which clash with other passages of Scripture, must be rejected. If we infer from this that there was no authority or superintendence in the churches, we contradict the evidence of Scripture, and of the primitive churches, as well as the testimony of our reason, which must convince us that every society must be governed by some laws, and their administrators. Identity of names by no means proves identity of office. This will be evident if we consider the manner in which the same epithets are given to the same persons in Scripture, where their offices, ranks, &c. are evidently distinct. Thus Christ is called (Isai. ix. 5.) שֶׁר־שָׁלוֹם, "Prince of Peace;" and Michael, who is by many supposed to be Christ, is called (Dan. xii. 1.) הַשֵּׁר הַגָּדוֹל; and yet the kings of Persia and Grecia are each of them called by the same name.

The same word is attributed to the captain of the host (1 Sam. xii. 9.); to the governor of a city (2 Chron. xviii. 25.); to the princes of the tribes (1 Chron. xxvii. 22.); to the chief of the Levites (1 Chron. xv. 16, 27.); to the governor of the sanctuary, (1 Chron. xxiv. 5.) So likewise the term ראש, a head or chief person, is spoken of God (2 Chron. xiii. 12.); of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 27.); of Jehoida, the high priest (2 Chron. xxiv. 6.); of other priests; of a chief man of a tribe; of a judge of Israel; of the chief door-keeper of the temple; of a chief captain. The same difference of meaning is to be found in the words najid, prince, and nasi, ruler or prelate. "By all which it appeareth evidently that the same term may be used of men, much differing in place and degree, and having an imparity in their callings."—See the last tract in the Bibliotheca Scriptorum of Dr. Hickes, p. 418. See also Bingham's Eccles. Antiq., and Archbishop Potter's Church Government; and others on the words presbyter, bishop, and elder.

NOTE 27.—PART XIII.

THE Alexandrine manuscript, and some others, read "the church of the Lord;" but Michaelis is clear, that Θεοῦ is the true reading, on the principle that the reading which might occasion a correction, is more probably right, than that which is likely to arise from one. Now, "his blood," that is, "the blood of God," is an extraordinary expression, if not in the real text; but had that been αυτου, it is inconceivable how any one should alter it into Θεοῦ.

Instead of which, there are several different readings: αυτου, χριστου, αυτου θεου, θεου και αυτου, αυτου και θεου: all of which seem to have been alterations on account of the difficulty of the true reading θεου, which gave occasion to such a wish to alter it. Michaelis, vol. i. c. vi. sect. xiii. p. 336, also "the Church of God," is a phrase very frequent in the New Testament, as 1 Cor. i. 2.; x. 32.; xi. 22.; xv. 9; 2 Cor. i. 1.; Gal. i. 13.; 1 Tim. iii. 5.; but the "Church of the Lord" is never found in it. Whitby ap. Elsley, vol. iii. p. 317. See the whole subject discussed at length in Kuinoel, Comment. in Lib. N. T. Hist. vol. iv. p. 678; and in Dr. Pye Smith's work on the Messiah.

NOTE 28.—PART XIII.

By the Spirit they apprized St. Paul of his danger, if he went up to Jerusalem.

NOTE 29.—PART XIII.

WITSIUS, in his Life of St. Paul, chap. x. has endeavoured to show the prudence, innocence, and wisdom of the Apostle's conduct on this occasion.

St. Paul was accused of having exhorted the Jews to forsake the Law of Moses, and forbidden them to circumcise their sons. In this charge there was a mixture of truth and falsehood—St. Paul did not exhort the Jews to forsake the substance of the Mosaic Law, nor did he expressly enjoin them to relinquish even the ceremonial part. But it must, however, be confessed, that in his arguments addressed to the Gentile converts, in which he describes the rites and ceremonies of the Law as mere shadows of better things to come, the inference might fairly be drawn, that he did not consider these rites and ceremonies as any longer binding to the Jews themselves.

Why, then, did the apostles at Jerusalem, who knew all this as well as St. Paul, entreat him to purify himself, shave his head, and bind himself by a vow? Why did St. Paul himself comply with their request? A modern scholar, of considerable literary attainments, but whose name Witsius does not mention, so strongly felt the difficulty attending this question, that he was induced to doubt, in toto, the divine authority of the Christian religion.

Witsius, however, is of opinion, that the conduct of the elders on this occasion, as well as that of St. Paul himself, was fully justified by existing circumstances. The great mass of the Jews were at that time so bigoted in favor of the ceremonial Law, that the full light of the Gospel was too strong for their eyes to bear at once. The temple was standing, and they were daily spectators of the sacrifices there offered up. St. Paul, whose maxim it was to "become all things to gain all men," adopted a prudent but innocent artifice—this was a fit occasion for employing the wisdom of the serpent.

Gilpin, Paley, and others, have blamed James and the presbytery of Jerusalem, for giving this advice, and St. Paul for following it; as sacrificing the truth of the Gospel to the prejudices of the Jewish zealots: for why, say they, should St. Paul offer propitiatory sacrifices (as in this case, Num. vi. 14.), inasmuch as by respecting the type he showed disrespect to the antitype, Christ? This surely was not an indifferent matter, and his submitting thereto savoured of unjustifiable compliance, and a temporizing spirit. But this censure seems to be unfounded, for—1. The apostles had no scruple of conscience in conforming to the Jewish rites. St. Paul celebrated the feast of Pentecost now, and the Passover at his fourth visit to Jerusalem, (Acts xviii. 21.) And yet this highest Jewish rite was virtually superseded, when "Christ our Passover" was sacrificed on the cross, according to St. Paul's own doctrine, (1 Cor. v. 7, 8.) And the apostolic decree did not prohibit the Jewish ritual to the zealots; it only exempted the Gentile Christians from it, as unnecessary to salvation.

2. The doctrine of St. Paul was perfectly conformable to the apostolic decree, and to the Gospel; he maintained the insufficiency of all rites, whether of the "circumcision" or the "uncircumcision;" whether of Jews or Christians, without a "new creation," or regeneration of the inward man; without an operative "faith" in Christ, "productive of love" to man (Gal. v. 6. and vi. 15.) without "circumcision" of the heart in spirit, not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, "but of God," (Rom. ii. 28, 29.)

3. Were not the apostles and St. Paul, on that occasion, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit?

See Witsius, De Vitâ Pauli, cap. x.—Melet. Leiden. p. 109, &c. and Hales's Analysis of Chronol. vol. ii. p. 1242.

NOTE 30.—PART XIII.

It has been a question much agitated among the learned, how St. Paul's ancestor became free of the city of Rome? St. Paul saying, in his answer to Lysias, "But I was free born," Acts xxii. 28. Vid. Gron. not. ad Joseph. p. 41-46. Never, certainly, was there a dispute more needless, since it is so very plain from many unquestionable authorities, that the freedom of the city of Rome was attainable by foreigners in various ways. By merit: thus two whole cohorts of Cameritians; thus Heracliensium Legio, and many others, mentioned by Tully, pro Balbo, c. 22. By favor: thus the cohort garrisoned at Trapezus, spoken of by Tacitus, Hist. l. 3. c. 47; thus Alaudarum Legio, so often mentioned by Cicero, Suet. Jul. 24. 2. Nothing is more certain, than that the Jews assisted Julius Cæsar with their forces, Jos. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 8. § 1, 2, 3, which he also very gratefully acknowledges. Ibid. c. x. § 2, 7. The like they did by Mark Antony, ibid. c. 15. § 8. Can it be supposed that many of them did not at that time, either by merit or favor, procure the freedom of the city of Rome? or was it Antipater alone who had that honor conferred on him? Ibid. c. 8. § 3. By money: as in the instance of the centurion. Hence, probably, it is that we read of so many Jews free of the city of Rome, who dwelt in Greece and Asia. Ibid. c. x. § 13, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19. By being freed from servitude: very great numbers became citizens this way, through the covetousness or vainglory of their masters, as well as from their own merit. Vid. Dionys. Halic. Ant. Rom. l. iv. c. 24. Suet. Aug. c. xlii. n. 3. That multitudes of the Jews, in particular, became free this way appears from Tiberius enlisting four thousand freed Jews at one time, and sending them to Sardinia. Compare Suet. Tib. c. xxxvi. n. 2. Tacitus, l. 2. c. lxxxv. n. 4. Jos. Antiq. l. 18. c. iii. § 5.

It has been generally believed, however, that the inhabitants of Tarsus, born in that city, had the same rights and privileges as Roman citizens, in consequence of a charter or grant from Julius Cæsar. Calmet disputes this, because Tarsus was a free, not a colonial city; and he supposes that St. Paul's father might have been rewarded with the freedom of Rome for some military service: and that it was in consequence of this that St. Paul was born free. But that the city of Tarsus had such privileges appears extremely probable. In chap. xxi. 39., Paul says, he was born at Tarsus in Cilicia; and in this chap. ver. 28, he says, "he was free-born;" and at ver. 25, he calls himself a Roman; as he does also chap. xvi. 37. From whence it has been reasonably concluded that Tarsus, though no Roman colony, had this privilege granted to it, that its natives should be citizens of Rome. Pliny, in Hist. Nat. lib. v. 27, tells us, that Tarsus was a free city. And Appian, De Bello Civil. lib. v. p. 1077, ed. Tollii, says that Antony made the people of Tarsus free, and discharged them from paying tribute. Dio Cassius, lib. xlvii. p. 508, edit. Reimar, further tells us, "Adeo Cæsari priori, et ejus gratia etiam posteriori, favebant Tarsenses, ut urbem suam pro Tarso Juliopolin vocaverint." Philo, De Virt. vol. ii. p. 587, edit. Mang. makes Agrippa say to Caligula, "You have made whole countries, to which your friends belong, to be citizens of Rome." These testimonies are of weight sufficient to show that St. Paul, by being born at Tarsus, might have been free-born, and a Roman.—See Biscoe On the Acts, Bishop Pearce on Acts xvi. 37., Dr. A. Clarke, and others.

NOTE 31.—PART XIII.

ON ST. PAUL'S DECLARATION THAT HE WAS IGNORANT THAT ANANIAS WAS HIGH PRIEST.

ST. PAUL's ignorance that Ananias was high priest, has presented some difficulty, and occasioned much discussion. The former modes of considering the subject are given by the learned Witsius^a. How, it is demanded, could Paul be mistaken in the person of a man so exalted in rank as the high priest? And, if he was mistaken, can his excuse be considered as sufficient? The Jews were forbidden to revile their ruler; were they therefore permitted to revile the rest of their countrymen? In reply to this, some explain the words, "not to know,"

as equivalent to "not to acknowledge." I do not acknowledge him for high priest—our Great High Priest is Jesus Christ: him only can I allow as such. This, however, does not appear satisfactory to Witsius, and he proposes two elucidations, leaving his reader to choose between them:—

1st. It is very possible that St. Paul was not acquainted with the person of the high priest. For St. Paul had been for some time absent from Judæa; and the office of high priest being completely at the disposal of the Roman governor, changes were very frequent; so much so, that, as Josephus informs us, there had been three high priests in the course of one year. It may further be observed, that Ananias did not wear his pontifical robes, which were worn only in the temple.

2dly. We may suppose that St. Paul was not mistaken in the person of the high priest, but happening to have his eyes turned another way when the command was given, he was not aware from whom the expression proceeded, but attributed it to some other member of the Sanhedrin seated with the high priest upon the bench. Le Clerc, and the most learned of the English interpreters, incline to this explanation. But what can justify the harshness of Paul's reply (v. 3.), supposing it addressed to any indifferent individual? It is answered, that Paul's words amount to a prophetic denunciation, and not an imprecation—Τύπτειν σὲ μέλλει. This was proved in the event; for, as Grotius observes, Ismael Phabi succeeded to the high priesthood soon after; whether on account of the death or the removal of Ananias is uncertain.

Michaelis^b has solved the difficulty, however, in a very satisfactory manner. On this passage it has been asked, 1. Who was this Ananias? 2. How can it be reconciled with chronology, that Ananias was at that time called the high priest, when it is certain, from Josephus, that the time of his holding that office was much earlier? And 3. How happened it that Paul said, "I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest," since the external marks of office must have determined whether he were or not? "On all these subjects," says Michaelis, "is thrown the fullest light, as soon as we examine the special history of that period; a light which is not confined to the present, but extends itself to the following chapters, insomuch that it cannot be doubted that this book was written, not after the destruction of Jerusalem, but by a person who was contemporary to the events which are there related."

Ananias, the son of Nebedeni, was high priest at the time that Helena, queen of Abiadene, supplied the Jews with corn from Egypt, during the famine which took place in the fourth year of Claudius, mentioned in the eleventh chapter of the Acts. St. Paul, therefore, who took a journey to Jerusalem at that period, could not have been ignorant of the elevation of Ananias to that dignity. Soon after the holding of the first council, as it is called, at Jerusalem, Ananias was dispossessed of his office, in consequence of certain acts of violence between the Samaritans and the Jews, and sent prisoner to Rome, whence he was afterwards released, and returned to Jerusalem. Now from that period he could not be called high priest, in the proper sense of the word, though Josephus has sometimes given him the title of ἀρχιερεὺς, taken in the more extensive meaning of a priest, who had a seat and voice in the Sanhedrin; and Jonathan, though we are not acquainted with the circumstances of his elevation, had been raised in the mean time to the supreme dignity of the Jewish Church. Between the death of Jonathan, who was murdered by order of Felix, and the high priesthood of Ismael, who was invested with that office by Agrippa, elapsed an interval in which this dignity continued vacant. Now it happened precisely in this interval that St. Paul was apprehended in Jerusalem; and the Sanhedrin, being destitute of a president, he undertook of his own authority the discharge of that office which he executed with the greatest tyranny. It is possible, therefore, that St. Paul, who had been only a few days in Jerusalem, might be ignorant that Ananias, who had been dispossessed of the priesthood, had taken upon himself a trust to which he was not entitled; he might therefore very naturally exclaim, "I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest." Admitting him, on the other hand, to have been acquainted with the fact, the expression must be considered as an indirect reproof, and a tacit refusal to recognise usurped authority.

A passage, then, which has hitherto been involved in obscurity, is brought by this relation into the clearest light; and the whole history of St. Paul's imprisonment, the conspiracy of the fifty Jews, with the consent of the Sanhedrin, their petition to Festus to send him from Cæsarea, with an intent to murder him on the road, are facts which correspond to the character of the times, as described by Josephus, who mentions the principal persons recorded in the Acts, and paints their profligacy in colors even stronger than those of St. Luke.

NOTE 32.—PART XIII.

It is probable these conspirators laid themselves under all the curses that were usually denounced in an excommunication. It was usual among the Jews, for private persons to excommunicate both themselves and others^c. From their perverted oral tradition, they made it a rule that a private person might kill any one who had forsaken the Law of Moses, of which crime St. Paul was accused. They therefore applied to the Jewish magistrates, who were chiefly of the sect of the Sadducees, and St. Paul's bitterest enemies, for their connivance and support (v. 14.), who gladly aided and abetted this manner of taking away his life, and, on its failure, determined themselves afterwards to make a similar attempt, (Acts xxv. 3.) Their vows of not eating and drinking were as easy to loose as to bind; according to Lightfoot (vol. ii. p. 703), any of their rabbies or wise men could absolve them.

^b Michaelis, vol. i. p. 51–54. Horne, i. 116–118.

NOTE 33.—PART XIII.

WE learn from this epithet, that the word Nazarene was applied to the Christians as a term of contempt in the time of the Apostles. Tertullus evidently meant the Christians in general, who being followers of the despised Nazarene, probably obtained this appellation from the very first. It does not, however, appear that this name was assumed by the Christians themselves. They were called among themselves "the Brethren," "They of the Faith," and "the Faith," till at length, when they became more numerous, and received a large accession of converts from the Gentiles, Christian became the general name; and the Hebrew Christians, who still perhaps bore the name of Nazarenes among the Jews, were distinguished among Christians by the names of "the Hebrews," and "They of the Circumcision." If this epithet was generally applied to the early Christians by their enemies, it is not necessary to prove that the Nazarenes, to whom Tertullus alluded, were believers in the Divinity of our Lord, and in those doctrines which are now embodied in the formularies and creeds of the Church.

Long after the death of the apostles we read of a class of religionists who were called Nazarenes; who blended in their ecclesiastical regimen the Jewish rites and Christian precepts, and maintained various opinions respecting the person of Christ, which are defensible neither from the Scriptures, nor the decisions of the primitive Church. Dr. Priestley attempted to prove that these Nazarenes, and another sect, the Ebionites, who likewise advocated erroneous notions on this important subject, were the same; and that they were the remnant of the Church at Jerusalem, maintaining, in depression and neglect, the pristine faith in its ancient purity. Bishop Horsley, on the contrary, asserted, and made his assertion good by the best remaining evidence, that the name of Nazarene was never heard of among Christians themselves, as descriptive of a sect, before the final destruction of Jerusalem by Adrian; when it became the specific name of the Judaizers, who at that time separated from the Church of Jerusalem, and settled in the north of Galilee. The name was taken from the country in which they settled; but it seems to have been given in contempt, and not without allusion to the earlier application of it by the Jews, to the Christians in general. The object of this epithet was to stigmatize these Nazarenes as mere Judaizers, who endeavoured to retain the Jewish observances, while they professed Christianity, and thus to degrade and corrupt the Gospel. The Hebrew Christians, properly so named, left Jerusalem during the siege, and retired to Pella, whence they afterwards removed and settled at Ælia. Neither were the Nazarenes the same as the Ebionites; as Epiphanius, Mosheim, and others, speak of them as separate communities.

Such are the opposite statements of these controversialists; and the result of their discussion has given another proof to the world, that the Unitarian opinions are as utterly unsupported by antiquity as they are by Scripture; and that the common vulgar Christianity of the system rightly called orthodox, and which is in vain endeavoured to be used as a term of contempt, is the one, true, and ancient faith, upon which the hopes of a Christian must be founded. The Divinity and Atonement of Christ are the unchangeable basis of the Christian's confidence that his repentance is accepted by his Creator.— See Horsley's Letters to Priestley, pp. 174–180, &c. and Bingham's Eccles. Antiq. 8vo. edit. vol. i. p. 13, lib. i. cap. 2. § 1. See also Semler ap. Archbishop Laurence's work On the Logos of St. John, p. 76.

NOTE 34.—PART XIII.

THERE are two modes of arranging the construction of this verse. Either, "When Felix heard these things he deferred them, and said, that after he had acquired a more perfect knowledge of that way, and Lysias being come, he would take full cognizance of the business;" or, "When he heard these things, having," &c. as in our translation. Beza and Grotius state, that Felix had two points, the one of law, the other of fact, to determine. The first was, whether the new sect of the Nazarenes was against the Law of Moses; the other, whether Paul was raising a tumult. On the first, the learned were to be consulted; on the other, Lysias was the most conclusive witness. Hence delay was entirely proper. Whitby cannot allow that the text will bear this construction, and holds with the English version, that Felix had already gained a knowledge of the Christian way by his residence at Cæsarea, where Cornelius was converted, and Philip the deacon, and many disciples resided, chap. xxi. 8, 16. Elsley, vol. iii. p. 330.

^c Selden, De Jure Nat. l. iv. c. 7 and 8, pp. 472 and 478; and De Syned. l. i. c. 7. p. 820, fin. 830 and 857. Biscoe, 278, vol. i.

NOTE 35.—PART XIII.

FOR the probable date of Felix's recal to Rome, see the remarks on Section ii. Part XV.

NOTE 36.—PART XIII.

A FREEMAN of Rome, who had been tried for a crime, and sentence passed on him, had a right to appeal to the emperor, if he conceived the sentence to be unjust; but, even before the sentence was pronounced, he had the privilege of an appeal in criminal cases, if he conceived that the judge was doing any thing contrary to the laws. Ante sententiam appellari potest in criminali negotio, si iudex contra leges hoc faciat.

An appeal to the emperor was highly respected. The Julian law condemned those magistrates, and others, having authority, as violators of the public peace, who had put to death, tortured, scourged, imprisoned, or condemned any Roman citizen who had appealed to Cæsar. Lege Juliæ de vi publicâ damnatur, qui aliquâ potestate præditus, Civem Romanum ad Imperatorem appellentem necarit, necarive jusserit, torserit, verberaverit, condemnaverit, in publica vincula duci jusserit.

This law was so very sacred and imperative, that, in the persecution under Trajan, Pliny would not attempt to put to death Roman citizens who were proved to have turned Christians; hence, in his letter to Trajan, lib. x. Ep. 97, he says, "Fuerunt alii similis amentię, quos, quia cives Romani erant, annotavi in urbem remittendos." "There were others guilty of similar folly, whom, finding them to be Roman citizens, I have determined to send to the city." Very likely these had appealed to Cæsar.—See Grotius ap. Dr. Clarke, and Bishop Pearce.

NOTE 37.—PART XIII.

ST. LUKE here relates that, "when St. Paul was sent from Cæsarea to Rome, he was with the other prisoners committed to the care of Julius, an officer of the Augustan cohort," that is, a Roman cohort, which had the honor of bearing the name of the emperor. Now it appears from the account which Josephus has given in his second book on the Jewish war^d, that when Felix was procurator of Judæa, the Roman garrison at Cæsarea was chiefly composed of soldiers who were natives of Syria. But it also appears, as well from the same book^e, as from the twentieth book of his Antiquities^f, that a small body of Roman soldiers was stationed there at the same time, and that this body of Roman soldiers was dignified with the title of ΣΕΒΑΣΤΗ, or Augustan, the same Greek word being employed by Josephus, as by the author of the Acts of the Apostles. This select body of Roman soldiers had been employed by Cumanus, who immediately preceded Felix in the procuratorship of Judæa, for the purpose of quelling an insurrection. And when Festus, who succeeded Felix, had occasion to send prisoners from Cæsarea to Rome, he would of course entrust them to the care of an officer belonging to this select corps. Even here then we have a coincidence, which is worthy of notice—a coincidence which we should never have discovered, without consulting the writings of Josephus. But that which is most worthy of notice is the circumstance, that this select body of soldiers bore the title of Augustan. This title was known of course to St. Luke, who accompanied St. Paul from Cæsarea to Rome. But that, in the time of the Emperor Nero, the garrison of Cæsarea, which consisted chiefly of Syrian soldiers, contained also a small body of Roman soldiers, and that they were dignified by the epithet Augustan, are circumstances so minute, that no impostor of a later age would have known them. And they prove incontestibly, that the Acts of the Apostles could have been written only by a person in the situation of St. Luke.

NOTE 1.—PART XIV.

ARISTARCHUS is mentioned, Col. iv. 10., as St. Paul's fellow-prisoner; and in Philemon 24, as his fellow-laborer. No records remain to enable us to elucidate his history

NOTE 2.—PART XIV.

FOR a very curious and interesting account of the ships of Alexandria, and the trade in corn between that place and Puteoli, see Bryant's treatise on the Euroclydon, Analysis of Mythology, vol. v. p. 343, 349; and Hasæus' treatise in the Critici Sacri, De Navius Alexandrinis, vol. xiii. p. 717, &c.

NOTE 3.—PART XIV.

THERE is some obscurity in this expression. Commentators are divided, whether the wind arose against the island or the ship. By the words κατ' αὐτῆς, Boisius and Wolfius understand πρὸς αὐτήν, "the ship." Boltenius refers it to τὸ πλοῖον, ver. 10., and thinks that αὐτῆς is put for αὐτοῦ. Kuinoel is of opinion that the island is referred to.

Schleusner on this passage (voc. βάλλω) interprets the words κατ' αὐτῆς to mean the ship. It seems, however, evident that the island is meant, from the grammatical construction, and that it refers to τὴν Κρήτην, in the preceding line. Our translation points, though rather obscurely, to the same meaning ("There arose against it"), which is rather more clearly expressed in the Rheims translation, ("A tempestuous wind, called Euro-Aquilo, drove against it"), and the Vulgate ("Misit se contra ipsam, Cretam, scilicet, ventus typhonicus"), and Castalio's version ("In eam procellosus ventus impetit"), agree in the same manner.

This acceptance of the signification of this passage contradicts the idea that the wind Euroclydon blew from a northerly quarter, as it must in such case have driven the vessel from the island, and not towards it, as it appears to have done. The course of the wind from the south-east would impel the ship towards the island of Crete, though not so directly but that they might weather it, as they in fact did, and got clear, though it appears that they incurred some risk of being wrecked, when running under, or to the south of the island of Clauda, or Gaudos, which lies opposite to the port of Phenice, the place where they proposed to winter. See Kuinoel, Comm. in Lib. Hist. N. T. in loc. the Dissertation on St. Paul's Voyage.—Ap. Class. Journ. No. 38, p. 202, and Bryant. Wolfius quotes at length the passage in Boisius, referred to by Kuinoel.

NOTE 4.—PART XIV.

ON THE WIND CALLED EUROCLYDON.

THIS wind is generally supposed to be that tempestuous and uncertain wind which blows from all directions, and is called a Levanter. "The Euroclydon," says Dr. Shaw, "seems to have varied very little from the true east point; for, as the ship could not bear up, ἀντοφθαλμεῖν, loof up, against it, ver. 15., but they were obliged to let her drive, we cannot conceive, as there are no remarkable currents in that part of the sea, and as the rudder could be of little use, that it could take any other course than as the wind directed it. Accordingly, in the description of the storm, we find that the vessel was first of all under the island of Clauda, ver. 16., which is a little to the southward of the parallel of that part of the coast of Crete, from whence it may be supposed to have been driven; then it was tossed along the bottom of the gulph of Adria, ver. 27., and afterwards broken to pieces, ver. 41., at Melita, which is a little to the northward of the parallel above mentioned; so that the direction and course of this particular Euroclydon seems to have been first at east by north, and afterwards pretty nearly east by south."

The learned Jacob Bryant^a examines at great length the decision of Dr. Bentley, who endeavoured to prove that the Euroclydon was the same as Euro-Aquilo in the Vulgate; and, though it is not found in any table of the winds among either the Greek or Roman writers, nor in the temple of the winds of Andronicus Cyrrhestes at Athens, that it corresponded to the wind Cæcias, Κακίας. Mr. Byrant contends there was no such wind as Euro-Aquilo. An anonymous writer, No. 38, of the Class. Journ., has drawn up the argument in a very satisfactory manner.

^a Bryant's Analysis of Mythology, vol. v. p. 330–341; Shaw's Travels, 4to. edit. p. 329; edit. 2. p. 331. Dissertation on St. Paul's Voyage, &c. No. 38, of the Class. Journ. Etym. Μ. τυφὼν γὰρ ἔστιν ἡ τοῦ ἀνέμου σφόδρα πρὸς, ὅς καὶ εὐροκλίδων καλεῖται, and Hesychius τυφὼν ὁ αἰγρεῖς ἄνεμος. The Alexandrian MS. and the Vulgate read for εὐροκλίδων—εὐρακίλων, Euro-Aquilo, ap. Kuinoel.

The Latin Vulgate translation, that of Castalio, and some others, render the word Euroclydon, by Euro-Aquilo, a word found no where else, and inconsistent in its construction with the principles on which the names of the intermediate or compound winds are framed. Euro-notus is so called, as intervening between Euro and Notus, and as partaking, as was thought, of the qualities of both. The same holds true of Libo-notus, as being interposed between Libs and Notus. Both these compound winds lie in the same quarter, or quadrant of the circle, with the winds of which they were composed; and no other wind intervenes. But Euros and Aquilo are at ninety degrees distance from each other; or, according to some writers, at fifteen degrees more, or at 105 degrees; the former lying in the south-east quarter, and the latter in the north-east; and two winds, one of which is the east cardinal point, intervene, as Cæcias and Subsolanus. The Carbas of Vitruvius occupies the middle point between Eurus and Aquilo, in his scheme of the winds; but this never had, nor could have, the appellation of Euro-Aquilo, as it lies in a different quarter, and the east point is interposed, which could scarcely have been overlooked in the framing of a compound appellation. The word Euroclydon is evidently composed of Eurus, or Εὐρος, the south-east wind, and κλύδων, a wave, an addition highly expressive of the character and effects of this wind, but, probably, chiefly applied to it when it became typhonic or tempestuous. Indeed the general character under which Eurus is described, agrees perfectly with the description of the effects of the wind which caused the distress related in the account of this voyage.

NOTE 5.—PART XIV.

THE island on which St. Paul was shipwrecked was in Adria. Kuinoel, and the commentators who adopt the general opinion, that St. Paul was wrecked at the African Malta, interpret Adria, in a very wide sense, of the sea between Greece, Italy, and Africa, in such manner, that the Ionic, Cretic, and Sicilian seas, are comprehended under that appellation. Bryant, in his dissertation above referred to, limits the application of the word to the waters of the gulf, still called the Adriatic.

The Adriatic Sea in early ages comprehended only the upper part of the Sinus Ionicus, where was a city and a river, both called Adria, from one of which it took its name. It afterwards was advanced deeper in the gulf; but never so engrossed it as to lose its original name. It was called for many ages promiscuously, the Adriatic and Ionian Gulf. Thucydides (lib. i.), Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. lib. viii. cap. x.), and Polybius (lib. ii. p. 102, edit. Casaub. Par. 1609), confirm Mr. Bryant's opinion. Polybius informs us, that the Ionian Gulf reached south to the promontory of Corinthus, in Bruttia, where was the commencement of the Sicilian Sea; but even this, which was the remotest point south of the Adriatic, was never supposed to extend as far as Malta in the Mediterranean.

Strabo says expressly, that the Adriatic Sea is bounded by Panormus, and a port of Crisior, and by the Ceraunian mountains, which lie in about forty degrees north latitude, and upwards of four degrees to the north of Malta; and in another place, that the Ceraunian mountains, and the Promontorium Japygium form the boundary or mouth of the Ionian Sea (book vi. p. 405, Oxf. edit.)

And Ptolemy, so far from accounting Malta to be an island of the Adriatic Sea, reckons it to be a part of Africa; and Pomponius Mela inclines to the same arrangement: the latter writer speaks of Coreyra, which is in latitude 39° 30' north, (nearly half a degree to the south of the Ceraunian mountains,) as being situated in the neighbourhood (vicina), not in the Adriatic Sea; so that he probably meant to assign the same limits with Strabo.

NOTE 7.—PART XIV.

Διθάλασσος is properly (says Bochart) an isthmus, or a narrow strait between two seas; but it here seems to mean (says Kuinoel) an oblong drift or heap of sand, a sand-bank. Mr. Bryant, however, objects to this interpretation.

The τόπος διθάλασσος (says Bryant) is nothing else but the natural barrier of a harbour; where this is wanting, they make an artificial one, called a mole, or pier; otherwise there can be no security for shipping, the harbour being little better than a road without it. Such a barrier or headland was here, which they endeavoured to get round, and failed. This may be learned from the context—Περιπεσόντες δὲ εἰς τόπον διθάλασσον, ἐπώκειλαν τὴν ναῦν: where the word ἐκπεσόντες was before: it signifies falling upon a place in taking a round or circuit. The mariners saw a bay, into which they had a mind to run their ship; but they met with a small promontory, that projected and formed the entrance into the bay, and which was washed on each side by the sea. This impeded them, and in endeavouring to get round it, their ship struck and stood fast. Mr. Bryant confirms this interpretation of the word by the authority of Chrysostom. See Kuinoel in loc., and Bryant's Dissertation, p. 397.

NOTE 8.—PART XIV.

ON THE ISLAND OF MELITA.

MANY commentators have been of opinion that St. Paul was wrecked at Meleda or Melite, in the Adriatic, and not at Malta, in the Mediterranean. Kuinoel mentions Rhoer as the principal continental divine who has defended this opinion. The most celebrated treatise, however, with which we are acquainted, is that of Mr. Bryant, who has defended this opinion at great length, with all his usual learning, and more than his usual judgment; and in the general opinion, I believe, has been supposed to have established his position. I shall again refer to the summary of his arguments, and the just remarks of the anonymous writer I have before referred to, on this subject.

I am of opinion, he observes, that the island Meleda, last mentioned, is the one here alluded to. My reasons are as follow:—"The island of Meleda lies confessedly in the Adriatic Sea, which situation cannot, without much strain on the expression, be ascribed to the island of Malta, as I have before shown (Note 5.) Meleda lies nearer the mouth of the Adriatic than any other island of that sea, and would of course be more likely to receive the wreck of any vessel that should be driven by tempests towards that quarter. Meleda lies nearly N. W. by N. of the south-west promontory of Crete, and of course nearly in the direction of a storm from the south-east quarter. The manner in which Melita is described by St. Luke agrees with the idea of an obscure place, but not with the celebrity of Malta at that time. Cicero speaks of Melita (Malta) as abounding in curiosities and riches, and possessing a remarkable manufacture of the finest linen. The temple of Juno there, which had been preserved inviolate by both the contending parties in the Punic wars, possessed great stores of ivory ornaments, particularly figures of Victory—antiquo opere et summa arte perfectæ."

"Malta," says Diodorus Siculus, "is furnished with many and very good harbours, and the inhabitants are very rich, for it is full of all sorts of artificers, among whom there are excellent weavers of fine linen. Their houses are very stately and beautifully adorned. The inhabitants are a colony of Phœnicians, who, trading as merchants as far as the Western Ocean, resorted to this place on account of its commodious ports and convenient situation for a sea trade; and by the advantages of this place, the inhabitants presently became famous both for their wealth and merchandise."

It is difficult to suppose that a place of this description could be meant by such an expression, as of an island called "Melita;" nor could the inhabitants, with any propriety of speech, be understood by the epithet "barbarous."

But the Adriatic Melite perfectly corresponds with that description. Though too obscure and insignificant to be particularly noticed by the ancient geographers, the opposite and neighbouring coast of Illyricum is represented by Strabo as perfectly corresponding with the expression of St. Paul.

The circumstance of the viper or poisonous snake that fastened on St. Paul's hand merits consideration.

Father Giorgi, an ecclesiastic of Melite Adriatica, who has written on this subject, suggests very properly, that as there are now no serpents in Malta, and as it should seem were none in the time of Pliny, there never were any there, the country being dry and rocky, and not affording shelter or proper nourishment for animals of that description. But Meleda abounds with those reptiles, being woody and damp, and favorable to their way of life and propagation. The disease with which the father of Publius was afflicted (dysentery, combined with fever, probably intermittent) affords a presumptive evidence of the nature of the island.

Such a place as Melite Africana (Malta), dry and rocky, and remarkably healthy, was not likely to produce such a disease, which is almost peculiar to moist situations and stagnant waters; but might well suit a country woody and damp, and probably for want of draining, exposed to the putrid effluvia of confined moisture.

The following are the principal objections, with their answers, to Mr. Bryant's and Rhoer's hypothesis: 1. Tradition has unvaryingly asserted this as the place of the Apostle's shipwreck.—The tradition cannot be traced to the time of the wreck. 2. The island in the Venetian Gulf, in favor of which Mr. Bryant so learnedly contends, is totally out of the track in which the Euroclydon must have driven the vessel.—The contrary has been shown, (see Note 4.) 3. It is said, in verse 11. of this chapter, that another ship of Alexandria, bound, as we must suppose, for Italy, and very probably carrying wheat thither, as St. Paul's vessel did (chap. xxvii. 38.), had been driven out of its course.—The same Levanter which drove one from its course, might have driven the other also. 4. In St. Paul's voyage to Italy from Melita, on board the Alexandrian ship that had wintered there, he and his companions landed at Syracuse (ver. 12, 13.), and from thence went to Rhegium. But if it had been the Illyrian Melita, the proper course of the ship would have been first, to Rhegium, before it reached Syracuse at all; whereas, in a voyage from the present Malta to Italy, it was necessary to reach Syracuse in Sicily, before the ship could arrive at Rhegium, in Italy. This is the strongest argument; but see Note 11.

The learned Dr. Gray, author of the invaluable Key to the Old Testament, in his work on the connection between the sacred writings and the literature of Jewish and heathen authors, favors the opinion of Mr. Bryant, and confirms its probability by a similar incident in the life of Josephus, who was wrecked on his way to Rome, in the Adriatic Sea, in the same year with St. Paul.

"The account in the life of Josephus," says Dr. Gray, "written by himself, appears to relate to this voyage, and seems to prove that Josephus was a companion in a part of it with St. Paul. There are, indeed, difficulties which interfere with this opinion, which, as the subject is of some moment, may be proposed for critical investigation."

The relation is as follows:—"After the twenty-sixth year of my age, it happened that I went up to Rome on the occasion that I shall now mention. At the time when Felix was procurator of Judæa, there were certain priests of my acquaintance, good and worthy persons, whom on a small and trifling occasion he had put into bonds, and sent to Rome to plead their cause before Cæsar. For these I was desirous to procure deliverance, and that especially because I was informed that they were not unmindful of piety towards God, even under their afflictions, but supported themselves with figs and nuts: accordingly I came to Rome, though it was often through great hazards by sea, for our ship being wrecked in the midst of the Adriatic Sea, we that were in it, being about six hundred in number, swam for our lives all the night, when, upon the first appearance of the day, a ship of Cyrene appearing to us, by the providence of God, I and some others, eighty in all, preventing the rest, were taken up into the ship: and when I had thus escaped and come to Puteoli, I became acquainted with Aliturus, an actor of plays, a Jew by birth, and much beloved by Nero, and through his interest became known to Poppea, Cæsar's wife, and took care, as soon as possible, to entreat her to procure that the priests might be set at liberty."

"The dates," says this learned writer, "might be shown so far to correspond, that there would be no objection from this source. It is not improbable that Josephus, who was of sacerdotal descent, and brought up in the strict profession of the Pharisaic opinions, should have felt an interest in the welfare of St. Paul, who was a Pharisee, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and who might be called a priest, as he was a doctor of the law, and assumed the character of a preacher of righteousness. What Josephus says of Felix having, as procurator of Judæa, sent the persons spoken of to Rome, may be inaccurately stated, or may relate to some order first given by Felix to this effect, but the execution of which was delayed by the change of governors. This would accord with the account of St. Luke, and would not be inconsistent with what is further stated by him, that St. Paul was detained two years in confinement, and that Festus, not long after his arrival to take possession of the government, examined Paul at Cæsarea; and after having again heard his defence in presence of Agrippa, directed him to be conveyed to Rome. Josephus, then speaking of the imprisonment and sending of St. Paul to Rome, ascribes both the measures to their first author, whose unpopular government was the subject of very general complaint, and whose proceedings were most likely to be traversed at Rome.

The piety and resignation which the historian ascribes to his companions, accord well with the character of St. Paul; and the circumstance of their supporting themselves by figs and nuts, may help to explain what is stated in the Acts, that the "passengers fasted fourteen days;" that is, had no regular food. It might have been by means of the interest of Aliturus, that St. Paul was allowed the liberty of residing at his own house at Rome. The other difficulties which occur are not so easily removed, and present a fair subject for discussion. It is stated by Josephus that there were six hundred persons in the ship in which he sailed, though in the vessel in which St. Paul was wrecked, there but two hundred and seventy-six.

The number, however, mentioned by Josephus is so great, as to lead us to suspect some mistake, since it is not by any means credible that trading vessels at that time were accustomed to contain, or capable of accommodating, so great a number of persons.

With respect to the difference between the account in the Acts, and that of Josephus, as to the circumstances of the escape, it is to be considered whether Josephus, and the seventy-nine with him, might not have been separated from those, who swam to shore at Melita, and have been taken up in the ship of Cyrene, being the persons who first cast "themselves into the sea," as is related in the Acts; and whether the remainder of the crew, who, Josephus states, were swimming with him all the night, and of whose subsequent fate he says nothing, might not have reached the land together with St. Paul. Why, when Josephus afterwards, upon this supposition, must have received the account of St. Paul's escape with the rest, he should omit to record it, can be explained only from a reluctance which he might feel, to confirm or report the miraculous circumstances which demonstrated the divine countenance to St. Paul's mission, which, if he had admitted, he must have been a convert to Christianity. He certainly speaks inaccurately in one instance, representing himself and his companions to have swam all the night, which, without a miracle at least, could not have been literally effected; another difficulty, and perhaps the greatest, is, that St. Paul expressly says, that they all escaped safe to land, and that when they escaped they knew that the island was called Melita, which seems to imply, that they all reached the same island. It is possible, however, that the Apostle, by the word "all," refers to the immediate antecedent in the verse, speaking distinctly of those who followed the first division.

The integrity of the miracle, and the declarations of St. Paul, that there should be no loss of any man's life, and that not a hair should fall from the head of any of them, are equally established, whether the whole crew reached the land, or some only, while others were taken up into a ship. If Josephus was one of the brethren, whom the Apostle found at Puteoli, he might have been delayed on his voyage from Melita, or detained at Puteoli by Aliturus, till St. Paul arrived there; if the circumstances should not be thought to be satisfactorily reconciled, there are still so many concurrences, that the accounts must at least be allowed to bear a very remarkable resemblance to each other, if not to refer to the same event; for let it be considered that in both accounts the prisoners are represented to have been put into bonds by Felix, upon a trifling occasion, and in both to have appealed to Cæsar. In both relations, men of extraordinary piety and excellence are exposed to shipwreck in the Adriatic in the same year; and in both they wonderfully escape; by a remarkable providence, in both histories they arrive at Puteoli; and in both instances the prisoners are, by an unexpected indulgence in some degree, set at liberty, in consequence it should seem, of interest made with the emperor.—Johan. Fred. Wandalinus considers Malta, in the Mediterranean, as the scene of St. Paul's shipwreck, p. 773, in a dissertation in the 13th vol. of the Critici Sacri.

NOTE 9.—PART XIV.

MR. BRYANT fully proves that the people of Malta, in the Mediterranean, could not be justly called "barbarous." On this point the testimony of Diodorus Siculus (see Note 8.) is decisive. Mr. Bryant, after some extracts on the magnificence of the temples at Malta, goes on to contrast the description of the African Malta, given by the classical writers, with the brief but forcible account of the Adriatic Melite in the New Testament. The island is situated in the Adriatic Gulf, near the river Naro, in the province of the Nestiæans, an Illyrian people. What is the character of these Illyrians? Barbarous beyond measure; so that they are seldom mentioned without this denomination. Thucydides, speaking of Epidamnus, says, it was "in the neighbourhood of the Taulantii, a barbarous set of people, Illyrians."—Hist. lib. i. Polybius says, that in his time "they did not seem so much to have feuds and quarrels with any particular nation, as to be at war with all the world."—Hist. lib. ii. p. 100, edit. Casaub. Item excerptæ Legationes, sect. cxxv. Diodorus seldom mentions them but he terms them barbarians. Speaking of the Lacedæmonians giving them a remarkable check, he says (lib. xiv. p. 464, edit. Stephan.), τοῦ πολλοῦ θρόσους ἐπαυσαν τοῦς βαρβάρους. One Illyrian nation was called the Dardanians; of whom Nicolaus Damascenus (Συναγωγή παραδόξων ἡθῶν) mentions an odd rule, which, I believe, no other body politic imposed upon itself: they were washed only three times—when they were born, when they married, and when they died—τρὶς ἐν τῷ βίῳ λοῦονται μόνον, διὰ γένονται, καὶ ἐπὶ γάμοις, καὶ τελευτῶντες. Strabo speaks of the country as naturally good, but neglected and barren, "on account of the savage disposition of the inhabitants, and the national turn to plunder." They are represented as rude in their habits, and their bodies disfigured with marks and scarifications, by way of ornament, (Strabo, vol. i. p. 484, edit. Amstel. 1707); not given to traffic, and ignorant of the use of money. (Schol. in Dionys. Περιηγ. ad vers. 97.) They are described as extending to the Danube north, and eastward to Macedonia and Thrace; comprehending a villainous brotherhood under different denominations. (Liv. lib. x. cap. 2.) Illyrii Liburnique et Istri, gentes feræ. Such were the Scordisci, a nation bent on ruin; who are said to have made a beautiful country for seven days' journey a desert. Add to these the Bessi, so supreme in villainy, that the banditti looked up to them, and called them, by way of eminence, "The Thieves." (Strabo, vol. i. p. 490, edit. Amstel. 1707.) In short, it is notorious that all the tract of Illyria, from the city Iassus north-west, was termed Ἰλλυρίς Βαρβαρικὴ: partly on account of the ferocity of the inhabitants, and partly to distinguish it from the Hellenic, where the Greeks had made their settlements. It is observable, that the islands upon this coast were noted for a desperate race of freebooters; and, what is most to the purpose, Melite and Corcyra particularly swarmed with pirates. They so far aggrieved the Romans by their repeated outrages, that (Appian. De Bello Illyrico) Augustus ordered the island to be sacked, and the inhabitants to be put to the sword. This in great measure was executed. So that, when the Apostle arrived in these parts, the island must have been very much thinned, and the remainder of the people well disciplined.

Syracuse would have been the smallest deviation possible.

NOTE 10.—PART XIV.

IT was the custom with the ancient Greeks and Romans, to place the image or picture of the deity, to whose care and protection they committed the ship, at the stern, and to place the sign, by the name of which the ship was called, at the head^b. It is a dispute among learned men, whether the tutelar deity were not also sometimes the sign, and for that reason placed both at head and stern. There are undeniable instances in ancient authors, wherein some of the heathen deities are placed at the head. And it is not very likely, that such ships should have other deities at the stern, than those to whose tutelage they were committed. Of this sort is the ship which carried Paul to Italy. It had Castor and Pollux, two heathen deities, at the head, and doubtless, if any, had the same also at the stern, as the tutelar gods, protectors, and patrons of the ship, these being esteemed deities peculiarly favorable to mariners.

NOTE 11.—PART XIV.

AN argument has been brought in favor of the opinion, that the island here in question was the island of Malta, “from St. Paul’s calling at Syracuse, in his way to Rhegium; which is so far out of the track, that no example can be produced in the history of navigation, of any ship going so far out of her course, except it was driven by a violent tempest.” This argument tends principally to show, that a very incorrect idea has been formed of the relative situations of these places. The ship which carried St. Paul from the Adriatic Sea to Rhegium would not deviate from her course more than half a day’s sail by touching at Syracuse, and the delay so occasioned would probably be but a few hours more than it would have been, had they proceeded to Syracuse in their way to the straits of Messina, from Malta, as the map will show. Besides, the master of the ship might have, and probably had, some business at Syracuse, which had originated at Alexandria, from which place it must have been originally intended the ship should commence her voyage to Puteoli; and in this course the calling at

NOTE 12.—PART XIV.

DR. LARDNER has shown that this mode of custody was in use amongst the Romans, and that whenever it was adopted, the prisoner was bound to the soldier by a single chain: in reference to which St. Paul, Acts xxviii. 20., tells the Jews, whom he had assembled, “For this cause, therefore, have I called for you to see you, and to speak with you, because that for the Hope of Israel I am bound with this chain,” τὴν ἄλυσιν ταύτην περιζέμμαι. It is in exact conformity, therefore, with the truth of St. Paul’s situation at the time, that he declares of himself (Eph. vi. 20.), πρεσβείω ἐν ἁλύσει. And the exactness is the more remarkable, as ἄλυσις, a chain, is no where used in the singular number to express any other kind of custody. When the prisoner’s hands or feet were bound together, the word was δεσμοί, “bonds,” Acts xxvi. 29. When the prisoner was confined between two soldiers, as in the case of Peter (Acts xii. 6.), two chains were employed; and it is said upon his miraculous deliverance, that the “chains” (ἁλύσεις, in the plural) “fell from his hands.”—Paley’s Horæ Paulinæ.

NOTE 13.—PART XIV.

ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

THE Epistles which follow in this part of the Arrangement were written by St. Paul during his imprisonment at Rome. This will appear from the allusions which are repeatedly made by him to that event. In this Epistle to the Ephesians we meet with—“I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles,” chap. iii. 1. “I therefore (the prisoner of the Lord) beseech you,” chap. iv. 1. “For which I am an ambassador in bonds,” chap. vi. 20.; and we know that Tychicus, by whom the Epistle was probably sent, chap. vi. 21., as the subscription affirms, was with him during his first imprisonment. As St. Paul does not speak of the probability of his release, we may conclude, with Dr. Lardner, Bishop Tomline, Mr. Horne, and others, that it was written in the early part of his imprisonment.

Many learned men have doubted whether this Epistle was sent to the Church at Ephesus. They think that the proper direction is, The Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans; and suppose it to be the same which the Apostle mentions Coloss. iv. 16., “When this Epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the Church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewise read the Epistle from Laodicea." Dr. Paley's arguments in the affirmative are entitled to much regard.

"Although it does not appear," he observes, "to have ever been disputed that the Epistle before us was written by St. Paul, yet it is well known that a doubt has long been entertained concerning the persons to whom it was addressed. The question is founded partly in some ambiguity in the external evidence. Marcion, a heretic of the second century, as quoted by Tertullian, a father in the beginning of the third, calls it, The Epistle to the Laodiceans. From what we know of Marcion, his judgment is little to be relied upon; nor is it perfectly clear that Marcion was rightly understood by Tertullian. If, however, Marcion be brought to prove that some copies in his time gave Ἐν Λαοδικείᾳ in the superscription, his testimony, if it be truly interpreted, is not diminished by his heresy; for, as Grotius observes, 'cur in cā re mentiretur nihil erat causæ.' The name Ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, 'In Ephesus,' in the first verse, upon which word singly depends the proof that the Epistle was written to the Ephesians, is not read in all the manuscripts now extant. I admit, however, that the external evidence preponderates with a manifest excess on the side of the received reading. The objection, therefore, principally arises from the contents of the Epistle itself, which in many respects militate with the supposition that it was written to the Church of Ephesus. According to the history, St. Paul had passed two whole years at Ephesus, Acts xix. 10., and in this point, viz. of St. Paul having preached for a considerable length of time at Ephesus, the history is confirmed by the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and by the two Epistles to Timothy. 'I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost,' 1 Cor. xvi. 8. 'We would not have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia,' 2 Cor. i. 8. 'As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia,' 1 Tim. i. 3. 'And in how many things he ministered unto me at Ephesus, thou knowest well,' 2 Tim. i. 18. I adduce these testimonies because, had it been a competition of credit between the history and the Epistle, I should have thought myself bound to have preferred the Epistle. Now every Epistle which St. Paul wrote to the Churches which he himself had founded, or which he had visited, abounds with references and appeals to what had passed during the time that he was present among them; whereas there is not a text in the Epistle to the Ephesians from which we can collect that he had ever been at Ephesus at all. The two Epistles to the Corinthians, the Epistle to the Galatians, the Epistle to the Philippians, and the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, are of this class; and they are full of allusions to the Apostle's history, his reception, and his conduct whilst amongst them; the total want of which, in the Epistle before us, is very difficult to account for, if it was in truth written to the Church of Ephesus, in which city he had resided for so long a time. This is the first and strongest objection. But farther, the Epistle to the Colossians was addressed to a Church in which St. Paul had never been. This we infer from the first verse of the second chapter: 'For I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh.' There could be no propriety in thus joining the Colossians and the Laodiceans with those 'who had not seen his face in the flesh,' if they did not also belong to the same description. Now his address to the Colossians, whom he had not visited, is precisely the same as his address to the Christians, to whom he wrote in the Epistle which we are considering: 'We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you, since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints,' Col. i. 3, 4. Thus he speaks to the Ephesians, in the Epistle before us, as follows; 'Wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints, cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers,' chap. i. 15. The words 'having heard of your faith and love,' are the very words we see, which he uses towards strangers; and it is not probable that he should employ the same in accosting a Church in which he had long exercised his ministry, and whose faith and love he must have personally known. The Epistle to the Romans was written before St. Paul had been at Rome; and his address to them runs in the same strain with that just now quoted: 'I thank my God, through Jesus Christ, for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world,' Rom. i. 8. Let us now see what was the form in which our Apostle was accustomed to introduce his Epistles, when he wrote to those with whom he was already acquainted. To the Corinthians it was this: 'I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ;' 1 Cor. i. 4. To the Philippians, 'I thank my God upon every remembrance of you,' Phil. i. 3. To the Thessalonians: 'We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers; remembering without ceasing your work of faith and labor of love,' 1 Thess. i. 2, 3. To Timothy: 'I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience, that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day,' 2 Tim. i. 3. In these quotations it is usually his remembrance, and never his hearing of them, which he makes the subject of his thankfulness to God.

"As great difficulties stand in the way, supposing the Epistle before us to have been written to the Church at Ephesus; so I think it probable that it is actually the Epistle to the Laodiceans, referred to in the fourth chapter of the Epistle to the Colossians. The text which contains that reference is this: 'When this Epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the Church of the Laodiceans, and that ye likewise read the Epistle from Laodicea,' Col. iv. 16. The Epistle from Laodicea was an Epistle sent by St. Paul to that Church, and by them transmitted to Colosse. The two Churches were mutually to communicate the Epistles they had received. This is the way in which the direction is explained by the greater part of commentators, and is the most probable sense that can be given to it. It is also probable that the Epistle alluded to was an Epistle which had been received by the Church of Laodicea lately. It appears, then, with a considerable degree of evidence, that there existed an Epistle of St. Paul nearly of the same date with the Epistle to the Colossians, and an Epistle directed to a Church (for such the Church of Laodicea was) in which St. Paul had never been. What has been observed concerning the Epistle before us shows that it answers perfectly to that character.

"Nor does the mistake seem very difficult to account for. Whoever inspects the map of Asia Minor will see, that a person proceeding from Rome to Laodicea would probably land at Ephesus, as the nearest frequented seaport in that direction. Might not Tychicus then, in passing through Ephesus, communicate to the Christians of that place the letter with which he was charged? And might not copies of that letter be multiplied and preserved at Ephesus? Might not some of the copies drop the words of designation Ἐν τῇ Λαοδικείᾳ, which it was of no consequence to an Ephesian to retain? Might not copies of the letter come out into the Christian Church at large from Ephesus; and might not this give occasion to a belief that the letter was written to that Church? And, lastly, might not this belief produce the error which we suppose to have crept into the inscription?

"And it is remarkable, that there seem to have been some ancient copies without the words of designation, either the words 'In Ephesus,' or the words 'In Laodicea.' St. Basil, a writer of the fourth century, has this very singular passage: 'And writing to the Ephesians, as truly united to him who is through knowledge, he (Paul) calleth them in a peculiar sense 'such who are;' saying, to the saints who are, and (or even) the faithful in Christ Jesus; for so those before us have transmitted it, and we have found it in ancient copies.' Dr. Mill interprets (and, notwithstanding some objections that have been made to him, in my opinion, rightly interprets) these words of Basil, as declaring that this father had seen certain copies of the Epistle in which the words 'in Ephesus' were wanting. And the passage must be considered as Basil's fanciful way of explaining what was really a corrupt and defective reading; for I do not believe it possible that the author of the Epistle could have originally written ἡμῖν τοῖς ὁῦσιν, without any name of place to follow it."

Such are the arguments of Dr. Paley on this side of the question. All the ancient fathers and Christian writers, with Bishop Tomline, Horne, and many others of our best critics, have espoused the contrary opinion, which is well represented by Dr. Lardner, who observes, "That this Epistle was sent to the Church at Ephesus, we are assured by the testimony of all catholic Christians of all past ages. This we can now say with confidence, having examined the principal Christian writers of the first age, to the beginning of the twelfth century, in all which space of time there appears not one who had any doubt about it. Of these testimonies, that of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, in the end of the first century, is very remarkable. In a letter which he wrote to the Ephesians from Smyrna, in his way to Rome, he says (chap. xii.), 'Ye are the companions in the mysteries of the Gospel of Paul the sanctified, the martyr, deservedly most happy; at whose feet may I be found, when I shall have attained unto God, who, πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ (for ὅλῃ ἐπιστολῇ, as πᾶσα οἰκοδομῇ, Ephes. ii. 21. is first for ὅλῃ,) throughout all his Epistle, makes mention of you in Christ.' The Greek phrase signifies honorable mention, (Matt. xxvi. 13. Mark xiv. 9. Acts x. 4.) Ignatius means, that St. Paul commends the Ephesians throughout the whole of the Epistle, without blaming them, as he did in his letters which were addressed to some others, by calling them companions or partakers of the mysteries of the Gospel of Paul, he alluded to those passages in the present Epistle of the Ephesians, where the Gospel is represented as a mystery made known to the Apostle, and by him to them. Ignatius having thus described the Epistle to the Ephesians, there can be no doubt as to the genuineness of its inscription; for it is by some supposed that the Epistle of Ignatius was only written forty-five years after that of the Epistle to the Ephesians."

Michaelis has shown, at considerable length, that the omission of the word ὁῦσιν, "who are," was the subject of Basil's implied censure, as being hostile to the inference he wished to deduce, and not the omission of the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ. And as this father, in another passage of his writings, expressly cites the Epistle to the Ephesians^c without any hesitation, it is evident that in his time (the latter part of the fourth century) this Epistle was not considered as being addressed to the Laodiceans.

The passages quoted by Dr. Paley admit of easy and satisfactory interpretations, which directly refute his hypothesis. It will be recollected, that four or five years had elapsed since St. Paul had quitted Ephesus; he might therefore with great propriety express (in i. 15.) his complacency on hearing that they continued steadfast in the faith, notwithstanding the various temptations to which they were exposed. Again, the expression (in iii. 2.) (εἴγε ἠκούσατε τὴν οἰκονομίαν) which many translate and understand to mean, "if ye have heard of the dispensation;" more correctly means, "since ye have heard the dispensation" of the grace of God, which had been made known to them by St. Paul himself. Consequently this verse affords no countenance to the hypothesis above mentioned. The same remark applies to chap. iv. 21., where a similar construction occurs, which ought in like manner to be rendered, "since indeed ye have heard him," &c. With respect to the direction given by St. Paul in Col. iv. 16., that the Colossians should cause the Epistle which he wrote to them to be "read also in the Church of the Laodiceans, and that they should likewise read the Epistle from Laodicea," it is highly probable (as Rosenmüller has remarked) that by "the Epistle from Laodicea," St. Paul meant a letter addressed to him by the Church of Laodicea, in answer to which he wrote the letter addressed to the Colossians (as being the larger Church) desiring that they would send it to the Laodiceans, and get a copy of the Epistle which the latter had sent to St. Paul, in order that the Colossians might better understand his reply.

Michaelis and Haenlein, after Archbishop Usher and Bengel, get rid of all the difficulties attending this question, by supposing the Epistle to have been encyclical or circular, being addressed to the Ephesians, Laodiceans, and some other Churches in Asia Minor. But it could hardly be circular in the sense in which Michaelis understands that term: for he supposes that the different copies transmitted by St. Paul had ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, "at Ephesus," ἐν Λαοδικείᾳ, "at Laodicea," &c. as occasion required; and that the reason why all our manuscripts read ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, is, that when the books of the New Testament were first collected, the copy used was obtained from Ephesus: but this (Bishop Middleton observes) seems to imply what cannot be proved, that the canon was established by authority, and that all copies of this Epistle not agreeing with the approved edition were suppressed.

Dr. Macknight is of opinion, that St. Paul sent the Ephesians word by Tychicus, who carried their letter, to send a copy of it to the Laodiceans, with an order to them to communicate it to the Colossians. This hypothesis will account, as well as that of Michaelis, for the want of those marks of personal acquaintance which the Apostle's former residence might lead us to expect, and on which so much stress has been laid; for every thing local would be purposely omitted in an Epistle which had a farther destination.

Dr. Lardner enumerates a variety of passages which apply better to the Ephesians than to any other people; particularly those which show that the Apostle was well acquainted with those whom he was addressing (see chap. i. 13.); also at the end of the chapter, where, after speaking of Christ as filling all his members with his gifts and graces, he adds, (chap. ii. 1.) "And you who were dead in trespasses and sins." Chap. iv. 20. "But ye have not so learned Christ." Ver. 21. "Seeing ye have heard Him, and have been taught by Him, as the truth is in Jesus." Now, could the Apostle say these things, unless he had been well acquainted with the persons to whom he wrote? or rather, unless they had been instructed and endowed with the spiritual gifts by himself? Farther, if the Apostle had not been well acquainted with the persons to whom he was writing, and if they had not been his own converts, would they have taken such an interest in him, as to make it proper for him to send Tychicus to make known all things to them concerning himself? (chap. vi. 21, 22.) The salutation sent to the brethren in Laodicea (Coloss. iv. 15.) is a strong presumption that the Epistle in the canon inscribed to the Ephesians was not to the Laodiceans. For the Epistle to the Colossians being written at the same time with the supposed Epistle to the Laodiceans, and sent by the same messenger, Tychicus (Eph. vi. 21. Coloss. iv. 7, 8.), is it probable, that in the Epistle to the Colossians, the Apostle would think it needful to salute the brethren in Laodicea, to whom he had written a particular letter, in which he had given them his apostolical benediction? We will finish the argument in the words of Dr. Chandler, who observes, "It is not material to whom the Epistle was inscribed, whether to the Ephesians or Laodiceans, since the authority of the Epistle doth not depend on the persons to whom it was written, but on the person who indited it, which was St. Paul, as the letter itself testifies, and all genuine antiquity confirms."

That this Epistle was designed for the use not only of the Athenians, but of all the brethren in the proconsular Asia, not excepting those 508-518, who observes, that if ever there were an Epistle from St. Paul to the Laodiceans, it is lost; for that which is extant in Fabricius and Jones's work On the Canon, (to which we may add Pritius,) is universally allowed to be a forgery; yet the loss of a canonical writing is of all suppositions the most improbable.—See Horne's Crit. Introduct.

to whom the Apostle was personally unknown, may be inferred from the inscription of the Epistle, and from its concluding benedictions. "The saints in Ephesus, and the believers in Christ Jesus," appear to describe different persons; the latter may relate to all the believers in the province of Asia. A distinction is also made in the benediction, (chap. vi. 23, 24.) "Peace be to the brethren" (at Ephesus), and then "grace be with all them who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," that is, with all the faithful brethren in the proconsular Asia. That a considerable intercourse existed between the Churches of the proconsular Asia and that of Ephesus is evident from the First Epistle to the Corinthians, which was written from Ephesus, where, instead of mentioning the Church of Ephesus by itself, as saluting the Corinthians, the salutation is from the Churches of Asia in general, comprehending Ephesus among the rest, (1 Cor. xvi. 19.) St. Paul usually addressed his letters to the Churches in the great cities, yet they were designed, as the inscriptions prove, for all those of the neighbourhood. We may further add, that the perfection of the moral admonition delivered in this Epistle, and the catholic manner in which other matters are treated corroborate the opinion that it was intended for the brethren of the province of Asia, which accounts for the omission of those allusions to particular persons and circumstances, which might have been expected, had St. Paul been addressing only a Church planted by himself in a city where he had so long resided.

Dr. Lardner places the Epistle to the Ephesians at the beginning of St. Paul's first imprisonment. He proposes, in support of his opinion, the two following arguments: that Timothy, who joined the Apostle in his letters to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, is not mentioned in this Epistle, from which he infers that Timothy had not yet joined him at Rome. Dr. Macknight, who supposes it was written after the Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon, observes, that it is possible Timothy might only have left Rome for a short time, and refers to Heb. xiii. 23.

Dr. Lardner's second argument is that already noticed, that the Apostle does not express an expectation of an early release, as in the Epistle to the Philippians. Macknight, however, is of opinion, that no inference can be drawn from this circumstance. The Apostle, he observes, in his Epistle to the Colossians, makes as little mention of his release as in his Epistle to the Ephesians. And yet all allow that that Epistle was written and sent with the Epistle to Philemon, in which the Apostle expressed the strongest hope of that event. He did not think it necessary, it seems, to mention his enlargement in his letter to the Colossians, because he had ordered Tychicus to inform them of it (iv. 7.) "All things concerning me, Tychicus will make known to you." For the same reason he may have omitted mentioning his release to the Ephesians, as may be inferred from Eph. vi. 21. "But that ye also may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus will make known to you all things."

The phraseology here deserves notice, "that ye also may know;" which he thinks implies, that at this time the Apostle had ordered Tychicus to make known all things concerning him to some others, namely, to the Colossians; consequently that the two Epistles were written about the same time; and as Tychicus and Onesimus, to whom the Apostle delivered his Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, were to take Ephesus in their way, he gave them his letter to the Ephesians likewise, and ordered them, when they delivered it, to enjoin the Ephesians to send a copy of it to the Laodiceans, with directions to send a transcript, taken from their copy, to the Colossians. Tychicus and Onesimus, therefore, taking Ephesus in their way, delivered the Apostle's letter to the Church in that city, as they were directed; then proceeded with the letter to the Colossians and to Philemon, which, when they delivered, their commission was at an end.

Such are Dr. Macknight's arguments. It is evident, however, that this mode of reasoning is very inconclusive. I have placed the Epistle therefore at this period, and have been guided by the arguments of Dr. Lardner, which have been before considered, and which is consistent with the order of the Sacred Canon.

From the frequent use of the word "mystery," and from other reasons, Macknight, Dr. Chandler, and other commentators, have supposed that St. Paul intended to illustrate the truths he enforces in this Epistle, by referring to the mysteries of Diana, which were celebrated at Ephesus, in the temple of that name. Dr. Macknight has largely discussed this subject. I have not adopted his opinions, as they appear to require farther confirmation. The allusions of St. Paul to the service and ministers of the Jewish temple seem to be made without any reference to those of Diana. See the argument of Warburton and Leland in Macknight's Preface^d.

NOTE 14.—PART XIV.

ADAM is expressly called in Scripture "the figure of him that was to come;" and the circumstances which attended the formation of Eve were equally a figure of the creation of the Church, of whom Eve was the common mother. As God took from Adam, while insensible in a deep sleep, part of himself for the formation of Eve, that she might receive a spiritual life; so did God revivify the human body of our Saviour from the deep sleep of death, for the purpose of conferring spiritual life on mankind. And as Adam gave his flesh for the woman, so did Christ his flesh for the Church. And as the wife is made one flesh with the husband, so must the Church be spiritually united to Christ, and be made one with him through the Spirit, for which purpose he has incorporated the human with the divine nature, that both may be united by the same holy Spirit. Woman was created and brought to life from the side of Adam, and the Church was created or regenerated by the piercing of the body of Christ.

NOTE 15.—PART XIV.

ON THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

ST. PAUL planted a church at Philippi, A. D. 50, the particulars of which are related in Acts xvi. 9–40. part xii. sect. 8, of this Arrangement; and it appears from Acts xx. 6. part xiii. sect. 12. that he visited them again, A. D. 58, though no particulars are recorded concerning that visit. Of all the Churches planted by St. Paul, that at Philippi seems to have cherished the most tender concern for him; and though it appears to have been but a small community, yet its members were peculiarly generous towards him. For when Christianity was first planted in Macedonia, no other church contributed any thing to his support, except the Philippians; who, while he was preaching at Thessalonica, the metropolis of that country, sent him money twice, that the success of the Gospel might not be hindered by its preachers becoming burdensome to the Thessalonians, (Phil. iv. 15, 16.) The same attention they showed to the Apostle, and for the same reason, while he preached the Gospel at Corinth, (2 Cor. xi. 9.) And when they heard that St. Paul was under confinement at Rome, they manifested a similar affectionate concern for him, and sent Epaphroditus to him with a present, lest he should want necessaries during his imprisonment, (Phil. ii. 25. and iv. 10, 14–18.)

The more immediate occasion of the Epistle to the Philippians was the return of Epaphroditus, one of their pastors, by whom St. Paul sent it, as a grateful acknowledgment of their kindness in sending him supplies of money. From the manner in which St. Paul expressed himself on this occasion, it appears that he was in great want of necessaries, before their contributions arrived; for, as he had not converted the Romans, he did not consider himself as entitled to receive supplies from them. Being a prisoner, he could not work as formerly; and it was his rule never to receive any thing from the Churches where factions had been raised against him. It also appears that the Philippians were the only Church from whom he received any assistance, and that he conferred this honor upon them, because they loved him exceedingly, had preserved his doctrine in purity, and had always conducted themselves as sincere Christians.

There is not much controversy concerning the date of this Epistle; it was probably written in the end of A. D. 62, and about a year after that to the Ephesians. Dr. Paley conjectures the date by various intimations in the Epistle itself. “It purports,” he says, “to have been written near the conclusion of St. Paul’s imprisonment at Rome, and after a residence in that city of considerable duration. These circumstances are made out by different intimations, and the intimations upon the subject preserve among themselves a just consistency, and a consistency certainly unmeditated. First, the Apostle had already been a prisoner at Rome so long, as that the reputation of his bonds, and of his constancy under them, had contributed to advance the success of the Gospel. (See chap. i. 12–14.) Secondly, the account given of Epaphroditus imports that St. Paul, when he wrote the Epistle had been in Rome a considerable time; ‘He longed after you all, and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick;’ (chap. ii. 26.) Epaphroditus had been with St. Paul at Rome; he had been sick; the Philippians had heard of his sickness; and he again had received an account how much they had been affected by the intelligence. “The passing and repassing of these advices must necessarily have occupied a large portion of time, and must have all taken place during St. Paul’s residence at Rome. Thirdly, after a residence at Rome, thus proved to have been of considerable duration, he now regards the decision of his fate as nigh at hand: he contemplates either alternative, that of his deliverance, (chap. ii. 23, 24.) ‘Him (Timothy) therefore I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me; but I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly;’ that of his condemnation, (ver. 17.) ‘Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all.’ This consistency is natural, if the consideration of it be confined to the Epistle. It is farther material, as it agrees with respect to the duration of St. Paul’s first imprisonment at Rome, with the account delivered in the Acts, which having brought the Apostle to Rome, closes the history, by telling us that he dwelt there two whole years, in his own hired house.”—Hor. Paul. p. 242. It is remarkable that this is the only Epistle that is free from the reprehensions and censures of the Apostle. The Philippians throughout are commended for the excellence of their conduct, with the exception of the caution, or perhaps slight reproof, given (chap. ii. 3, 4.) on the subject of vainglory and strife on the exercise of their spiritual gifts, which, as St. Chrysostom observes, "is a strong proof of the virtue of the Philippians, who gave their teacher no subject of complaint whatever."

NOTE 16.—PART XIV.

COMMENTATORS differ as to the person here spoken of; some consider the expression "yoke-fellow" to allude to Epaphroditus, the bearer of the Epistle, others that Syntyche (ver. 2.) was a man, the husband of Euodias, and was here referred to; and another conjecture is, that Euodias and Syntyche were both female presbyters, and that the husband of one of these women is the person alluded to by the Apostle, and that he is called a "true yoke-fellow" on account of his excellent character as a husband. Others, again, think that the jailor was intended, who was one of St. Paul's chief converts at Philippi, and assisted him in the work of the Gospel. If none of these suppositions are admitted, it may have been addressed to some particular bishop or deacon mentioned in the salutation. The Clement referred to in this verse is supposed to have been the same who was afterwards bishop of Rome, and who wrote an Epistle to the Corinthians, which is still extant.

NOTE 17.—PART XIV.

ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE
TO THE COLOSSIANS.

THIS Epistle was written about the same time with that to the Philippians, towards the end of the year 62, and in the ninth of the Emperor Nero.

That the two Epistles were written about the same time is rendered probable by the following circumstance; in the Epistle to the Philippians (chap. ii. 19.) St. Paul purposes to send Timothy to Philippi, who was then with him at Rome, that he might know their state. As Timothy joins in the salutation in the beginning of this Epistle, it is evident that he still continued at Rome, and had not yet been sent to Philippi; and as St. Paul wrote the former Epistle nearly at the close of his first imprisonment at Rome, the two Epistles must have been written a short space from each other.

By whom Christianity was first planted at Colosse, there is no certain information. To prove that St. Paul was not the first preacher, two passages are adduced. The first (chap. i. 4.), "having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus," is supposed to imply that he had only heard of their being converted by some other teacher. But the Apostle might express himself in that manner, and still have been the minister of their conversion; for it was his constant practice to make inquiries concerning the faith of those whom he had brought to the knowledge of the Gospel; being particularly anxious to ascertain the influence which the Judaizing teachers had gained over his converts. It is therefore only probable, that when Epaphras came from Colosse to the Apostle, that he would inquire concerning their state, and being informed that the greater part of them remained steadfast, that he would address them as "having heard of their faith." The Apostle used the same language to other persons and Churches, of whose conversion there can be no doubt that he was the instrument.

The second passage from this Epistle, which is thought to prove that he never preached the Gospel in Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, is chap. ii. 1. "I would that ye knew how great a conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh." But this by no means implies that the brethren in Colosse and Laodicea had not seen the Apostle, when he thus addressed them; for, as Theodoret has observed, the Apostle's meaning is, that his conflict was not alone for the converted Gentiles in these places, but "for as many as had not seen his face in the flesh;" for all the converted Gentiles every where, and in every age of the world. That this is the true meaning of the expressions, is further evident (he remarks) from the next verse, where the Apostle does not say, "that your hearts may be comforted," as he would have done, if the Gentiles of Colosse and Laodicea had been of the number of those who had not seen his face in the flesh, but "that their hearts," namely, those who have not seen my face in the flesh "may be comforted," as well as yours. It is further advanced, that the Apostle himself speaks of Epaphras as the spiritual father of the Colossians, chap. i. 7. "As ye also learned of Epaphras." But this seems rather to intimate that they had been taught the knowledge of the Gospel, not from the Apostle alone, but also by another, by Epaphras, a faithful minister of Christ, and fellow-laborer with the Apostle. Besides, if Epaphras had alone converted them, the Apostle, as Lardner remarks, instead of saying, chap. iv. 12., "Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you," would have said, "Epaphras, in whom ye believed," or some expression to the like purport.

Dr. Lardner, Bishop Tomline, and others, are of opinion that the Church at Colosse was founded by St. Paul; and they ground their suppositions on the following considerations:

that St. Paul was twice in Phrygia, in which country were the cities of Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis; that he does in effect say, that he had dispensed the Gospel to the Colossians (chap. i. 21-25.), and that it appears, from the terms of affection and authority discoverable in this Epistle, that he did not address them as strangers, but as acquaintances, friends, and converts, (chap. ii. 5. and iv. 7, 8.) The Apostle also wrote the salutation with his own hand, as he did to the other Churches planted by himself, and who knew his own writing; whereas in the Epistle to the Romans, who were strangers to him, the salutation was written by Tertius.

Dr. Lardner observes, that the Colossians were converted by an apostle is further proved from chap. ii. 6, 7. "Seeing then ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, walk ye in him; rooted and built up in him, and stablished in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving." This the Apostle could not have written to them, if their only teacher had been Epaphras, or any other who was not an apostle. See also chap. i. 6., which things, Dr. Lardner observes, demonstrate that the Colossians were converted by an apostle, and in that capacity he bears testimony to the fidelity of their own pastor, (chap. i. 7.) It is most probable, therefore, that the Churches in Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis were planted by St. Paul, with the assistance of Timothy, for which reason he is joined in the salutation of this Epistle. Macknight supposes that, before their conversion, some of the Colossians had embraced the doctrines of Pythagoras, and others those of Plato, and that the Judaizers, to recommend the Law of Moses, affirmed that the former derived his discipline, and the latter his dogmas, from the Jewish laws. It is certain that the abstinence from animal food, and the fastings and severities practised on the body, recommended by the Pythagorean precepts; and the doctrines of Plato, concerning the agency of angels in human affairs, and the honor which is on that account due to them, are expressly condemned by the Apostle in this Epistle. As the Jewish teachers artfully suited their arguments to the opinions and characters of those they addressed, they might have pressed on the minds of the Colossians, to prove the ministry of angels, that angels conducted the Israelites into Canaan, and that the Law of Moses was given by their ministry. To those who were tinctured with the Platonic philosophy, they affirmed that it was arrogance in sinners to worship God without some mediator, and therefore they exhorted them to offer up their prayers to God through the mediation of angels, which was more acceptable to him than the mediation of Christ; who could not be supposed to have the same power with God as the angels, who were employed by him in the government of the world; and as the heathens and Jews were particularly attached to propitiatory sacrifices, we may conjecture, although not mentioned by the Apostle, that these false teachers, since there were no sacrifices appointed by the Gospel, taught that the Jewish sacrifices and purifications were to be continued as the means of justification. The whole scope of the Apostle's letter is to show the folly and vanity of these errors, by establishing the contrary truths. Lardner remarks, that in the Epistle which John wrote, by the command of our Lord, to the Church of the Laodiceans, traces of the same errors may be found, which the false teachers endeavoured to disseminate throughout Phrygia. For example, to show that angels are not superior to Christ in dignity and power, and that they are not to be worshipped, he asserts his own power as governor of the world, in nearly the same words as St. Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians, (Rev. iii. 14. Coloss. i. 18.) See also the condemnation of the false teachers, who were puffed up with their pretended knowledge, and a corruption of the Law of Moses (Coloss. ii. 18. Rev. iii. 47.); and whereas St. Paul said to the Colossians (chap. ii. 10.), "Ye are complete in him, which is at the head of all principality and power;" Christ said to the Laodiceans (Rev. iii. 18.), "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire," &c. Although the worship of angels was repressed for a time by the Apostle's Epistle to the Colossians, it afterwards prevailed among them to such a degree, that the council which met at Laodicea, the capital of Phrygia, found it necessary to condemn that idolatry by their thirty-fifth canon, as Theodoret informs us, in his note on Coloss. ii. 18., which thus stands: "Christians ought not to leave the Church of God, and go and name angels, or gather assemblies. If, therefore, any one is found to practise this secret idolatry, let him be anathema, because he has left our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and has turned to idolatry." This council is supposed to have been held, A. D. 363. Its last two canons declared what sacred books were to be publicly read in the Churches.

From the similarity in the doctrine and phraseology of this Epistle to that of the Ephesians, many have considered it as an epitome of the former; yet, though there is a great similarity, which may give us reason to suppose the Apostle considered the two Churches in some things nearly in the same state, the Epistle to the Colossians relates to corruptions which are not even hinted at in the other Epistle.

The general agreement of expression and sentiment between these two Epistles, and their having been forwarded by the same messenger (Eph. vi. 21. Coloss. iv. 7.), have induced many to suppose they were written at the same time. In their arrangement I have been guided by Dr. Lardner, who considers this argument as not decisive, because Tychicus may have been sent twice from Rome into Asia by the Apostle, with letters, during a confinement of two years; and because other reasons may have induced him to have written the same things to these Churches. He considers, as has been already observed, that as Timothy, who was joined with St. Paul in the Epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, is not united with him in his Epistle to the Ephesians, he had left Rome, and did not return to that city till after the Epistle to the Ephesians had been written.

Epaphras, who was sent by the Colossians to comfort the Apostle by the assurances of their affectionate regard under his imprisonment, and to bring them back word how matters went with him, became so obnoxious to the Roman magistrates, that he was imprisoned by them (Philemon, 23.) on account of his exertions in the cause of the Gospel; on this account Tychicus and Onesimus, whom the Apostle had converted and sent back to Colosse, were made the bearers of this Epistle.

NOTE 18.—PART XIV.

THE Apostle, in this expression, seems evidently to refer to the Jewish law, in allusion, perhaps, to Numb. v. 23. But as the Gentiles seem also to be included by him, the handwriting of ordinances must signify the law of conscience, the transgression of whose precepts subjected the Gentiles to death. The law of conscience may be regarded as comprised in or united to the Law of Moses, by which these precepts were more generally promulgated, and rigorously enforced, subjecting alike all mankind to the curse of eternal death, which curse was abolished, or blotted out, by the death of Christ. We must otherwise suppose that the Apostle, by changing the form of his words, you into us, in this instance, addressed the Jews, confining this expression to their Jewish ritual, which was now by the death of Christ blotted out, and entirely abolished; thereby intimating that neither Jew nor Gentile was bound any longer by its observance; that it was now entirely cancelled, as other bonds were, by being struck through with a nail; that, as it no longer existed to separate Jews and Gentiles, they were all admitted to the same equal privileges, the same condition of salvation, through faith in Christ. Macknight, however, is of a different opinion, and supposes that the moral and not the ritual precepts of the Law of Moses, to which the curse was annexed, were blotted out; but as Christ expressly declares he came not to destroy the Law, but to fulfil it; its moral precepts, engraven on our consciences, must be binding under every dispensation—we are all called upon to fulfil the spirit of the Mosaic Law.

NOTE 19.—PART XIV.

THIS expression is variously translated. Commentators suppose it alludes to the first elements, or principles of science; to the first beginnings of piety, or the first principles of religion and philosophy. Locke refers it to “the Law;” and Dr. Clarke observes, that the observances of Jewish rites and ceremonies were only rudiments, first elements, or the alphabet out of which the whole science of Christianity was composed. We have often seen that the world, and this world, signify the Jewish dispensation, or the rites, ceremonies, and services performed under it.

NOTE 20.—PART XIV.

ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

PHILEMON, to whom this Epistle is addressed, was an inhabitant of Colosse, as appears from St. Paul’s mentioning Onesimus in his Epistle to the Colossians (iv. 9.) as one of them, and also from his saluting Archippus in this Epistle (ver. 2.), who appears, from Col. iv. 17., to have been a pastor of that Church. Philemon seems to have been a person of great worth as a man, and of some note as a citizen in his own country; for his family was so numerous, that it made a Church by itself, or at least a considerable part of the Church at Colosse, (ver. 2.) He was likewise so opulent, that he was able, by the communication of his faith, that is, by his beneficence, to refresh the bowels of the saints, (ver. 6, 7.) According to Grotius, Philemon was an elder of Ephesus; Beausobre and Dr. Doddridge suppose him to have been one of the ministers of the Colossian Church; and from St. Paul’s requesting him (ver. 22.) to provide a lodging for him at Colosse, Michaelis thinks that he was a deacon of that Church. These opinions appear to have been founded on the inscription of this Epistle, where St. Paul calls him a fellow-laborer. But this appellation, as Drs. Whitby, Lardner, and Macknight have remarked, is of ambiguous signification; being given not only to those who were employed in preaching the Gospel, but also to such pious individuals, of either sex, as assisted the apostles in any manner. Hilary, the deacon, expressly calls him one of the laity; Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact appear to be of the same opinion.

Philemon was most probably a converted Gentile, and, from the 19th verse of this Epistle it is generally supposed that he was converted under the ministry of St. Paul; but, from the Apostle's saying, in the 5th verse, that he had heard of Philemon's faith in Christ, it is a disputed point with commentators.

We learn, from this Epistle, that Onesimus was the slave of Philemon, whom he had probably robbed; though Macknight and Dr. Lardner are of opinion that St. Paul's expression, in ver. 18, does not insinuate that Onesimus had robbed his master of any thing but his service, and that he then ran away as far as Rome. Whether he repented of what he had done, and voluntarily went to St. Paul, or in what other manner they came to meet there, we have no information. But the Apostle, during his confinement "in his own hired house," opened a way to the heart of the rude slave, converted him to the Christian faith, and baptized him. It also appears that St. Paul kept Onesimus with him for some time, to wait upon himself, until Onesimus, by his conduct, confirmed the truth and sincerity of his conversion. During his abode with the Apostle, he served him with the greatest assiduity and affection; but, being sensible of his fault in running away from his master, he wished to repair that injury by returning to him. At the same time being afraid lest, on his return, his master should inflict upon him the punishment of torture, or death, which by the law or custom of Phrygia he was empowered to do to a fugitive slave, he entreated St. Paul to write to Philemon in his behalf, and request him to forgive and receive him again into his family. The Apostle therefore wrote this Epistle to Philemon, "in which, with the greatest softness of expression, warmth of affection, and delicacy of address, he not only interceded for Onesimus's pardon, but urged Philemon to esteem him, and put confidence in him as a sincere Christian. And because restitution, by repairing the injury that has been done, restores the person who did the injury to the character which he had lost; the Apostle, to enable Onesimus to appear in Philemon's family with some degree of reputation, bound himself in this Epistle by his handwriting not only to repay all that Onesimus owed to Philemon, but to make full reparation also to Philemon for whatever injury he had done to him by running away." To account for the solicitude expressed by St. Paul in this Epistle, in order to obtain Onesimus's pardon and procure a thorough reconciliation, it is not necessary to suppose, with some critics, that Philemon was keen and obstinate in his resentments, or of that rough and intractable disposition for which the Phrygians were proverbial. The contrary is insinuated by the Apostle, who has in other places commended his benevolence and charity. It is most probable, as Dr. Macknight has conjectured, that Philemon had a number of slaves, on whom the pardoning of Onesimus too easily might have had a bad effect; and therefore he might judge some punishment necessary as an example to the rest. At least St. Paul could not have considered the pardoning of Onesimus as an affair that merited so much earnest entreaty, with a person of Philemon's piety, benevolence, and gratitude, unless he had suspected him to have entertained some such intention.

Whether Philemon forgave or punished Onesimus is a circumstance concerning which we have no information. From the earnestness with which the Apostle solicited his pardon, and from the generosity and goodness of Philemon's disposition, the eminent critic above cited conjectures that he actually pardoned Onesimus, and even gave him his freedom, in compliance with the Apostle's insinuation, as it is interpreted by some, that "he would do no more than he had asked." For it was no uncommon thing, in ancient times, to bestow freedom on those slaves whose faithful services had procured for them the esteem and good will of their masters. The primitive Christians preserving this Epistle, and placing it in the Sacred Canon, Dr. Benson remarks, are strong arguments to induce us to believe that Philemon granted the Apostle's request, and received Onesimus into his house and favor again. As Onesimus was particularly recommended by Paul to the notice of the Colossians (ch. iv. 9.), it cannot be doubted that they cheerfully received him into their Church. In the Apostolical Constitutions^e, Onesimus is said to have been bishop of Berea; but they are a compilation of the fourth century, and consequently of no authority. When Ignatius wrote his Epistle to the Ephesians (A. D. 107), their bishop's name was Onesimus; and Grotius thought that he was the person for whom St. Paul interceded. But this, as Dr. Lardner^f remarks, is not certain. Dr. Mill^g has mentioned a copy, at the conclusion of which it is said that Onesimus suffered martyrdom at Rome, by having his legs broken.

That this Epistle was written from Rome, about the same time with those to the Philippians and Colossians, is proved by several coincidences. "As the letter to Philemon, and that to the Colossians, were written," says Dr. Paley, "at the same time, and sent by the same messenger, the one to a particular inhabitant, the other to the Church of Colosse, it may be expected that the same, or nearly the same persons, would be about St. Paul, and join with him, as was the practice, in the salutations of the Epistle. Accordingly we find the names of Aristarchus, Marcus, Epaphras, Luke, and Demas in both Epistles. Timothy, who is joined with St. Paul in the superscription of the Epistle to the Colossians, is joined with him also in this. Tychicus did not salute Philemon, because he was the bearer, with Onesimus, of the Epistle to Colosse, and would undoubtedly there see Philemon." That when the Apostle wrote the former Epistle, he was in bonds (Col. iv. 3, 18.); which was the case also when he wrote this (see ver. 1. 10, 13, 23.); from which, and various other circumstances, we may conclude that they were written about the same time, in the ninth year of Nero, A. D. 62.

^g Nov. Test. Millii et Kusteri, p. 513.

As some have thought it strange that a private letter, of a particular business and friendship, should have been admitted into the Sacred Canon, not only as a genuine production of St. Paul, but as also designed by the Holy Spirit for the edification of the Church, it will be necessary to show the important lessons and duties it enforces. In a religious view, and upon a spiritual account, it sets before churchmen of the highest dignity, a proper example of attention to the people under their care, and an affectionate concern for their individual welfare. It teaches us that all Christians, in their relationship to God, are on a level. Onesimus the slave, upon becoming a Christian, is the Apostle's dear son, and Philemon's brother. Christianity makes no alteration in men's civil affairs. By Christian baptism a slave did not become a freedman; his temporal estate or condition was still the same; and, though Onesimus was the Apostle's son and Philemon's brother upon a religious account; yet he was obliged to be Philemon's slave for ever, unless his master voluntarily gave him his freedom. Servants should not be taken, or detained from their own masters, without their master's consent, (see ver. 13, 14.) We should love and do good unto all men, and make restitution where we have injured. We should not condemn persons of low estate, nor disdain to help the meanest slave, when it is in our power. The Apostle has here set us an example of benevolence, condescension, and Christian charity, which it will well become us to follow. He took pains with and converted a slave, and in a most affectionate and earnest manner interceded with his master for his pardon. We should be grateful to our benefactors. This St. Paul touches upon very gently, (ver. 19.), where he intimates to Philemon that he owed unto himself also: and therefore, in point of gratitude, he was obliged to grant his request. We should forgive the penitent, and be heartily reconciled to them. The Apostle's example teaches us to do all we can to make up quarrels and differences, and reconcile those who are at variance. The bishops and pastors of the Christian Church, and all teachers of religion, have here the most glorious example set before them, to induce them to have a most tender regard to the souls of men, of all ranks and conditions; teaching them not to despair of the souls of the wicked, but to do every thing in their power to convert them.

It furnishes a noble example also of the influences of Christianity, which, if properly understood, and its doctrines properly applied, becomes the most powerful means of the melioration of men: the wicked and profligate, when brought under its influence, are transformed by it into useful and worthy members of society. It can convert a worthless slave into a pious, amiable, and useful man; and make him not only happier and better in himself, but also a blessing to the community.

The anxiety which the Apostle showed for the welfare of Onesimus, in return for his affectionate services, could not fail to cherish good dispositions in the breast of Philemon. We do a man a great kindness, when we even engage him in acts of mercy and benevolence. From this Epistle we learn what sort of man the Apostle was in private life. He has here displayed qualities which are in the highest estimation among men; a noble spirit, arising from a consciousness of his own dignity, consummate prudence, uncommon generosity, the warmest friendship, the most skilful address, and the greatest politeness, as well as purity of manners: qualities which are never found either in the enthusiast or impostor.

There is something very persuasive in every part of this Epistle, yet the character of St. Paul prevails in it throughout. The warm, affectionate, authoritative teacher is interceding with an absent friend for a beloved convert. He urges his suit with an earnestness, befitting perhaps not so much the occasion, as the ardor and sensibility of his own mind. Here also, as every where, he shows himself conscious of the weight and dignity of his mission; nor does he suffer Philemon for a moment to forget it: "I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient." He is careful also to recall, though obliquely, to Philemon's memory, the sacred obligation under which he had laid him, by bringing him to the knowledge of Christ; "I do not say to thee, how thou owest to me, even thine own self besides."—See Adam Clarke in loc. v. 8.

NOTE 21.—PART XIV.

THE term "prisoner," in this verse, is supposed by commentators not sufficiently to express the situation of St. Paul at Rome, and that the Greek word δεσμιος should be translated, bound with a chain; which it not only signifies, but describes more accurately the circumstances of the Apostle, who, from being confined for no crime against society, but for heresy in the Jewish religion, was allowed to live in his own hired house, with a soldier who kept him. To this soldier he was tied with a chain, fixed on his right wrist, and fastened to the soldier's left arm; which being of sufficient length, permitted them to walk together without difficulty, wherever the labors of the Apostle directed him.

NOTE 22.—PART XIV.

THE word Onesimus signifies "useful," or "profitable," from ὄνημι, "to profit," or "to help;" which has induced some commentators to suppose, that both here, and in ver. 20, the Apostle makes an allusion to the signification of the name of his convert.

NOTE 23.—PART XIV.

THE apology made here by the Apostle is very similar to that of Joseph for his brethren, (Gen. xlv. 5.)

NOTE 24.—PART XIV.

ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE
OF ST. JAMES.

THIS Epistle of St. James, with those bearing the names of the apostles, Peter, Jude, and John, have been generally distinguished by the appellation of Catholic, for which various reasons have been assigned.

Salmeron and others have imagined, that they were denominated Catholic, or General Epistles, because they were designed to be transcribed and circulated among the Christian Churches, that they might be perused by all; for they contain that one catholic or general doctrine, which was delivered to the Churches by the apostles of our Saviour, and which might be read with advantage by the universal Church of Christ. In like manner they might be called canonical, as containing canons, or general rules and precepts, which concern all Christians.

Others are of opinion that they received the appellation of Catholic, or General Epistles, because they were not written to one person, city, or church, like the Epistles of St. Paul, but to the Catholic Church, Christians in general, or to Christians of several countries, or at least to all the Jewish Christians, wherever they were dispersed over the face of the earth. Œcumenius, Leontius, Whitby, and others, have adopted this opinion, which, however, does not appear to be well founded. The Epistle of St. James was indeed written to the Christians of the twelve tribes of Israel, in their several dispersions; but it was not inscribed to the Christians in Judæa, nor to Gentile Christians in any country whatever. The two Epistles of Peter were written to Christians in general, but particularly those who had been converted from Judaism. The First Epistle of John, and the Epistle of Jude were probably written to Jewish Christians; and the Second and Third Epistles of John were unquestionably written to particular persons.

A third opinion is that of Dr. Hammond, adopted by Dr. Macknight, and others, which appears the most probable. He supposes that the First Epistle of Peter and the First Epistle of John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, obtained the name of catholic, or universally acknowledged, and therefore canonical Epistles, in order to distinguish them from the Epistle of James, the Second of Peter, the Second and Third of John, and the Epistle of Jude, concerning which doubts were at first entertained. But their authenticity being at length acknowledged by the generality of the Churches, they also obtained the name of catholic, or universally-received Epistles, and were esteemed of equal authority with the rest. They were also termed canonical by Cassiodorus in the middle of the sixth century, and by the writer of the prologue to these Epistles, erroneously ascribed to Jerome. Du Pin says, that some Latin writers have called these epistles canonical, either confounding the name with catholic, or to denote that they are a part of the canon of the books of the New Testament.

The denomination of Catholic Epistles is of very considerable antiquity, for Eusebius uses it as a common appellation in the fourth century, and it was probably earlier: for St. John's first Epistle is repeatedly called a Catholic Epistle by Origen, and by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria. Of these Epistles, two only, viz. the First Epistle of St. Peter and the First Epistle of St. John, were universally received in the time of Eusebius; though the rest were then well known. And Athanasius, Epiphanius, and later Greek writers, received seven Epistles, which they called catholic. The same appellation was also given to them by Jerome.

Although the authenticity of the Epistle of James, the Second of Peter, the Epistle of Jude, and the Second and Third Epistles of John, were questioned by some ancient fathers, as well as by some modern writers, yet we have every reason to believe that they are the genuine and authentic productions of the inspired writers whose names they bear. The primitive Christians were extremely and necessarily cautious in admitting any books into their canon, whose genuineness and authenticity they had any reason to suspect. They rejected all the writings forged by heretics in the names of the apostles, and therefore, most assuredly, would not have received any, without subjecting them to a severe scrutiny. Now, though these five Epistles were not immediately acknowledged as the writings of the apostles, this only shows that the persons who doubted had not obtained complete and incontestable evidence of their authenticity. But, as they were afterwards universally received, we have every reason to conclude, that, upon a strict examination, they were found to be the genuine productions of the apostles. Indeed the ancient Christians had such good opportunities for examining this subject, they were so careful to guard against imposition, and so well founded was their judgment concerning the books of the New Testament, that, as Dr. Lardner has remarked, no writing which they pronounced genuine has yet been proved spurious; nor have we at this day the least reason to believe any book to be genuine which they rejected.

The order in which these Epistles are placed varies in ancient authors; but it is not very material in what manner they are arranged. Could we fix with certainty the date of each Epistle, the most natural order would be according to the time when they were written. Some have placed the three Epistles of St. John first, probably because he was the beloved disciple of our Lord. Others have given the priority to the two Epistles of St. Peter, because they considered him as the prince of the apostles. Some have placed the Epistle of James last, possibly because it was more lately received into the canon by the Christian Church in general. By others, this Epistle has been placed first, either because it was conjectured to have been the first written of the seven Epistles, or because St. James was supposed to have been the first bishop of Jerusalem, the most ancient and venerable, and the first of all the Christian Churches; or because the Epistle was written to the Christians of the twelve tribes of Israel, who were the first believers.

There have been a variety of different opinions, both as to the author of this Epistle, and the time in which it was written. The arguments of Macknight and Lardner, who attribute it to James the Less, are generally considered satisfactory.

In the catalogue of the apostles (Matt. x. 2. Mark iii. 16. Luke vi. 14. Acts i. 13.) we find two persons of the name of James; the first was the son of Zebedee (Matt. x. 2.), the second, in all the catalogues, is called the son of Alphæus; one of these apostles is called (Gal. i. 19.) the Lord's brother. Wherefore as there were only twelve apostles, and as James, the son of Zebedee, so far as we know, was in no respect related to our Lord, the apostle called James, the Lord's brother, must have been James, the son of Alphæus, called also James the Less, or younger, whose relation to Christ will appear by comparing Mark xv. 40. with John xix. 25. In the former passage, Mark, speaking of the women who were present at the crucifixion, says, "There were also women looking on afar off: among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the Less, and of Joses, and Salomé." In the latter passage, John, speaking of the same women, says, "There stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene:" wherefore our Lord's mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, mentioned by John, is, in all probability, the person whom Mark calls Mary, the mother of James the Less, and of Joses: consequently her sons, James and Joses, were our Lord's cousins-german by his mother. And as the Hebrews called all near relations brethren, it is more than probable that James, the son of Alphæus, who was our Lord's cousin-german, is James the Lord's brother, mentioned Gal. i. 19. Three circumstances confirm this opinion. 1. James and Joses, the sons of Mary, our Lord's mother's sister, are expressly called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3.; James, the son of our Lord's mother's sister, being distinguished from another James, by the appellation of the Less, Mark xv. 40. There is good reason to suppose that he is the James whom Mark, in his catalogue, distinguishes from James, the son of Zebedee, by the appellation of the son of Alphæus. It is true, Mary, the mother of James and Joses, is called the wife of Cleophas, John xix. 25. But Cleophas and Alphæus are the same name, differently pronounced; the one according to the Hebrew, and the other according to the Greek orthography. 3. Of the persons called the brethren of Jesus (Matt. xiii. 55.), there are three mentioned in the catalogue of apostles, James, and Simon, and Judas. They, I suppose, are the brethren of the Lord, who are said, as apostles, to have had a right to lead about a sister or a wife, &c. (1 Cor. ix. 5.) Jerome likewise thought James, the Lord's brother, was so called, because he was the son of Mary, our Lord's mother's sister. Lardner (Canon, vol. iii. p. 63.) says, "Jerome seems to have been the first who said our Lord's brethren were the sons of his mother's sister;" and that this opinion was at length embraced by Augustine, and has prevailed very much of late, being the opinion of the Romanists in general, and of Lightfoot, Witsius, Lampe, and many of the Protestants. On the other hand, Origen, Epiphanius, and other ancient writers, both Greeks and Latins, were of opinion that James, the Lord's brother, was not the son of the Virgin's sister, but of Joseph, our Lord's reputed father, by a former wife, who died before he espoused the Virgin. Of the same opinion were Vossius, Basnage, and Cave, among the Protestants; and Valesius among the Romanists. Epipha-nius and Theophylact supposed that Joseph's first wife was the widow of Alphæus, who being Joseph's brother, Joseph married her, to raise up seed to him; and therefore James, the issue of that marriage, was fitly called the son of Alphæus, and brother of our Lord.

James the Less, the son of Alphæus, therefore, we conclude to have been not only the Lord's near relation, but an apostle whom, as is generally supposed, he honored in a particular manner, by appearing to him alone, after his resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 7. These circumstances, together with his own personal merit, rendered him of such note among the apostles, that they appointed him to reside at Jerusalem, and to superintend the Church there. This appointment, Lardner says, was made soon after the martyrdom of Stephen: and in support of this opinion he observes, "that Peter always speaks first, as president among the apostles, until after the choice of the seven deacons." Every thing said of St. James after that implies his presiding in the Church of Jerusalem, (Canon, vol. iii. p. 28.) For example, when the apostles and elders at Jerusalem came together to consider whether it was needful to circumcise the Gentiles after there had been much disputing, Peter spake, (Acts xv. 7.), then Barnabas and Paul, (ver. 12.) And when they had ended, James summed up the whole, and proposed the terms on which the Gentiles were to be received into the Church (ver. 19-21.), to which the whole assembly agreed, and wrote letters to the Gentiles, conformably to the opinion of James, (ver. 22-29.) From this it is inferred, that James presided in the council of Jerusalem, because he was president of the Church in that city.

Chrysostom, in his Homily on Acts xv. says, "James was bishop of Jerusalem, and therefore spake last." In the time of this council Paul communicated the Gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, to three of the apostles, whom he calls pillars, and tells us, that when they perceived the inspiration and miraculous powers which he possessed, they gave him the right hand of fellowship, mentioning James first, (Gal. ii. 9.) "And perceiving the grace that was given unto me, James, Cephas, and John, who were pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship." This implies that James, whom in the first chapter he had called the Lord's brother, was not only an apostle, but the presiding apostle in the Church at Jerusalem. In the same chapter Paul, giving an account of what happened after the council, says, (ver. 11.) "When Peter was come to Antioch, before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were come he withdrew, and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision." This shows that James resided at Jerusalem, and presided in the Church there, and was greatly respected by the Jewish believers. The same circumstance appears from Acts xxi. 17., where, giving an account of St. Paul's journey to Jerusalem, with the collections from the saints in Judæa, St. Luke says, (ver. 18.) "St. Paul went in with us to James, and all the elders were present." Farther, the respect in which James was held by the apostles, appears from two facts recorded by St. Luke; the first is, when St. Paul came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, Barnabas took him, and brought him to Peter and James, as the chief apostles. Compare Acts xxi. 18. with Gal. ii. 9. The second fact is, after Peter was miraculously delivered out of prison, about the time of the Passover, in the year 44, he came to the house of Mary, where many were gathered together praying, (Acts xii. 12.); and when he had declared to them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison, he said, "Go, show these things to James, and to the brethren," (ver. 17.) These particulars are mentioned by Lardner, and before him by Whitby and Cave, to show that James, the Lord's brother, was really an apostle, in the strict acceptation of the word: consequently that Eusebius was mistaken when he placed him among the seventy disciples.—Eccles. Hist. lib. vii. c. 12.

That the Epistle of James was early esteemed an inspired writing, is evident from the following fact:—That while the Second Epistle of Peter, the Second and Third of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament (the Peshito), which was made in the beginning of the second century, for the use of the converted Jews, the Epistle of James has found a place in it, equally with the books which were never called in question. This is an argument of great weight; for certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that Epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity than the converted Gentiles, to whom it was not sent, and who perhaps had no opportunity of being acquainted with it, till long after it was written. Wherefore, its being received by the Jewish believers is an undeniable proof that they knew it to be written by James the apostle; whereas the ignorance of the Gentile believers, concerning this Epistle, is not even a presumption against its authenticity.

That the converted Gentiles had little knowledge of the Epistle of James in the first ages may have been owing to various causes, such as that it was addressed to the Jews, and that the matters contained in it were personal to the Jews. For, on these accounts, the Jewish believers may have thought it not necessary to communicate it to the Gentiles: and when it was made known to them, they may have scrupled to receive it as an inspired writing, for the following reasons:—1. The writer does not, in the inscription, take the title of an apostle, but calls himself simply James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ.—2. Many of the ancients, by calling the writer of this Epistle James the Just, have rendered his apostleship doubtful.—3. As they have done likewise, by speaking of him commonly as bishop of Jerusalem, and not as an apostle of Christ. It is not surprising, therefore, that this Epistle was not received generally by the converted Gentiles; consequently that it was not often quoted by them in their writings. But afterwards, when it was considered that this Epistle was from the beginning received by the Jewish believers, and that it was translated into the Syriac language for their use, and that St. Paul, though an apostle, sometimes contented himself with the appellation of a servant of Christ (Phlip. i. 1. and Philem. ver. 1.), and sometimes took no appellation but his own name (1 Thess. i. 1. and 2 Thess. i. 1.); and that the Apostle John did not, in any of his Epistles, call himself an apostle, the title which the author of the Epistle of James had to be an apostle, was no longer doubted; but he was generally acknowledged to be James, the son of Alphæus, and the Lord's brother, and his Epistle, after an accurate examination, was received as an inspired writing. So Estius tells us, who affirms, that after the fourth century no Church nor ecclesiastical writer is found, who ever doubted of the authority of this Epistle; but on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of Scripture published, whether by general or provincial councils, or by Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, since the fourth century, constantly number it among the canonical Scriptures.

With respect to what is remarked by Eusebius, that there are not many ancient writers who have quoted the Epistle of James, learned men have observed, that Clement of Rome has quoted it four several times: and so does Ignatius, in his genuine Epistle to the Ephesians (sect. x. xii. xvii. xxx.), and Origen, in his thirteenth homily on Genesis, sect. v. That it was not better known is easily accounted for, as observed above, from the circumstance of its being particularly addressed to the whole Jewish nation, for the purpose of correcting the errors and vices which prevailed among them at the time it was written. On this account the Gentiles would feel themselves comparatively but little interested, and would therefore be less anxious to obtain copies of it. The seeming opposition of the doctrine of this Epistle to the doctrine of St. Paul, concerning justification by faith, without the works of the Law, may have occasioned it also to have been less regarded by the most ancient writers.

Michaelis is of a different opinion respecting the author of this Epistle. "All things considered," says he, "I see no reason for the assertion, that James, the son of Zebedee, was not the author of this Epistle. One circumstance affords, at least, a presumptive argument in favor of the opinion, that it was really written by the Elder James, and at a time when the Gospel had not been propagated among the Gentiles, namely, that it contains no exhortations to harmony between the Jewish and Gentile converts; which, after the time that the Gentiles were admitted into the Church, became absolutely necessary. Had it been written after the apostolic council of Jerusalem, mentioned Acts xv., and by the younger James, we might have expected that at least some allusion would be made in it to the decree of that council, which was propounded by the younger James in favor of the Gentile converts as their brethren."

On this controverted and uncertain point, I have followed the majority of commentators, and have considered James, the Lord's brother, as the author of this Epistle. His history is fully and ably collected by Dr. Lardner, from the writings of the ancient fathers; and to his labors the reader is more particularly referred. He concludes this part of his labors with observing, that the time of the death of James may be determined without much difficulty: he was alive when St. Paul came to Jerusalem at the Pentecost, in the year of Christ 58; and it is likely that he was dead when St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, at the beginning of the year 63. Theodoret, upon Heb. xi. 37., supposes the Apostle there to refer to the martyrdoms of Stephen, James the brother of John, and James the Just. According to Hegesippus, the death of James happened about the time of the Passover, which might be that of the year 62; and if Festus was then dead, and Albinus not arrived, the province was without a governor. Such a season left the Jews at liberty to gratify their licentious and turbulent disposition, and they were likely to embrace it. The Epistle, therefore, as the work of James the Less, must have been written about this time, A. D. 62. As it concludes abruptly, it has been considered as a posthumous writing, left unfinished by the premature and violent death of the Apostle^b.

Bishop Tomline, and others, are of opinion that this Epistle was addressed to the believing Jews who were dispersed all over the world; Grotius and Dr. Wall, to all the people of Israel living out of Judæa. Michaelis considers it certain that St. James wrote to persons already converted from Judaism to Christianity; but at the same time he believes, as the Apostle was highly respected by the Jews, in general, that he designed that it should also be read by the unbelieving Jews, and that by this intention he was influenced in the choice of his materials. Dr. Benson is of opinion that this Epistle was addressed to the converted Jews out of Palestine; but Whitby, Lardner, (and after them Macknight,) think it was written to the whole Jewish nation, both within and without Judæa, whether believers or not. This opinion is grounded on some expressions in the first ten verses of the fourth chapter, and in the first five verses of the fifth chapter, which they suppose to be applicable to unbelievers only. It is true that in the fifth chapter the Apostle alludes to the then impending destruction of Jerusalem, and the miseries which soon after befel the unbelieving Jews: but Bishop Tomline is of opinion, that the Apostle alludes merely to the great corruptions into which the Hebrew Christians had fallen at that time.

It does not appear probable that James would write part of his Epistle to believers, and part to unbelievers, without any mention or notice of that distinction. It should also be remembered, that this Epistle contains no general arguments for the truth of Christianity, nor any reproof of those who refused to embrace the Gospel; and therefore, though his lordship admits that the inscription, "To the twelve tribes that are scattered abroad," might comprehend both unbelieving and believing Jews, yet he is of opinion that it was intended for the believing Jews only, and that St. James did not expressly make the discrimination, because neither he, nor any other apostle, ever thought of writing to any but Christian converts. "The object of the apostolical Epistles," he further observes, "was to confirm, and not to convert; to correct what was amiss in those who did believe, and not in those who did not believe." The sense of the above inscription seems to be limited to the believing Jews by what follows almost immediately, "The trying of your faith worketh patience," (i. 3.) And again, "My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons," (ii. 1.) These passages could not be addressed to unbelieversⁱ.

The Epistle itself is entirely different in its complexion from all those in the Sacred Canon; the style and manner are more that of a Jewish prophet, than a Christian apostle. It scarcely touches on any subject purely Christian. Our blessed Lord is only mentioned twice in it, chap. i. 1. and ii. 1. It begins without any apostolical salutation, and ends without any apostolical benediction. In short, had it not been for the two slight notices of our blessed Lord, we had not known that it was the work of any Christian writer. It may be considered a sort of connecting link between Judaism and Christianity, as the ministry of John Baptist was between the old covenant and the new.

NOTE 25.—PART XIV.

THE Greek word διψυχος signifies one who has two souls—one for heaven, the other for earth—the man who desires to secure both worlds, but will give up neither. Some suppose St. James alludes to those who were divided in their affections and minds, between the Levitical rites and the Gospel of Christ; equally unwilling to renounce the benefits of the latter, and to give up the long-established institutions of the former. It was a usual term among the Jews, to express the man who attempted to worship God, and yet retained the love of the creature.—Rabbi Tanchuma, fol. 84. 4. on Deut. xxvi. 16. said, "Behold the Scripture exhorts the Israelites, and tells them, that when they poured out their prayers before the Lord, לֹא יִהְיֶה לָהֶם שְׁתֵּי לִבְבוֹת one for the holy, blessed God, and the other for something else." The expression occurs in Ecclus. i. 26. καὶ διψοῦν.

AMONG the Rabbins there is this saying, "Evil concupiscence is at the beginning like the thread of a spider's web, afterwards is like a cart-rope."—Sanhedrin, fol. 99. 2.

NOTE 27.—PART XIV.

THIS expression is supposed by commentators to signify the doctrine which has been implanted—the light within—the natural, innate, or eternal world; comparing the Gospel to a seed, or to a plant, which is here said to be engrafted in their minds. But I cannot but believe that the Apostle refers rather to the Mosaic Law, the Gospel of Christ being engrafted on the Law; for Christ came not to destroy the Law and the Prophets, but to fulfil them. (See James ii. 23.) The ritual law he fulfilled by his sacrifice and death, and the effects resulting from them—His blood cleansing us from all sin—the Great High Priest offering up his intercession and prayers for us in the Holy of Holies—and the moral law he fulfilled in his pure and holy life; for in him there was no sin; he was the true paschal lamb, without blemish, and without spot—he realized every title of the Law, and was the great end and object of it. Its types, ceremonies, and festivals were only the figure and representation of Him that was to come—they were now finished, completed, and blotted out for ever, dying with him on the cross. In ver. 25 of this chapter, the word “perfect,” which is used in opposition to the Mosaic Law, which was imperfect, seems to be applied to the Gospel, in a sense which corroborates the opinion here advanced. It intimates that the Gospel, or the Law of liberty, was made perfect by bringing to perfection the whole system of the Jewish Law; engrafting on it the fulness of salvation, and giving us liberty from its burdensome rites, and ability to overcome the power and dominion of sin.

IN Pirke Aboth, cap. v. 14, it is said there are four kinds of men who visit the synagogues: 1. He who enters, but does not work. 2. He who works, but does not enter. 3. He who enters, and works. 4. He who neither enters, nor works. The first two are indifferent characters; the third is the righteous man; the fourth is wholly evil.—See Schoetgen. *Hor. NOTE 29.—PART XIV.

IN the tract Shabbath, fol. 70. 2. where they dispute concerning the thirty-nine works commanded by Moses, Rabbi Jochanan says, “But if a man do the whole, with the omission of one, he is guilty of the whole, and of every one.” It was a maxim also, among the Jewish doctors, that if a man kept any one commandment faithfully, though he broke all the rest, he might assure himself of the favor of God; for while they taught that “He who transgresses all the precepts of the Law, has broken the yoke, dissolved the covenant, and exposed the Law to contempt; and so has he done who has broken even one precept,” (Mechilta, fol. 5. 1. Jalkut Simeoni, part i. fol. 59. 2.) they also taught, that he who observed any principal command, was equal to him who kept the whole law, (Kiddushin, fol. 39.) and they give, for example, “If a man abandon idolatry, it is the same as if he had fulfilled the whole Law,” (ibid. fol. 40.) To correct these erroneous vacillating doctrines, seems to have been the object of the Apostle. Adam Clarke has collected from Schoetgen many rabbinical doctrines, or traditions, to illustrate this Epistle, which bears evident internal proof that it was written by a Jew to Jews.—

NOTE 30.—PART XIV.

THAT particular and great sins were supposed to be the causes of extraordinary diseases among the Jews is evident from many passages in Scripture:—Deut. xxviii. 15, 21, 22, 27. Ps. xxxvii. 9, &c.; and cvii. 17, 18.; John v. 14.; and when the bodily disorder was cured, the sin was said to be forgiven, 2 Chron. vii. 13, 14. Isa. xxxiii. 24. Matt. ix. 29. Luke v. 20, &c. 1 Cor. xi. 29, 30, 32. It is also expressly declared by St. John, in his First Epistle, chap. v. 16, 17. “there is a sin unto death, and a sin not unto death,” the latter of which is described in the present case; for “the prayer of faith,” or of prophetic impulse, was to be exerted in favor of the latter in both instances.

The confession recommended (verse 16.), was not auricular, or for the purposes of absolution, but was required as a proof of a sincere repentance before the miraculous cure was attempted, that by an acknowledgment of his sins the penitent might obtain the pardon and prayers of the injured parties. The miracle could not be performed if the sick person was not sufficiently penitent (John v. 16.), or if the elders had not the prayer of faith, or if the continued sickness or death of the afflicted person tended more to the glory of God: and it is further certain that neither the apostles nor elders could work miracles but when the Spirit saw proper, and by an impulse intimated it to them (Phil. ii. 26, 27.; 1 Tim. v. 23.; 2 Tim. iv. 17.) The oil was used as a sensible token to the sick person, and to all present, of the miracle about to be performed. It was applied in anticipation of a recovery from some great bodily disease, and not for the cleansing of the soul in the last agonies of death, when there is no hope of life. It is probable that our Saviour appointed this outward sign when he gave commission to his disciples to heal the sick (Matt. x. 8. Luke ix. 2.), for we read, Mark vi. 13., that they made use of it. It could not therefore last after the divine gifts were withdrawn; and where no miraculous interference is expected, its observance becomes a superstition. It might have been originally prescribed on these occasions as emblematical of the peculiar mercy and favor of God, in allusion to the custom of anointing their prophets and kings in the old dispensation. It was always much esteemed by the Jews for its healing qualities, and was used by them as the natural means of recovery, in which sense some supposed it was applied by St. James, intimating that natural means are made efficacious only by the prayer of faith and the divine blessing.

NOTE 31.—PART XIV.

ON ST. LUKE'S GOSPEL.

THE Gospel of St. Matthew, as has been shown, was most probably written during the first or Pauline persecution of the Church, when the Gospel was preached to the Jews only. That of St. Mark under the inspection of St. Peter, in the second or Herodian persecution, when the Gospel was preached to the proselytes. The fitness of these Gospels to the periods, to which the best remaining testimony refers their publication, is an additional evidence that they were then made known. The time had now arrived when the Gospel had been preached over the greater part of the world, by the most learned and most laborious of the apostles of our Lord. St. Paul had now preached to the idolatrous Gentiles for many years, and it is not probable that the numerous converts of this description, who were now added to the Church, should be left without an authentic statement of the facts of Christianity. St. Luke had been long the companion of St. Paul, as he was a learned man, being a physician. He was evidently well qualified to give an account of the labors and travels of the Apostle, and to write also an account of the life of their common Master. Whether Luke was, according to Dr. Lardner, a Jew by birth, and an early convert to Christianity; or, according to Michaelis, a Gentile (see Coloss. iv. 10, 11, 14., where St. Paul distinguished Aristarchus, Marcus, and Jesus, who was called Justus, from Epaphras, Lucas, and Demas, who were of the circumcision, i. e. Jews), or whether he was one of the Seventy, is uncertain. He is the only Evangelist who mentions the commission given by Christ to the Seventy, (Luke x. 1-20.) It is likely he is the Lucius mentioned Rom. xvi. 21., and if so, he was related to the Apostle Paul, and is the Lucius of Cyrene, who is mentioned Acts xiii. 1., and in general with others, Acts xi. 20. Some of the ancients, and some of the most learned and judicious among the moderns, think he was one of the two whom our Lord met on the way to Emmaus, on the day of his resurrection, as related Luke xxiv. 13-35.; one of these was called Cleophas, ver. 18., the other is not mentioned, the Evangelist himself being the person and the relator.

St. Paul styles him his "fellow-laborer," (Philemon, ver. 24.) It is generally believed that he is the person mentioned, Col. iv. 14., "Luke, the beloved physician." All the ancients of repute, as Eusebius, Gregory Nyssen, Jerome, Paulinus, Euthalius, Euthymius, and others, agree that he was a physician; but where he was born and where he exercised the duties of his profession are not known.

He accompanied St. Paul when he first went into Macedonia, Acts xvi. 8-40.; xx.; xxvii.

and xxviii. Whether he went with him constantly afterwards is not certain, but it is evident he accompanied him from Greece, through Macedonia and Asia, to Jerusalem, where he is supposed to have collected many particulars of the evangelic history; from Jerusalem he went with Paul to Rome, where he staid with him the two years of his imprisonment. This alone makes out the space of five years and upwards.

Though there have been various opinions respecting the date of St. Luke's Gospel, it has generally been referred to this period.

Dr. Owen and others refer it to the year 53, while Jones, Michaelis, Lardner, and the majority of biblical critics, assign it to the year 63, or 64, which date appears to be the true one, and corresponds with the internal characters of time exhibited in the Gospel itself. But it is not so easy to ascertain the place where it was written. Jerome says that Luke, the third Evangelist, published his Gospel in the countries of Achaia and Bœotia. Gregory Nazianzen also says, that Luke wrote for the Greeks, or in Achaia. Grotius states, that about the time when Paul left Rome, Luke departed to Achaia, where he wrote the books we now have. Dr. Cave was of opinion that they were at Rome before the termination of Paul's captivity; but Drs. Mill, Grabe, and Wetstein affirm that this Gospel was published at Alexandria in Egypt, in opposition to the Pseudo-Gospel, circulated among the Egyptians. Dr. Lardner has examined these various opinions at considerable length, and concludes that upon the whole, there is no good reason to suppose that St. Luke wrote his Gospel at Alexandria, or that he preached at all in Egypt: on the contrary, it is more probable that when he left Paul he went into Greece, and there composed or finished and published his Gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles. That St. Luke wrote his Gospel for the benefit of the Gentile converts, is affirmed by the unanimous voice of Christendom; and it also may be inferred from his dedicating it to one of his Gentile converts. This indeed appears to have been its peculiar design; for, writing to those who were far remote from the scene of action, and ignorant of Jewish affairs, it was requisite that he should descend to many particulars, and touch on various points, which would have been unnecessary had he written exclusively for the Jews. On this account he begins his history with the birth of John the Baptist (Luke i. 5-80.) as introductory to that of Christ; and in the course of it he notices several particulars mentioned by St. Matthew (Luke ii. 1-9, &c.) Hence also he is particularly careful in specifying various circumstances of facts which were highly conducive to the information of strangers, but which it would not have been necessary to recite to the Jews who could easily supply them from their own knowledge.

PART XV.

NOTE 1.—PART XV.

ON THE ORIGIN AND DATE OF THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

WE are informed by some of the early fathers, that the Ebionites not only rejected the Epistles of St. Paul, but reviled the Apostle himself as a Greek and an apostate. As the Ebionites would probably retain by tradition many of the opinions of the Hebrew Christians, we may infer that his own countrymen reproached St. Paul with the same appellations. They would charge him with abandoning his principles, and following the general custom of apostates, of opposing with virulence and bitterness the religion he had once defended. St. Paul well knew that it would be useless to assert his sincerity to those who still retained the opinions he had relinquished; or to place before them the essential difference between forsaking from caprice or interest the religious system in which a man has been educated, and forsaking it from a deep conviction of its falsehood, founded upon a deliberate, impartial, and serious examination of its evidences. In his imprisonment at Rome he had repeatedly discussed with the Jews the question of Christianity, and in many instances without effect. Where we do not convince, we generally incur reproach; and this was evidently the case with St. Paul. He did not therefore attempt to remove the impressions which had been circulated to his prejudice; he wrote only a full and explicit statement of the doctrines and truths of the Christian religion contained in this masterly Epistle to the Hebrews. Here he proves the Deity of Christ, and the superior excellency of his Gospel when compared with the institutions of Moses, which were now abolished. That he might not excite prejudice against this masterly compendium of Christian truth, he omits his usual style of address. He mentions neither his name nor his apostolic functions. Addressing the Epistle to the Hebrews generally, in whatever part of the world they were to be found, though more especially the Hebrews of Palestine, he writes anonymously, and neither directs his Epistle from any place, nor sends it to any particular Church by a special messenger. The omission of his name, too, is further satisfactorily accounted for by Clemens Alexandrinus, and Jerome. St. Paul would here intimate that as Jesus Christ himself was the peculiar apostle to the Hebrews (as acknowledged in this Epistle, chap. iii. 1.), St. Paul declined through humility to assume the title of an apostle.—See Lardner, vol. ii. p. 211, vi. p. 411, 412. To which Theodoret adds, that St. Paul being peculiarly the apostle of the uncircumcision, as the rest were of the circumcision, (Gal. ii. 9. Rom. xi. 13.), he scrupled to assume any public character when writing to their department, that he might not be thought forward or obtrusive, as if wishing “to build upon another’s foundation,” which he always disclaimed, (Rom. xv. 20. Lardner, ii. p. 412.) He did not mention his name, messenger, or particular persons to whom it was sent, because, as Lardner judiciously remarks, such a long letter might give umbrage to the ruling powers at this crisis, when the Jews were most turbulent, and might endanger himself, the messenger, and those to whom it was directed. But they might know the author easily by the style and writing, and even from the messenger, without any formal notice or superscription.

Clement of Alexandria, Jerome, Euthalius, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and other fathers, were of opinion that the Epistle to the Hebrews was sent more particularly to the converted Jews living in Judæa, who in the Apostle’s days were called Hebrews, to distinguish them from the Jews in the Gentile countries, who were called Hellenists or Grecians, (Acts vi. 1. ix. 29. xi. 20.) The opinion of these learned fathers is adopted by Beza, Louis Capel, Carpsov, Drs. Lightfoot, Whitby, Mill, Lardner, and Macknight, Bishops Pearson and Tomline, Hallet, Rosenmüller, Scott, and others. Michaelis considers it as written for the use of the Jewish Christians at Jerusalem and in Palestine; and observes that it is a question of little or no moment, whether it was sent to Jerusalem alone, or to other cities in Palestine; because that this Epistle, though it was intended for the use of Jewish converts at Jerusalem, must equally have concerned the other Jewish converts in that country. This very ancient opinion is corroborated by the contents of the Epistle itself, in which we meet with many things peculiarly suitable to the believers in Judæa.

1st. In this Epistle the Apostle does not, according to his usual practice, make frequent exhortations to brotherly love and unity, because it was sent to Christian communities in Palestine, which consisted wholly of Jewish converts. It is true that the author speaks of brotherly love (xiii. 1.) where he says, “Let brotherly love continue;” but he speaks only in general terms, and says nothing of unity between Jewish and heathen converts. Moreover, he uses the word "continue," which implies that no disunion had actually taken place among its members.

2dly. The persons to whom it was addressed were evidently in imminent danger of falling back from Christianity to Judaism, induced partly by a severe persecution, and partly by the false arguments of the rabbins. This could hardly have happened to several communities at the same time in any other country than Palestine, and therefore we cannot suppose it of several communities of Asia Minor, to which, in the opinion of some commentators, the Epistle was addressed. Christianity enjoyed, from the tolerating spirit of the Roman laws and the Roman magistrates, throughout the empire in general, so much religious liberty, that out of Palestine it would have been difficult to have effected a general persecution. But, through the influence of the Jewish Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, the Christians in that country underwent several severe persecutions, especially during the high priesthood of the younger Ananus, when St. James and other Christians suffered martyrdom.

3dly. In the other Epistles of St. Paul, more particularly those to the Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, we shall find there is no apprehension of any apostacy to Judaism, and still less of blasphemy against Christ, as we find in the sixth and tenth chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The two passages of this Epistle (vi. 6.; x. 29.), which relate to blasphemy against Christ, as a person justly condemned and crucified, are peculiarly adapted to the communities in Palestine; and it is difficult to read these passages without inferring that several Christians had really apostatized and openly blasphemed Christ: for it appears from Acts xxvi. 11., that violent measures were taken in Palestine for this very purpose, of which we meet with no traces in any other country at that early age. Neither the Epistles of St. Paul, nor those of St. Peter, furnish any instance of a public renunciation of Christianity and return to Judaism: and if such an occurrence had taken place, it could not have escaped their most serious attention, and would have extorted their most severe reproofs. The circumstance, that several, who still continued Christians, forsook the places of public worship (x. 25.) does not occur in any other Epistle, and implies a general and continued persecution, which deterred the Christians from an open confession of their faith. Under these sufferings the Hebrews are comforted by the promised coming of Christ, which they are to await with patience, as being not far distant, (x. 25-38.) This can be no other than the promised destruction of Jerusalem (Matt. xxiv.) of which Christ himself said, (Luke xxi. 28.) "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh."

Now this coming of Christ was to the Christians in Palestine a deliverance from the yoke with which they were oppressed: but it had no such influence on the Christians of other countries. On the contrary, the first persecution under Nero happened in the year 65, about two years before the commencement of the Jewish war, and the second under Domitian, about five-and-twenty years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

4thly. According to Josephus several persons were put to death during the high priesthood of the younger Ananus, about the year 64 or 65 (See Heb. xiii. 7.)

5thly. The declarations in Heb. i. 2. and iv. 12., and particularly the exhortation in ii. 1-4., are peculiarly suitable to the believers of Judæa, where Jesus Christ himself first taught, and his disciples after him, confirming their testimony with very numerous and conspicuous miracles.

6thly. The people to whom this Epistle was sent were well acquainted with our Saviour's sufferings, as those of Judæa must have been. This appears in Heb. i. 3. ii. 9, 18. v. 7, 8. ix. 14, 28. x. 11. xii. 2, 3. and xiii. 12.

7thly. The censure in chap. v. 12. is most properly understood of Christians in Jerusalem and Judæa, to whom the Gospel was first preached.

8thly. Lastly, the exhortation in Heb. xiii. 12-14. is very difficult to be explained, on the supposition that the Epistle was exclusively written to Hebrews who lived out of Palestine; for neither in the Acts of the Apostles, nor in the other Epistles, do we meet with an instance of expulsion from the synagogue merely for belief in Christ; on the contrary, the apostles themselves were permitted to teach openly in the Jewish assemblies. But if we suppose that the Epistle was written to Jewish converts in Jerusalem, this passage becomes perfectly clear, and, Dr. Lardner observes, must have been very suitable to their case, especially if it was written only a short time before the commencement of the Jewish war, about the year 65 or 66. The Christians, on this supposition, are exhorted to endure their fate with patience, if they should be obliged to retire, or even be ignominiously expelled from Jerusalem, since Christ himself had been forced out of this very city, and had suffered without its walls. If we suppose, therefore, that the Epistle was written to the Hebrews of Jerusalem, the passage in question is clear: but on the hypothesis, that it was written to Hebrews who lived in any other place, the words "Let us go forth unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach," lose their meaning. The "approaching day," chap. x. 25., can signify only the day appointed for the destruction of Jerusalem, and the downfall of the Jewish nation; but this event immediately concerned only the Hebrews of Palestine, and could have no influence in determining the conduct of the inhabitants of any other country.

Michaelis, in an elaborate dissertation (vol. iv. p. 186-268.) has endeavoured to set aside the authenticity of this Epistle, by the following positions:—

1. That the style is so very different from that of St. Paul in his genuine Epistles, that he could not possibly have been the author of this Greek Epistle, p. 252.

2. That it was originally written in Hebrew, but whether by St. Paul or not is doubtful, p. 257.

3. That it was early translated into Greek, but by whom is unknown, p. 247.

"An hypothesis," says Dr. Hales, "at once so dogmatical and skeptical, calculated to pull down, not to build up or edify; to unsettle the faith of wavering Christians, and to rob this most learned and most highly-illuminated Apostle of his right and title to the most noble and most finished of all his compositions, and this too upon the paradoxical plea of its acknowledged excellence, both of style and subject (which none assents to more cheerfully than Michaelis, p. 242, 243, 247.) imperiously demands our consideration;" fortunately, this copious writer has furnished materials in abundance for his own refutation, from which we shall select a few.

I. Objections drawn from dissimilarity of style are often fanciful and fallacious. On the contrary, a striking analogy may be traced between this and the rest of St. Paul's Epistles, in the use of singular and remarkable words and compound terms; in the mode of constructing the sentences by long and involved parentheses, &c., with this difference, however, that this being more leisurely written, and better digested in his confinement, is more compressed in its argument, and more polished in its style, than the rest, which were written with all the ease and freedom of epistolary correspondence, often in haste, during his travels.

The following remarkable instances of analogy we owe to Michaelis.

Ch. x. 33. Θεαριζόμενοι, is an expression perfectly agreeable to St. Paul's mode of writing, as appears from 1 Cor. iv. 9. But since other writers may likewise have used the same metaphor, the application of it in the present instance shows only that St. Paul might have written the Epistle to the Hebrews; not that he really did write it, p. 256. But it is answered, there is a propriety in its use here that fits no other writer but St. Paul; and this by Michaelis' own confession. It is here applied to the Apostle's public persecutions; "exposed on a theatre to public revilings and afflictions," exactly corresponding to his complaint to the Corinthians, in the parallel text, Θέατρον ἐγενήθημεν τῷ κόσμῳ, "We were made a spectacle unto the world;" and how? the same Epistle will inform us afterwards; "after the (barbarous) custom of men, I fought with wild beasts at Ephesus," in the public theatre (1 Cor. xv. 32.), literally, not figuratively; according to the judicious remark of Benson, supported by Michaelis himself, who assures us, that St. Paul's deliverance from the lion's mouth at Rome afterwards (2 Tim. iv. 17.), was "not from suffering death by the sword, but from being exposed in the amphitheatre to wild beasts as several Christians had already been, and in a very cruel manner," for which he refers to Tacitus, Annal. 15. 44. in his note, p. 176.

Ch. x. 30. Ἐμοὶ ἐκδιχῆσις, ἐγὼ ἀνταποδώσω, is a quotation from Deut. xxxii. 35. which differs both from the Hebrew text and from the Septuagint; and this passage is again quoted in the very same words, Rom. xii. 19. This agreement in a reading which has hitherto been discovered in no other place (see the new Orient. Bibl. vol. v. p. 231-236.) might form a presumptive argument, that both quotations were made by the same person; and consequently, that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by St. Paul. But the argument, says Michaelis, is not decisive; for it is very possible, that in the first century there were manuscripts with this reading, in Deut. xxxii. 35. from which St. Paul might have copied, in Rom. xii. 19., and the translator of this Epistle in Heb. x. 30., same page, 256.

A more decided instance of skepticism is rarely to be found. To any other the "presumptive argument" would appear irresistible, not to be overturned by a bare possibility, but a very high improbability; since this remarkable rendering is to be found in "no other place," but in these two passages, as he himself acknowledges. The present Septuagint reading is found in both the Vatican and Alexandrine, and was probably therefore the original reading of the first century. The Apostle's rendering, in both places, is more correct and critical than the Septuagint, in the first clause ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐκδικήσεως, which is only a paraphrase, not a translation, like his ἐμοὶ ἐκδιχῆσις, of the Hebrew נָקַם י', and in the second the joint rendering ἀνταποδώσω is founded on a various reading, וְשָׁלַם, supported by a parallel verse, Deut. xxxii. 41., and followed not only by the Septuagint, but by the Syriac, Vulgate, and Chaldee. It is therefore greatly superior to the present Masorete, וְשָׁלַם, "and recompense," supported only by the Arabic version, and followed by the English Bible, evidently for the worse. And the Apostle has further improved upon the Septuagint, in the common term ἀνταποδώσω by the emphatic prefix Ἐγὼ, which makes it stronger, as appropriated to the Almighty, than even the original Hebrew, which wants the personal pronoun.

II. Michaelis asks, "Why did the author of the Syriac version translate this Epistle from the Greek, if the original was in Hebrew?" p. 231.

The Syriac version was the earliest of all, written in the apostolic age, and in the day of the Apostle Adæus, Thaddæus, or Jude, according to the judicious Abulfaragi, and near the end of the first century, according to Michaelis, vol. ii. p. 30. If, then, this most ancient version was translated immediately from the Greek, surely the presumption is infinitely strong, that there was then no Hebrew original. This argument, indeed, furnished by himself, seems decisive also to prove the canonical authority of the Greek Epistle in the judgment of the Syriac translator; for why should he adopt the Epistle, unless written by the Apostle to whom the voice of the Church had assigned it? Surely John or Jude the apostle would not have suffered it otherwise to have been admitted into the Sacred Canon, either of the Greek or Syriac Testament.

Assuming it, however, to have been written in Hebrew, Michaelis draws the following objection from a supposed blunder of the translator into Greek, to show that he could not possibly be St. Paul, which most completely recoils upon himself, and proves irrefragably that the Greek was the original, and written by the Apostle.

Ch. xii. 18. Οὐ γὰρ προσεληλύθατε ψηλαφωμένῳ ὄρει.—ver. 22. Ἀλλὰ προσεληλύθατε Σιών ὄρει.

“Here,” says he, “the expression ὄρει ψηλαφωμένῳ, monti palpabili, which is opposed to Σιών ὄρει, is certainly a very extraordinary one; and I am wholly unable to give a satisfactory account of it, except on the supposition that the Epistle was written in Hebrew. But on this supposition the inaccuracy may be easily assigned. Sinai, or the mountain of Moses, is that which is here opposed to Mount Sion. Now the expression ‘to the mountain of Moses,’ is in Hebrew לְהַר כְּשֵׁי מֹשֶׁה. This word כְּשֵׁי the translator misunderstood, and, instead of reading it כְּשֵׁי, and taking it for a proper name, either read by mistake כֶּשֶׁ, palpatio, or pronounced by mistake כֶּשֶׁה, palpatio. Hence, instead of rendering ‘to the mountain of Moses,’ he rendered ‘to the tangible mountain.’”

But this “mountain of Moses” is a creation of his own brain. For “Sinai in Arabia,” the mountain here meant by the apostle, pursuing his former allegory, Gal. iv. 24–26., is no where so styled in Scripture, but rather “the mountain of God,” Exod. iii. 1, &c. “the mountain of the Lord,” Numb. xxx. 33., or the holy place,” Ps. lxxviii. 17., because it was honored with the presence of the God of Israel. To call it, therefore, by the name of Moses, or indeed of any mortal, would have been sacrilege. To what, then, did the Apostle refer in the remarkable term ψηλαφωμένῳ? Evidently to the divine injunction to the people and their cattle, not to ascend or touch it, beyond the prescribed limits near its foot, under pain of death, Exod. xix. 12–24. Alluding to this awful command, the Apostle beautifully contrasts the terrors of the Law delivered on the earthly Sinai, not to be touched under pain of death, with the superabundant grace of the Gospel, promising to the faithful eternal life in the heavenly Sion; to which, by an admirable anticipation, he represents them as already come (προσεληλύθατε).

Michaelis was rather too fond of displaying his Oriental learning, and never surely was there a more unfortunate specimen than this.

III. He is not less unfortunate in his last quotation: he rested this principally on the testimony of Origen, who, according to Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. b. vi. ch. xxv., “held that the matter of the Epistle was from St. Paul, but the construction of the words from another, who recorded the thoughts of the Apostle, and made notes, as it were, or commentaries of what was said by his master,” p. 246.

Having delivered his own opinion, Origen adds, “If then any Church (or whatsoever Church) holds this Epistle as Paul’s, it should be commended, even upon this account; for it was not without reason the primitive worthies have handed it down as Paul’s; but who wrote the Epistle (in its present form) truly God indeed knows. The historical account that has reached us is various and uncertain; some saying that Clemens, who was bishop of Rome, wrote the Epistle, others Luke, who wrote the Gospel and Acts,” p. 247.

Michaelis here thinks that by ἱστορία εἰς ἡμᾶς φθόσασσα, Origen meant “oral accounts,” and he contends that “neither of these contradictory accounts can be true, for the style of the Epistle to the Hebrews is neither that of St. Luke, nor that of Clement of Rome; and the latter especially, if we may judge from what is now extant of his works, had it not even in his power to write an epistle so replete with Jewish learning,” p. 247.

What now is the force of Origen’s evidence, supposing that his opinion is fairly and fully related by Eusebius, which may be doubted? Why surely, that St. Paul was the original author of the Epistle, as confirmed by primitive tradition. The oral account upon which he founded his conjecture was vague; and Michaelis has satisfactorily shown, that it could not be true in either case: what then remains by all the rules of right reasoning? Unquestionably, that, rejecting the oral account as false, we should embrace the primitive tradition as true, and consequently admit that no one but the Apostle himself could be the author of an Epistle so replete with Jewish learning, who was educated at the feet of Gamaliel himself (Acts xxii. 3.) and disputed with the first Jewish rabbis of the age, in Asia, Greece, and Rome.

By the failure, therefore, of the paradoxical hypothesis of Michaelis, in all its branches, the positive evidence is still further strengthened; we may now rest assured, that the Epistle was written in Greek, not in Hebrew, by St. Paul himself, not by any one else.

The Epistle itself furnishes us with decisive and positive evidence that it was originally written in the language in which it is now extant.

In the first place, the style of this Epistle throughout manifests that it is no translation. It has no appearance of constraint, nor do we meet with those Hebraisms which occur so constantly in the Septuagint version.

The numerous paronomasias, or concurrences of words of like sound, but which cannot be rendered in English with due effect, are also a clear proof that it is not a translation. See in Heb. v. 8, 14.; vii. 3, 19.; ix. 10.; x. 34.; xi. 37.; and xiii. 14. (in the Greek.)

Hebrew names are interpreted; as Melchisedek, by "King of Righteousness," (vii. 2.) and Salem, by "Peace," which would have been superfluous, if the Epistle had been written in Hebrew.

The passages cited from the Old Testament in this Epistle, are not quoted from the Hebrew, but from the Septuagint, where that faithfully represented the Hebrew text. Frequently the stress of the argument taken from such quotations relies on something peculiar in that version, which could not possibly have taken place if the Epistle had been written in Hebrew. And in a few instances where the Septuagint did not fully render the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, the author of the Epistle has substituted translations of his own, from which he argues in the same manner, whence it is manifest that this Epistle never was extant in Hebrew. See Dr. Owen's Fifth Exercitation on the Hebrews, vol. i. p. 46-53, folio edition. Calvin, and several other divines, have laid much stress upon the rendering of the Hebrew word berith by διαθήκη, which denotes either testament or covenant: and Michaelis acknowledges the weight of this argument, to prove that the Epistle to the Hebrews was originally written in Greek.

Among the Jews there were several dialects spoken, as the East Aramæan or Chaldee, and the West Aramæan or Syriac; which suffered various alterations from the places where the Jews were dispersed; so that the original Hebrew was known comparatively to few, and those who were conversant in Syriac might not be acquainted with the Chaldee. If therefore this Epistle had been written in biblical Hebrew, only a few could have read it; and in either of the other dialects, a part only of the Jews could have perused it.

With regard to the objection, that the Apostle's name is not at the beginning of this Epistle, Clement of Alexandria, who is followed by Jerome, observes, that Jesus Christ himself was the peculiar Apostle to the Hebrews, (as acknowledged in this Epistle, iii. 1.); St. Paul therefore probably declined, through humility, to assume the title of an apostle. He did not mention his name, messenger, or the particular persons to whom it was sent, because (as Dr. Lardner judiciously remarks) such a long letter might give umbrage to the ruling powers at this crisis, when the Jews were most turbulent, and might endanger himself, the messenger, and those to whom it was directed. And as he was considered by the zealots as an apostate from the religion of their fathers, his name, instead of adding weight, might have prevented the Judaizing and unbelieving Jews even from reading his Epistle. The author, however, would be easily known, without any formal notice or superscription; and the omission of the Apostle's name is no proof that the Epistle to the Hebrews was not written by St. Paul: for in the three Epistles of St. John, which are universally acknowledged to be the productions of an inspired apostle, the name of the writer is not inserted. The first Epistle begins in the same manner as the Epistle to the Hebrews; and, in the other two, he calls himself simply the elder or presbyter. That the Apostle, however, did not mean to conceal himself, we learn from the Epistle itself: "Know ye," says he, "that our brother Timothy hath been sent abroad, with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you," (Heb. xiii. 23.) The objection therefore, from the omission of the Apostle's name, necessarily falls to the ground.

The passages which have been adduced as unsuitable to the apostolic mission, and which have been cited as proofs that this Epistle could not therefore have been written by St. Paul, are Heb. ii. 1, 3. and xii. 1. It is here considered that the writer speaks of himself as one not at all distinguished, and in the second passage, according to Grotius and Le Clerc, as one who had received the knowledge of the Gospel, not himself from Christ, but from his apostles. To this it is again replied, that it was usual with St. Paul to join himself to those with whom he writes, particularly when he is mentioning any thing that is unpalatable or dishonorable to them (see Tit. iii. 3., and frequently in Romans); and in this verse (chap. ii. 3.) he does not imply that he received the knowledge of the Gospel from those who heard Christ preach, but that the salvation which was given to St. Paul by the Lord, was confirmed to him by the preaching of the apostles; and St. Paul often appealed, as well as the other apostles, in this manner to the testimony of eyewitnesses in confirmation of things made known to himself by revelation, (Acts xiii. 30, 31.; 1 Cor. xv. 5-9.; 2 Tim. ii. 2.; 1 Pet. i. 12.; Jude 17.)—See Macknight's Preface to the Hebrews.

^a Michaelis thinks it highly improbable that St. Paul would visit Jerusalem again, and expose his life to the zealots there. But surely, Dr. Hales remarks, he might revisit Judæa without incurring that danger. See Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 1130.

With regard to the objection, that this Epistle is superior in point of style to St. Paul's other writings, and therefore is not the production of that Apostle, we have already remarked that this may be accounted for by the circumstance that it was one of St. Paul's latest written Epistles, composed in his mature age, and after long intercourse with the learned Gentiles. But "there does not appear to be such a superiority in the style of this Epistle, as should lead to the conclusion that it was not written by St. Paul. Those who have thought differently have mentioned Barnabas, Luke, and Clement, as authors or translators of this Epistle. The opinion of Jerome was, that 'the sentiments are the Apostle's, but the language and composition of some one else, who committed to writing the Apostle's sense, and, as it were, reduced into commentaries the things spoken by his master.'" Dr. Lardner says, "My conjecture is, that St. Paul dictated the Epistle in Hebrew, and another, who was a great master of the Greek language, immediately wrote down the Apostle's sentiments in his own elegant Greek; but who this assistant of the Apostle was, is altogether unknown." But the writings of St. Paul, like those of other authors, may not all have the same degree of merit; and if it should be considered that the Epistle to the Hebrews is written with greater elegance than the other compositions of this Apostle, it should be remembered that there is nothing in it which amounts to a marked difference of style; but, on the contrary, there are the same construction of sentences, the same style of expression, and the same sentiments expressed, in this Epistle, which occur in no part of the Scriptures except in St. Paul's Epistles.

There are also the striking peculiarities which distinguish his writings, the same abrupt transitions, returning frequently to his subject, which he illustrates by forcible arguments, by short expressions, or sometimes by a single word. The same elliptical expressions to be supplied either by the preceding or subsequent clause, with reasonings addressed to the thoughts, and answers to specious objections, which would naturally occur, and therefore required removing.

The numerous resemblances and agreements between this Epistle and those of St. Paul's acknowledged productions, have been collected at great length by Braunius, Carpzoy, Lardner, and Macknight, from whom Horne has made the following abridgment.

1. "Coincidences between the exhortations in this Epistle and those in St. Paul's other letters. See Heb. xii. 3. compared with Gal. vi. 9. 2 Thess. iii. 13. and Eph. iii. 13.; Heb. xii. 14. with Rom. xii. 18.; Heb. xiii. 1, 3, 4. with Eph. v. 2-4.; Heb. xiii. 16. with Phil. iv. 18. See also Acts ii. 42. Rom. xv. 26. 2 Cor. viii. 24. and ix. 13.

2. "Instances of agreement in the style or phrases of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and in the acknowledged Epistles of St. Paul. See Heb. ii. 4. compared with Rom. xv. 19. 2 Cor. xii. 12. and 2 Thess. ii. 9.; Heb. ii. 14. with 2 Tim. i. 10. and 1 Cor. xv. 26.; Heb. iii. 1. with Phil. iii. 14. and 2 Tim. i. 9.; Heb. v. 12. with 1 Cor. iii. 2.; Heb. viii. 1. with Eph. i. 21.; Heb. viii. 5. and x. 1. with Col. ii. 17.; Heb. x. 33. with 1 Cor. iv. 9.; Heb. xiii. 9. with Eph. iv. 14.; Heb. xiii. 10, 11. with 1 Cor. ix. 13.; Heb. xiii. 20, 21. with Rom. xv. 33. xvi. 20. Phil. iv. 9. 1 Thess. v. 23. and 2 Cor. xiii. 11.

3. "In his acknowledged Epistles, St. Paul has numerous allusions to the exercises and games which were then in great repute, and were frequently solemnized in Greece and in other parts of the Roman empire. In the Epistle to the Hebrews we have several of these allusions, which are also expressed with great elegance. Compare Heb. vi. 18. xii. 1-4, 12. with 1 Cor. ix. 24. Phil. iii. 12-14. 2 Tim. ii. 5. iv. 6-8. and Acts xx. 24.

4. "In the Epistle to the Hebrews there are interpretations of some passages of the Jewish Scriptures, which may properly be called St. Paul's, because they are to be found only in his writings. For example, Psalm ii. 7. "Thou art my Son: to-day I have begotten thee;" is applied to Jesus (Heb. i. 5.) just as St. Paul, in his discourse to the Jews in the synagogue of Antioch in Pisidia, applied the same passage of Scripture to him, (Acts xiii. 33.) In like manner, the explication of Psalm viii. 4. and of Psalm cx. 1. given by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25, 27., is found in Heb. ii. 7, 8. So also the explication of the covenant with Abraham, given Heb. vi. 14, 18., is nowhere found but in St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, (iii. 8, 9, 14, 18.)

5. "There are, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, doctrines which none of the inspired writers have mentioned, except Paul. In particular, the doctrines of the mediation and intercession of Christ, explained in Heb. iv. 15, 16. and vii. 22, 25. are nowhere found in the books of the New Testament, except in St. Paul's Epistles, (Rom. viii. 34. Gal. iii. 19, 20.) The title of Mediator, which is given to Jesus, (Heb. vii. 22. viii. 6. ix. 15. xii. 24.) is nowhere applied to Jesus except in St. Paul's Epistles, (1 Tim. ii. 5.) In like manner none of the inspired writers, except St. Paul, (Heb. viii. 1-4.) have informed us that Christ offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven; and that he did not exercise his priestly office on earth, but only in heaven.

6. "In the Epistle to the Hebrews, we find such enlarged views of the divine dispensations respecting religion; such an extensive knowledge of the Jewish Scriptures, according to their ancient and true interpretation, which St. Paul, no doubt, learned from the celebrated doctor, under whose tuition he studied in his younger years at Jerusalem; such a deep insight also into the most recondite meanings of these Scriptures, and such admirable reasonings founded thereon, for the confirmation of the Gospel revelation, as, without disparagement to the other apostles, seem to have exceeded, not their natural abilities and education only, but even that degree of inspiration with which they were endowed. None of them but St. Paul, who was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and who profited in the Jewish religion and learning above many of his fellow-students, and who, in his riper years, was intimately acquainted with the learned men of his own nation (Acts ix. 1, 2, 14. xxvi. 4, 5.), and who was called to the apostleship by Christ himself, when for that purpose he appeared to him from heaven; nay, who was caught up by Christ into the third heaven; was equal to the subjects treated of in this most admirable Epistle." And, as Dr. Hales remarks, it is a masterly supplement to the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, and also a luminous commentary on them; showing that all the legal dispensation was originally designed to be superseded by the new and better covenant of the Christian dispensation in a connected chain of argument, evincing the profoundest knowledge of both. The internal excellence of this Epistle, as connecting the Old Testament and the New in the most convincing and instructive manner, and elucidating both more fully than any other Epistle, or perhaps than all of them, places its divine inspiration beyond all doubt.

7. "The conclusion of this Epistle has a remarkable agreement with the conclusions of St. Paul's Epistles, in several respects. Compare Heb. xii. 18. with Rom. xv. 30. Eph. vi. 18, 19. Col. iv. 3. 1 Thess. v. 25. and 2 Thess. iii. 1.; Heb. xiii. 20, 21. with Rom. xv. 30-33. Eph. vi. 19-23. 1 Thess. v. 23. and 2 Thess. iii. 16. Heb. xiii. 24. with Rom. xvi. 1 Cor. xvi. 19-21. 2 Cor. xiii. 13. Phil. iv. 21, 22.; Heb. xiii. 25. with 2 Thess. iii. 18. Col. iv. 18. Eph. vi. 24. 1 Tim. vi. 21. 2 Tim. iv. 22. and Tit. iii. 15."

We may justly therefore conclude, with Carpzov, Whitby, Lardner, Macknight, Hales, Rosenmüller, Bengel, Bishop Tomline, and almost every other modern commentator, and biblical critic, that the weight of evidence, both internal and external, preponderates so greatly in favor of St. Paul, that we cannot but consider the Epistle to the Hebrews as written by that Apostle, and that the tradition preserved in the Church is correct; that this work is an inspired composition of the great Apostle of the Gentiles. It is acknowledged to be St. Paul's production by the Apostle Peter, in his Second Epistle, (iii. 15, 16.); from which passage it is evident, that St. Peter had read all St. Paul's letters; and that St. Paul had written to those Christians to whom St. Peter was then writing, that is, to the believing Jews in general, (2 Pet. i. 1.); and to those of the dispersion mentioned in 1 Pet. i. 1.; and as there is no evidence to prove that this Epistle was lost, there is every reason to conclude that it must be that which is now inscribed to the Hebrews, both these Apostles having treated on the same subjects.

If, then, St. Paul, as we believe, was the author of this Epistle, the time when it was written may easily be determined, for the salutation from the saints in Italy (Heb. xiii. 24.), together with the Apostle's promise to see the Hebrews shortly, plainly intimates that his imprisonment was then terminated, or on the point of being so. It was therefore written from Italy, perhaps from Rome, soon after the Epistles to the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, and not long before St. Paul left Italy, viz. at the end of A. D. 62, or early in 63. Of this opinion was Mill, Wetstein, Tillemont, Lardner, Macknight, and the great majority of critics. Dr. Lardner thinks it was probably written from Rome.

St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians was written at Ephesus; nevertheless he says (chap. xvi. 19.) "The churches of Asia salute you." So now he might send salutations from the Christians of Italy, not excluding, but including, those at Rome, together with the rest throughout that country. The argument of L'Enfant and Beausobre, that St. Paul was not yet set at liberty, because he requested the prayers of the Hebrews, that he might be restored to them the sooner, appears to me not of any weight. Though St. Paul was no longer a prisoner, he might request the prayers of those to whom he had written, that he might have a prosperous journey to them, whom he was desirous to visit; and that all impediments of his intended journey might be removed; and many such there might be, though he was no longer under confinement. St. Paul was not a prisoner when he wrote his Epistle to the Romans, yet he was very fervent in his prayers to God, that he might have a prosperous journey, and come to them, (chap. i. 10.) For determining the time of this Epistle, it may be observed that, when the Apostle wrote the Epistle to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon, he had hopes of deliverance. At the writing of all these Epistles, Timothy was present with him; but now he was absent, as plainly appears from chap. xiii. 23. This leads us to think that this Epistle was written after them. And it is not unlikely that the Apostle had now obtained that liberty which he expected when they were written.

Moreover, in the Epistle to the Philippians, he speaks of sending Timothy to them, (chap. ii. 19, 23.) "But I trust in the Lord Jesus, to send Timothy shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state. (Timothy, therefore, if sent, was to come back to the Apostle.) Him, therefore, I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me."

It is probable that Timothy did go to the Philippians, soon after writing the above-mentioned Epistle, the Apostle having gained good assurance of being quite released from his confinement; and this Epistle to the Hebrews was written during the time of that absence, for it is said, Heb. xiii. 23., "Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty, or has been sent abroad." The word is capable of that meaning, and it is a better and more likely meaning, because it suits the coherence. And I suppose that Timothy did soon come to the Apostle, and that they both sailed to Judæa, and after that went to Ephesus, where Timothy was left to reside with his peculiar charge.

Thus this Epistle was written at Rome, or in Italy, soon after St. Paul had been released from his confinement at Rome, in the beginning of the year 63. And I suppose it to be the last written of all St. Paul's Epistles which have come down to us, or of which we have any knowledge.

The occasion of writing this Epistle will be sufficiently apparent from an attentive review of its contents. The Jews did every thing in their power to withdraw their brethren, who had been converted, from the Christian faith. To persecutions and threats, they added arguments derived from the excellency of the Jewish religion. They regarded the Law of Moses as given by the ministration of angels; that Moses was far superior to Jesus of Nazareth, who suffered an ignominious death; that the public worship of God, instituted by their great legislator and prophet, was truly splendid, and worthy of Jehovah: while the Christians, on the contrary, had no established priesthood, no temple, no altars, no victims, &c.

These arguments, being both plausible and successful, and supported by the Doctors, Scribes, and Elders of Jerusalem, the Apostle, who was himself a doctor most learned in the Law, wrote this Epistle to prove that the same God who gave the former revelations of his will to the fathers of the Jewish nation, by his prophets, had in these last days spoken to all mankind by his Son; consequently that these revelations, emanating from the same divine source, could not possibly contradict each other. The Epistle may be considered as the key to the Old Testament, unlocking all its hidden mysteries, and may be divided into three separate heads. First, that which relates to the person of the Son of God, as it had described him in the Old Testament. Secondly, to show that the religion of the Gospel is the same under both Testaments, being shadowed out in the Old. And thirdly, to prove that the Church of Israel was a figure of the Church of Christ.

NOTE 2.—PART XV.

THE word αἰγλαία signifies splendor in itself. The word ἀπαύγασμα, here used, is derived from it, and signifies the emitted, or proceeding splendor; or, as it is expressed in the Nicene Creed, "light of light." As the light proceeding from the sun, although of the same essence, is distinct from the sun, so there is one person of the Father, and another of the Son. The Son is of the Father alone, not made, nor created, but begotten; of the same essence, bearing the very impression of his substance.

NOTE 3.—PART XV.

THE Apostle here endeavours to prove that the Law did not rest in temporal promises, or as the seventh article expresses it, that "both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life was offered to mankind by Christ. Wherefore they are not to be heard, which feign, that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises." The Gospel was preached before to Abraham (Gal. iii. 8.), and the Israelites were called out of Egypt under Moses, to take possession of an unknown promised land; so are Christians, under the Gospel, called by Christ, the Law-giver of the New Testament, out of the Egypt of this world, that they may prepare for an unknown and heavenly country. The revealed will of God has been made manifest from the foundations of the world, the nature of man being unchanged, and Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. The histories of the eminent men of the Old Testament prefigured the divine life and character of the promised Messiah, and the chosen people of God illustrated in their history the warfare to which Christians are exposed, and the blessings of which they are made partakers in the Gospel.

NOTE 4.—PART XV.

ADAM CLARKE remarks, "the Law and the Word of God in general is repeatedly compared to a two-edged sword among the Jewish writers, חרב שתי פיות, 'the sword with two mouths.' By this sword the man himself lives, and by it he destroys his enemies." See also Schoetgen. In Ephesians vi. 17. the doctrine of the Gospel is called "a Sword of the Spirit;" and in Revelation i. 16., the Word of God is spoken of as "a sharp two-edged Sword which went out from the mouth of Christ." See Isaiah xi. 4. As the Apostle is representing throughout, that the Gospel was described by the Law, as a body is by its shadow, there is reason to suppose that in the expression here used, both the Old and New Testaments were included.

NOTE 5.—PART XV.

COMMENTATORS are much divided as to the signification of this verse, some supposing these bitter supplications of Christ to be offered to save him from lying under the power of death, from which fear he was delivered; or as some interpret it, he was heard for his piety: and others refer them (which appears to me the most correct opinion) to his agony in the garden. As the second Adam, I have already shown that the Devil, who had departed from Christ for a season, was then permitted to assault him with all the powers of darkness, and with the whole weight of temptation to which the human nature could be exposed. At this unconceivable spiritual agony and conflict, the weakness of man showed itself, and he earnestly prayed that this trial might be spared him; but as the representative of man, it was appointed for him to submit to that agony of spirit which sin without an atonement had passed on all mankind. As both temporal and spiritual death were pronounced on the fall of the first Adam, so did the second Adam, in accomplishing our redemption, suffer and triumph over both.—See notes 33, 34, part vi. p. 164, 165, 166.

NOTE 6.—PART XV.

THE Apostle is supposed in this analogy to refer to the great spiritual advantages enjoyed by the Jews, and to foretell as a punishment of their abuse of them, and their apostacy, the approaching destruction of their city and temple, which took place about seven years after—they were therefore "nigh unto cursing."

NOTE 7.—PART XV.

FULFILLED seven years after, in the destruction of the temple and Jerusalem.

NOTE 8.—PART XV.

ST. CYRIL gives the following interpretation:—Although Christ is but one, yet he is understood by us under a variety of forms—He is the tabernacle, on account of the human body in which he dwelt—He is the table, because he is our bread of life—He is the ark, which has the law of God enclosed within, because he is the word of the Father—He is the candlestick, because he is the spiritual light—He is the altar of incense, because he is the sweet-smelling odor in sanctification—He is the altar of burnt-offering, because he is the victim by death on the cross for the sins of the whole world.

Macknight observes on this subject—"By introducing these things into the inward tabernacle, which represented heaven, and by placing them in the manner described, the Holy Ghost may be supposed to have signified, that in heaven the knowledge and memory of the divine dispensations to mankind, and God's interpositions in behalf of nations and individuals, will be preserved, and be the subject of devout contemplation, not only to the redeemed, but to the angelical hosts, represented by the cherubim overshadowing the mercy-seat."—1 Pet. i. 12. Eph. iii. 10.

NOTE 9.—PART XV.

DODDRIDGE supposes that St. Paul here refers to the manifestation which God made of himself upon Mount Sion, as being milder than that upon Mount Sinai. "Sion," he proceeds, "was the city of God. In the temple, which stood there, cherubim were the ornaments of the walls, both in the holy, and most holy place, to signify the presence of angels. There was a general assembly and congregation of the priests, which were substituted instead of the first born, of whose names catalogues were kept. There was God, a supreme Judge of controversies, giving forth his oracles. The high priest was the mediator between God and Israel (compare Luke i. 8-10.), and the blood of sprinkling was daily used."

NOTE 10.—PART XV.

SOME commentators suppose that this passage refers to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the abolition of the political and ecclesiastical constitution of the Jewish state—the one signified by the earth, the latter by heaven. Others, to the dissolution of all things, to the new heavens and earth—to the future state of glory. The Jewish state and worship are in all probability described by the prophets as the heavens, because they were established by God, and because the tabernacle, with its worship, were typical of heavenly things.—See the Dissertation of Lord Barrington.

*NOTE 21.—PART XV.

ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

THE Second Epistle to Timothy is peculiarly valuable to the Christian Church, on account of the singular contrast it affords between the persecuted, yet confident and happy Christian, and the ferocious, abandoned, and profligate Roman. Nero was at this time Emperor of Rome. Immediately before the burning of the city, he had offended and disgusted the Christians with those dreadful scenes of indescribable crime, which are related in the Annals of Tacitus. From these he proceeded to set fire to the city, then to persecute the Christians, and, possibly before the martyrdom of the apostles, to execute many of the most illustrious senators of Rome, for the conspiracy of Lucan, Seneca, and Piso. Many of the latter, indeed, met death with courage and serenity, though unblest with any certain hope of futurity. With the Christian only was found love and good-will to all mankind, and a patience and cheerfulness and triumph in the hour of death, as infinitely superior to the stoical calmness of a pagan, as the Christian martyr himself to the hero and the soldier. After such scenes this Epistle was probably written; and St. Paul expressed among them that sublime language of hope and exultation which compels every Christian to exclaim, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my latter end be like his")—"I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course: I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of life."

It is, however, a matter of dispute, whether this Epistle was written during St. Paul's first or second confinement at Rome. Estius, Hammond, Lightfoot, and Lardner, think it was the confinement mentioned by St. Luke, for the two following reasons: first, it is evident from 2 Tim. iv. 11., that when St. Paul wrote this letter, St. Luke was with him. Wherefore, as St. Luke has spoken of no imprisonment of St. Paul at Rome, but the one with which his history of the Acts concludes, the learned men above mentioned infer, that this must be the imprisonment, during which the Apostle wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy. But the answer is, St. Luke did not propose in the Acts to give a history of the life of any of the apostles, but an account of the first preaching and propagation of the Gospel. Wherefore, having related how the Gospel was published, first in Judæa by the apostles Peter, James, and John, and by the evangelists Stephen, Philip, and Barnabas; and then, in many heathen countries, by St. Paul, Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, and others; and by St. Paul, in his own hired house, during his two years' confinement at Rome; he ended his history at that period, as having finished his design. It is evident, therefore, although St. Luke has written nothing farther concerning St. Paul, this can be no proof that St. Paul's ministry and life ended then, or that St. Luke was ignorant of his after transactions; any more than his silence concerning St. Peter after the council of Jerusalem, is a proof that the ministry and life of this Apostle ended at that time; or that his silence concerning any particulars mentioned in St. Paul's Epistles, is a proof that these things did not happen, or, if they happened, that they were not known to St. Luke.

Secondly, it is said, that if this Epistle was written during an after imprisonment of St. Paul in Rome, Timothy must have been so old, that the Apostle could not with propriety have exhorted him to flee youthful lusts, (2 Tim. ii. 22.) But, it should be considered, that in the year 66, when the Apostle is supposed to have been a prisoner at Rome the second time, Timothy may have been only thirty-four years of age, which, both by the Greeks and Romans, was considered as youth.

These are the arguments on which the writers above mentioned have founded their opinion, that St. Paul wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy during his confinement at Rome, of which St. Luke has given an account in his history of the Acts. Other learned men hold, that the Apostle wrote this Epistle during a second imprisonment at Rome, and support their opinion by the following arguments:—

1. At the time the Apostle wrote this Epistle, he was closely imprisoned, as one guilty of a capital crime (2 Tim. ii. 9.) "I suffer evil (μέχρη δεσμῶν) unto bonds, as a malefactor." The heathen magistrates and priests, considering St. Paul as an atheist, because he denied the gods of the empire, very probably also supposing him to be one of the Christians who, they said, had set the city on fire, confined him in close prison, with his hands and feet in fetters, as a malefactor. His situation was very different during his first imprisonment. For then, (Acts xxviii. 30.) "he dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came to him, (ver. 31.) preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus, with all confidence, no man forbidding him." This mild treatment was probably owing to the favorable account which Festus gave of him to the Emperor, (Acts xxv. 25. xxvi. 31.) and to what Julius the centurion, who brought him to Rome, said of him, when he delivered him to the officer appointed to receive the prisoners from the provinces—the centurion's esteem of St. Paul is mentioned Acts xxvii. 42, 43.

2. The Roman governors of Judæa, by whom St. Paul was tried for his life, declared at his trials, that no crime was alleged against him, but only holding his opinions, which his accusers said were contrary to their religion, (Acts xxv. 18, 19.) They likewise declared, that he had been guilty of no crime against the state, (Acts xxvi. 31.) Heresy, therefore, being the only crime laid to the Apostle's charge, and that circumstance being made known by the governor of Judæa to his judges at Rome, they must have had a very favorable opinion of his cause.

In the former Epistle the author confidently looked forward to his liberation from confinement, and his speedy departure from Rome. He tells the Philippians (chap. ii. 24.) "I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly." Philemon he bids to prepare for him a lodging; "for I trust," says he, "that through your prayers I shall be given unto you." (ver. 22.) In the Epistle before us he holds a language extremely different: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand: I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day," (chap. iv. 6–8.) Phil. i. 14. "Many of the brethren in the Lord, being assured in my bonds, have become much more bold to speak the word without fear." At this time also he had the service of many affectionate friends, such as St. Mark, Timothy, St. Luke, Tychicus, Aristarchus, and others mentioned Col. iv. 7, 10, 11, 12, 14. But when he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, his assistants were all so terrified by the rage of his accusers and judges, that not so much as one of them, nor any of the brethren in Rome, appeared with him when he made his first answer, (2 Tim. iv. 16.) And after that answer was made, all his assistants fled from the city, except St. Luke, (2 Tim. iv. 11.)

During the Apostle's confinement in Rome, of which St. Luke has given an account, Demas was with him (Philemon, ver. 24.), and Mark, as his fellow-laborers, (Col. iv. 10, 11. Philemon, ver. 24.) But when he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, Demas had forsaken him, having loved this present world, (2 Tim. iv. 10.) And Mark was absent; for the Apostle desired Timothy to bring Mark with him, (2 Tim. iv. 11.) From these circumstances, it is evident that the Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, and the Second to Timothy, were written by the Apostle during different confinements.

To invalidate these arguments, Lardner supposes,^b that on St. Paul's arrival from Judæa, he was shut up in close prison as a malefactor, and expected nothing but instant death. That being in the greatest danger, all his assistants, except St. Luke, forsook him, and fled for fear of their own lives; that in this state of despondency he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy; that the emperor having heard his first defence, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 16., entertained a favorable opinion of his cause, and by a written order, appointed him to be confined in the gentle manner described Acts xxviii. 16., so that afterwards his assistants returned; and that he preached the Gospel to all who came to him, and converted many.

Dr. Paley remarks, these particulars are all resolvable into one supposition, viz. that this Epistle was not written during St. Paul's first residence at Rome, but in some future imprisonment in that city. The Epistle touches upon names and circumstances connected with the date, and with the history of the first imprisonment, and mentioned in letters during his imprisonment, and so touches upon them, as to leave what is said of one consistent with what is said of others, and consistent also with what is said of them in different epistles.

It is supposed by the generality of commentators that Timothy was at Ephesus when this Epistle was addressed to him; but Michaelis^b is of opinion that Timothy was most probably in some part of Asia Minor, because the Apostle, towards the end of chapter i. mentions several persons resident in that country, and because Troas, where Timothy was to call (chap. iv. 18.) does not lie in the way from Ephesus to Rome, to which place Timothy was to make haste to come with the cloak, books, and parchments before winter, (chap. iv. 21.) These objections are removed by considering that the Apostle referred to the Asiatic Christians, who were then at Rome, and had professed a friendship for him, yet had in his affliction forsaken him. Onesiphorus, who so diligently sought out the Apostle in his close confinement at Rome, had before ministered to him at Ephesus (chap. i. 18.), and that he still continued a resident of that city is proved by chap. iv. 19., where his family are saluted, which is strong evidence in favor of Timothy being at this time at Ephesus. Hymenæus also, mentioned chap. ii. 17., was one of the Judaizers of Ephesus, (1 Tim. i. 19, 20.; compare also 1 Tim. i. 5, 6, 7. with 2 Tim. ii. 22., &c. and chap. iii. 6, 7, 8.); and when Timothy was desired to call at Troas, he was only directed to follow the same route which the Apostle had himself taken when he left Ephesus for Rome.—(See Acts xx. 1–5. 2 Cor. ii. 12.) Alexander the coppersmith, spoken of chap. iv. 14., is the same who is mentioned

^b Michaelis, vol. iv. p. 161–164.

Acts xix. 33., and again 1 Tim. i. 20.; and although some have supposed that the mischief the Apostle refers to occurred at Rome, it is much more probable he alludes to what had formerly taken place at Ephesus, (compare Acts xix. 33. 1 Tim. i. 20. with 2 Tim. iv. 14, 15.); and this supposition naturally accounts for St. Paul's caution. Timothy being at Ephesus furnishes us also with a reason why St. Paul, who so strongly enforces his instructions and regulations for the ordination of bishops and deacons in his First Epistle, does not mention the subject in this. Timothy having fully executed the Apostle's former orders in that Church, there was now no occasion for repeating them. Tychicus (chap. iv. 12.) is considered as the bearer of this Epistle, who was sent by St. Paul to Ephesus, for the purpose of releasing Timothy, (see also Titus iii. 12.)

From these observations we may conclude, with the general consent of the primitive Church, that St. Paul visited Rome and suffered imprisonment there at two different periods, and that his second imprisonment terminated in martyrdom. It is supposed that St. Paul went to Rome the second time from Crete about the year 65, on account of Nero's persecution of the Christians, whom he had accused of setting fire to Rome, for the purpose of strengthening and comforting them; and that he was beheaded by having his head cut off with a sword, which was the punishment inflicted on the freemen of Rome, while the others were given to the wild beasts^c, on the 29th of June, A. D. 66. A short time previous to his martyrdom this Epistle was written. To use the words of Dr. Benson, "He had hitherto travelled about to plant churches, where he had never been, or to revisit the churches which he had planted. He was now to enter upon another and a very different scene. But as he lived piously, he died bravely. When he was not permitted to act any more, his principal concern was not for himself, but for the true Christian doctrine after his dissolution. He, therefore, addressed Timothy with the air and solemnity of a dying father, enjoining him, as he ever expected to meet his great and glorious Judge in peace, to preach the pure Christian doctrine, with zeal and frequency, when he himself was laid in the silent dust, and should preach and direct him no more. And having devolved the work upon one, in whom he could so fully confide, he suffered martyrdom, during the power of Helius Cæsarianus (Nero being absent at Greece), the vilest prefect of the most tyrannical prince that ever lived. Imagine a pious father, under sentence of death for his piety and benevolence to mankind, writing to a dutiful and affectionate son, that he might see and embrace him again before he left the world—particularly that he might leave with him his dying commands, and charge him to live and suffer as he had done—and you will have the frame of the apostle's mind during the whole of this Epistle."

NOTE 22.—PART XV.

ST. PAUL himself, a little before his death, has here clearly instituted a Gospel ministry. This was done by divine inspiration, and a succession of authorized teachers has perpetuated the true Gospel doctrine, from that time to the present period.

NOTE 23.—PART XV.

ON ST. PETER, AND ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF HIS FIRST EPISTLE.

ST. PETER, the apostle, was born at Bethsaida in Upper Galilee. He was the son of Jonas, Jonah, or John, and was a fisherman upon the lake of Gennesareth, following in all probability the trade of his father. His call to the apostleship by our Saviour, with his brother Andrew, a disciple of John the Baptist, who heard him point out Jesus as the Lamb of God, is recorded by three of the Evangelists. Macknight observes, about that time Peter had left Bethsaida, and had gone to Capernaum, with his wife, who is thought to have been of that town. From Andrew's accompanying his brother thither, and living with him in the same house, it may be conjectured that their father was dead. With them Jesus also abode, after he took up his ordinary residence at Capernaum; for he seems to have been pleased with the disposition and manners of all the members of that family. Thus, as Lardner observes, it appears that before Peter became an apostle, he had a wife, was the head of a family, had a boat and nets, and a furnished house, and maintained himself by an honest occupation. (Matt. xix. 27.) The Apostle St. Paul seems to insinuate, that Peter's wife attended him in his travels, after our Lord's ascension, (1 Cor. ix. 5.) He was the most zealous of all the apostles, and was conspicuous for the strength of his faith. He was more forward than the rest of the disciples, and was the first to answer the questions put to them by our Saviour. On the confession of his faith (Matt. xvi. 13–16.) it is supposed by some that our Lord invested Peter with privileges and powers superior to the rest of his disciples; but the following clause, "Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven," &c. mentions privileges, which are declared to belong to all the apostles. (Matt. xviii. 18. John xx. 21–23.) It cannot be said that the ^c Lactant. de Mort. persecutorum, c. 2. et Euseb. Histor. Eccles. l. 5. c. 1. edit. Reading, p. 207.

Church of Christ was built on Peter alone, for it is expressly asserted by divine revelation to have been built on the foundation of all the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. Peter, in delivering his own sentiments, expressed those of all the apostles; and our Lord, in addressing his reply to Peter, intended that it should be equally extended to them all. Lardner remarks on the Canon, p. 102, that Cassian, supposing Peter to be older than Andrew, makes his age the ground of his precedence among the apostles; and that Jerome himself says, "The keys were given to all the apostles alike, and the Church was built on all of them equally. But for preventing dissension, precedence was given to one. And John might have been the person, but he was too young: and Peter was preferred on account of his age." The only peculiar distinction conferred on St. Peter was, that after the descent of the Holy Ghost he should be the first to declare the Gospel to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles. That he received no superior power of preëminence over the other disciples is evident from our Lord's declaration—"One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren."

The First Epistle of Peter has been ever considered as authentic—it was referred to by Polycarp, Clemens Romanus, and the Martyrs of Lyons—it was acknowledged by Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, and quoted by Papias, Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian. Commentators, both ancient and modern, are divided in opinion as to the description of persons to whom these Epistles of St. Peter were addressed. Eusebius, Jerome, Didymus of Alexandria argue that they were addressed to Jewish Christians, dispersed through the countries mentioned in the inscription. Beza, Grotius, Mill, Cave, Tillemont, have followed the same opinion. But others suppose it to have been written to Gentiles also. Bede, in his prologue to the Catholic Epistles, says, that St. Peter's Epistles were sent to such as were proselyted from heathenism to Judaism, and afterwards to the Christian religion. Wetstein supposes they were written to the Gentiles—Barrington and Benson, to the Proselytes of the Gate—Lardner, Estius, Whitby, Macknight, and Adam Clarke, that they were sent to all Christians in general, Jews and Gentiles, residing in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, &c. That both the Epistles were sent to the same people is evident from 2 Peter iii. 1.; and it is also certain, that many things are mentioned in the First Epistle which can apply only to the Gentiles (chap. i. 14, 18, 20, 21. ii. 9, &c.) Compare with these expressions Rom. ix. 24, 25., where St. Paul is unquestionably speaking of Gentile converts. See also chap. iv. 3. It is also to be remarked, that those to whom the Apostle writes, principally consisted of the converts of St. Paul; as we are informed in the Acts of the Apostles that St. Paul had been in Galatia, and the other countries mentioned in the inscription. St. Peter corroborates this, by observing (2 Peter iii. 15.) "that his beloved brother Paul had written unto them," referring, no doubt, to his Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, and Colossians, the greater part of whom were Gentile converts. The most probable conclusion appears to be, that St. Peter's two Epistles were sent to all Christians in general, living in those countries, the majority of whom had been converted by St. Paul from heathenism to Christianity.

The passages which are considered inconsistent with the supposition that this Epistle was written both to Gentiles and Jews, are found in chap. ii. 9. and ver. 12. The former contains the honorable appellations which were peculiarly appropriated to the Jewish people; but as the Gentiles were now to become God's chosen people as well as the Jews, these titles belonged equally to them. The latter passage refers only to the unbelieving Gentiles. See a similar passage, 1 Cor. x. 32.

It remains for us now to inquire from what place this Epistle was written; for on this point also commentators are much divided. From St. Peter's sending the salutations of the Church from Babylon, it is by many believed that he wrote his First Epistle from that place. Pearson, Mill, and Le Clerc are of opinion that the Apostle speaks of Babylon in Egypt. Erasmus, Drusius, Beza, Lightfoot, Basnage, Beausobre, Wetstein, Cave, and Benson, suppose he writes from Babylon in Assyria. But, according to Lardner, there is no mention made of any church or bishop at the Egyptian Babylon during the first four centuries; and the Assyrian Babylon was almost deserted in the time of the apostles. Œcumenius, Bede, and other fathers, Grotius, Whitby, and the learned of the Romish communion, think that by Babylon Peter figuratively signified Rome. And this opinion is corroborated by the general testimony of antiquity, which, Dr. Lardner remarks, is of no small weight. Eusebius^d relates, on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, and Papias, bishop of Jerusalem, that St. Mark's Gospel was written at the request of Peter's hearers in Rome; and that "Peter makes mention of St. Mark in his first Epistle, which was written at Rome itself. And that he (Peter) signifies this, calling that city figuratively Babylon, in these words, 'the church which is at Babylon, elected jointly with you, saluteth you. And so doth Mark my son.'" This passage of Eusebius is transcribed by Jerome, who adds, positively, that Peter mentions this Mark in his First Epistle, figuratively denoting Rome by the name of Babylon; "the church which is at Babylon," &c. It is generally thought that Peter and John (Rev. xvii. 18.) gave to Rome the name of Babylon, figuratively to signify, as it was not expedient to do so more openly, that it would resemble Babylon in its idolatry, and in its opposition to, and persecution of, the Church of God; and that, like Babylon, it will be utterly destroyed.

Silvanus, or Silas, the bearer, was "the faithful brother," or associate of St. Paul, in most of the churches which he had planted. And though he was not at Rome with the Apostle when he wrote his last Epistle to Timothy, in all probability he soon after returned, and might have been sent by St. Paul and Peter jointly, to confirm the churches in Asia Minor, &c. which he had assisted in planting. But Silvanus, St. Paul, and St. Peter had no connexion with Babylon, which lay beyond their district; and, therefore, they were not likely at any time to build upon another's foundation. It is supposed that the Gospel was preached in Persia, or Parthia, by the Apostle Thaddeus, or Jude, according to Cosmas; and Abulfaragi computes, that the ancient Syriac version of the New Testament was made in his time, and probably by his authority, for the use of the Oriental churches^e.

The Jews were fond of mystical appellations, especially in their captivities; Edom was a frequent title for their heathen oppressors; and as they were first taken captive to Babylon, it is very probable that Rome, the principal scene of their second captivity, which so strongly resembled Babylon in her "abominations, her idolatries, and persecutions of the saints," should be denominated by the same title. And this supposition is confirmed by a similar expression in the Apocalypse, where the mystical application is unquestionable, (Rev. xiv. 8. xvi. 19. and xviii. 2, &c.) There is every reason to suppose (see Lardner) that John borrowed it from Peter; or rather, that both derived it by inspiration, from the prophecy of Isaiah, (xxi. 9.)

It is considered from the expression (chap. iii. 16.) as St. Peter had seen all St. Paul's Epistles when this was written, that the latter Apostle was dead; at least if St. Peter wrote from Rome, as is more generally supposed by the ancient Christian writers. For when St. Paul wrote his second letter to Timothy from Rome, a short time before his death, he did not mention the name of Peter, which he would not have omitted had he been in the city at that time. From which it is argued, that if St. Peter wrote his first Epistle from Rome, he must have done so after St. Paul's martyrdom, consequently not sooner than the year 66, or 67, about three years before the destruction of Jerusalem: for St. Paul was put to death in the twelfth year of Nero, corresponding to A. D. 66; and we are told that when he wrote his Second Epistle, which was a short time after the first, he was old, and near his end, with the prospect of soon dying a martyr for the truth of Christianity. Had he been put to death, as Grotius supposes, after the destruction of Jerusalem, the authenticity of the Second Epistle is destroyed. His argument is founded on 2 Pet. iii. 12., which he interprets as referring to the end of the world, which was to follow, according to a prevalent opinion, the destruction of Jerusalem. But as the Apostle himself confutes this idea (chap. iii. 3.) it is not necessary further to discuss the question.

Macknight remarks, as the design of this Epistle is excellent, its execution, in the judgment of the best critics, does not fall short of its design. Ostervald says of the First Epistle of Peter, "it is one of the finest books of the New Testament:" and of the second, "that it is a most excellent Epistle, and is written with great strength and majesty." Erasmus's opinion of Peter's First Epistle is, "It is worthy the Prince of the Apostles, and full of apostolical dignity and authority." He adds, "It is (verbis parca, sententiis differta) sparing in words, but full of sense." Lardner observes that Peter's two Epistles, with his discourses on the Acts, and the multitudes who were converted by them, are monuments of a divine inspiration, and of the fulfilment of Christ's promise to Peter and Andrew, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men."

NOTE 24.—PART XV.

MACKNIGHT considers the salvation of Noah in the ark typical of baptism, in the three following particulars:—"1st. By building the ark, and by entering into it, Noah showed a strong faith in the promise of God concerning his preservation by the very water which was to destroy the antediluvians; so by giving ourselves to be buried, in the water of baptism, we show a like faith in God's promise, that though we die and are buried, he will save us from death, the punishment of sin, by raising us from the dead on the last day. 2d. As the preserving of Noah alive, during the nine months he was in the flood, is an emblem of the preservation of the souls of believers while in the state of the dead; so the preserving believers alive while buried in the waters of baptism, is a prefiguration of the same event. 3d. As the waters of the deluge destroyed the wicked antediluvians, but preserved Noah, by bearing up the ark in which he was shut up till the waters were assuaged, and he went out of it, to live again on the earth; so baptism may be said to destroy the wicked and to save the righteous, as it prefigures both these events: the death of the sinner it prefigures by the burying of the baptized persons in the water; and the salvation of the righteous, by raising the baptized person out of the water to lead a new life."

^e Lardner, 8vo. vol. v. p. 272, 4to. vol. iii. p. 55. Michaelis, vol. ii. p. 30.

Macknight further observes, "that Noah gave the answer of a good conscience towards God (which was the baptism signified by the deluge), by entering into the ark, in the firm belief that God, according to his promise, would preserve him and his family—Baptism, understanding thereby the answer of a good conscience, now saveth us also, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ: because, if Christ had not risen, being an impostor, he could not have saved any one."—Macknight in loc. As Noah prepared the ark for believers, so Christ prepares his Church for Christians to conduct them in safety through the waves of this troublesome life, in which so many perish—and as Noah was preserved in the general destruction of sinners and the world, and brought into a new creation; so shall Christians, at the general judgment and dissolution of all things, be preserved, and admitted into a new state of being; carried safely with Jesus Christ through the waves of death, triumphing over them.

NOTE 25.—PART XV.

ON THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PETER.

MANY doubts were entertained by the ancients whether St. Peter was really the author of this Epistle. Eusebius reckoned it among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, or books not generally received as canonical. Semler thinks the superior influence of that party in the Church which advocated the admission of the idolatrous Gentiles, prevented its general reception. This opinion requires confirmation. We have the most satisfactory evidence, as Mr. Horne has well observed, of its genuineness and authenticity.

This Epistle, as well as the former, although its genuineness, as has been already observed, was doubted by some of the ancients, expressly claims St. Peter as its author. At the same time it is proved that this, with the four other Catholic Epistles, not universally acknowledged as inspired writings, were very early known, and upon full and impartial inquiry, their authenticity was established beyond a possibility of doubt. There is a remarkable coincidence between this and the First Epistle of St. Peter; and the writer appeals to facts and circumstances which evidently refer to that Apostle. The writer styles himself Simon Peter, which is the Hebrew form of writing, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ. St. Luke has distinguished him by the same name (chap. v. 8.), and John has done so seventeen times in his Gospel, as Macknight observes, perhaps to show that he was the author of the Epistle which begins "Symeon Peter, a servant and an apostle." The writer calls himself an apostle both in the inscription and chap. iii. 2.; and in ver. 15. of the same chapter, he calls St. Paul his beloved brother, and commends his Epistles as Scriptures, or Inspired Writings. He also declares that he was with Jesus at his transfiguration, and alludes to the prediction of our Saviour (John xxi. 19.) where Jesus foretold to St. Peter by what death he should glorify God. Some commentators have supposed that the First and Second Epistles of St. Peter were not written by the same person, because the style in which they are composed differs; but this difference seems confined only to the second chapter of the Second Epistle, the first and third chapters resembling the First Epistle—which circumstance would more naturally lead to the conclusion that the Second Epistle was written by two different authors, rather than that both the Epistles were. But this diversity of style is more easily accounted for by supposing that many expressions in the second chapter, which is distinguished from the others, were borrowed from the Gnostics, whose doctrines the Apostle was exposing and confuting. Thus, in 2 Pet. ii. 17., the Gnostics are called "clouds agitated by a tempest;" and we are informed that the Manicheans, who held many similar doctrines with the Gnostics, taught that there were five good and five bad elements, and that one of the latter was called "tempest." They speak also of darkness under the name of ζόφος, which word occurs several times in this chapter. The Epistle of St. Jude also abounds with unusual figurative expressions, which may be accounted for after the same manner. On the other hand, Macknight remarks, if the subjects treated of raise an author's indignation and abhorrence, he will use an acrimony of style expressive of these feelings. For the Apostle, whose love to his Master was great, and who had the feeding of Christ's sheep committed to him, regarding the false teachers as the most flagitious of men, wrote that chapter against them with a bitterness which he would not have used in correcting teachers who had erred through simplicity. The arguments of Grotius against the genuineness of this Epistle, on account of its difference of style and sentiments, are not worthy of notice, as he proposes, without the slightest authority, to expunge some words; and on no better grounds to consider others as interpolations.

Michaelis remarks, that the deluge, which is not a common subject in the apostolic epistles, is mentioned both in 1 Pet. iii. 20. and in 2 Pet. ii. 5.; and in both places the circumstance is noted, that eight persons only were saved, though in neither place does the subject require that the number should be particularly specified. The author of the First Epistle had read St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans; and the author of the Second Epistle speaks in express terms (chap. iii. 15, 16.) of the Epistles of St. Paul. Now, no other writer of the New Testament has quoted from the New Testament; consequently we have in these Epistles a criterion from which we may judge that they were written by the same author.

From chap. i. 14., it is evident that this Epistle was written a short time before St. Peter's death. It appears to have been written from Rome likewise, not long after his first. For, as Lardner (Can. iii. p. 253,) observes, "It is not unlikely, that soon after the Apostle had sent away Silvanus with the first Epistle, some came from those countries to Rome, where there was a frequent and general resort from all parts, bringing him an account of the state of religion among them, which induced St. Peter to write a second epistle, for the establishment of the Christians, among whom he had labored; and he might well hope, his last dying testimony to the doctrines which he had received from Christ, and had taught for many years with unshaken steadfastness, would be of great weight with them." It was evidently written under the impression of soon dying a martyr for the truth he had maintained; and ecclesiastical history informs us that the Apostle finished his course by being crucified with his head downwards, in the year 68, the fourteenth of the Emperor Nero.

The Second Epistle was written to the same communities as the first—to the whole of the Christian brethren dispersed in the countries mentioned in the inscription of the former epistle. (Compare 1 Peter i. with 2 Peter iii. 1.) Its design was the same, to comfort them under their persecution, by the most powerful arguments and considerations. I shall conclude by observing, in the words of Dr. Macknight, that "in speaking of the matters contained in the Second Epistle of St. Peter, I must not omit observing, that in it, as in the First Epistle, there are discoveries of some important facts and circumstances, not mentioned at all, or not mentioned so plainly, by the other inspired writers. Such as, 1. That our Lord was transfigured for the purpose of exhibiting not only a proof of his greatness and power, as the Son of God, and Judge of the world, but an example of the glory in which he will come to judgment; an example also of his power to transform our corruptible mortal bodies at the resurrection, into the likeness of his own glorious body, as it appeared in the transfiguration. 2. That the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire, was intended to be an example of that destruction by fire from the presence of the Lord, which will be inflicted on the wicked after judgment. (Compare Jude, verse 7.) 3. That in the last age of the world scoffers will arise, who, from the stability of the present mundane system, will argue that the world hath existed as we see it from eternity, and that it will continue for ever. 4. That after the judgment, this earth, with its atmosphere, shall be set on fire, and burning furiously, the elements shall be melted, and the earth, with all the works of God, and man thereon, shall be utterly destroyed. That after the present heaven and earth are burnt, a new heaven and a new earth shall appear, into which, according to God's promise, the righteous shall be carried, there to live in unspeakable happiness; an event which St. Peter himself, in his discourse to the Jews (Acts iii. 21.), hath termed 'the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.'"

These supernatural discoveries could only have been revealed by the Spirit of God—by an Apostle really inspired as St. Peter declares himself to have been. The strong internal evidence, therefore, of this Epistle, must of itself be sufficient to prove its authenticity.

From the whole tenor of the Epistle it is evident the Apostle is confuting the dangerous errors of those who perverted the doctrine of justification by free grace through faith, without the works of the Law, so as to make it a pretence for gratifying the lusts of the flesh without restraint. The false teachers endeavoured to persuade their disciples that Christ had purchased for them the liberty to indulge all their passions and appetites. And in order to circulate their impious doctrines, they arrogated to themselves authority and illumination superior to that of Christ, or of his apostles.—See Dr. Macknight and other commentators.

NOTE 26.—PART XV.

SINCE we are told (1 Cor. xv. 24.) that after the judgment Christ will deliver up the kingdom to his Father, the everlasting kingdom here referred to, signifies the kingdom which Christ erected by what he did in the flesh, and which by the government which he now exercises, he will at length fully establish. This kingdom will continue after he has delivered it up to his Father throughout all eternity, when God will be all in all.—See Macknight in loc.

NOTE 27.—PART XV.

ON THE ATTESTATION GIVEN TO THE DIVINE MISSION OF OUR LORD AT HIS BAPTISM.

IN a note on our Lord's baptism, I mentioned a treatise of Danzius, printed in Menschen, Nov. Testamentum ex Talmude. In this dissertation Danzius labors to show that the circumstances attending the baptism of Christ, which he considers as his initiation to his ministry, were not less convincing than those which accompanied the promulgation of the Law on the mount, and attested the divine commission of Moses. The Jews are fond of contrasting the obscure beginning of Christianity with the splendid beginning of their own religion. The thunders and lightnings, the fire on the mount, and the voice of Jehovah, were witnessed by the whole nation assembled round Mount Sinai, whereas, say they, what attended the initiation of Christ was comparatively done in a corner.

St. John alone, it is said, heard the voice from heaven, and saw the Spirit descending in the form of a dove. To this Danzius replies, that although the divine attestations in favor of Christ were not attended with those circumstances of terror amidst which the Law was promulgated on Mount Sinai, yet they were not less solemn and convincing; that it is not true that only John beheld them, for they were beheld also by the assembled multitude, who had just been baptized.

The reason why the circumstances of terror were omitted, was the express promise of God, that when he should send them a prophet like unto Moses, he would remember their request, in which they begged that they might not again hear the voice of God, nor see that great fire any more, lest they should die, (Deut. xviii. 15. &c.)

If, however, it should be here objected, that Christians assert the voice of God to have been heard at Christ's baptism, Danzius replies, the voice heard on this occasion was "minimè quidem terribilis et horrida: non tamen tenuis et remissa nimis; sed cum jucunditate quâdam, terrori verborum conveniente, satis sonora et penetrans," p. 348, § 23.

The miraculous appearances at Christ's baptism, Danzius asserts, excluded all doubt, even more strongly than those on the Mount; for on this latter occasion the people were at a distance, and restrained by boundaries, while on the former there was no such restraint, some of the crowd being near enough to be in actual contact with Christ himself.

To prove that a multitude was present at Christ's baptism, and was not only present, but heard the voice and saw the glorious light and the Spirit descending, it is necessary to compare the accounts given by the four Evangelists.

That multitudes were present at the time will be readily granted, from the expression used by St. Luke—ἐν τῷ βαπτισθῆναι ἁπαντα τὸν λαόν. That they also saw the miraculous appearances and heard the voice, are not so immediately apparent, as it not expressly asserted by any of the Evangelists, but must be inferred by carefully comparing their several accounts. Indeed, one strong argument may be drawn from the nature of the case; as it is doubtless reasonable to suppose that all this was done to convince the people of the divine commission of the person whom they had just seen baptized.

The account of St. Luke is couched in such words as exclude no one from participation in the sight; because he ascribes it to no one in particular, but only recounts the wonderful appearances, and it is natural to suppose that he means they were witnessed by all present. The words of St. Matthew may, without difficulty, bear the same meaning. The words of St. Mark alone contain a difficulty. He uses the singular verb εἶδε, and connects it with the foregoing verb ἐβαπτισθη, by the particle καί, whence, according to the rules of grammar, the subject of εἶδε, is the same with that of ἐβαπτισθη. Which being admitted, it follows that Jesus alone saw these miraculous sights. To this it is replied, that καί is here used as the Hebrew ו, which is often used between two words, having different subjects, of which the latter is not expressed in the nominative case. The subject of εἶδε, then, may be John. The following words favor this explanation, for we find ἐπ' αὐτόν, and not ἐφ' αὐτόν, or ἐφ' αὐτόν as it should be if Jesus were the subject of εἶδε. But Danzius is inclined to carry this still further—"We are not told (says he) that Jesus vidit, or Johannes vidit, but 'ascendens e flumine vidit;' now it is certain that not only Jesus went up, or John alone with him, but all the people who had been just baptized; why, then, may not ἀναβαδὼν be taken distributively or collectively? so as to mean that ἅπας ὁ λαός, universus ille populus ascendens vidit fissos cælos," &c.?

For an answer to an objection which may be drawn from these words of Christ (John v. 37.), "Ye have never heard the Father's voice," I have omitted to notice the very tedious inquiry about the בְּת קוֹל, as I have already discussed this point.

NOTE 28.—PART XV.

NOT any prophecy of Scripture is of self-interpretation, or is its own interpreter, because the Scripture prophecies are not detached predictions of separate, independent events, but are united in a regular and entire system, all terminating in one great object—the promulgation of the Gospel, and the complete establishment of the Messiah's kingdom.—Horsley's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 13-16.

NOTE 29.—PART XV.

ON THE EPISTLE OF ST. JUDE.

JUDE, or Judas, the writer of this Epistle, is considered by the generality of commentators to be the apostle of that name mentioned in the catalogue of the apostles given by St. Luke, chap. vi. 14, 15. and in Acts i. 13., and by St. Matthew, chap. x. 3., and Mark iii. 18., as Lebbeus and Thaddeus; from whence it is naturally inferred, as the Evangelists unite in confining the number of the apostles to twelve, that Jude, Lebbeus, and Thaddeus, was the same person, known by these different names. As he expressly declares himself to have been the brother of James, he may have borne the same relation to our Lord as James did. His call to the apostleship is recorded by St. Luke, chap. vi. 13., and he is mentioned also by John, xiv. 21–23. Therefore, as the promise contained in this passage implies, as an apostle, he was endowed with the spiritual gifts of the Holy Ghost, Christ through the Spirit dwelling with him.

Lardner supposes that James was originally an husbandman, from the expression in the Apostolical Constitutions, “Some of us are fishermen, others tentmakers, others husbandmen.” He conjectures that the latter part of the sentence peculiarly referred to St. Paul and St. Jude; which supposition is further corroborated by Hegesippus, as quoted by Eusebius, who asserts, “That when Domitian made inquiries after the posterity of David, some grandsons of Jude, called the Lord’s brother, were brought before him. Being asked concerning their possessions and substance, they assured him that they had only so many acres of land, out of the improvement of which they both paid him tribute, and maintained themselves with their own hard labor. The truth of what they said was confirmed by the callousness of their hands.” From which account, if it may be relied upon, it necessarily follows that this Apostle was married, and had children. Jerome, in his Commentary on Matthew x. 35., says, “That the Apostle Thaddeus, called by the Evangelist Luke, Judas the brother of James, was sent to Edessa, to Abgarus, king of Osroëne.” And Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. l. i. c. 13.) says, that Thomas, one of the twelve, sent to Edessa, Thaddeus, one of Christ’s seventy disciples, to preach the Gospel in those countries.

The canonical authority of this Epistle has been disputed, particularly because the Apostle is supposed to have quoted the apocryphal book of Enoch. To which objection it is replied, there is no good evidence that in Jude’s time there was any book extant entitled Enoch or Enoch’s Prophecy. The book that existed in the second and third centuries of that name is generally supposed to have been composed on the mention of this prophecy by Jude, and was consequently always regarded as a forgery. We cannot conclude, from the reference made by Jude, that such a book necessarily existed. For throughout the apostolical writings, there are many facts alluded to which are not related in the Jewish Scripture:—the sin and punishment of the evil angels, 2 Peter ii. 4.; Noah’s preaching righteousness to the people before the flood, 2 Peter ii. 5.; Abraham’s seeing Christ’s day, and being glad, as declared by Christ himself, John viii. 56.; Lot’s vexation at the iniquity of the Sodomites, 2 Peter ii. 7.; the emblematical purpose of the slaying of the Egyptians by Moses, Acts vii. 25.; the names of Pharaoh’s magicians, 2 Tim. iii. 8.; Moses’ exclamation on the mount, Heb. xii. 21.; with many others; which things seem to prove, beyond a doubt, that the inspired writers of the Old Testament did not record all the revelations made to them by God any more than they related every event in the lives of those persons whose histories they have written. Some explication was given with the revelation, which, being of the greatest importance, was transmitted by uninterrupted tradition from father to son; and the Spirit of God taught the apostles to discern those which were authentic. Macknight observes, “The Spirit of God, who inspired the evangelists and apostles, may have directed them to mention these traditions in their writings, and to allude to them, to make us sensible that many important matters, anciently made known by revelation, have been preserved by tradition. And more especially, that the persuasion which history assureth us hath prevailed in all ages and countries from the most early times, concerning the placability of the Deity, the acceptableness of sacrifice, the existence of the soul after death, the resurrection of the body, the rewards and punishments of the life to come, with other matters of a like kind, was founded on revelations concerning these things, which were made to mankind in the first age, and handed down by tradition. The truth is, these things being matters which, by the utmost efforts of their natural faculties, men could not discover, the knowledge and belief of them, which prevailed among all nations, whether barbarous or civilized, cannot be accounted for, except on the supposition of their having been originally discovered by revelation, and dispersed among all nations by tradition. Wherefore, in no age or country, have mankind been left entirely to the guidance of the light of nature, but have enjoyed the benefit of revelation in a greater or in a less degree.”

But granting that Jude really quoted from the book under consideration, it no more proves that he was not an inspired writer, than that St. Paul was not one, because he makes use of the heathen poets, Menander and Epimenides, 1 Cor. xv. 33.; Titus i. 12. Neither do such allusions establish the credibility or correctness of the whole work, but of that part only which they immediately employ. The preceding observations apply with equal force to ver. 9, in which the Apostle is supposed to cite an apocryphal relation, or tradition, concerning the Archangel Michael disputing with Satan for the body of Moses. This is, by some writers, referred to a book called the "Assumption, or Ascension of Christ," which in all probability was a forgery much later than the time of Jude; but Drs. Lardner and Macknight think it much more credible that the Apostle alludes to the vision in Zech. iii. 1-3. In further illustration of this verse, we may remark, that it was a Jewish maxim, that "it is not lawful for man to prefer ignominious reproaches, even against wicked spirits." Might not the Apostle, then, have used it merely as a popular illustration, without vouching for the fact, of that sober and wholesome doctrine, "not to speak evil of dignities," from the example of an archangel who did not venture to rail even at Satan, but meekly said, "The Lord rebuke thee?"

The Epistle itself was acknowledged, and generally received, as soon as it was fully ascertained to have been written by the Apostle Jude, the brother of James, and cousin-german of our Lord. It is found in all the ancient catalogues of the sacred writings of the New Testament; it is considered genuine by Clement of Alexandria, and is quoted as St. Jude's production by Tertullian, by Origen, and by the greater part of the ancients mentioned by Eusebius. See Lardner's works, 4to. vol. iii. p. 440-443. Its authenticity is confirmed by the subjects discussed in it, which are in every respect suitable to the character of an apostle of Jesus Christ; and, as Dr. Macknight truly observes, there is no error taught, no evil practice enjoined, for the sake of which any impostor could be induced to impose a forgery of this kind upon the world.

The other objection to the authenticity of this Epistle arises from the omission of the word apostle. The writer calls himself the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of our Lord; probably from a desire to show at once that he was a different person from Judas Iscariot. For if he had styled himself an apostle simply, he would not have been distinguished from that traitor; and, as the brother of James, he has fully established his claims to the apostleship, and his relationship to our Lord. James (chap. i. 1.) has also used the same manner of expression; so likewise has St. Paul, in his inscription to the Philippians. And the word apostle is omitted by the latter in his Epistle to Philemon, and in his Epistle to the Thessalonians; and St. John, in his Epistles, does not use the word apostle, nor make any mention of his own name. Yet no one, on this account, has supposed that these Epistles are not genuine.

Commentators differ as to the persons to whom this Epistle was addressed. Estius and Witsius suppose that St. Jude wrote to Christians every where, but more especially to the converted Jews. Dr. Hammond, that the Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians, with the design of cautioning them against the errors of the Gnostics. Dr. Benson, that it was written to Jewish believers, particularly to those of the western dispersion. But from the inscription (Jude 3.), Drs. Lardner and Macknight, Bishop Tomline, and Dr. A. Clarke, concur in thinking that it was written to all, without distinction, who had embraced the Gospel. The only reason, Dr. Macknight remarks, which has induced commentators to suppose that Jude wrote to the Jewish believers alone, is, that he makes use of arguments and examples taken from the sacred books of the Jews. But St. Paul, we have seen, followed the same course when writing to the Gentiles; and both apostles did so with propriety, not only because all who embraced the Gospel acknowledged the authority of the Jewish Scriptures, but also because it was of the greatest importance to make the Gentiles sensible that the Gospel was in perfect unison with the ancient revelation.

It is generally supposed, from the internal evidence of this Epistle, that it must have been written after St. Peter's Second Epistle. Estius and Witsius consider that it was written in the latter part of the apostolical age. Œcumenius is of opinion that Jude (ver. 17.) alludes to Peter in his Second Epistle, and Paul in almost all his Epistles; from which he infers, that Jude wrote late after the decease of the apostles. Dr. Mill fixes its date to the year 90, principally because the false teachers, whom St. Peter describes as yet to come, are mentioned by Jude as already come. But on a comparison of this Epistle with the Second of St. Peter, there does not appear to be such a remarkable difference in their phraseology, as will be sufficient to prove that St. Jude wrote his Epistle so long after St. Peter's Second Epistle, as Dr. Mill supposed; though it proves, as most critics agree, that it was written after the latter. The very great coincidence in sentiment and style between these two Epistles renders it likely that they were written about the same time; and, since we have seen that the Second Epistle of St. Peter was in all probability written early in A. D. 65, we are induced, with Lardner, to place it towards the close of the same year, or perhaps in A. D. 66. Bishop Tomline, however, dates it in A. D. 70; Beausobre and L'Enfant, between A. D. 70 and 75; and Dodwell and Dr. Cave, in 71 or 72.

There is a striking similarity between this

Epistle and that of the second chapter of the Second Epistle of St. Peter; which Estius and Benson account for by supposing that Jude wrote it after he had seen that of St. Peter, sometimes copying his very words; compare 2 Pet. iii. 3. with Jude, ver. 17, 18. Macknight is also of this opinion, and remarks upon it, "The Spirit may have directed Jude to write upon the same subject with Peter, and even in the words which Peter used, to give the greater authority to both Epistles; and that the condemnation of the false teachers, and the exhortations which the two apostles addressed to the faithful in their time, might have the more weight with them, and with Christians in succeeding ages, when they found these things delivered by both, precisely in the same terms."

Lardner conjectures on the contrary, and perhaps with greater probability, (Canon, vol. iii. p. 353.) "It seems very unlikely that St. Jude should write so similar an Epistle, if he had not seen Peter's. In that case, St. Jude would not have thought it needful for him to write at all. If he had formed a design of writing, and had met with an Epistle of one of the Apostle's very suitable to his own thoughts and intentions, I think he would have forborne to write. Indeed, the great agreement in subject and design, between these two Epistles, affords a strong argument that they were writ about the same time."

NOTE 30.—PART XV.

ARCHBISHOP TILLOTSON^a supposes that this difficult passage is illustrated by Deut. xxxiv. 6. He conjectures that Michael was employed by God secretly to bury the body of Moses, to defeat the malignant purpose of the Devil, who, could he have discovered to the Jews where Moses was interred, would have encouraged them to pay idolatrous honors to his remains, and they might have made him an occasion of idolatry after his death who had been so great an enemy to it in his lifetime. Beza and Estius are of the same opinion.

Macknight refers it to the vision of Zech. iii. 1., where the same words are used; he observes, "In Daniel's prophecy (chap. x. 13–21. and xii. 1.) Michael is spoken of as one of the chief angels who took care of the Israelites as a nation. He may, therefore, have been the angel of the Lord before whom Joshua the high priest is said to have stood, 'Satan being at his right hand to resist him;' namely, in his design of restoring the Jewish Church and state (which is typified in this chapter), called by Jude 'the body of Moses,' just as the Christian Church is called by St. Paul, 'the body of Christ.' Zechariah adds 'and the Lord,' that is, the angel of the Lord, as is plain from ver. 1., 'said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan! even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuke thee!'" Adam Clarke considers this as the most likely interpretation of the passage; and it will appear, he continues, the more probable, when it is considered that among the Hebrews the word "body" is often used for a thing itself; so in Rom. vi. 6., σῶμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας, "the body of sin," signifies sin itself; so the body of Moses may signify Moses himself; or that in which he was particularly concerned, viz. his institutes, religion, &c. It may be added, that the Jews consider Michael and Samuel, one as the friend, the other as the enemy, of Israel. Samuel is their accuser, Michael their advocate. And as Michael is represented (Dan. xii. 1.) standing up in defence of the children of Israel; and again, in Rev. xii. 7. as fighting against the dragon (called ver. 9., the Devil and Satan) and his angels. Whatever interpretation we give to the passage, it is only rational to infer a continued and persevering opposition is made by the great adversary of man to frustrate the plans of Omnipotence for their salvation; and that heavenly spirits protect and minister to the children of light and preserve them from the powers of evil, and the children of darkness.

NOTE 31.—PART XV.

JONES, in his Figurative Language, p. 158, has the following observations on this passage: "The Church that went from Egypt to Canaan gives us an example of every thing that can happen to the Christian Church, from the beginning of it even to the end of the world. The same evil which happened in the Church of Moses was found in the Church of Christ. Corah and his company had no dispute about the object or form of divine worship; they questioned none of the doctrines of the Law; they rose up against the persons of Moses and Aaron, that is, against the civil and ecclesiastical authority; contending that themselves and the congregation had an equal right; that Moses and Aaron had taken too much upon themselves; and, by exercising an usurped authority, were abusing and making fools of the people. This was their sin, and they maintained it to the last, and perished in it. It was the dispute of popular power against divine authority; and wherever the like pretensions are avowed by Christians, and the same arguments used in support of them, there we see the gainsaying of Corah."

NOTE 32.—PART XV.

DR. DODDRIDGE remarks on this verse—"Mr. Blackwall (Sacr. Class. vol. i. p. 164.), has shown by adequate authorities, that προεφητεύσε τοῖς τοῖς may be rendered prophesied against these (see ver. 4.) Some have thought the coming of the Lord here mentioned, was his coming attended with angels, to bring on the deluge. If it refers to his coming to the universal judgment, it is a most remarkable testimony to a future state; not indeed in the Mosaic economy, but previous to it. And perhaps Moses omitting this (as I think it almost certain he knew it) is to be resolved into the restriction under which he wrote, agreeably to the principles which the learned Dr. Warburton has so largely stated in his Divine Legation," &c.

^a Vol. ii. p. 158.

*NOTE 35.—PART XV.

ON THE DESIGN AND PLAN OF THE APOCALYPSE.

"THE testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." After the deluge, and before the corruption of man became again universal, the receiving of the divine influence by the spirit of prophecy was common to the heads of the patriarchal families; and when the descendants of Abraham were set apart from the rest of the nations, to preserve the knowledge of the true God, a continued succession of prophets, from the time of Abraham to Malachi, predicted, with gradually increasing clearness, the minutest events of the life, death, and sufferings of Christ, and the fortunes and enlargement of the visible Church, in a manner which, to the ancient Jews themselves, must frequently have appeared contradictory and incomprehensible.

As the same contest between good and evil, which commenced with the fall of man, is still proceeding in the world, the observer of the plans of divine wisdom might naturally infer, that the same testimony of Jesus would in some manner be continued. The office of the ancient prophets was twofold: they were the instructors and preachers to the people, and they were empowered to work miracles, or to foretell future events, to demonstrate the divine authority of their mission: and, as the probability of the distant fulfilment of their predictions was not uniformly effectual with the multitude, they predicted circumstances which should take place within a short time, and thus left the people without excuse if they longer rejected the divine annunciation of distant predicted events. The Christian Church was provided with a succession of prophets in the first of these offices, but of the second it is left entirely destitute. No man has appeared in the Christian Church, since the death of the last of the Apostles, who has been able certainly to predict the future; and yet the two former dispensations abounded with this proof of the divine origin of the one true religion. It does not seem probable that the best, and perhaps the last Dispensation, should be thus deprived of one important branch of evidence, unless some adequate substitute were provided in its room; and we know of no other than the Book of the Apocalypse, which we might therefore infer, would abound with predictions to be gradually fulfilled, even if we had not been informed that it was a volume of prophecies. We are justified, therefore, in considering this book, with Lowman, Clarke, and others, as designed to supply the place of that continued succession of prophets, which demonstrated the continued providence of God to the Jewish and patriarchal churches.

The superiority of prophecy over miracles, as an evidence of Christianity, has been asserted by Bishop Warburton, and by many learned writers, as a continually increasing evidence. The great peculiarity of the prophecies of the Old Testament, is their gradual development of the system of truth, as the world was able to bear it. The first prophecy of the seed of the woman, that is, of some one family of the descendants of Eve, was less definite than those which predicted in their order that he should descend from Abraham, from Isaac rather than from Esau; from Judah, than from the other patriarchs; from David, and so on till the annunciation of Malachi, that the Lord whom they sought should come while the second temple was standing. Another peculiarity was, that the ancient prophets announced, in very general terms, in the boldest and most figurative language, various events which have never yet taken place, relative to some more glorious state of the Church, the punishment and overthrow of its enemies, the final restoration of the Jews, and the universal establishment of happiness and innocence among mankind. If we are justified in expecting a book of prophecy, in the place of a succession of prophets, in the Christian Church, we may anticipate also the clearer prediction of the same events, and their gradual development.

The majority of commentators on the Apocalypse generally acted on these principles of interpretation. They discover in this book certain predictions of events which were fulfilled soon after they were announced; they trace in the history of later years various coincidences, which so fully agree with various parts of the Apocalypse, that they are justly entitled to consider them as the fulfilment of its prophecies; and by thus tracing the one God of Revelation through the clouds of the dark ages, through the storms of revolutions and wars, through the mighty convulsions which at various periods have agitated the world, their interpretations, even when they are most contradictory, when they venture to speculate concerning the future, are founded on so much undoubted truth, that they have materially confirmed the wavering faith of thousands. Clouds and darkness must cover the brightness of the throne of God, till it shall please him to enable us to bear the brighter beams of his glory. In the mean time we trace his footsteps in the sea of the Gentile world, his path in the mighty waters of the ambition and clashing passions of man. We rejoice to anticipate the day when the bondage of Rome, which would perpetuate the intellectual and spiritual slavery of man, shall be overthrown, and the dayspring of united knowledge and holiness bless the world.

Among other predictions of the future glory of the Jewish Church, which shall be fulfilled in the latter ages of the world, and the subject of which we might expect to meet with in the Apocalypse, we may observe the following :—

1. The Jewish Church shall possess its own land, Jer. iii. 18–23. Ezek. xxxvii. 21, 22. Amos ix. 14, 15.

2. It shall possess all the earth, Obad. comm. xv. 19, 20. Jer. xxxi. 38–40. Isa. xxvii. 12. and lxv. 10.

3. It shall dwell secure, Isa. lx. 18. Hosea ii. 18.

4. And that for ever, Ezek. xxxvii. 25. Amos ix. 15.

5. The land shall be more fertile than ever, Ezek. xxxvii. 35. Hosea ii. 21, 22. Joel iii. 18. Amos ix. 13. Zech. xiv. 10.

6. It shall have more inhabitants, Isa. xlix. 19–21. Ezek. xxxiv. 31. and xxxvi. 37, 38.

7. It shall be one united and perfect kingdom, Ezek. xxxvii. 22–24. Hosea i. 11.

8. Uniformly flourishing, Dan. vii. 27.

9. The Church shall be eminent and illustrious, Isa. iv. and xxiv. 23. and lx. 1, 2. Dan. xii. 3. Jer. iii. 16, 17. Joel iii. 19, 20.

10. And this as to its external form, Isa. xxiv. 23. and xxx. 26. and lx. 20. and lxii. 1–4. Zech. xiv. 6, 7.

11. Free from all unholiness, Joel iii. 17. Zech. xiv. 20, 21.

12. Sincere and pure in its doctrine, Ezek. xxxvii. 23. Hosea ii. 16, 17. and xiv. 8. Zech. xiii. 2, 3.

And this representation of the universal Church is depicted in the Apocalypse in the most vivid colors.

Rosenmüller has drawn up, in a general manner, the opinions of those commentators who have interpreted the Apocalypse on the principles now laid down.

Those who consider the Apocalypse as a prophecy and scenical exhibition of what shall happen to the Christian Church to the end of the world, lay down as a proposition, which comprises the subject of the whole book :—The contest of Christ with his enemies, and his final victory and triumph over them. See 1 Cor. xv.

25. Matt. xxiv. Mark xiii. Luke xxi.; but what is but briefly hinted in these Scriptures, is detailed at large in the Apocalypse, and represented by various images nearly in the following order :—

1. The decrees of Divine Providence concerning what is to come are declared to John.

2. The manner in which these decrees shall be executed is painted in the most vivid colors.

3. Then follow thanksgiving to God, the Ruler and Governor of all things, for these manifestations of his power, wisdom, and goodness.

After the exordium, and the seven epistles to the seven Churches of Asia Minor, to whose angels, or bishops, the book seems to be dedicated (chap. i. ii. iii.), the scene of the visions is opened in heaven, full of majesty, and John receives a promise of a revelation relative to the future state of the Church, chap. iv. v.

The enemies of the Church of Christ, which the Christians had then most to fear, were the Jews, the heathens, and the false teachers. All these are overcome by Christ; and over them he triumphs gloriously. First of all, punishments are threatened to the enemies of the kingdom of Christ, and the preservation of his own followers, in their greatest trials determined; and these determinations are accompanied with the praises and thanksgivings of all the heavenly inhabitants, and of all good men, chap. vi. to the x.

The transactions of the Christian religion are next recorded, chap. xi. to chap. xiv. 5. The Christians are persecuted,—

1. By the Jews; but they were not only preserved, but they increase and prosper.

2. By the heathens; but in vain do these strive to overthrow the kingdom of Christ; which is no longer confined within the limits of Judæa, but spreads among the Gentiles, and diffuses itself over the whole Roman empire, destroying idolatry, and rooting out superstition in every quarter, chap. xii. and xiii. 1–10.

3. False teachers and impostors of various kinds, under the name of Christians, but enemies of the cross of Christ; more intent on promoting the interests of idolatry, or false worship, than the cause of true religion (chap. xiii. 11–18.), exert their influence to corrupt and destroy the Church; but, notwithstanding, Christianity becomes more extended, and true believers more confirmed in their holy faith, (chap. xiv. 1–5.) Then new punishments are decreed against the enemies of Christ, both Jews and heathens; the calamities coming upon the Jewish nation, before its final overthrow, are pointed out, (chap. xiv. and xv.) Next follows a prediction of the calamities which shall take place during the Jewish war; and the civil wars of the Romans, during the contentions of Otho and Vitellius (chap. xvi. 1–16.), who are to suffer most grievous punishments for their cruelties against the Christians, (chap. xvii.) The Jewish state being now finally overthrown (chap. xviii.) the heavenly inhabitants give praise to God for his justice and goodness; Christ is congratulated for his victory over his enemies, and the more extensive progress of his religion, (chap. ix. 1-10.)

Opposition is, however, not yet totally ended; idolatry again lifts up its head, and new errors are propagated; but over these also Christ shows himself to be conqueror, chap. xix. 11-21. Finally, Satan, who had long reigned by the worship of false gods, errors, superstitions, and wickedness, is deprived of all power and influence; and the concerns of Christianity go on gloriously, chap. xx. 1-6. But, towards the end of the world, new enemies arise, and threaten destruction to the followers of Christ; but vain is their rage, God appears in behalf of his servants, and inflicts the most grievous punishments upon their adversaries, chap. xx. 6-10. The last judgment ensues, ver. 11-15., all the wicked are punished, and the enemies of the truth are chained, so as to be able to injure the godly no more; the genuine Christians, who had persevered unto death, are brought to eternal glory; and, freed from all adversities, spend a life that shall never end, in blessedness that knows no bounds, chap. xxi. and xxii.—See Rosenmüller.

Mr. Faber has supposed that much of the imagery of the Revelation is taken from the ancient mysteries; and Eichhorn has represented it as a drama: and the most strange and singular opinions have prevailed respecting its plan and interpretation. Though I have adopted that system of explanation, which represents the continued superintendence of God over his Church, there are four other principal hypotheses:—

1. The Apocalypse, in the opinion of Wetstein, contains a prophetic description of the destruction of Jerusalem, of the Jewish war, and the civil wars of the Romans.

2. The second is the general opinion of the fathers; that it contains predictions of the persecutions of the Christians under the heathen emperors of Rome, and of the happy days of the Church under the Christian emperors, from Constantine downwards.

3. The third is adopted by the generality of Protestant writers; that it contains prophecies concerning the tyrannical and oppressive conduct of the Roman pontiffs, the true antichrist; and foretells the final destruction of popery.

4. The fourth is adopted on the other side, by the papal writers, that it is a prophetic declaration of the schism and heresies of Martin Luther, those called Reformers, and their successors; and the final destruction of the Protestant religion.

This fourth has been illustrated and defended at large by Bishop Walmsley, in a work called the History of the Church, under the feigned name of Signior Pastorini; in which he endeavours to turn every thing against Luther and the Protestants, which they interpreted of the pope and popery; and attempts to show, from a computation of the apocalyptic numbers, that the total destruction of Protestantism in the world will take place in 1825, or 1828!

The plan of Wetstein is the most singular of all these. He supposes the book of the Apocalypse to have been written a considerable time before the destruction of Jerusalem. The events described from the fourth chapter to the end, he supposes to refer to the Jewish war, and to the civil commotions which took place in Italy, while Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian, were contending for the empire. These contentions and destructive wars occupied the space of about three years and a half, during which, Professor Wetstein thinks, the principal events took place which are recorded in this book. On these subjects he speaks, particularly in his notes, at the end of which he calls his Ἀναζεφαλωσις, or synopsis of the whole work, which I proceed now to lay before the reader.

This prophecy, which predicts the calamities which God should send on the enemies of the Gospel, is divided into two parts. The first is contained in the closed book; the second in the open book.

I. The first concerns the earth and the third part, i. e. Judæa and the Jewish nation.

II. The second concerns many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings, chap. x. 11. i. e. the Roman empire.

1. The book written within and without, and sealed with seven seals, chap. v. 1. is the bill of divorce sent from God to the Jewish nation.

2. The crowned conqueror on the white horse, armed with a bow, chap. vi. 2. is Artabanus, king of the Parthians, who slaughtered multitudes of the Jews in Babylon.

3. The red horse, ver. 4.—the Sicarii and robbers in Judæa, in the time of the proconsuls Felix and Festus.

4. The black horse, ver. 5.—the famine under Claudius.

5. The pale horse, ver. 8.—the plague which followed the robberies and the famine.

6. The souls of those who were slain, ver. 9.—the Christians in Judæa, who were persecuted, and were now about to be avenged.

7. The great earthquake, ver. 12.—the commotions which preceded the Jewish rebellion.

8. The servants of God from every tribe, sealed in their foreheads, chap. vii. 3.—the Christians taken under the protection of God, and warned by the prophets to flee immediately from the land.

9. The silence for half an hour, ch. viii. 7.—the short truce granted at the solicitation of King Agrippa. Then follows the rebellion itself.

1. The trees are burnt up, ver. 7—the fields and villages, and unfortified places of Judæa, which first felt the bad effects of the sedition.

2. The burning mountain cast into the sea, which in consequence became blood, ver. 8. and,

3. The burning star falling into the rivers, and making the waters bitter, chap. viii. 10, 11.—the slaughter of the Jews at Cæsarea and Scythopolis.

4. The eclipsing of the sun, moon, and stars, ver. 12.—the anarchy of the Jewish commonwealth.

5. The locust, like scorpions, hurting men, chap. ix. 3.—the expedition of Cestius Gallus, prefect of Syria.

6. The army with arms of divers colors, ver. 16, 17.—the armies under Vespasian in Judæa. About this time Nero and Galba died; after which followed the civil war, signified by the sounding of the seventh trumpet, chap. x. 7, 11. xii. 15.

1. The two prophetic witnesses, two olive-trees, two candlesticks, chap. xi. 3, 4.—teachers in the Church, predicting the destruction of the Jewish temple and commonwealth.

2. The death of the witnesses, ver. 7.—their flight, and the flight of the Church of Jerusalem to Pella, in Arabia.

3. The resurrection of the witnesses, after three days and a half, ver. 11.—the predictions began to be fulfilled at a time in which their accomplishment was deemed impossible; and the doctrine of Christ begins to prevail over Judæa, and over the whole earth.

4. The tenth part of the city fell in the same hour, and seven thousand names of men slain, ver. 13.—Jerusalem, seized by the Idumeans; and many of the priests and nobles, with Annas the high priest, signified by names of men, i. e. men of name, slain by the zealots.

5. The woman clothed with the sun, the moon under her feet, and a crown of twelve stars on her head, chap. xii. 1.—the Christian Church.

6. The great red dragon seen in heaven, with seven heads, seven diadems, and ten horns, ver. 6.—the six first Cæsars, who were all made princes at Rome, governing the armies and the Roman people with great authority; especially Nero, the last of them, who having killed his mother, cruelly vexed the Christians, and afterwards turned his wrath against the rebellious Jews.

7. The seven-headed beast from the sea, having ten horns, surrounded with diadems, chap. xiii. 1.—Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who were shortly to reign, and who were proclaimed emperors by the army.

8. This beast, having a mouth like a lion, the body like a leopard, and feet like a bear, ver. 2.—avaricious Galba; rash, unchaste, and inconstant Otho; Vitellius, cruel and sluggish, with the German army.

9. One head, i. e. the seventh, cut off, ver. 3.—Galba.

10. He who leadeth into captivity, shall be led into captivity; he who killeth with the sword, shall be killed with the sword, ver. 10.—Otho, who subdued the murderers of Galba, slew himself with a dagger; Vitellius, who bound Sabinus with chains, was himself afterwards bound.

11. Another beast rising out of the earth, with two horns, ver. 11.—Vespasian and his two sons, Titus and Domitian, elected emperors at the same time in Judæa.

12. The number of the wild beasts 666, the number of a man, Teitan, Titan, or Titus: T, 300. E, 5. I, 10. T, 300. A, 1. N, 50. making in the whole 666.

But some very respectable MSS. have 616 for the number; if the N be taken away from Teitan, then the letters in Teita make exactly the sum 616.

13. A man sitting upon a cloud, with a crown of gold upon his head, and a sickle in his hand, chap. xiv. 14.—Otho and his army, about to prevent supplies for the army of Vitellius.

14. An angel of fire commanding another angel to gather the vintage; the winepress trodden, whence the blood flows out 1600 furlongs.—The followers of Vitellius, laying all waste with fire, and the Bebriaci conquering the followers of Otho with great slaughter.

Then follow the seven plagues:—

1. The grievous sore, chap. xvi. 2.—the diseases of the soldiers of Vitellius, through intemperance.

2. The sea turned into blood, ver. 3.—the fleet of Vitellius beaten, and the maritime towns taken from them by the Flavii.

3. The rivers turned into blood, ver. 4.—the slaughter of the adherents of Vitellius at Cremona, and elsewhere, near rivers.

4. The scorching of the sun, ver. 8.—the diseases of the Vitellii increasing, and their exhausted bodies impatient of the heat.

5. The seat of the beast darkened, ver. 10.—all Rome in commotion through the torpor of Vitellius.

6. Euphrates dried up, and a way made for the kings of the east, and the three unclean spirits like frogs—the Flavii besieging Rome with a treble army; one part of which was by the bank of the Tiber.

The shame of him who is found asleep and naked.—Vitellius, ver. 15.—Armageddon, ver. 16.—the prætorian camps.

7. The fall of Babylon, ver. 19.—the sacking of Rome.

1. The whore, chap. xvii. 1.—Rome.

2. The seven kings, ver. 10.—Cæsar, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, and Galba.

3. The eighth, which is of the seven, ver. 11.—Otho, destined by adoption to be the son and successor of Galba.

4. The ten horns, ver. 12-16.—the leaders of the Flavian factions.

5. The merchants of the earth, chap. xviii. 11.—i. e. of Rome, which was then the emporium of the whole world.

6. The beast and the false prophet, chap. xix. 20.—Vespasian and his family, contrary to all expectation, becoming extinct in Domitian; as the family of the Cæsars, and of the three princes, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

7. The Millennium, or a thousand years, chap. xx.—taken from Psalm xc. 4. a time appointed by God, including the space of forty years, from the death of Domitian to the Jewish war, under Adrian.

8. Gog and Magog going out over the earth, ver. 8.—Barchochebas, the false Messiah, with an immense army of the Jews, coming forth suddenly from their caves and dens, tormenting the Christians, and carrying on a destructive war with the Romans.

9. The New Jerusalem, chap. xxi. 1, 2.—the Jews being brought so low as to be capable of injuring no longer, the whole world resting after being expiated by war, and the doctrine of Christ propagated, and prevailing every where, with incredible celerity.

It does not appear necessary to enter into any confutation of this scheme, which is founded upon the hypothesis that the Apocalypse was written before the Jewish war. This opinion too has been lately defended at great length by Mr. Tilloch, who has adopted Sir Isaac Newton's idea, that the Epistles contain quotations from the Revelations. Mr. Tilloch has managed this part of his argument with great skill, but the arguments for the later date are so much more satisfactory, that I cannot assent to the supposition of the early date. Mr. Tilloch's collections of parallel passages between the Apocalypse and the Epistles, however, appear to prove, that the apostles in general were well acquainted with the subjects concerning which St. John prophesied, but that they knew them by the influence of the same Holy Spirit, which dictated them to St. John. The expressions in question, therefore, were common to all the inspired writers of the New Testament.

If the evidence for the late date of the Apocalypse were not so decisive, I should have gladly assigned a much earlier period for its composition; more especially as the destruction of Jerusalem appears to have been an opportunity so favorable to appeal to the afflicted, yet desperate sons of Israel at that dreadful time, and to have elevated their hopes to another and more enduring city, which hath immoveable foundations, the New Jerusalem, which the prophet saw coming down from heaven. After a very careful perusal both of Michaelis and Mr. Tilloch's objections, it appears most probable that the generally-received opinion is most correct, that St. John was banished into Patmos towards the end of Domitian's reign, by virtue of his edicts for persecuting the Christians; and that he had the Revelations contained in the Apocalypse during his exile; though the book itself could not have been published until after the Apostle's release and return to Ephesus. The unanimous voice of Christian antiquity attests, that St. John was banished by the order of Domitian. Irenæus, Origen, and other early fathers, refer the Apostle's exile to the latter part of Domitian's reign, and they concur in saying that he there saw the Revelation. Internal evidence likewise supports this conclusion. For, in the three first chapters of the Apocalypse, the seven Asiatic Churches are described as being in that advanced and flourishing state of society and discipline, and to have undergone those changes in their faith and morals, which could not have taken place if they had not been planted for a considerable time. Thus, the Church of Ephesus is censured for having left "her first love." That of Sardis "had a name to live, but was dead." The Church of Laodicea had fallen into lukewarmness and indifference. Now the Church of Ephesus, for instance, was not founded by St. Paul until the latter part of Claudius's reign; and when he wrote to them from Rome, A. D. 61, instead of reproving them for any want of love, he commends their love and faith, (Eph. i. 15.) Further, it appears from the Revelation, that the Nicolaitans formed a sect, when this book was written, since they are expressly named; whereas they were only foretold in general terms by St. Peter, in his Second Epistle, written A. D. 65, and in St. Jude's Epistle, which was written about A. D. 65 or 66. It is also evident from various passages of the Revelation, that there had been an open persecution in the provinces. St. John himself had been banished into Patmos for the testimony of Jesus. The Church of Ephesus (or its bishop) is commended for its "labor and patience," which seems to imply persecution. This is still more evident in the following address to the Church of Smyrna (Rev. ii. 9.), "I know thy works and tribulation," θλῆψιν: which last word always denotes persecution in the New Testament, and is so explained in the following verse.

Lastly, in Rev. ii. 13., mention is made of a martyr named Antipas, who was put to death at Pergamos. Though ancient ecclesiastical history gives us no information concerning this Antipas, yet it is certain, according to all the rules of language, that what is here said is to be understood literally, and not mystically, as some expositors have explained it. Since therefore the persecution, mentioned in the three first chapters of the Apocalypse, cannot relate to the time of Claudius, who did not persecute the Christians, nor to the time of Nero, whose persecution did not reach the provinces, it must necessarily be referred to Domitian, according to ecclesiastical tradition.

Domitian's death is related to have happened in September, A. D. 96. The Christian exiles were then liberated, and St. John was permitted to return to Ephesus. As, however, the emperor's decease, and the permission to return, could not be known in Asia immediately, some time must intervene before the Apostle could be at liberty either to write the Apocalypse at Ephesus, or to send it by messengers from Patmos. We conclude, therefore, with Dr. Mill, Le Clerc, Basnage, Dr. Lardner, Bishop Tomline, Dr. Woodhouse, and other eminent critics, in placing the Apocalypse in the year 96 or 97.

The occasion of writing the Apocalypse is sufficiently evident from the book itself. St. John, being in exile in the island of Patmos, is favored with the appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ to him, and is repeatedly commanded to commit to writing the visions which he beheld. (See Rev. i. 11, 19., ii. 1, 8, 12, 18. iii. 1, 7, 14. xiv. 13. xix. 9. and xxi. 5.) The scope or design of this book is twofold; first, generally to make known to the Apostle "the things which are," (i. 19); that is, the then present state of the Christian churches in Asia; and secondly and principally, to reveal to him "the things which shall be hereafter," or the constitution and fates of the Christian Church, through its several periods of propagation, corruption, and amendment, from its beginning to its consummation in glory. "The prophecy of the Revelation," says Daubuz, "was designed as a standing monument to the Church, to know what destinies attend it; and that, when men should suffer for the name of Christ, they might here find some consolation both for themselves and for the Church: for themselves, by the prospect and certainty of a reward; for the Church, by the testimony that Christ never forsakes it, but will conquer at last."

In endeavouring to ascertain the probable meaning of this mysterious book, I have consulted some of the works which have lately appeared, as well as of Mede, Lowman, and Mr. Faber. I know the danger of attempting to fix the interpretation of the book; and how indelibly it fixes the stigma of deficiency of judgment on the unsuccessful interpreter. Calvin and Whitby were considered wise, for their prudence in declining all attempts to explain the Apocalypse. The learned and laborious hierophant, whom I have principally selected from among the thronging guides, who have presented themselves to conduct me through the labyrinth, is the great master who has explained to us the origin and progress of the heathen idolatry. Mr. Faber seems to have solved more difficulties, answered more objections, and thrown a brighter lustre on some of the more involved passages, than any other author whatever. He has not escaped, however, the usual fate of those who venture to comment on the Revelation. He has failed in some instances, and neither his learning, ingenuity, originality, nor talent, can rescue him from the consequences—a suspicion of a want of judgment. While this eminent theologian is my chief guide, I take the counsel of all whose suggestions appear worthy of attention, and not unfrequently decide for myself, where their directions either clashed or were contradictory.

NOTE 36.—PART XV.

THE last and most interesting accounts of the origin of Mahometanism, its progress, and its temporary check by the Crusades, are to be found in Mr. Charles Mills's eloquent and interesting works, the Histories of Mahometanism, and of the Crusades.

NOTE 37.—PART XV.

ON THE DATE AND OCCASION OF THE FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. JOHN.

THE place which has here been assigned in this Arrangement to the Epistles of St. John, will excite much surprise among those who have been accustomed, with the generality of commentators, to fix an earlier date, and arrange them before the Apocalypse. In the absence of all positive and decisive evidence of the precise year in which they were written, we are unable to depend, with satisfaction, upon the conjectural arguments by which both an early or a late date may be defended. Many reasons, however, have suggested themselves, which appear to be sufficient to justify the conclusion which I have here adopted, that the Epistles of St. John were written immediately before the compilation of his Gospel, and after the Revelation, at the close of the life of the Apostle, and consequently at the termination of the apostolic age.

When the Holy Spirit inspired the various writers of the Old and New Testaments, it imparted only the instructions and prophecies which were necessary for the benefit of the universal Church. It did not so interfere with the natural or acquired talents of the favored persons, whom it elevated above the rest of mankind, that their peculiar or characteristic modes of expression should be necessarily altered. Isaiah was a nobleman and a courtier, and his refined and polished language declares his education, as well as his native genius. Amos was a herdsman; and though there is the same superhuman internal evidence that the Spirit of prophecy rested on him also, though none of the prophets has more magnificently described the Deity, though his sentiments are elevated, and his diction splendid, he is still distinguished by the use of images which are drawn from rural life, and by phrases which are not characteristic either of the study of the schools of the prophets, or of the courtesy of a king's palace. Every one of the sacred writers is distinguished from his inspired brethren by some internal proofs of his vocation, or habits, or education: and if the external evidence of the truth and authenticity of the various books of Scripture were not taken into consideration, sufficient arguments might be adduced in their defence, from a careful comparison of the contents of the sacred books.

This consideration will possibly assist us in the attempt to discover, from internal evidence, whether it is not probable that the Apocalypse was written before the Epistles of St. John. The former book abounds with Hebraisms, and with images derived from the Jewish traditions and peculiarities. Though neither the Septuagint nor the New Testament is written in purely Attic Greek, not one book of either volume is so full of the solecisms in question as the Apocalypse; whereas the Epistles and Gospel of St. John are written both correctly and elegantly. It is true that the three books are proved to be the work of the same author, by their general agreement, both in style and expression; and Wetstein, Horne, and Dr. Lardner, have collected numerous instances of this coincidence: but the chief barbarisms of the Apocalypse are to be found neither in the Epistles, nor in the Gospel of St. John. In this respect they are remarkably distinguished from each other; and while the common adoption of certain forms of speech demonstrates the whole of the books in question to be the work of one writer, the insertion of so many peculiar idioms and Hebraisms in the one appear to justify our conclusion, that it must have been written at a period when the author was not so well versed in the elegances and purity of the language in which he wrote. He seems as if he thought in one language, and wrote in another; or, as if he had attempted for the first time to write in a language in which he made a subsequent improvement. This, in literature, is not an unfrequent case. The triple sentence, for instance, and the balanced periods, which so remarkably characterize the style of the Rambler, and the Lives of the Poets, were perceptible in the early works of Dr. Johnson, and afford internal evidence that they were written by him; while the grossness and puerility of his Marmor Norfolciense, are such as he would have blushed to have acknowledged in his maturer years. In the early poems of Milton we may trace, and that not faintly, "the towering thought," and hear "the living lyre," of the days of his ripened genius; yet he could not have written, at that splendid period, the pretty conceits which adorn or disgrace his juvenile Poems on the Passion and the Nativity.

But it is not only the internal evidence which induces me to place the Apocalypse before the Epistles of St. John; the circumstances of the Apostle's life sufficiently account for the more frequent adoption of Hebraisms in the former book. He was a native Jew, and probably continued within the precincts of the Holy Land longer than any of the apostles. Neither he, nor any of the Twelve, appear to have left Palestine during the Pauline persecution. When James was made bishop of Jerusalem, in the Herodian persecution, after the Apostle James was beheaded, and Peter had been cast into prison, it is probable, as I have endeavoured to show in the notes to the 10th part of this Arrangement, that all the apostles left Jerusalem, and John among the number. He was present however at the council in that city, and there could not have been time, during that short interval, for the establishment of the Churches in Asia, which are said to have acknowledged him as their founder. It seems probable that he continued either in Jerusalem, or within the precincts of Palestine, till the destruction of the city. Throughout that part of the Acts of the Apostles which relates the travels of St. Paul, St. John is not once mentioned; and no salutation is sent to him in any of the Epistles which St. Paul wrote from Rome to the Churches of Asia; not even in his Epistle to the Ephesians, nor in the Epistles which, in the latter part of his life, he wrote to Timothy in Ephesus. I agree therefore with the opinion of Macknight and others, that John probably remained in Judæa till he saw Jerusalem encompassed with armies, and observed the other signs of its approaching ruin, foretold by his Divine Master. Lampe (Prolegomena to St. John's Gospel, lib. i. cap. 3.) is of the same opinion, and fixes the time of his departure in the last year of Nero; in which he is confirmed by the Chronicon Paschale. During the whole of this period he would have conversed in his native language, among his own people: neither can we assign any reason for his adopting the Greek language, or for cultivating it with peculiar attention at this period. Baronius and Dr. Lardner would place the retirement of the Apostle from Judæa after the martyrdom of St. Paul and St. Peter; this would make a difference of a few years only.

A more important question is, whether St. John lived exclusively among the Greek cities of Asia, in the interval between the overthrow of Jerusalem, and his banishment to Patmos in the last year of Domitian. This cannot be satisfactorily decided. The learned Mill places some dependence upon the tradition, that this Apostle travelled into Parthia and India. His First Epistle was called by Augustine, the Epistle to the Parthians; and the Jesuits' Letters, cited by Baronius, affirm that the people of a town in India believed the Gospel to have been preached there by St. John; and the same is asserted, as I find in a note in Lampe, by the people of a town in Arabia. It is not probable that he would immediately establish himself at Ephesus; as Timothy, who is generally declared by the ecclesiastical historians to have been bishop of that place, was probably still alive. Others, whose opinion is strongly condemned by Lampe, have been of opinion that St. John did not take up his residence at Ephesus till near the end of the reign of Domitian. This opinion seems to be most supported by the little remaining evidence which can enable us to come to any decision on a point so obscure. The apostles were commanded to preach throughout the world; and they would probably have adopted that plan, which they are said to have done, that each should take his peculiar district, and to that direct his attention. As part at least of Asia Minor had been placed under the care of Timothy, it is not unlikely that St. John would have travelled to other parts of the East before he came to Ephesus, to reside there. The course of his travels might have been from the east of Judæa to Parthia, and round from thence to India, and returning by Arabia to Asia, he there preached, and founded the Churches of Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea, and others. These he might have established at the conclusion of his route. In Parthia, India, and Arabia, he would not have required the Greek language, and during the short period which elapsed between his arrival in Asia, and his banishment at the latter end of the reign of Domitian, he would have been more likely to have acquired that kind of language which we find in the Apocalypse, than the more polished style of the Epistles and the Gospel. The former shows less acquaintance with the language than the latter; and the fact is fully accounted for, if we suppose that the Apostle, when he wrote the Apocalypse, had not had so frequent intercourse with the people, as at a subsequent period; and this course of his travels explains the causes of this fact.

If we may thus decide respecting the travels of St. John after the destruction of Jerusalem, we reconcile many of the various traditions of antiquity, and account for the difference between the language of the Apocalypse and the other writings of the Apostle. I have taken no notice of the journey which Eusebius tells us he took again to Palestine, after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Lampe considers it as very uncertain, and there is no corroborating authority to support it. Neither can we venture to assert the truth of the story, that the Apostle went to Rome towards the end of the reign of Domitian, and was there cast into a caldron of boiling oil. That he was sent to the island of Patmos, and there wrote the Apocalypse, cannot be doubted; and the arguments of Lampe confirm the general opinion, that he was banished to that island in the fifteenth year of the reign of Domitian, and not of Claudius; and was recalled soon after in the reign of Nerva.

The uniform tradition of antiquity assures us, that the Apostle returned to Ephesus after the termination of his banishment to Patmos, and continued there till his death, in the third year of Trajan, and probably in the hundredth year of his own age. After his return from Patmos, he resided constantly at Ephesus, and spoke, as we may justly conclude, the Greek language only. This practice would have given him a fluency and knowledge of that tongue to a greater degree than when he was at Jerusalem, or associating with the people of various countries; and it will sufficiently explain the reasons why the style of the Epistles should so much resemble that of the Gospel of St. John, which was undoubtedly the last of the inspired books which was added to the canon of Scripture. Thus in his Gospel St. John does not content himself with simply affirming or denying a thing, but denies its contrary to strengthen his affirmation; and in like manner, to strengthen his denial of a thing, he affirms its contrary. (See John i. 20. iii. 36. v. 24. and vi. 22.) The same manner of expressing things strongly occurs in this Epistle. (See chap. ii. 4, 27. and iv. 2, 3.) In his Gospel also, St. John frequently uses the pronoun, ὁὗτος, αὗτοι, τοῦτο, this, in order to express things emphatically. (See chap. i. 19. iii. 19. vi. 29, 40, 50. and xvii. 3.) In the Epistle the same emphatical mode of expression obtains. (Compare chap. i. 5. ii. 25. iii. 23. v. 3, 4, 6, and 14.)

It does not therefore appear to me improbable, that these Epistles were written as late as the year 95 or 96, towards the very close of the apostolic age.

As this opinion is by no means generally adopted, it will be necessary to take some notice of the arguments by which Dr. Hales, Mr. Horne, and other learned divines, would assign an earlier date to this Epistle.

The expression in chap. ii. 18., "It is the last hour," is said to be more applicable to the last hour of time of the duration of the Jewish state than to any later period, especially as the Apostle adds—"And as ye have heard that antichrist is coming, even so now there have been many antichrists; whence we know that it is the last hour:" in which passage the Apostle evidently alludes to our Lord's prediction concerning the springing up of false Christs, false teachers, and false prophets, before the destruction of Jerusalem, (Matt. xxiv. 5-25.) The expression, however, the "last time" may allude, not to the destruction of that city, but to the close of the apostolic age. Michaelis would support this argument for the early date of this Epistle, by observing that St. John's Gospel was opposed to heretics, who maintained the same opinions as are opposed in this Epistle; which tenets he has confuted by argument in his Gospel; whereas in the Epistle he expresses only his disapprobation. Michaelis therefore concludes that the Epistle was written before the Gospel; because if St. John had already given a complete confutation when he wrote this Epistle, he would have thought it unnecessary to have again declared the falsehood of such opinions. This opinion of Michaelis appears to be correct; but the date of the Epistle is not ascertained by its having been written before the Gospel.

Again, the expression (chap. ii. 13, 14.), "Ye have known him from the beginning," applies, it is said, better to the disciples, immediately before Jerusalem was destroyed, than to the few who might have been alive at the late date which some critics assign to this epistle. In the verses just cited, the fathers or elders are twice distinguished from the "young men" and the "children," by this circumstance, that they had seen him during his ministry, or after his resurrection. Thirty-five years after our Lord's resurrection and ascension, when Jerusalem was destroyed, many such persons might have been alive; whereas in 98, or even in 92, there could not have been many persons alive of that description.—In reply to this argument we may observe, that some of those who had seen the miracles of our Lord, might have taken refuge with St. John at Ephesus.

To these two arguments for the early date of St. John's First Epistle, Dr. Hales has added the three following, which have not been noticed by any other biblical critic:—

1. As the other apostles James, Jude, Paul, and Peter, had written Catholic epistles to the Hebrew Christians especially, it is likely, that one of the principal "pillars of the church," the greatest surety of the mother Church, the most highly-gifted and illuminated of all the apostles of the circumcision, and the beloved disciple, would not be deficient likewise in this labor of love.—This is true; but the labors of these apostles might have been the very cause why St. John should delay writing.

2. Nothing could tend so strongly to establish the faith of the early Jewish converts as the remarkable circumstances of our Lord's crucifixion, exhibiting the accomplishment of the ancient types and prophecies of the Old Testament respecting Christ's passion, or sufferings in the flesh. These St. John alone could record, as he was the only eyewitness of that last solemn scene among the apostles. To these, therefore, he alludes in the exordium, as well as to the circumstances of our Lord's appearances after the resurrection; and to these he again recalls their attention in that remarkable reference to "the water" at his baptism; to "the water and blood" at his passion, and to the dismissal of "his spirit" when he commended it to his Father, and expired, (chap. v. 5-9.)—This argument really appears to be but of little weight; the early converts had the other Gospels in their hands; and there does not seem to have been any necessity for St. John's writing ten or twenty years earlier.

3. The parallel testimony in the Gospel (John xix. 35-37.) bears witness also to the priority of the Epistle, in the expression, "He that saw hath testified" (μεμαρτύρηκε), intimating that he had delivered this testimony to the world already; for if now, for the first time, it should rather be expressed by the present tense μαρτυρεῖ, "testifieth." And this is strongly confirmed by the Apostle's same expression, after giving his evidence in the Epistle, "This is the testimony of God, which he hath testified (μεμαρτύρηκε) concerning his Son," (ver. 9.), referring to the past transaction, as fulfilling prophecy.—It is acknowledged that the Epistle was written first: but this does not settle the date.

"Though this composition is called an Epistle, nothing is to be found in it," Bishop Horsley has observed, "of the epistolary form. It is not inscribed to any individual, like St. Paul's to Timothy and Titus, or the second of the two which follow it, 'to the well-beloved Gaius'—nor to any particular Church, like St. Paul's to the Churches of Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, and others—nor to the faithful of any particular region, like St. Peter's First Epistle to 'the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, nor to any principal branch of the Christian Church, like St. Paul's to the Hebrews—nor to the Christian Church in general, like the Second of St. Peter, 'to them that had obtained like precious faith with him,' and like St. Jude's 'to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called.' It bears no such inscription: it begins without salutation, and ends without benediction. It is true, the writer sometimes speaks, but without naming himself in the first person—and addresses his reader without naming him in the second. But this colloquial style is very common in all writings of a plain familiar cast: instances of it occur in St. John's Gospel; and it is by no means a distinguishing character of epistolary composition. It should seem that this book hath for no other reason acquired the title of an Epistle, but that in the first formation of the canon of the New Testament it was put into the same volume with the didactic writings of the apostles, which, with this single exception, are all in the epistolary form. It is indeed a didactic discourse upon the principles of Christianity, both in doctrine and practice ; and whether we consider the sublimity of its opening with the fundamental topics of God's perfections, man's depravity, and Christ's propitiation—the perspicuity with which it propounds the deepest mysteries of our holy faith, and the evidence of the proof which it brings to confirm them ; whether we consider the sanctity of its precepts, and the energy of argument with which they are enforced—the dignified simplicity of language in which both doctrine and precept are delivered ; whether we regard the importance of the matter, the propriety of the style, or the general spirit of ardent piety and warm benevolence, united with a fervid zeal, which breathes throughout the whole composition—we shall find it in every respect worthy of the holy author to whom the constant tradition of the Church ascribes it, 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.' ”

Admirable as these observations of Bishop Horsley are, this eminent theologian has omitted to observe, that the solemn and yet affectionate charges it contains to mutual love and charity seem more especially to constitute this composition what it is generally called, a Catholic Epistle. It may be considered as the last advice of the surviving Apostle, enforcing the dying injunctions of his and our Divine Master. It is limited to no nation—it is equally addressed and is equally suitable to all mankind, that they love one another. It is the precept which, if observed, will ever be the criterion by which the true Christian will be distinguished, without which, faith, and hope, and profession and practice, will be incomplete and unavailing.

NOTE 38.—PART XV.

GENERAL REMARKS ON THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF ST. JOHN.

THE Second and Third Epistles of John may be regarded as an epitome of the First Epistle, containing very little which is not to be found in the former.

The thoughts and style of both are so similar to those of the First Epistle, that almost all critics attribute them to St. John ; and suppose in all probability they were written about the same time as that Epistle. Various reasons have been assigned to account for the doubts entertained of their authenticity by the primitive Church. Michaelis thinks they originated from the address, in which the author neither calls himself John, nor assumes the title of an Apostle, but simply names himself “the elder” (ὁ πρεσβύτερος): which title the Apostle John might with great propriety assume, as, by reason of his great age, he was probably the only remaining Apostle. It is however most probable, that, being letters to private persons, they had been kept by the descendants of the families to whom they were written, and were not discovered till long after the Apostle's decease. In which case, on their first discovery, all the immediate vouchers for their genuineness must have departed this life ; and the Church of Christ, vigilantly on its guard against imposture, hesitated to receive them into the number of canonical Scriptures, until it was fully ascertained that they were divinely inspired.

The Second Epistle is cited by Irenæus, and received by Clemens of Alexandria. Origen mentions all three Epistles, and remarks that the Second and Third were not allowed to be genuine by all persons. Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, speaks of them as being ascribed to St. John. The Second Epistle was quoted by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria ; and the three Epistles were received by Athanasius, by Cyril of Jerusalem, by Epiphanius, by Jerome, by Ruffinus, and all those writers who received the same canon of the New Testament that we do.

Commentators are greatly divided respecting the person to whom the Second Epistle is addressed. Some suppose it to have been written to an individual, others to some particular Church.

Archbishop Newcome, Wakefield, Macknight, and the translators of our authorized version, make ἐκλεκτῇ to be an adjective, and render the inscription “to the elect (or excellent, or chosen) Lady ;” the Vulgate version, Clemens of Alexandria, Calmet, Wolf, and Wetstein, consider ἐκλεκτῇ to be a proper name, and translate it, “To the Lady Eclecta ;” Schleusner, Rosenmüller, and Benson, take Κυρία to be a proper name, and the Epistle to be addressed to Kyria the Elect. Michaelis supposes Κυρία to be an ellipsis of Κυρία Ἐκκλησία, which, among the ancient Greeks, signified an assembly of the people held at a stated time, and was held at Athens three times in every month ; and that, since the sacred writers adopted the term Ἐκκλησία, from its civil use among the Greeks, Κυρία Ἐκκλησία might here mean the stated assembly of the Christians, held every Sunday ; and thus τῇ ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ, with ἐκκλησία, understood, would signify, “To the elect Church or Community which comes together on Sundays.” He acknowledges, however, at the same time, that he cannot produce any instance of such ellipsis. Of these various hypotheses, that of Beza, which establishes the authorized translation, appears the most probable. He observes, in his note on the inscription, “Some think Eclecta a proper name, which I do not approve, because in that case the order of the words would have been Κυρίᾳ Ἐκλεκτῇ, ‘to the Lady Eclecta.’ Others think this name denotes the Christian Church in general. But that is disproved, first, by its being a manner of speaking altogether unusual; secondly, by the Apostle's expressly promising, in the two last verses, to come to her and her children; thirdly, by sending to her the salutation of her sister, whom he also calls Eclecta. I therefore think this Epistle was inscribed to a woman of eminence, of whom there were some here and there, who supported the Church with their wealth, and that he called her Elect, that is, excellent, and gave her the title of Κυρία, 'Lady,' just as St. Luke gave to Theophilus, and St. Paul gave to Festus, the title of Κράτιστος, 'Most excellent.' For the Christian religion doth not forbid such honorable titles to be given when they are due."

Macknight thinks this Epistle was written to confute the errors of Basilides, which were propagated by his followers, in the latter end of the first century. These false teachers affirmed, that Christ was a man in appearance only, consequently that his death and sufferings were not real, but only in appearance. Therefore, as this doctrine concerning the person of Christ did away entirely with his atonement and vicarious sacrifice, John particularly cautions this lady and her children against receiving into her house those teachers who taught it (ver. 7.), that they might not be exposed to their licentiousness, or the danger of being deceived by them, or assist them in spreading their errors. It is uncertain where this lady lived—but as the Apostle mentions his intention of visiting her soon, it is conjectured she resided near Ephesus, from which place this letter was written. Some suppose the Elect Lady was deaconess of some Church, at whose house it is probable the apostles and evangelists were hospitably provided for and accommodated, in their different journeys.

NOTE 39.—PART XV.

ON THE THIRD EPISTLE OF ST. JOHN.

THIS Third Epistle of St. John is supposed to be addressed to a converted Gentile. In the history of the Acts, and in the Epistles, five persons of this name are mentioned—A Gaius of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29.); a Gaius of Derbe, a city of Lycaonia, or Isauria (Acts xx. 4.); a Gaius who was St. Paul's host at Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23.); a Gaius whom this Apostle baptized at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 14.), supposed to have been the same as the preceding; and the Gaius to whom this Epistle is inscribed, who is by some considered to have been a convert of the Apostle John, as he numbers him among his children; and therefore a different person from the others mentioned of the same name. The majority of modern commentators, however, are of opinion, that the Epistle was more probably written to the Gaius of Corinth, who was conspicuous for his hospitality and kindness to the preachers of the Gospel. But it is impossible at this time to distinguish with any degree of certainty between these individuals. Commentators are also equally divided as to the character and official situation of Diotrophes. Bede and Erasmus, with Michaelis, suppose him to have been the founder of a new sect. But Lamy observes this is not probable; for had he preached false doctrines, St. John would certainly have cautioned Gaius and the Church against them. Grotius, Le Clerc, and Beausobre conjecture, that Diotrophes refused to receive (being a Gentile convert) Jewish Christians. Heuman thought he was a deacon. Lardner, with many others, imagines him to have been a bishop, who desired to rule every thing in his Church according to his own pleasure; and that he restrained the deacons from employing any part of the funds of the Church in relieving the brethren and strangers, casting them out of the Church if they persisted in entertaining or relieving them. Likewise, from ver. 9., where St. John appears to assert he had written to the Church, and insinuates that Diotrophes would not acknowledge his apostolical authority, having assumed a preëminence of episcopal power, he had suppressed his letter, and had prevented it from being read, according to the usual manner, in the public assemblies, for the direction and instruction of the people. On which account, with the additional consideration of his persecuting conduct, it is more probable that John wrote this Epistle to Gaius after the brethren had informed him of the letter, and of the hospitality and kindness of Gaius. From these arguments it is reasonable to suppose, that he was either a turbulent and ambitious elder, or bishop of the Church of which Gaius was a member; and that, being a converted Jew, he violently opposed the admission of the Gentiles, and became the leading opponent of the apostles.

Commentators also differ much in their opinions concerning the brethren and strangers mentioned ver. 5. It is generally supposed, from the circumstance of their having praised the liberality of Gaius, in the presence of the Church, that they were the rulers of that Church over which John was supposed to preside, which was the Church of Ephesus. And as this Apostle desired Gaius to assist and forward them on their journey (ver. 6.), that they were going out a second time to the Gentiles. The strangers likewise are variously described—Grotius and Lampe think them believing Jews, driven out of Palestine by their unbelieving brethren, or by the calamities of the Jewish war. Benson, with many others, considers them Gentile converts, whom Diotrophes refused to receive, because they did not observe the rites of the Mosaic Law. He is led to this conclusion from the recorded fact, that Diotrophes did not acknowledge the authority and apostleship of St. John (ver. 9.); and he thinks that none but the Judaizing teachers denied the authority of the apostles.

Macknight says, with respect to the strangers, without determining in this place whether they were expelled from their native country for the faith and profession of the holy name of Christ (which was the opinion of Heuman) or not—"I suppose that having come to the place where the brethren, of whom the Apostle speaks, dwelled, they joined them in their journey; which I think was undertaken for the sake of preaching Christ to the Gentiles. If I am right in this conjecture, the strangers as well as the brethren were preachers, as above observed. For, if they were only persons in want, it was no commendation of them 'that they went forth taking nothing of the Gentiles;' because standing in need of alms, it was their duty not only to receive, but even to ask alms for the support of their life from the unbelieving Gentiles; especially as in many places there may have been no Christians to whom they could apply for relief: whereas, if they were preachers, they were greatly to be praised, when, in imitation of the Apostle St. Paul, they supported themselves by their own labor, and took nothing from their Gentile converts on the score of maintenance, lest it might have marred the success of their preaching. In short, if these brethren and strangers had not been preachers, the Apostle could not with propriety have said (ver. 8.) 'We therefore ought to receive such, that we may be joint laborers in the truth.' For the terms 'laborers' and 'joint laborers' are always, in apostolical writings, applied to preachers of the Gospel, or to those who in some way or other assisted the preachers of the Gospel. These things Lardner did not attend to, when he said, 'I see nothing that should lead us to think preachers are spoken of, but only persons in want.'"

Benson and Rosenmüller agree in supposing Demetrius to have been one of the brethren mentioned in this Epistle, who went forth to preach to the Gentiles, and that he was the particular bearer of this letter. This opinion appears more probable than that which maintains that he held some sacred office in the Church of which Gaius was a member, for had that been the case, it would have been unnecessary to have mentioned his piety and exemplary conduct to the good and hospitable Gaius.

The authenticity of the Third Epistle of St. John has been discussed in the preface to the Second. There is reason to suppose they were both written about the same time, at Ephesus, over which Church John is thought to have presided, when he was eminent for his great age; and that they were received at the same time into the Sacred Canon.

VIII.	St. Paul arrives at Rome, and is kindly received by the Brethren.	Acts xxviii. part of v. 14 to 16.	Rome.	327
IX.	St. Paul summons the Jews at Rome, to explain to them the Causes of his Imprisonment.	Acts xxviii. 17-29.	328
X.	St. Paul writes his Epistle to the Ephesians, to establish them in the Christian Faith, by describing, in the most animating Language, the Mercy of God displayed in the Calling of the Gentiles through Faith in Christ, without being subjected to the Law of Moses, and to enforce upon them that Holiness and Consistency of Conduct, which is required of all who have received the Knowledge of Salvation.	THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.	61	4774	328
XI.	St. Paul writes his Epistle to the Philip- pians, to comfort them under the Concern they had expressed on the Subject of his Imprisonment—to exhort them to continue in union and mutual love, and to caution them against the Seductions of false Teachers, who had begun to introduce themselves among them.	THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.	62	4775	338
XII.	St. Paul writes his Epistle to the Colossians, in reply to the Message of Epaphras, to prove that the Hope of Man's Salvation is founded on the Atonement of Christ alone; and, by the Establishment of opposite Truths, to eradicate the Errors of the Judaizers, who not only preached the Mosaic Law, but also the Opinions of the Heathen, Oriental, or Essenian Philosophers, concerning the Worship of Angels, on account of their supposed Agency in human Affairs and the necessity of abstaining from animal Food.	THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.	345
XIII.	St. Paul writes his Epistle to his Friend Philemon, to intercede with him in favor of his Slave Onesimus, who had fled from the Service of his Master to Rome; in which City he had been converted to Christianity by Means of the Apostle's Ministry.	THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.	351
XIV.	St. James writes his Epistle to the Jewish Christians in general, to caution them against the prevalent Evils of the Day—to rectify the Errors into which many had fallen, by misinterpreting St. Paul's Doctrine of Justification, and to enforce various Duties.	THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF ST. JAMES.	Jerusalem.	352
XV.	St. Paul remains at Rome for two years, during which time the Jews do not dare to prosecute him before the Emperor.	Acts xxviii. 30, 31.	Rome.	359

PART XV.

From the Commencement of the Fifth and last Journey of St. Paul to the Completion of the Canon of the whole Scriptures—With a brief Survey of the History of the Christian Church to the present Time.

I.	St. Paul, while waiting in Italy for Timothy, writes the Key to the Old Testament—the Epistle to the Hebrews—to prove to the Jews, from their own Scriptures, the Humanity, Divinity, Atonement, and Intercession of Christ—the Superiority of the Gospel to the Law—and the real Object and Design of the Mosaic Institution.	THE EPISTLE TO THE HE- BREWS.	Italy.	62 or 63	4775 or 4776	360
II.	After his Liberation, St. Paul visits Italy, Spain, Britain, and the West.		Italy, Spain, Britain.	63-4	4776-7	381
III.	He then proceeds to Jerusalem.		Jerusalem.	384
IV.	From Jerusalem to Antioch in Syria.		Antioch.	65	4778	384
V.	From Antioch to Colossé.		Colosse.	384
VI.	From Colossé to Philippi.		Philippi.	384
VII.	From Philippi to Corinth.		Corinth.	385
VIII.	From Corinth to Troas.		Troas.	385
IX.	From Troas to Miletum.		Miletum.	385
X.	From Miletum to Rome.		Rome.	385
XI.	St. Paul is imprisoned at Rome in the general Persecution by Nero.		386
XII.	St. Paul, in the Anticipation of the near approach of Death, writes his Second Epistle to Timothy, exhorting him, as his last request, to the faithful Discharge of his Duty, in all times of Apostacy, Persecution, and Dissension.	THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.	Italy.	65 or 66	4778 or 4779	386
XIII.	St. Peter writes his first Epistle to the Jews, who, in the time of Persecution, had taken Refuge in the heathen Countries mentioned in the Inscription, and also to the Gentile Converts, to encourage them to suffer cheerfully for their Religion; and to enforce upon them the Necessity of leading a holy and blameless Life, that they may put to shame the Calumnies of their Adversaries.	THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. PE- TER.	Rome.	391
XIV.	St. Peter, under the Impression of approaching Martyrdom, writes to the Jewish and Gentile Christians, dispersed in the Countries of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, &c., to confirm the Doctrines and Instructions of his former Letter, to caution them against the Errors of the false Teachers, by reminding them of the Judgments of God on Apostates, and to encourage them under Persecution, by the Consideration of the happy Deliverance of those who trusted in him, and the final Dissolution both of this World and of the Jewish Dispensation.	THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. PE- TER.	Italy, or Rome.	66	4779	398
XV.	Jude writes his Epistle to caution the Christian Church against the dangerous Tenets of the false Teachers, who had now appeared, subverting the Doctrine of Grace to the Encouragement of Licentiousness; and to exhort them to a steadfast Adherence to the Faith and Holiness.	THE GENER- AL EPISTLE OF JUDE.	Probably Syria.	403

XVIII.	St. John writes the Apocalypse to supply the place of a continued Succession of Prophets in the Christian Church, till the second coming of Christ to judge the World.	THE BOOK OF REVELATION.	Patmos.	96	4799	407
XIX.	St. John writes his First Epistle to confute the Errors of the false Teachers, and their different Sects—against the Docetæ, who denied the Humanity of Christ, asserting that his Body and Sufferings were not real, but imaginary—against the Cerinthians and Ebionites, who contended that he was a mere Man, and that his Divinity was only adventitious, and therefore separated from him at his Passion—and against the Nicolaitanes, or Gnostics, who taught that the Knowledge of God and Christ was sufficient for Salvation; that being justified by Faith, and freed from the Restraints of the Law, they might indulge in Sin with Impunity—He cautions Christians from being seduced by these Doctrines and Practices, by condemning them in the strongest Terms—He contrasts them with the Truths and Doctrines of the Gospel, in which they had been instructed, and in which they are exhorted to continue.	THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN.	Ephesus.	429
	St. John writes his Second Epistle to caution a Christian Mother and her Children against the Seductions and pernicious Errors of the false Teachers, supposed to be a sect of the Gnostics.	THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.	437
	St. John writes his Third Epistle to Gaius, to praise him for his steadfast faith and kindness to some Christian Brethren and strangers, and to recommend them again to his protection and benevolence—to rebuke and to caution him against the presumptuous arrogance of Diotrophes, who had denied his authority, and disobeyed his injunctions, and to recommend Demetrius to his attention, and the imitation of the church.	THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.	438
XX.	St. John sanctions the Books of the New Testament, and completes the Canon of Scripture, by writing his Gospel, at the Request of the Church at Ephesus.		439
XXI.	Brief View of the Condition of the Jews, the Stations of the Sanhedrin, and its Labors before the final and total Dispersion of the Nation; with an Outline of the History of the visible Church, from the closing of the Canon of Scripture to the present Day; and the Prospects of the permanent Happiness of Mankind, in the present and future World.		443
